NOTE ON VOLUME III

THIS volume of the Encyclopaedia concentrates on histories of different languages including Tibeto-Burman and Austro-Asian, and of literature in them. The usual fare of entries on significant authors and books is also provided in alphabetical order. These surveys mention, willy-nilly, a good many of the authors and books on which separate entries also occur in the Encyclopaedia, leading, maybe, to an impression of repetition; but in order to offer a clear perspective for an understanding of the growth and development of Indian literature, it was thought necessary to err by a reasonable excess, allowing the entries on books and authors to serve as illustrations of trends and turns in the process of development.

It has been noted by some reviewers that the general entries are not common to all languages. In fact, they cannot be. Some forms of literature are not as popular or important in some languages as they are in others. And since the representative character of the entries was expected to be maintained, we could not insist on the inclusion of entries on the same general topic in all the languages. Additionally, in the lists prepared by the expert committees of all the languages, all the general topics were not found to be common. We could not naturally interfere with the lists and in some cases, the entries on the general topics found in the lists, did not reach us even at the last stage of printing. As it has been editorially promised in the first volume, we will include all important entries, left out owing to unavoidable reasons, in the last volume of addenda. We will also accommodate in the last volume entries on the general topics, if on second thought, the expert committees decide to have them in common with other languages.

It has been observed by some that the major authors in different languages do not sometimes get the coverage they deserve. But if we note that all their major works are separately dealt with and that taken together, all that is written on them and their works makes for an adequate assessment of their achievement, then this criticism may not appear to be valid.

The nature of this work is foundational and the limitations are many, because the material for a work of this magnitude is being explored for the first time. Some errors therefore cannot be avoided in spite of the best efforts of all those concerned with the publication of this pioneering venture. But the errors detected can be and will be rectified and the entries, particularly on authors, updated in the later editions. The opinions expressed by the contributors do not necessarily reflect those of the Akademi or the Editorial Board.

KAB TAK PUKARUN-KABIR GRANTHAVALI

KAB TAK PUKARUN (Hindi). A litterateur of rare versatility, Rangeya Raghava stands out as one of the foremost Hindi novelists of the post-Independence era, and his work Kab tak pukarun? (1957) is one of about a dozen remarkable Hindi novels that have enriched this literary genre since Independence. Rangeya Raghava, like Premchand, is one of those Hindi novelists who attracted the discerning readers' attention with his very first novel Gharaunde (1941) which he wrote at the young age of about 18 years. There was no looking back for him since the appearance of that novel until the age of 39 when the cruel hand of destiny snatched away from his readers this versatile author of 136 books in all genres.

Kab tak pukarun? portrays the miserable life style of 'Karnats', a backward community inhabiting a part of Rajasthan. They have got so much accustomed to their wretched lot that they do not resent their harassment and exploitation at all levels at the hands of the upper castes and petty officials alike. The entire community is oppressed because of their economic affliction, deprivation and the prevalent social system. These so-called criminal tribes have lost all their moral standards because of constant moral and physical exploitation through money power on the one hand, and State power on the other. Sexual exploitation of women through money and power arouses no sense of resentment and rebellion in their menfolk. They have sunk low to such levels of disgraceful life that they take all this in their stride. The hero of the novel Shukhrum, a sturdy and rugged man of moral and physical strength, tries to take a stand, but his circumstances force him to make compromises at every step. His reactions and responses, as the plot-structure winds its way through various situations, have been very sympathetically portrayed by the author with a psychological perspective. The author seems to be in total command of all the situations that develop and his structural skill never lets any strand go out of his hand. His understanding of human sensibilities is complete and infallible. With a plethora of incidents and episodes to manage, he never allows a diffusion to set in.

Kab tak pukarun? is a commendably successful novel and may be cited as a proof of the progressive artistic excellence and finesse achieved by the author in a short life.

KABBIGARA KAVA (Kannada) is a Kannada poem by Andayya (1180-1217), comprising 272 stanzas. The poet gave his work the title 'Kavanagellam'. It narrates the story of a king called Karuvilla. His wife is Ichegarathi. He learns that Shiva has abducted Chandra, one of his followers. He sets forth to battle, meets a Jinamuni on the way, pays respects to him, and then attacks Shiva with his flowery arrows. Shiva becomes half female, and curses Karuvilla. As a result, the king is separated from his wife and becomes the ruler of another kingdom. When an 'apsare' (a celestial nymph) reveals his past he is freed from the curse and is united with his wife.

The poet was probably in the court of Kamadeva of the Kadamba dynasty. He seems to have identified his patron with the Kamadeva of mythology. The poem is also a glorification of Jainism. As a poem it is readable; it narrates a story of love with restraint. It is best remembered for the poet's avowed attempt to exclude Sanskrit words. He declares that his predecessors had all mixed Sanskrit words with Kannada words as if a story could not be narrated in Kannada without the support of Sanskrit words, and that he composed this poem as a 'Kabbigara kava' (One who composed a poem in pure Kannada, and thus saved, become the Saviour of Poets). His style is generally simple and smooth and he occasionally displays poetic talent. He describes both the Kannada land and the Kannada language in glowing words.

KABI KARNA (Oriya) Though the exact dates of his birth and death are not known, he is said to have lived in the 17th century. It was the time of Muslim rule in Orissa when many rulers indulged in iconoclastic activities against the Hindu religion. Hence attempts were made to defend the Hindu religion in devious ways. One such was to transform the Muslim divinity 'Satyapir' into Hindu 'Satyanarayana' and people wrote poetical accounts called 'pala' to celebrate the divinity's powers. Kabi Karna was the first writer to write palas in Oriya, and he introduced 'Satyanarayan pala' in the contemporary society. He wrote sixteen palas which were popularly known as 'solapala' (sixteen palas) and contained sixteen different stories in verse, mostly in rhymed couplets, and in a combination of both Oriya and Bengali languages. These are generally stories depicting people in great distress and suffering, from which they escape through worshipping Satyanarayana who was revered as an incarnation of divine Lord Vishnu. These palas are often read out at the time of real worship, and apart from their narrative interest, they contain moral instructions for the listeners. Solapala is a collection of stories in verse as also a compendium motivating people irrespective of communities towards developing faith in gods and religion. To that extent Kabi Karna remains an important poet, whose book not only had a significant social impact but also inspired many writers subsequently to write similar books.

KABIR GRANTHAVALI (Hindi) is an authentic collection of poems of Kabirdas, the great mystic poet of the fifteenth century. This celebrated collection of the work (Vani) of the great poet was first published in 1930 by Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi, edited very meticulously by Babu Shyamsundar Das. The text of the work is based on the manuscript which was compiled in 1504, fourteen years before the death of Kabirdas. It is supposed to have been penned by some Malookdas, but it is not certain whether he was the same famous disciple of Kabirdas, who later achieved renown as a saint poet in his own right. Whatever Kabirdas preached through his verses during his last fourteen years, was compiled mostly in the Guru Granth Sahib, the holy book of the Sikh Panth, compiled in the year 1604. In this Granthavali, it finds place in the form of 'Appendix'.

Before the publication of the Granthavali, Bijak or Kabir bijak was regarded as the most authentic account of the poet's teachings. Now Kabir granthavali enjoys the reputation of being the most authoritative and popular work of the poet. It has seen many reprints till date. Later, Parasnath Tiwari also edited a Kabir granthavali (1961). He subjected the text to rigorous examination to determine the authenticity of the verses. He emphasized that only 200 padas, 744 couplets—sakhis and a few ramainis—are originally Kabir's. However, Kabir granthavali, edited by Tiwari, could not gain that popularity and status as is even now enjoyed by the Granthavali edited by Babu Shyamsundar Das.

Some important translations of a few poems of Kabirdas appeared from time to time in English as also in other Indian languages, but these do not cover the whole gamut of his poetry, and as such, they give only a glimpse of his vast poetic treasure. Acharya Kshitishmohan Sen of Vishva Bharati first collected and translated his poems in -to Bengali in 4 parts (1910-11). Poet Rabindranath Tagore rendered the most popular translation in English, One Hundred Poems of Kabir, which was published in 1915 by Macmillan and Co., London. It was very warmly and widely received. An English poet also translated fortyfour poems of Kabir under the title The Kabir Book (1971). Ch. Vaudeville also published Kabir Granthavali (only the couplets) from institute Francais d' Indologie, Pondicherry (1957), and a title Kabir Vol. I from Oxford University Press, London (1974), in which again only a few couplets are translated. At present the translations of Kabir's poems are available in almost all important Indian languages.

The three parts of Kabir granthavali consist of 'sakhi'—composed in doha (couplet) metre, 'pada' based mostly on the musical 'ragas' and 'ramaini' also based on ragas, but mostly descriptive and quite lengthy in character. There are 409 'sakhis' (the couplets) which are classified under 59 various captions. The 'padavali' consists of 403 padas which are composed, rather arranged later, in various musical ragas. The third part is made up of seven 'ramainis' of various types 'satpadis'—(of seven stanzas), 'ashtapadis' (of eight stanzas) and chaupadis (of four stanzas). Under the title 'Parishishta' (Appendix), the editor has given verses not included in Granthavali, but found in Guru Granth Sahib. This part comprises 192 couplets or sakhis, and 222 padas. Naturally this Granthavali becomes an invaluable treasurehouse of Kabir's poetry.

The verses of Granthavali can be classified under three categories: (1) Bhakti poetry, (2) Philosophical poetry and (3) Poetry of social awakening. The prime concern of Kabir is bhakti. In the poems of bhakti, he establishes a rapport with the Supreme Lord, calling Him by various names—Rama, Hari, Gobind, Keshava, Madhava, Allah, etc., but the dearest one to Kabir is Rama. However, these names are not of much consequence to him. That is why he assigns different names to the Lord. According to the poet, the salvation from this world can be attained only by remembering (Naam sumaran), which is the best way to be with Him, to be merged in the Infinite. Kabir firmly believes that only a true 'guru' can initiate his disciple into bhakti (devotion). To realise Him, one must give up a life of dalliance. Without the purity of heart and deed, the goal of bhakti cannot be reached.

Kabir becomes mystical in his approach when he remembers God as his husband, the darling of the heart, and considers himself to be His beloved and wife. This part of his poetry deals with the most intimate and personal way to the realisation of the Lord. He seeks the reunion of the soul with the Infinite by the expression of love in whatever simile or metaphor he can think of.

In his philosophical poetry, Kabir tries to convey his perceptions regarding the supernatural (Brahma), soul (Jiva), universe (Jagat), illusion (Maya), and their inter-relations. The kernel of the mystical poems of Kabir is the oneness of the Supreme being and the individual soul.

Kabir's poetry of social awakening is relevant to all the ages. He rejects formalism in religion, society and life, attacks vehemently the dogmas, rituals and ceremonies, denounces the scriptures, formal religion, the caste system, the priesthood, the Mullah and the Pandit alike. Though all this appears very commonplace today, it required a great deal of courage in the Middle ages to challenge the established authority. The powerful weapon of satire lends a unique charm to his poetic diction. Naturally his style touches the right chord. By this virtue, Kabir becomes the real poet of the masses and of the elite as well.

What makes Kabir's poetry so enduring, relevant, refreshing and invigorating for all ages, is the uncovering of the essence of true religion, the real hallmark of a true devotee, the revolutionary vision of social change, his approach animated by humanism and modernity—the qualities which make his poetry so outstanding.

KABIR, HUMAYUN (English; b. 1906 d. 1970). An Indo-Anglian poet and educationist, he had a brilliant academic career at Calcutta and Oxford. He worked as Secretary, Oxford Union Society, and also as President,

KABIRDAS

Jowett Society. He worked for some time at the Andhra University, Waltair, before joining Calcutta University as Lecturer in Philosophy (1934-34). In 1941 he delivered the Sir George Stanley Lectures at the Madras University which were later published as Poetry, Monads and Society (Calcutta University, 1941).

Kabir was an active participant in the nationalist movement and organised many student, labour and peasant movements in Bengal. After Independence, he held several distinguished positions in the Government of India including those of the Secretary and Educational Adviser, Chairman, University Grants Commission, Consultant for the Fund for Advancement of Education, New York, Head of the Indian delegation of educationists to the USSR, Chairman, Executive Board of the Indian National Commission for UNESCO and Minister for Scientific Research and Cultural Affairs. In these capacities, he helped the restructuring of elementary and secondary education, as well as of higher education. He also helped in moulding the country's policy on science and technology.

Kabir was a versatile thinker and a prolific writer. Besides being a writer of books on cultural and socio-economic themes, he was a poet, novelist, critic and short story writer. He also worked as editor of Bharat and Chaturanga.

He wrote in both Bengali and English. As a poet, he shows a remarkable eye for naturalistic detail and considerable insight into the Indian landscape as in 'The Padma'. Poems such as 'Mahatma' and 'Trains' show his lyrical gift. Besides poetry, Kabir also wrote a novel based on the life of rural Bengal, entitled Men and Rivers (1945) in which the river becomes a metaphor for both the permanence and the flux of life.

Kabir also wrote several books of general interest such as The Indian Heritage (1946), Science, Democracy and Islam (1955) etc. Many of his writings have been translated into Swedish, German and French.

FURTHER WORKS: Bengali: Swapna-sadh (Poetry, 1927), Sath (Poetry, 1931); English: Monads and Society (1941), Mahatma and other Poems (1941), Banglar kavya (Criticism, 1945); Men and Rivers (Novel, 1945), The Indian Heritage (1946; rev. edn. 1955), Of Cabbages and Kings (Essays, 1948), Science, Democracy and Islam (1955), Studies in Bengali Poetry (1962), Indian Philosophy of Education (1965), Saratchandra Chatterjee.

KABIRDAS (Hindi; b.1398, d.1518). Kabir's name is extremely popular among the Hindi devotional poets, who propounded the school of Impersonal Worship (Nirgun dhara). Kabir is known especially for his forthrightness, his integrity and his humanistic approach. He never believed in any particular sect, doctrine or creed, but owing to the emergence of 'Kabir panth' or 'Kabir's sect,' his life history got shrouded in the mist of many superstitions and legends.

There exists a great difference of opinion among the scholars about the time of Kabir's birth. But there are some incontrovertible facts on the basis of which the time of his birth can be established. Kabir was known to be a disciple of Ramanand. There is a clear mention of Kabir's name amongst the twelve leading disciples of Ramanand, which evidently establishes his contemporariness with Ramanand. According to Kabir charita bodh, he was born on the full moon day of Jyestha in Vikram Samvat 1455, at Kashi. In the subsequent account of Kabir panth, his life span, replete with many miraculous events, stretched over a period of 120 years. According to these books, Kabir died in 1518. There are many popular legends concerning the place of his death, and according to them, he breathed his last in Magahar where he went of his own free will. He had decided himself to die at Magahar to challenge the superstitious belief that death at Magahar was a sure way to hell.

Kabir believed in leading a normal family life unlike other ascetic poets of this period. He did not leave his ancestral occupation of a weaver throughout his life. He married in a usual manner, and the wedlock produced a daughter and a son. Thus, he discharged all the duties of an average householder. In his religious outlook there was no place for the parochiality of the Hindu and the Muslim religious faiths. He had unshaken faith in the omnipotence of God, sans sectarian or religious considerations.

He was vehemently opposed to Idol-worship and did not have any faith in the incarnation of God in human form. He opposed ritual worship, e.g. undertaking fasts, pilgrimages, wearing ochre robes, etc. To speak aloud against the hypocrisy and deceitfulness prevalent during his time was his very nature. His listeners were at times hurt by his loud and discordant voice, but Kabir never wavered from his path of forthright utterances. He always advised everybody to know the truth that lay within each one of us.

It is also popularly believed that Kabir never had any formal education in his lifetime. There were two sources through which he accumulated rich knowledge. The first was a store of self-experience which he considered to be his guide on the path to knowledge, and the other was his constant communion with holy men, ascetics, Sadhus, etc. He heard their discourses religiously to enrich his knowledge. In this light, Kabir's was a very keenly receptive and sensitive mind. If the sayings of these holy men agreed with his own experiences of truth, he would not hesitate to include them in his own system of beliefs. He could never accept the superstitious dogmas, however holy the sacred book that disseminated them.

This style of giving sermons was non-traditional. He would place before the public his belief, versed in a simple, direct and unembellished language, and would try to prove its veracity by various examples and instances. His speech was quite effective and vigorous while giving these sermonic discourses. The language that Kabir used in the propagation of his own inner experience, was not a language of a normal poet, but a powerfully communicative expression of a brilliant mind. It is for this reason that Hajari Prasad Dwivedi eulogizes Kabir as 'a dictator of language'. He even explained the profound metaphysical concepts of Yoga, Vedanta, Nyaya, Sankhya, etc., in a very mature language and earned commendation from learned scholars of his time. The collection of his poems, 'Kabir vani', was published with the title Kabir granthavali by Nagari Pracharani Sabha, Kashi. Besides this, the followers of 'Kabir panth' have also brought out a collection of 'Kabir vani' under the title Kabir bijak. Kabir's dohas are also incorporated in Guru granthsahib. Kabir's poetry touches upon the various aspects of devotion, philosophy, mysticism and social reforms, and he fearlessly projects his own experience.

Kabir is recognised as a poet, social reformer, preacher, founder of a religious school and a fearless humanistic saint. His poetry is relevant even in the modern context of life.

KABIWALA (Bengali). During the latter half of the 18th century both Mangalkabya and Vaishnava poetry of the medieval ages lost their vitality and ultimately declined and in their places was born a new form of secular lyrics. They were the creation of a class of professional singers known as Kabiwala. The city of Calcutta had begun to grow and it was necessary to cater to the taste of the new urban population of Calcutta and its suburbs. The songs mainly secularized the divine love of Radha and Krishna preached by the Vaishnava devotee poets of the medieval ages. They had little or no literary value in comparison with the Vaishnava lyrics. What they offered were amusement and excitement mostly created by high sounding words and artificial altercations.

The songs of the Kabiwala became extremely popular for a period covering nearly a century from the latter half of the 18th century to the first half of the 19th century. But most of this literature has been irretrievably lost. The kabiwalas used to extemporise their songs on the open stage before a watching audience. Because the verses were improvised under such circumstances they lacked literary merit. Yet there were some kabiwalas who became popular as singers and composers. Of them the names of Haru Thakur (1738-1812), Nitai Bairagi (1751-1821) and Ram Basu (1786-1826) deserve mention.

The performance was, in fact, a kind of verbal combat between two parties each consisting of half a dozen singers, men and women, headed by one reputed kabiwala. The kabiwala improvised songs in the form of questions or answers or attacks and counter-attacks. Being a duet, such performances came to be known as 'kabir larai' (poets' fighting).

Ishwarchandra Gupta, a kabiwala in his early life and later the editor of a Calcutta daily newspaper called Sanbad Prabhakkar made a very wide and liberal collection of the accounts of the lives and activities of the kabiwalas of Bengal. He published his collection in his journal. This is practically the only source of our information about the kabiwalas of Bengal.

KABYA SANCHAYAN (Oriya) is a collection of poems by Baikunthanath Pattanaik (1904-1979), known as one of the founder poets of the Sabuja group of the five poets in the early thirties of the present century. The literary history, particularly the history of Oriya poetry, during the years 1920 to 1936, makes a fascinating study and the poems which the anthology Kabya sanchayan comprises form a notable work of the period.

The anthology which consists of about 148 poems was published in early forties and dedicated to Raja Sri Bikram Dev Varma of Jeypore in Orissa, who was a patron of literature.

The poems of Baikunthanath Pattanaik are genuinely philosophical, serious and very much metaphysical and expressive of nobler sentiments of man and woman. His long poem entitled 'Jiban sangit' (Songs of life) and 'Mritika darshane', though they begin with a subjective prelude, grow into stately, grand and subtle philosophical lyrics, remarkable for thought, chaste in diction and sustained in inner feelings. His poems 'Uma', 'Kisa Gotami', 'Varsha baran' possess variety, lyrical passion and flexibility of attitude towards human society and nature.

The bulk of his poems in the anthology Kabya sanchayan manifests rare combination of both romantic mood and classical appeal. Thus his poems are the product of romanticism and philosophical speculations on the supreme divine glory. The poet's true involvement with his lyrics was never on account of any sort of religious faith, but it was combined with spiritual ambitions united with his human passion for truth and beauty and his passion for soul's liberation. The characters in his poems are also drawn from myth and legends. Again, the greatness and success of his poems are due to their grand style and their sublimity of passions and thought. A close study of his poems elevates and uplifts the readers.

KACH DE VASTAR-KADAMBARI-GUJARATI

KACH DE VASTAR (Punjabi). Sohan Singh 'Misha', better known as S.S. Misha, is the author of this collection of poems. Serving as Producer at All India Radio, Jullundur, he has already produced three collections of poems.

His Kach de vastar has two portions—one containing regular poems, and the other ghazals.

In this collection, the poet has portrayed many aspects of the present times. There is an atmosphere of fear, suspicion and distrust everywhere. In a way, every one is attired with a livery of glass, and everyone is cautious to protect it from being broken or cracked by others.

Life is full of struggles, hardships and odds for the common man. If a man recognizes and then fully depends upon his inner strength and confidence, he can face them bravely. There is exploitation of man by man. Man has yet to see good and sunny days.

The poet preaches amity, friendship and brotherhood. Communal disharmony, tension, violence and bloodshed should be condemned and discarded. Hypocrisy and selfishness of modern man are simply horrible. Friendship and nearness cannot be separated by artificial barriers. Penitence and remorse are the best ways to forget the bloody past. Love and understanding can prove an oasis in an arid and strife-torn life. Man should not lose heart against adversities.

Physical craving and relationship are no alternative to the union of minds and souls. Pure and selfless love leaves behind everlasting fragrance even after the beloved departs.

Kach de vastar has ninety five pages. Its second edition has been published by Lahore Book Shop, Ludhiana (Punjab). Title is meaningful, artistic and relevant.

KACHNAR (Hindi) is one of the famous novels of Vrindavanlal Varma who is known as the Walter Scott of Hindi literature. The book was published in 1948. This is not a historical novel as it appears to be, but a blending of history and tradition, which is the usual feature of Varma's historical novels. Varma admits that despite its tendency to exaggerate, the tradition leads to the truth, and as such, it attracts him more than history. For this novel, the author was inspired by his desire to depict the simple, natural and playful life of the Rajgondas and their contribution to the enrichment of Indian culture.

An ordinary slave-girl, Kachnar, is the central figure of the novel. She represents the chastity and vigour of the traditional Indian woman. The novel depicts vividly Kachnar's constant struggle for protection against the feudal kings and the sex-hungry religious priests. It also exposes the moral deterioration of the vicious 'Gosains'. Kachnar was the maid servant of Rani Kalavati who had extramarital relations with Mansingh, cousin of king Dalip. The king was attracted by Kachnar's extra-ordinary beauty and made some lewd advances. But she declined insisting that the king should agree to marry her which he could not. Once when king Dalipsingh had gone to fight against Sagar's army, he got serious head injury falling off his horse. Taking advantage of the situation, Mansingh administered some herb to the king, as a result of which he died. The relatives carrying the king's body for the funeral encountered the squall followed by heavy rain on the way, and they fled for their homes, leaving the dead body unguarded. However, as a result of this sudden downpour, king Dalip came back to life and was rescued by a group of Sadhus headed by Mahant Achalpuri. Emboldened by the death of Dalip, Mansingh married his queen, Kalavati, and tried to spread his lustful tentacles on Kachnar also. But Kachnar took shelter in the 'ashram' of Achalpuri to save herself from the lustful advances of Mansingh. There she met Dalip who failed to remember her as he had lost his memory because of his head injury. In the ashram, mahant Achalpuri tried to entice Kachnar, but she tactfully managed to keep away from him. King Dalip had another serious fall while fighting against Mansingh for Achalpuri, as a result of which he regained his lost memory. Dalip returned to his kingdom, married Kachnar and forgave Mansingh and Kalavati.

As admitted by the author in his preface, this novel is based on historical works, folk songs, tradition and the famous "Bhaval Sanyasi" case, while developing its story. Though many of the incidents on which the novel is based, he scattered in vast expanses of time, the author has condensed them into a single plot with his imagination. The author's main objective is not to depict historical facts, but to bring out the complexities of human nature consequent on the impact of changing social environments and also to expose the human weaknesses masquerading under the garb of religious priesthood and hermitage through the all-transcending love affair of Kachnar and Dalip. The author has also attempted to glorify the role of love in transforming human personality. Varma's probe into the past glory of the country is aimed at bringing out valuable lessons for reforming the present social order.

KADAMBARI (Gujarati), by the medieval Gujarati poet Bhalan (1405-1489), is a translation of the well-known Sanskrit work of Bana. The original work by Bana and his son Pulind Bana is in prose, which has been translated by Bhalan in verse. Original Sanskrit Kadamari of Bana is honoured as poetry and prose. The story writer, Bana, is known as 'Kavi Bana', for, as per Sanskrit commentaries on the work, it has been mentioned that prose writing is a test for the poet. It is really a difficult task even today to translate the prose of Bana into any modern Indian language. It was rather difficult to translate and render into verse in medieval Gujarati the work which was written three hundred years ago. Obviously, the real charm of prose or poetry cannot be communicated through mere verbatim translation. And then, it was so unusual to think of a translation by which to summarise and adapt it in the 16th century idiom. Bhalan was a brilliant translator and poet. He accepted the challenge and succeeded. It proves Bhalan's creative ability and efficiency in translating a work written in poetic prose into verse.

Bhalan was a scholar of Sanskrit. He had also translated Durgasaptashati. In his 'Nalakhyan', he incorporated some of the shlokas of Sanskrit epic Naishadhiya charitam, which shows his scholarship and literary taste. The aim of translating a well-known literary work, Kadambari, differs from the aim of translating such works with religious aim. In the beginning of his work, he clearly mentions the aim: 'I have written in Gujarati for the persons with literary interests, who do not know Sanskrit, wish to enjoy the masterpiece, but are not able to understand it.' In the beginning, he also narrates the story of Bana, and says that the poet Bana lived in the kingdom of Bhoja. It is established that Bana was a poet in the court of King Harshavardhana. Bhalan mentioned the name of Bhoja because Bhoja was known and various legends prevailed about his poets in Gujarat.

This work of Bhalan is not only rare and unique, but it is also a work of quality and great merit. According to the well-known critic of medieval Gujarati literature, the work of Bhalan is not a mere translation but it is a creation based on the original work. It has been honoured as recreation. Original Sanskrit Kadambari of Bana is so complex in style and narration that its literal translation is rather difficult. Bhalan was well aware of this difficulty. He clearly mentions that 'the prose and verse of Bana is full of figures of speech, and language is difficult'. Hence, he has adopted a way that can judiciously reflect the charm of the original. The story of Kadambari, as narrated by Bana, is long, and so Bhalan tried to summarise it. He says, 'I am giving it in brief, in the light of my understanding. If I try to do verbatim translation, it would become extremely long'. These references show not only Bhalan's limitations and aims, but also his understanding and ability. As a result, an excellent work in the Gujarati language appeared 300 years after the original Kadambari was written.

As a literary form, it resembles the early 'akhyana'. In this particular form of Gujarati literature, the story is divided into cantos known as 'kadavun'. It is a verse which is to be sung in its traditional composition, known as 'deshi dhal', which the poet or the narrator has to sing and recite with the help of 'mana', a rhythm instrument. Bhalan is the father of this particular form, 'akhyana'. It narrates the story in verse, which is not based on any regular metre. Kadambari of Bhalan is also in 'deshi'. He has utilised the main characteristics and total number of letters, known as 'matra' i.e. bits of 'dohara', 'chopai', 'savaiya' and 'harigeet'. These traditional metres help the lucid narration of the story and are easy to sing. The contribution to the development of 'deshi dhal' through Kadambari also goes to Bhalan's credit.

Original Sanskrit Kadambari, as it is known, is in two parts, the first one written by Bana and the second one written by his son Pulind Bana. Bhalan's Kadambari is also divided into two parts, known as 'purvabhag' and 'uttarbhag'. The first part consists of 23 cantos and the second of 40. Bhalan was not a mere scholar, but a poet too. Hence, his work is remarkable not only in Gujarati literature but also in medieval Indian literature, for such a classic achievement is rare.

KADAMBARI (Sanskrit), a Sanskrit Romantic prose work by Bana (7th Cent.), is an imaginative tale, technically in the 'katha' form, a romantic story of love that transcends the bounds of mortal existence and moves through three lives till the deep and passionate love finally attains its desired fulfilment. In this marvellous texture the worlds of human beings, animals and birds merge together, as do human, semidivine and divine characters; and the earth and the heavens combine in the universal bond of love that defies death and continue in the next birth, thus holding the entire creation together. It is these unique qualities of the heart and of faith that distinguish this classic of Bana from the usual love romances in other languages and bestow on it a universality that neither age can dim nor difficulty of language or difference of culture drown.

Banabhatta left the Kadambari unfinished to be brought to a conclusion by his son Bhushanabhatta.

The story is told in the ornate style, loaded with unending compounds, puns, rhetorical figures and tricks of poetic embellishment, which make reading an intellectual and trying exercise, though Bana is more poetical in the Kadambari than in the Harshacharita and avoids here recondite puns and difficult vocabulary requiring the help of a lexicon. Bana uses in this romance the technique of emboxing tales, a form of story-telling which is the essential stringing device used in fables like the Panchatantra or the folk-tales as in the Brihatkatha of Gunadhya. But while in these kinds of story-literature the frame story and the inset stories are really disconnected and held together only as illustrations of some moral or political maxim, Bana's emboxed tales have identical characters appearing under different names in successive births.

The germ of Bana's story may be found in Somadeva's Kathasaritsagara, a Sanskrit version of Gunadhya's Brihatkatha, now lost, in the story of kind Sumanas and a tribal maiden Muktalata, who had a parrot gifted with the ability to speak in human language. The two stories have many parallels.

KADAMBARI-SANSKRIT

The story may be so summarised: A Chandala maiden brings to king Shudraka a parrot which tells his own story as follows: As a child it experienced much misery due to early loss of parents. Sage Jabali, as he happened to see the bird, said that it was reaping the fruit of its past misconduct. The parrot then repeated its past history as narrated by Jabali. Chandrapida was the son of king Tarapida of Ujjayini, and Vaishampayana was the son of Tarapida's minister Shukanasa. The two boys were of the same age. Accompanied by Vaishampayana and a maid named Patralekha, captive daughter of another king, and an army, Chandrapida set out on a world conquest expedition. One day the prince happened to get cut off from his retinue and alone reached the lake Achchoda, where he met a love-lorn maiden named Mahashveta, who narrated her own story. She was the daughter of a Gandharva and an Apsara. She met Pundarika and his friend Kapinjala, and fell in love with the former, who was the son of goddess Lakshmi and ascetic Shvetaketu. But before the lovers could unite Pundarika died of the pangs of unfulfilled longing. As Mahashveta also prepared to die, a heavenly being came down and took away the body of Pundarika and assured Mahashveta of reunion if she could continue to live. Mahashveta introduced Chandrapida to her friend Kadambari, who remained unmarried because her friend also remained so. Kadambari and Chandrapida became mutually deeply enamoured but before they could get wedded the former was required to come back to Ujjayini leaving Patralekha in the company of Kadambari. Back at Ujjayini Chandrapida pined for Kadambari and got some relief only as he received tidings about her from Patralekha. Banabhatta wrote only up to this stage. The rest of the story comes from his son. According to the latter half of the work, the retinue of Chandrapida also came back to Ujjayini without Vaishampayana, who crazily insisted on staying back by the side of the lake Achchoda. Chandrapida hurried back to the lake to know the real situation about Vaishampayana. The former met only Mahashveta, who reported that Vaishampayana fell in love with her but got repulsed by her because of her fidelity to Pundarka, and became cursed by her to become a parrot because of his repeated entreaties, and died out of mental agony. On hearing this Chandrapida also had an instantaneous death. As Chandrapida's beloved Kadambari also prepared to commit suicide a voice from heaven told that Pundarika's body was intact in heaven and Kadambari also should protect the body of Chandrapida till the time of reunion. In this state of confusion and sorrow Chandrapida's horse Indrayudha fell into the lake and reappeared as Kapinjala who related his own story: Kapinjala followed the Moon, which carried away Pundarika's dead body. As the Moon augmented the pangs of separation of Pundarika, while dying, Pundarika cursed the Moon to suffer from a similar lot. Kapinjala could learn that the Moon and Pundarika were about to be reincarnated as Chandrapida and Vaishampayana. Then through another curse Kapinjala became the horse Indra yudha. Here ended the story told by Jabali, whence the parrot could learn that he was Vaishampayana himself. The parrot related the event of being caught and brought to king Shudraka by the Chandala maiden. Here ends the story told by the parrot. The author now informs that the Chandala princess revealed herself as Lakshmi, the mother of the parrot, who was earlier Pundarika and then Vaishampayana. At the instance of Lakshmi the parrot and the king ceased to live thereafter. On the other hand, Chandrapida regained his life, Pundarika descended from the sky, Patralekha revealed herself as Rohini, the most beloved consort of the Moon, and thus all ended well.

This intricate story is based on the idea of reincarnation, remembrance of the loves of past lives, the omniscience of divine sages who see past and future, and above all, the purity and power of profound love that outgrows the coils of mortal life. The story moves freely between heaven and earth as Bana's eye moves in a fine frenzy. The tangled and intricate construction of the story may be due to Bana's original conception or due to the completion of the story by his son. Yet "All the characters in the Kadambari, as Kane observes," are life-like and consistent. The gentle and youthful Harita; the generous and loving king Tarapida; the trusted minister Shukanasa...; the tender queen Vilasavati; the devoted Patralekha...; the affectionate yet stern Kapinjala; Mahashveta, holy in mind as she was fair in body (and) who serves as a foil for the heroine; these are characters that are bound to make a deep impression on the heart of the reader".

Perhaps the obstacle to our appreciation of Bana may be his ornate elaboration which knows no restraint. "Bana's power of observation and picturesque description, his love of nature, his eye for colour and ear for music, the richness of his fancy and his wealth of words" (Dasagupta and De) are the unquestionable excellences of his writing; but artistic restraint is outside his nature. Dasagupta and De feel that the chief value of Bana's romance lies in "its sentiment and poetry". His Kadambari is a study of the spontaneous emotion of love and also of recollective affection, of 'the friendship of former births' of which Kalidasa and Bhavabhuti also speak. The poetic possibilities of the belief in transmigration of life as well as of the depth and tenderness of human love are exploited here in a luxurious poetic style befitting a romance. And so, Kadambari will remain a supreme specimen of romantic fiction which may be imitated but is difficult to surpass.

KADAMBARISARA-KAFI-PUNJABI

KADAMBARISARA (Sanskrit) was composed by Abhinanda or Gaudabhinanda, son of Jayantabhatta, the author of Nyayamanjari, who incidentally mentions Shankaravarman as the king of Kashmir who ruled from A.D. 884. This allusion brings Abhinanda down to the first half of the 10th century A.D. Abhinanda's Kadambarisara is an abridgement of Bana's famous romance Kadambari in verse. The Kadambarisara is an epic or mahakavya consisting of ten cantos in which Abhinanda epitomises the story of Bana's Kadambari. Abhinanda's poetry has been held in high esteem by later rhetoricians. He has been quoted by Kshemendra in his Suvritatilaka. Someshvara in great veneration eulogises him in his Kirtikaumudi.

KADAR YAAR (Punjabi; b. 1805) was born in the village Machihe of Shekhupura district. He was a Sandhu Jat by caste. His composition Mirajnama indicates 1829 as the year of its writing. He enjoyed the patronage of both Lahne Durbar and Sikh Sardars. He got some agricultural land in reward for writing the 'qissa' (story) of Puran Bhagat. His compositions known so far are Sohini Mahiwal, Puran Bhagat, Raja Rasalu, Hari Singh Nalva, Mirajnama and Roznama. Puran Bhagat and Raja Rasalu were written for the first time in Punjabi. Evidently he was not a very learned person. Often he distorted the Persian and Arabic words, though he used them sparingly. This defect does not seem very glaring in view of the practice of the poets of the period who borrowed Persian words and modified them according to Punjabi phonetics.

Realism was not the trend of the age. Accordingly, Kadar Yaar's narrations do not lack the presentation of miraculous incidents, though, being a man of average education for the age, he does not show that profusion of tricks which is characteristic of Ahmed Yaar and the later qissa poets of the early British period, like Muhammad Baksh, Ghulam Rasul and Imam Baksh.

Kadar Yaar's style in Sohini Mahiwal, and partly in Mirajnama, is so refined and different from Puran Bhagat and Hari Singh Nalva that one may altogether doubt that the same poet could write this stuff.

KAFI (Gujarati) is a poetic genre of medieval Gujarati literature, with a distinct character of its own. Generally considered a part of the genre of 'pada', this poetic form might have been adopted from the Sindhi and Kutchhi languages. But it differs from its original source, the mainstream of the 'pada' tradition. There is a notion that a 'pada' sung in kafi 'raga' or kafi 'that' would be a kafi, but most kafis are sung in 'Bhairavi raga', and they have a definite pada structure also. The structure is: a 'mukhabandha' or 'dhruvapada' of two lines is followed by three or four stanzas of three lines each. Thus, the composition is made up of eleven or fourteen lines in all. In 'mukhabandha', there is one proposition and, in the succeeding lines, thoughts or illustrations are presented to substantiate that proposition. In one stanza consisting of three lines, the first two lines contain what is known in Gujarati as 'antyanuprasa', while every third line rhymes with the lines of the 'mukhabandha'.

The poet Dhira is famous for having established the kafi form in the Gujarati language, and infused in it the poetic character. He is generally regarded as having flourished between 1753 and 1825. Besides composing individual poems in kafi style and form, Dhira was also the author of the poetic works consisting of a string of kafis such as Swaroop ni kafio. Poet Dhira and his contemporaries, who are mostly disciples of saints, seem to have been influenced by Mekan, a saint of Kutchh. Mekan's disciple, Gangaram, has composed numerous poems in the kafi form. It may be that Dhira came into contact with Gangaram (1730). In Dhira we find a developed form of kafi, and one can even embark upon a philosophical inquiry into the concept of kafi. The 'advaita' philosophy before Adya Shankaracharya was divided into various schools or sects. Shankaracharya consolidated it into 'Kevaladvaita'. One of the theories of advaitadarshan of the era prior to Shankar, which continued to be in vogue after him, has become famous as Ajatvada. Amongst the poets, who follow this old tradition of Ajatvada in Gujarati, are the poets like Akho, Buto, Narhari and others; their poetic forms, such as 'chhappo' also follow the traditional pattern, whereas among the exponents of the Kevaladvaita established by Shankar, are poets like Dhira, Nirant, Bapusaheb and others, who, in their works, also follow the kafi style. Adherence to dogma is the dominant note in kafi poetry.

It was through the Kutchhi language that the kafi form was introduced into Gujarati language, and it was re-established by poet Dhira. Thereafter, Nirant (1747-1825), Bapusaheb Gaekwad (1779-1843), Dayaram (1776-1852), Bhojo (1785-1850) and other poets have composed a fairly large number of kafis. The tradition of compositions in the kafi form can be seen as late as 1866 in the works of the Jain poet, Umedchand. After this, no development is seen in the kafi tradition. Amongst the various poetic forms that went into oblivion under the growing influence of the English language, one can include kafi also.

KAFI (Punjabi). Primarily the term 'kafi' refers to a distinctive style of singing, especially the singing of short devotional lyrics. It is also considered to be the name of a raga or ragini in certain quarters. But this view is rather difficult to maintain as the extant kafis of Punjabi have been composed in different ragas. As a matter of fact this term has acquired a generic connotation by virtue of its establishment of certain thematic and formal conventions of poetic expression. From the available anthologies of kafis composed by Punjabi poets, it is possible to describe the characteristics of kafi as: (a) kafi is a lyrical composition meant for singing in a certain style, (b) its subject matter is invariably mystico-ethical in nature, (c) its central theme is contained in one of its verses, the refrain of which is emphasized by repetition. This device of repetition helps to create the appropriate environment needed to highlight the required spiritual effect. (d) There is practically no difference between kafi and qawwali as far as the style of singing is concerned, but kafi is used only to express the religious sensibility of the poet whereas qawwali has a wider thematic range. (e) The theme of spiritual love contained in the kafis mostly uses metaphors and symbols of worldly love. (f) The recurrent theme of kafis is the alienation of the human soul from its divine source. This feeling of spiritual loneliness is often expressed in erotic imagery; (g) In the thematic structure of kafis a prominent place is given to the guru or murshid or teacher who is considered to be the mediator between man and God. (h) The kafis have been a powerful vehicle for expressing the sufi sensibility, especially the mystical union of soul and God. (i) The kafis utilize certain folk motifs and devices for their structural organization.

Surinder Singh Kohli has included one kafi said to be composed by the first Punjabi sufi poet, Shiekh Farid (1173-1262), in his anthology of the kafis. This can be taken as an instance of the first emergence of this form. In this kafi, the human soul is mentioned as a girl in the imagery of the medieval institution of marriage. This type of imagery became the recurrent formal device of the later kafis.

After Farid, we come across three kafis composed by Guru Nanak, included in the Adigranth under ragas 'Asa', 'Suhi' and 'Maru'. The Guru extends the thematic scope of kafi by incorporating his own view of life in it. Some of the other Guru poets (namely, Guru Amardas, Guru Ramdas and Guru Arjun) have also composed kafis on the structural pattern of the kafis of Guru Nanak. These kafis can be grouped in a separate class as 'Gurumat' kafis.

The other major Muslim sufi poet who has written kafi was Shah Hussain (1539-1593). The following lines of Shah Hussain can be taken as a representative illustration:

Rabha' mere hal da mehrim tun
Andar tun hain bahir tun hain rom rom vich tun"

(O God! thou art the knower of my situation Thou art within me, without me, pervading every fibre of my body).

The other notable sufi poets who composed kafis are Shah Sharaf, Bulhe Shah, and Ghulam Farid.

KAFI (Sindhi), a form of Sindhi Poetry, is an off-shoot of 'wai', the original Sindhi form of lyric. Wai was sung in sufi congregations during 'Sama'. Because of its metrical and structural limitations, it gave way to kafi which can be written in many 'chhandas' and sung in several raga/raginis. The 'sthaiy' (in Sindhi 'thalu') is of one line and the 'antara' can be of one or more lines. The antara rhymes with sthaiy, and when it is of more than one line, its last line rhymes with the sthaiy. Intricate rhyme patterns are interwoven in antaras which bear testimony to the great craftsmanship of the poets. The sthaiy or thalu is repeated after every antara. This repetition gives a particular shape to the thought, feeling or situation expressed in the poem, and also brings to these a sense of permanence in the midst of change.

Kafi has a distinct character of its own. It is usually sung by a group of five or more singers of whom one is the main singer, and the others follow him. It is sung in a typical style with 'dambur' (Tanpura) as an accompaniment. The singers and the audience go into ecstasy. Its melody is intoxicating.

The word kafi was used for the first time for the poetic compositions of Sahib'd'ino Faruq (1688-1725), grandfather of Abdul Wahab 'Sachal' (1737-1829) and a contemporary of Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752). One specimen is found in Shah-jo-Risalo (Yaman Kalyan 4). In all the editions of the Risalo it has been shown as 'wai', which it is certainly not.

It cannot be said for certain as to when, where and how the form of kafi came into existence. Prior to its entry into Sindhi literature, it existed in the poetry of the Punjabi poet, Shah Hussain (1539-1593). It possibly came to Sindhi from Punjabi whence it travelled to Kutch and Gujarat. However, it is certainly a gift from some sufi poet of the Sindhu valley.

In Sindhi poetry, this form was followed up by the sufi poets and others who came after Shah Abdul Latif and Sachal Sarmast. Many important poets like Sangi, Qalich, Qasim, Dalpat, etc. have contributed towards the enrichment of this genre. Shahu Faqir and his brother Ghulam Ali Faqir have also written some good Kafis. Kafi is essentially a lyric. In the beginning, the form acquired a generic connotation for its thematic and formal conventions of poetic expression inasmuch as its subject matter was mystic and ethical. But later, especially in the modern period, it acquired a wider thematic range, and erotics found a place in many compositions in this form. Thus, the kafi to begin with was a vehicle for expressing the sufi sensibility, i.e. the yearning of the human soul for the union with God by utilising the folk-motifs and devices for their structural organisation, and in the modern period it became the vehicle of expression of love on the physical plane, though the motifs remained the same.

There are various opinions regarding the derivation of the word 'kafi'. In the opinion of some scholars, the correct word is 'qafi' derived from an Arabic word 'qafa', meaning 'to follow'. Some think it to have been derived from 'qafiya', a poem, and some are of the view that kafi takes its root from 'kaif', which means intoxication.

N.G.N.

KAGAZ TE KANVAS (Punjabi) symbolizes the lasting friendship of two artists, the poetess Amrita Pritam and her painter friend, Imroz. This is the first Punjabi book (published in 1970) which won the country's highest and most prestigious Jnanpith Award in 1983.

Basically a lyricist, Amrita's poetic sensibility has found a new direction by reducing the elements of lyricism and increasing intellectualism. Here we find no regular rhyming but irregular rhythm.

Amrita assumes an international character by extending her poetic horizon and internationalising her artistic sensibility. Under western influence, she lauds the liberalization of women, especially in their free relations with men. She is all praise for the deeds and views of Marilyn Monroe and Ayn Rand. In her poem 'Oedipus', instead of hero's traditional repentance for his incest, we have a sort of reconciliation with abnormal situation. Under the influence of Schopenhauer and Camus, Marilyn Monroe and Kazant Zakis, a sort of pessimistic and escapist tendency has developed in her poetic sensibility, which prompts her to pronounce life a dirty handkerchief or a prostitute, and death a fountain of fresh and healthy waters.

She does not enslave her poetic sensibility under any ism or ideology. At times she gives vent to her progressive and anti-imperialistic thinking by asking odd but pertinent questions. But according to her, socialism forces the extinction of individuality and distinctiveness and breeds the similarity of bricks.

To make the vicious forces and vice-mongers of the society tremble and turn pale, she wields her mighty flail with the help of satire. Now satire has developed in the armoury of her poetic sensibility as her strongest weapon. She, forcefully and fiercely, lashes at hypocrisy, unscrupulous democratic means to achieve and misuse power, stooge-writers hankering after cheap popularity and fame.

Her greatest strength lies in her unique poetic style. She selects appropriate and fresh poetic symbols to express her ideas precisely and distinctively. Her symbols are created from modern mechanical and medicinal devices. Her imagery is generally fresh like nature and sensuous because of her personal psychological bent of mind.

In short, Kagaz te Kanvas (paper and canvas) is a land-mark in her poetic evolution, as also in the annals of new Punjabi poetry.

S.S.U.

KAHAKOSHU (Apabhramsha) is a compendium of hundreds of stories, composed in the last quarter of the 11th century A.D. at Anahilapura (Gujarat), in the Apabhramsha language,* in verses, having 53 chapters (Sandhis) with an average of 20 pieces (kadavakas) a chapter, (varying from 10 to 32 Kadavakas in different chapters), every piece having 10 to 15 lines, by Shrichandra, a Digambara monk.

In the beginning the traditional description of the cycle of time is given. Then the poet narrates the stories to fortify the faith in the religion. He mentions Mularadhana of 'Shivakoti' as the source of his work. Harisena's Brihatkathakosha and some other works have also been consulted by him. He picks up Prakrit 'gathas' (verses) from Mularadhana, explains their meaning in Sanskrit prose and then gives short or long stories. Some stories are summaries of the tales given in the Brihatkathakosha and a few are merely referred to (Yashodharakatha, Ch. XXX).

Each chapter does not have one story always. Sometimes there are several stories in one chapter or a story (Charudattakatha) begins in the middle of a chapter, and continues in the next chapter or a story occupies even three chapters (Karakandukatha). The stories have varieties. Most of them are connected with the illustrious, the legendary, the religious or the popular characters of the Jaina tradition. Then there are the tales connected with the Hindu legends and myths, the stories of the Vidyadharas, of the thieves, the animals and birds and some of them are folk-tales. They are generally given in the form of examples or sometimes as illustrations or in the form of previous birth accounts.

By the means of these stories the author wants to convey the fruits of practising the religion and the morality. The topics that are dealt with are: reverence for the scriptures and knowledge, service to the monks, confession, meditation, devotion, company of the virtuous, gifts of medicine, scriptures and safety, non-violence, truthfulness, renouncement, forbearance, and consequences of the passions like greed and pride, the infatuation towards the women and so on. There are stories of the virtuous as well as the wicked ladies. Sometimes the stories of conversion from Buddhism and Bhagavatism are told. At places discourses on the Jaina religion are available.

The well-known characters of these stories are: Bharata, Harisena, Sanatkumara, Karakandu, Vasudeva and Krishna, Marichi, Shrenika, Abhayakumara, Sudarshana, Shripala, Chilataputra, Bhadrabahu, Sukoshala, Gajakumara, Metarya, Chitta-sambhuta, Rohini, Panchala and Gandharadatta, Charudatta, Bhilla Kshirakadamba and Drona, Brahma-Tilottama, Urvashi, Vasu-Narada-Parvataka, Uma and Rudra, Vishnu and Bali, Kartavirya and Parashurama, Parashara, Matsyagandha, Vyasa, Chandapradhyota, Chanakya, Sakatala, Vararuchi, etc.,

The style of the work is of the popular narrative type and various popular motifs are employed in the stories. It does not have much poetic importance. There are some ordinary descriptions as well as sayings and proverbs. Paddhadia, Alillaha, etc. are the main Apabhramsha metres employed in it along with some Sanskrit metres. It is interspersed with Sanskrit and Prakrit quotations. In the ending verse of every chapter the name of the author is given.

It contains important cultural data. Special mention can be made of the Kapalikas, sea-voyages, practising of Yoga for the attainment of one's desired object, the stupefying devices, medicinal uses of various oils, and the belief of the people in the supernatural events and the efficacy of the lores, charms, incantations, mystical formulas, etc.

K.R.C.

KAIFI, AZMI (Urdu; 1925) is a poet well known for his progressive ideas. He could not acquire much formal education as he abandoned his studies during the 1942 Freedom movement. He belonged to an orthodox religious family but from his early youth he rebelled against the old shibboleths of religions and later got himself fully associated with the ideology of the progressive writers. In fact, he became an active participant in the Progressive Writers' Movement in Urdu.

He is not a prolific writer, but whatever he has written so far bears the stamp of his peculiar poetic talent. He has till now published three collections of his poems which have added to his renown as a poet. He has visited a number of countries as a poet-delegate, and he received the Soviet Land Nehru award for his creative writing in 1975. He had been earlier honoured by the Government of India with the title of Padmashri.

His Awara Sijde is considered to be a valuable contribution to Urdu literature. The poems in this collection have all the characteristic qualities of his writing—vigour, powerful expression and breadth of vision. They also reveal a poetic sensibility, modern in its grasp of the contemporary situation. He received the Sahitya Akademi award on this collection in 1975.

KAIFI, PANDIT BRIJ MOHAN DATATRIYA (Urdu b; 1866; d. 1955), a well-known poet, literary scholar and philologist of Urdu, was born in Delhi in a distinguished Kashmiri Pandit family. He died at a quite mature age, at Ghaziabad. Kaifi's forefathers had come from Kashmir to Delhi in the reign of Farrukhsiyar in the early 18th century. They were offered lucrative posts in the royal court of Delhi. After the lapse of a century they joined the East India Company. His father Pandit Kanhaiyalal Datatriya was a Police Officer in the princely State of Nabh under the rule of Raja Bharpur Singh. His father died when Kaifi was a child. He was brought up and educated in Delhi. He received his early education in Persian and Urdu, and later was sent to school. Kaifi was the product of St. Stephen's College of Delhi.

Kashmiri Pandits in those days had excelled themselves in Persian learning. Some of them took to writing poetry in Persian as well as Urdu, and Kaifi was no exception. He knew many languages, including Persian, Sanskrit, Arabic and English.

Kaifi started his career as a journalist. He edited the Congress owned Urdu journal Khair-Andesh which was published from Ambala. After sometime he joined the princely State of Kapurthala. Later he went to Europe and England, but after the World War broke out, he returned to India in 1916. When Raja Daljeet Singh of Kanpurthala became the Prime Minister of the Kashmir State, Kaifi was offered the post of Assistant Foreign Secretary. He served the Kashmir State for many years. Kaifi also lived for sometime in Lahore and Lyallpur where his sons were employed. In 1947 he shifted from Lyallpur to Bombay and then he finally settled in Delhi.

Kaifi started writing poetry in Urdu at an early age on the inspiration of a close relative, Pandit Narayan Das who was a poet of repute and wrote Ghazals under the pen name of Zamir Dehlavi. In the beginning of his literary career, Kaifi used to write only Ghazals in keeping with the old literary tradition of Urdu poetry, but later the influence of Hali and Mohammad Husain Azad, great literary figures, changed his perspective. He now devoted himself to other genres of Urdu poetry like nazm, masnavi, musaddas, qata, etc. He had a wide range of subjects and themes to touch upon. He published his collection of poems under the title, Wardat, which was widely acclaimed. His longish poem, Bharat Darpan, written in the form of musaddas, appeared in 1905. It is a long narrative poem depicting the social conditions and life style of his countrymen. It is saturated with patriotic sentiments and feelings. A collection of his other patriotic poems appeared in 1954 under the title Chand Nazmen. Kaifi also took to masnavi writing and produced Jag Biti. His other masnavis are Aina-e-Hind, and Prem Tarangini. His style is lucid and simple. Kaifi's literary interests were varied. Besides poetry, he also wrote novels, short stories and plays. Nihatta Rana is his novel which deals with a semi-historical theme. Kaifi was a trend-setter in Urdu drama. His plays Raj Dulari and Murari Dada are masterpieces and exhibit many artistic qualities of play writing.

Kaifi was also a great researcher and a philologist of high reputation. He had excelled himself in coining new words and terminologies in Urdu, relating to literature and other disciplines. His philological and linguistic works include Manshurat (Lahore, 1934) and Kaifia (Bombay, 1942) whose critical editions have been published by Gopi Chand Narang and Masud Husain Khan respectively. Khamsa-e-Kaifi (Delhi, 1939) is the collection of his articles and poems, depicting the socio-cultural and historical aspects of Urdu.

The range of Kaikini's interests is exceptional. A playwright and critic, he is also interested in science, history and sociology. Both as a journalist and as a contributor to a number of journals and periodicals, he has shown a spirit of inquiry and an open-minded approach to social problems. His prose is crisp, clear and incisive.

T.N.S.

KAIKINI, P.R. (English; b. 1912) essentially a poet, edited Peoples Raj from 1947 to 1954 and Farmer from 1954 to 1957. He was the Assistant Editor in the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting of the Collective Works of Mahatma Gandhi 1958-1969 and Editor in the Publication Division in 1957. He was associated with the National Book Trust from 1969 to 1973.

His earlier work Flower Offerings (1934) had the sub-title 'Prose Poems on Truth, Beauty and Nature' and this was followed by Songs of a Wanderer-Prose Lyrics (1936). However, the poet in him revolted against the staid and placid life, and in subsequent collections The Civilization (1937), Shanghai (1939), The Recruit (1940), The Snake in the Moon (1942), Look on Undaunted (1944), Kaikini's mood reflects the Indian response to the holocaust caused by the Nazis, the evil of Hitler's war, the sufferings of embattled Shanghai and a sense of disintegration and chaos:-

Rivers of blood clotting and germ-infected germ-infested and clotting clotting

Time was when wonder shone supreme in our eyes
But alas: today shattered and broken we fall

However, Kaikini still has faith that the war-ravaged world could still be redeemed and in the post-war poems of the Passionate East (1948) and of later collection Some of My Years (1972) a more hopeful note is sounded, which: may be seen in lines like:

"You are nothing if not a dream, a dream, a dream".
"In the forest of savage nights
Like the tumbling chaos of flitting firefiles

And their memory of boundless joy of years bygone Playing counterpoint to the proud pageant of potentates"

KAIKOTTIKALI SONGS (Malayalam). Kaikottikali, also known as 'tiruvatirakali', is a form of folk-dance of the women of the higher castes of Kerala, often performed during festive seasons like Onam and Tiruvatira and on occasions like marriage and birthday. It is a simple and gentle group-dance with the 'lasya' element predominating even though the 'tandava' part is also brought in occasionally. Dressed in the typical style of Kerala, women dance in gay abandon, singing melodious songs which are reputed for their literary flourish. One of the performers starts singing, while the rest repeat it in chorus, clapping their hands in unison. Moving in a circle, clock-wise at times anti-clockwise at every step they gracefully bend sideways, the arms coming together in beautiful gestures, upwards and downwards, and to either side with punctuation by the clapping of hands.

There is an extensive literature used for this purpose which is called kaikottikali songs. At times the songs of the attakathas are also used. Kunchan Nampiyar (1705-1770) is the earliest known poet whose kaikottikali songs have come down to us through his compositions Rugminiswayamvaram pattu vrittam (Rugmini's marriage in ten meters) and Shilavati nalu vrittam (in four meters). But the most popular songs of this genre are those composed by Machatt Narayanan Elayath (1745-1822). He wrote about a dozen works of the type among which Shakuntalam (Story of Shakuntala), Parvati-swayamvaram (Parvati's marriage), Sitaswayamvaram (Sita's wedding) and Gopikagitam (Song of the cowherd-maids) have fascinated the women. Many of the poets of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries have composed innumerable kaikottikali songs. Kuchelakatha (Story of Kuchela) of Kottoor Nampiyar (18th century), Subhadraharanam (Abduction of Subhadra) of Irayimman Tampi (1783-1856), Shakuntalam patinalu vrittam (Story of Shakuntala in fourteen metres) of Arippattu Kochugovinda Warriar (1790-1855), Patracharitam (Story of the vessel) of Ampati Rama Poduval (1800-1883), Sitaswayamvaram (Sita's marriage) of Kuttikunhu Tankachi (1820-1903), Hariniswayamvaram (Marriage of Harini) and Kaliyamardanam (Suppression of Kaliya) of Venmani Mahan Namboodiripad (1844-1893), Mayooradhwaja charitam (Story of Mayuradhwaja) of Kotungalloor Kunjikuttan Tampuran (1856-1913) are works containing varieties of kaikottikali songs.

Most of these songs narrate stories from the epics of the Ramayana, the Bhagavata and the Mahabharata and are either erotic or devotional in tone. Usually kaikottikali starts with an invocation to God Ganapati and also to Goddess Saraswati. The songs are so simple as the following lines on Goddess Saraswati:

'Oh the fair complexioned lass!
My Goddess Saraswati, who dwells in the white lotus,
I bow before thy feet.'

Numerous tunes like kummi, kuratti, vanchippattu are used for the songs. Some of the songs cannot be analysed into metres; but the bulk of them is composed in metres which are familiar. It is also noteworthy that the lyrical school of poetry headed by Changampuzha Krishna Pillai (1911-1948) has adopted the metrical patterns almost exclusively from these songs.

T.R.R.N

was a prominent dramatist in English and Kannada.

The only son of Justice Paramashiva Iyer of Mysore High Court, Kailasam was born in an affluent family. He took B.A. and M.A. degrees of Madras University and also studied in Royal College of Science, London (1908-15). He secured Fellowship of the Royal Geological Society. Later he served in the Department of Geology of Mysore State (1915-20), but resigned probably because he was by temperament unsystematic. He led a desultory life. A wayward genius, a brilliant speaker and a fascinating conversationalist, Kailasam had a large number of friends and admirers. He presided over the Kannada Sahitya Sammelan in Madras (1945).

Kailasam's stay in England seems to have stimulated his interest in drama. (He was himself an excellent actor). He saw the plays of William Archer, Ibsen, Bernard Shaw and Galsworthy, and also the performance of great actors and actresses like Forbes-Robertson and Ellen Terry Jr. on the stage. All this must have inspired him to write dramas in English on his return to the country.

He wrote five plays in English, hoping for a more satisfying self-expression than through the Kannada medium. He felt imaginatively gripped by the heroic characters of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, and saw them as apocalyptic figures embodying psychic realities. The Burden (1933) is a moving dramatic projection of Bharata's agony on his coming to know that his foolish and ambitious mother, Kaikeyi, had won the Kingdom of Ayodhya for him and banished Rama to the forest. The Purpose (1944) and Fulfilment (1933) present Ekalavya the heroic archer checkmated, first by Drona his Guru, and later by the Lord himself, Krishna. Like Ekalavya, Karna is another tragic character who is driven to destroy himself as it were out of his very greatness of heart. Kailasam's Karna is "an impression of Sophocles in five acts". Just as Bharata in The Burden sees the stark truth at last like Oedipus, his Karna too is pursued by almost a Sophoclean tragic fatality, and he is thwarted and defeated again and again, but also purified and glorified in the process. In this poetic tragedy, it is as though the Mahabharata itself is held in miniature. The posthumously published Keechaka (1949) is yet another powerful play, and the hero is here transfigured from a merely lustful villain into a fighter and a man of honour. In their conception, characterisation and poetic articulation, these five plays are among the best of their kind. Nevertheless, his achievement was rather less than his capacity, and it is perhaps as a pioneer in English drama that he will be best remembered.

Kailasam wrote plays also in Kannada which display his abundant creative power. Tollu-ghatti (1918), Kailasam's first play, was written at the request of a friend, Justice Shankaranarayana Rao, for the boy scouts. It enabled him to discover his field of interest. It contrasts two brothers, one Puttu, immersed in his books, with his eyes glued to the first place in the examination, and the other, Madhu, toiling for the family and not doing well in the examinations. Puttu is the apple of his father's eye, and Madhu is treated with contempt. But when a fire breaks out in the house, the father realizes who is the stronger of the two. 'Hollow and Sound'—this was to be the theme of a number of Kailasam's plays in the years to come.

Kailasam wrote twenty-one Kannada plays and four English plays; two more plays in English were reconstructed by his friends after his death.

Kailasam is generally regarded as the master of comedy. His plays range from kindly humour (Bandvalvil-lada badayi and Vaidyana vyadhi) to searing satire (Nam brahmanike and Yodhruvani). He can create characters who are not just funny but comic, like Ahoblu (Bandvavil-lada badavi) who is hollow and boastful, no doubt, but who makes language a shield to protect him from harsh realities. Generally, Kailasam has a serious purpose to expose emptiness in men and women, or to expose a social evil. Sometimes the laughter hides the clash of personalities, as in Home Rule; it is a play which evokes laughter but in which hatred also pours forth like lava. In Yodhruvani he attacks the practice of dowry. He has also written some plays like Soole which are serious analyses of social evils like prostitution.

Kailasam was also a master craftsman. The action of most of his plays takes just as much time as the stage presentation. There are perfectly constructed plays like Vaidyana vyadhi and Bandvalvillada badayi. Generally, he works through comparison and contrast, presenting pairs of characters, families or situations.

Kailasam's language in his Kannada plays was the language of the educated middle class, which had a far too generous sprinkling of English words. Whatever the defence, it must be admitted that this has come to limit the appeal of the plays. His language is energetic and racy, and the Kannada stage had not heard such thrust-and-parry dialogue. But at times he is too loud, and the mannerisms become wearisome.

Kailasam came to write at a time when the professional companies were facing a difficult time. In his Kannada plays he is realistic, while in his English plays he seeks to embody a vision. He made drama out of the everyday life of ordinary men and women, and was thus in tune with the spirit of the Navodaya age. His insistence was on decency and compassion; he was the first to bring a widow on the stage, and he focussed attention on her life of tears and sacrifice. In this humanistic approach also, he belonged to the Navodaya age. He reduced the importance of mere plot and made drama a clash of personalities and a vehicle of an individual point of view. It is true that his characters sometimes strike us as garrulous, and his language is not quite suited to the revelation of the inner life of a character of a serious consideration of moral issues, but he brought drama nearer to everyday life, a world of interesting men and women, and sought to educate the emotions and stimulate the conscience. Whether with 'Sriranga' (Adya Rangacharya) he effected a break from tradition is being currently debated.

KAIYATA (KAIYYATA, KAYYATA, KAJJATA; Sanskrit), bearing typically a Kashmiri name, was son of Jaiyyata (Jayyata), surnamed Upadhayaya. His preceptor was Maheshvara. Bhimasena, in his commentary (1722) on Mammata's Kavyaprakasha, speaks of Kaiyata as a disciple, even a younger brother of Mammata who was both a grammarian and a rhetorician, which is hardly probable. The lower terminus of Kaiyata's date is fixed by the mention of his name in the Sarvadarshanasamgraha of Madhavaacharya (14th century.)

According to a tradition, he was a native of Pampur or Yechgam, a small town in Kashmir. It is said that he was very poor. He is stated to have visited Varanasi where he defeated grammarians in a dispute held in an assembly, and in deference to the wishes of the President, wrote his commentary.

The name of Kaiyata's celebrated commentary on Patanjali's Mahabhashya is Pradipa or Kaiyatadipa or Bhashyapradipa. It marks the culmination of the second period of the development of the Paninian school. Kaiyata is regarded as one of the most authoritative writers of the school of Panini.

In the introduction to his commentary, Kaiyata acknowledges his indebtedness to Hari, i.e., Bhartrihari (7th cent.) who also commented upon the Mahabhashya. Kaiyata refers also to the Kashika commentary on the Ashtadhyayi of Panini, written by Vamana and Jayaditya (7th cent.)

The Pradipa was commented upon by Nagojibhatta alias Nageshabhatta (18th cent.) in his Uddyota, by Narayana in his Vivarana and by the Ishvarananda, pupil of Satyananda who wrote another commentary, of the same name. One Pravartaka also appears to have commented on the Pradipa.

Some of the highlights of Kaiyata's commentary are as follows:

He recognises the fourfold connotation of words, viz. jati, vyakti, linga, padartha.

Kaiyata holds that, in Panini's times, grammar used to be studied along with the Vedas. So, Panini did not think it necessary to speak about the necessity of grammar. The writer of the Pradipa further says that in Katyayana's days grammar was studied even after the study of the Vedas. So he pointed out some necessity for grammatical study.

According to Kaiyata, in the direction dashamyam putrasya, contained in the Grihyasutra, the locative is in 'samipya' or in the sense of proximity.

Kaiyata holds that, even in the absence of 'karana', (instrumental case) etc., there is the predominance of the 'karta' (nominative case) by the principles of 'anvaya' and 'vyatireka' i.e. rule of concomitant variation.

As regards the authorship of the Dhatupathas, Kaiyata on Panini 1.3.1, holds that these are not un-Paninian, but the meanings of the roots are later additions (athanirdeshastvadhunikah).

Kaiyata recognises 'ra' as a distinct 'pratyahara' for 'r' and 'l'. According to him the grammarian, Kashakritshna is pre-Paniniyan. Though Panini does not mention him, yet it may be inferred that his grammar was not unknown to the former.

On Panini II. 3.17, Kaiyata supports the reading 'manyakarmanyana-dare upamane vibhasha pranishu'.

We have a poet Kaiyata whose verses are quoted in the Subhashitavali (nos. 2040, 2044, 2499) of Vallabhadeva (variously assigned to different periods from the 12th to the 15th century). Kaiyata, son of Chandraditya, grandson of Vallabhadeva and protege of Bhim Gupta of Kashmir (977-982), wrote a commentary on Anandavardhana's Devishataka (977).

KAJALMAYA (Marathi) is a collection of short stories by G.A. Kulkarni. He opens his collection with the quotation by Thoreau: "If a man does not keep pace with his companions, it is, perhaps, because he hears a different drummer." Through the grind of drudgery of day to day life, he hears the distant drumming of destiny.

Kajalmaya is the seventh collection of his short stories published by Popular Prakashan, Bombay, in 1972. In 1973, he was given Sahitya Akademi Award which he could not accept for technical reasons. In 1980, the second edition of the book was brought out.

Kulkarni, who is renowned for his portrayal of incongruities of life, its meaninglessness, and the queer mockery of the destiny, gives the best of these portrayals in Kajalmaya. The fourteen short stories included in this collection are in fact fourteen slices of experience from life. People caught in different pitfalls of life, or cheated by life, defeated, helpless, good and bad characters and the omniscient destiny watching their struggle with the absolute detachment of a passive observer, such are the situations and characters which are depicted here. These stories in which incidents are charged with supernatural elements, are a class by themselves. Kajalmaya does have something in common with his earlier collections in terms of social reality. 'Pradakshina', 'Shevatche hirve pan', 'Vansh', 'Kasab', 'Bhovre' and 'Punarapi' form a group. 'Thipka', 'Anjan' and 'Svapna' have combination of realism and imagination, while 'Vidushak', 'Ratna' 'Dut', 'Gulam' and 'Kalsutra' have their moorings only in the world of imagination. The stories in the first category are set in human settlements in their social contexts which are not always of much relevance to the stories. The characters are more important than the lacklustre surroundings they are placed in. Dadasaheb, a local leader, Bhiaru, a priest who is a dope, foulsmelling Ramkoli, and Gopal, a simpleton clerk belong to one type of characters, and Karevva, a barren middle-aged woman, Shantakka, a guileless widow, Janaki, a brazen flirt, Namutai, an insane mother belong to the other.

All these characters are suffering from some mental or physical infirmity and have helplessly accepted rejection as their fate. Their lives bear a number of scars, both visible and invisible, and the emptiness is palpable; all-pervading characters like Namutai, who is on the brink of insanity, are natural inhabitants of this world. The references to cremation ground, bones, black magic, death, murder are frequent. And then, the lines dividing life and death, wakefulness and dreams, sanity and insanity overlap in their contours and mingle with each other. And against such background, the life that sprouts is helpless, meaningless. To the question: 'Why is it so?' Kulkarni has one definite answer: 'Destiny'. He, therefore, leaves social, economic, political problems untouched. He has never portrayed life in its bright bloom. He concentrates on the futility in human relationships, the decadence of values, insults hurled at every step and cheating which suffocates the human being.

These short stories in the second category have a beautiful blending of reality and imagination. The characters of the stories in the third category dwell in the world of imagination. Their world is a parallel world created by Kulkarni's power of imagination. They are far off from the world we know and understand: they are the offspring of the author's colossal logistics.

He develops some sort of conclusion about the rationale behind human existence, and then, refutes it with equal logical force. This is the game he indulges in, and the outcome is meaningless mortality which has neither a beginning nor an end. The strength of intelligence as depicted in 'Vidushak', crumbles in no time, and the strange game of inevitability nullifies the short living victories. The author weaves a unique pattern with the thin strands of human sentiments. The pattern has a definite shape hoisted on a firm logical base. Each of the constituents of the world of experiences as unfolded in his stories has an identity of its own. This gives the story a firm, well-knit structure. It is not emotional but intellectual.

Kulkarni, in his stories, brings out the grandeur of palaces, mutts, temples, deserts, oceans in a picturesque style. Such descriptions and the imagery, the rich vocabulary, the poetic fancies shape his experience, and present it forcefully backed by his nonchalant, nonconformist talent. Though occasionally the stories are set in conventional environs and though the images infiltrate into the stories through the stages of their development, the stories do not lose their independent identity. This symbolism, according to Chandrakant Bandivedekar, is like that of Kafka. He says, "Though his images are not multifaceted as those of Kafka, their effect is lasting and the effect and appeal total." Even Gangadhar Gadgil (Ajkalche sahityik) and D.B. Kulkarni (Parthivteche udayasta) have complained about Kulkarni's unflinching focus on the darker side of life. This 'maya' on the whole, though immensely liked by the critics for its intensity, has raised strong objection for its being 'Kajalmaya'. The common Marathi reader would certainly long for rare beautiful moments of the positive aspects of life side by side with the agonising reference of human existence through Kulkarni's portrayal. But the contribution of Kajalmaya even as a collection of stories throbbing with the brutal facts of life, ought not to be slighted.

KAKADEUTAR HAD (Assamese) is a historical novel by Navakanta Barua. The setting is the district of Nowgong and the time covered is the later part of the eighteenth century when the Ahom king Gaurinath Sinha reigned asking. The story is told through the device of a grandmother of today recalling the past history of her family. The novel tells the story of a deadly feud between a nobleman and a parvenu. The two vie with one another for their position in the society. The nobleman, Bhogai Barua, ultimately wins when he rouses his people cleverly against the wealthy man, Bakhar Bora, and gets him killed. While telling the story of two upper class families the novelist deftly reconstructs the whole socio-cultural milieu of the time. The common people in this feudal society are shown to have been just puppets in the hands of the higher class which moulded their destiny. In between the upper class and the lower, the novel shows a middle class where a few persons of culture and learning existed, commanding the respect of all.

Though a historical novel, the facts drawn from history are not many. Only the names of the two families occur in history while their enmity and rivalry and the consequent death of Bakhar Bora occur in folk-songs and ballads. The rest is the novelist's own invention. The novel has a poetic flavour in many places, and there is a poetic undertone in the concept of the narrator—the grandmother. She is a silent observer of all happenings in the ancient family of rank who also bears in her consciousness all that happened in this family in the past.

History in this novel is not a mere retelling of the story of the past. The significance of the past happenings here is shown as not very different from the significance of the present happenings. The novelist rather overtly states in places how the social forces that worked in the past work even today, though in a different way. The novelist compares the grandmother, overtly again, to the social anthropologists of today who want to understand the present by constantly turning back to the past.

In successful evocation of a past milieu, in linking it up with the present, and in its poetic quality, this novel is one of the major works of Assamese fiction. It won the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1975.

KAKATI, BANIKANTA (Assamese; b. 1894, d. 1952) is one of the most erudite scholars and linguists Assam has ever produced. Though born of poor parents of a peasant family, Banikanta was a natural genius who came to be acknowledged even when he was a school-student. And, true to the proverb that the morning shows the day, Banikanta's genius budded into a stirring success when he topped the list of the successful candidates at the I.A. Examination (1913) of Calcutta University, appearing from Cotton College, Gauhati. Having passed his B.A. with Honours in English in 1915 from the Presidency College, Calcutta, Banikanta continued his studies for M.A. in Calcutta University, and became a double M.A. in English literature and language in 1918 and 1923 respectively. Although in his first M.A. degree, Banikanta was placed in the second class, his genius once again asserted itself, by securing for him the first class first position in his second M.A. degree and winning the prestigious Kshetramohan Chatterjee Gold Medal.

KAKKAD, N.N.—KAKKANADAN

Renowned for his plain living and high thinking Banikanta could have become a high administrative officer under the British but opted for the career of a teacher in Cotton College, Gauhati, where he continued to serve for more than thirty years at a stretch till 1949, becoming its Principal in 1947. Endeared to all for his amiable nature and respected by all for his scholarly wisdom, Banikanta was a man of wit and humour.

When he was working as Principal of Cotton College he was confronted with a situation when he had to make a choice between the Professorship in Assamese of the newly established Gauhati University and the post of the Director of Public Instruction, Assam. But the teacher-scholar's choice was for the Professorship which led him ultimately to be honoured as the first Dean of the Faculty of Arts of Gauhati University in 1949.

Although Banikanta was a Master in English, his scholarly pursuits were directed with a missionary zeal towards the growth and development of the Assamese language. His consistent and dedicated research in the Assamese linguistics over a period of seven years were at last crowned with success when he obtained his Ph.D. from Calcutta University in 1935 for his Assamese linguistic masterpiece entitled Assamese: Its Formation and Development, which was published later on in 1941. This great book has been serving as the safest guide to students and researchers in Assamese.

Banikanta was a researcher not only in Assamese linguistics but also in the age-old traditional Assamese literature and religious systems prevailing in ancient Kamrup (modern Assam). His Purani Asamiya sahitya (1940) is a classic on old Assamese literature. His works, Life and Teachings of Shankaradeva (1920), The Mother Goddess Kamakhya (1948), Vishnuite Myths and Legends (1952), Purani Kamrupar dharma dhara (1955), may be taken as an outline history of the religio-cultural life of the Assamese from the Puranic to the modern age. His Kalita jatir itibritta (1942) is a socio-cultural history of the Kalita people of Assam while his Sahitya aru prem (1948) is a work on art and literature. His Pakhila (1951) meant for children is a scholarly collection of tales from the treasury of world literature.

Around Banikanta gathered a team of research scholars whom he guided to achieve their goals. Banikanta may be called the father of modern research in Assamese. As a literary critic he is still second to none for his wisdom and acumen, simplicity of style and expression, comparative method of analysis and broad human sympathy for poets and writers.

KAKKAD, N.N. (Malayalam; b. 1927), whose full name is Kakkad Narayanan Nambudiri, was born at Avittanallur in Kozhikode district. He belongs to the school of post-modernism, which gave a fresh momentum to Malayalam poetry during the sixties. He took his B.O.L. degree from the Sree Kerala Varma College, Trichur. While a student he was first associated with the Nambudiri Yogakshema Sabha and later with the Communist Party. After education he joined the All India Radio and retired as Programme Officer (1985).

Finding all the dreams about an independent India shattered and human values trampled on, Kakkad attempted to set new trends in the content and form of poetry by blending the best of the great tradition with the best of the modern sensibility. He aimed at presenting the melodies and wrath of man through complex techniques. Development of myth, new images, rhythm, psychological realism, symbolism, lyricism, narrative discontinuity and alienation of the author are the characteristics of his poetry.

Salabhagitam (Song of the butterfly, 1957), Vajrakundalam (Diamond ear-ring, 1965), 1963 (10 poems, 1970), Patalattinte muzhakkam (The roar of the Inferno, 1971), Kummatti (A folk character, 1974), Vazhi vettunnavarodu (To the road-builders, 1976) and Kavita (Selected poems, 1984) are collections of his poems. Noted for their purity of tone, felicity of expression and simplicity of emotion his poems grip the heart of the reader. In Patalattinte muzhakkam he expresses his deep concern of the modern city becoming infernal. Most of his characters (for eg. Kantappan in 1963) seem to be mocking, while, in fact they are grinding their teeth against the hypocrisy of the society. According to him tradition itself is a dynamic force that could change the existing customs and conventions.

He has also written a collection of essays Kavitayum paramparayavum (Poetry and tradition, 1982), wherein he establishes that there existed in Kerala a folklore in original style and tradition parallel to the classical Sanskrit works of Magha, Harsha and Bharavi and the works of the Manipravala poets. His collection Kavita published by Kavita Grandhavalai received the Cherukad Award for 1984.

KAKKANADAN (Malayalam, b. 1935) is a novelist and short story writer in Malayalam. Born near Quilon, he took the B.Sc. degree in 1955. He was employed for a time in Southern Railways and in the Ministry of Railways, New Delhi. He visited Germany in 1967. Among his major collections of short stories are Kachchavadam (Trade), Kannadi vidu (Glass house), Patinezhu (Seventeen), Yuddhavasnam (End of the war), Purattek- kulla vazhi (The way out), Ashwatthamavinte chiri (The laughter of Ashwatthama).

His novels include Sakshi (Witness), Adiyaravu (Surrender), Ezham mudra (The seventh seal), Ushnamekhala (Tropics), Parankimalai, Tulavarsham (The north-east monsoon), Tirangalil udayam (Sunrise on the shores), etc. Some of his stories have been filmed.

Kakkandan is fully alive to the contradictions in modern life. He is aware of what is happening in the name of politics and business. He is a master of rhythmic prose in some of the stories like Nishada sankirtanam and Shri chakram while he uses down-to-earth dialectal forms in other stories.

K.A.P.

KAKKOKA (Sanskrit) is the author of the Ratirahasya, a work on erotica. Very little is known about his personal life; it cannot be precisely ascertained when or where he was born. Most probably he flourished in the twelfth century or a little earlier. He has been referred to by Somadeva, the author of the Nitivakya-mrita, mentioned in Kumbha's and Shankaramishra's commentaries on Jayadeva's Gitagovinda and quoted by Mallinatha in his commentaries on the works of Kalidasa and also by Yoshodhara in his Jayamangala commentary on the Kamasutra of Vatsyayana. Among the writers on Kamashastra, Kakkoka has displayed rare originality in both thinking and style. It is interesting to note that, except Virabhadra, all later writers on the subject such as Padmashri, Jyotirishvara, Devaraja, Jayadeva, Kalyanamalla and others followed Kakkoka in the scheme and subject matter of their works.

KAL AJ TE BHALK (Punjabi) is an award-winning drama of Harcharan Singh. It is a full-length play, comprising about 71 pages, and published by Navyug Press, Delhi (1972).

The theme revolves around the person of a so-called hermit, and shows his past, present and future, all in a moment of revelation. Harcharan Singh enters the phase of modern writing with this play, but cannot altogether shake off his traditional style and approach. Already many writers have tried their hand at unveiling the shadowy and shady deeds of the so-called sadhus and ascetics who still enjoy a prestigious place in our society. The crumbling feudal, spiritual and aristocratic forces are backed by all who conspire to exploit and misguide the masses, and then chase them like hounds.

The writer has clearly divided his dramatis personae into black and white. They can be easily classified into victims and wrong-doers. But the future has a streak of hope. The poetic justice he metes out is typical of Harcharan Singh. The play ends on a hopeful note.

Harcharan Singh experiments with the modern style of fantasy. In this play, the day-dreaming (or wishful thinking) of the mahant is the burden of the drama, and as the mahant himself puts it, 'he lives' his past, present and future in this family of his.

The dialogues are crisp and double-edged in meaning. The situations are dramatic and symbolic at the same time, and even the names of the dramatis personae are consistent with their characters. At times, the preacher gets the better of the dramatist, but on the whole the performance is that of a master-playwright. The strings do not get loose or out of control. The village 'misis' enliven and avert the otherwise tense situation. They serve as a chorus. Nothing is lacking or superfluous.

Here, the dramatist holds the scalpel like a skilled surgeon, but the physician in him is rather weak and meek, though he endeavours to usher in a brave new world in which there would be no injustice, no exploitation, and the shadows of the cloudy past will not stretch into the bleak present nor threaten a rosy future.

KAL SUNNA MUJHE (Hindi) is a collection of 37 poems of 'Dhumil' (pseudonym of Sudama Pandey), the well-known Hindi poet of the post-sixties, published posthumously in 1977 from Varanasi, and edited by Rashkehar. Besides the poems, this edition contains two prefaces: one by Vidyaniwas Misra, who suggested the title to the editor and toned down the emotional outburst of the editor's preface, and the other by the editor. Both the prefaces are useful inasmuch they furnish details of the poet's life, and evaluate him as an individual and as a poet. The editor has also given in the book some of the views of the poet about poetry and its language. This collection of poems was chosen for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979.

The importance of the poems in the collection rests on their progressive content and effective expression. What the poet expresses in his poems, is his authentic experience. Dhumil was a passionate individual, and at the same time he was influenced by Marxism. Therefore, his concerns are both individualistic and socialistic. In one of his poems, 'Jawaharlal Nehru ki mrityu par' (On Jawaharlal Nehru's death), he eulogises Nehru, and in another poem, 'O vairagi: Shantipriya Dwivedi', he praises Dwivedi's recluse life. In some poems, viz. 'Uske bare mein' (About him), 'Parajay-bodh' (Sense of defeat), 'Mrityu-chinta', etc., he expresses a sense of imminent death, defeat and depression. But a fighting spirit is also visible. In the poem 'Aaj mein lar raha hun' (Today I am fighting), he says: "Hear me tomorrow, when white flowers will be flowing with milk and the child will be drinking milk the bread will be taken with meat in the kitchen, when the family's labour for livelihood will be developing in sweet close relations, then hear me, today I am fighting.” His main concern is with the downtrodden. In most of the poems of this collection, he feels sorry for their poverty and ignorance, he is angry at their inaction, and he wishes that his poems should inculcate a sense of revolt in them. His last poem, written on January 14, 1975, underlines the temper of his poetry.

Look,
How the words become a poem.*
Read
The man lying between the letters
To know the reality.
Don't ask the blacksmith, but ask the horse
About the taste of iron
Who has the bridle in his mouth

To express himself effectively, Dhumil has used aggressive language embedded with fresh similes, images and symbols, and above all he uses expressive idiom.

KALA (Sanskrit). The Indian mind places religion, riches, libidinal satisfaction and liberation on the same platform, and declares, them as constituting the four ends of life. The mode of approach makes it clear that the subject of 'kama' is taken up precisely with the same care, seriousness and objectivity as that of dharma and artha or as any other technical topic. The most well-known work in this area is Vatsyayana's Kamasutra, which tries to trace the origin of the science to Prajapati or the Creator Himself.

The Kamasutra speaks of sixty-four different arts as follows: 1. Vocal music, 2. Instrumental music, 3. Dancing, 4. Painting in colours, 5. Decoration of the forehead, 6. Floor decoration with coloured powders, 7. making of beds with flowers, 8. Colouring the teeth, garments, hair, nails and the body, 9. Floor decoration with coloured stones and gems, 10. Making of different kinds of beds for different seasons and for different purposes, 11. Swimming and aquatic sports, 12. Bewitching and spells to subdue and win others, 13. Stringing flowers into garlands and other ornaments for decorating the body, 14. Arranging flowers in the form of floral crowns and chaplets, 15. Art of dressing and costumes for different occasions (private and public festivals), 16. Preparation of ear-rings with ivory, shell and other materials, 17. Making of scents and other perfumery articles, 18. Matching of jewellery and renovating old ornaments, 19. Creating illusions by magical tricks for amusement and entertainment of guests, 20. Make-up, toilet and employment of beautifying agents, 21. Deceptive trick or device of hand, 22. Art of cooking, 23. Preparation of different types of beverages, sweet and acid drinks, and spiced alcoholic drinks, 24. Sewing and needle-work of various kinds, 25. Making birds, flowers, etc. out of yarn or thread, 26. Mimicry of the sounds of the lute (Vina), 27. Setting of puzzles and solving riddles, 28. Repartee in extempore verse (that is, when one person recites a verse, another person follows with a recitation starting with the last quarter of the previous verse), 29. Participation in programmes relating to recitation of verses difficult to interpret and not easy to pronounce, 30. Melodious and attuned reading (from the two great epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata), 31. Dramatic criticism and analysis of narratives, 32. Extempore filling up of the missing line of a verse, 33. Making different items of furniture from canes and reeds, 34. Wood-engraving 35. Carpentry, 36. Building engineering, 37. Assessment of golden articles and gems, 38. Metallurgy, 39. Tinting or dyeing crystals and precious stones, 40. Gardening and care of plants and rules relating to the Science of Agriculture, 41. Training rams, cocks and other birds for mock fights, 42. Teaching parrots and other birds to talk and carry messages, 43. (Kamasutra, Chapter III).

The next author to give a detailed treatment to sixty four arts is Bhoja. In his Shringaraprakasha Bhoja treats the accomplishments going by the name of 'Chatushshash-ti Kalas' in the chapter on exciting factors, technically known as 'Uddipana vibhavas' in the terminology of Sanskrit Poetics. On this subject Bhoja leaves off Vatsyayana and borrows from his commentator Jayamangala. Jayamangala classifies, sixty-four basic arts into twenty-four 'Karmashrayas', twenty 'Dyutashrayas', sixteen 'Shayanopacharikas' and four 'Uttarakalas'. Following this classification Bhoja categorises the basic arts; he subdivides twenty Dyutashrayas into two groups and asserts that while fifteen of this category are 'nirjivas', five are 'sajivas'. Both Jayamangala and Bhoja maintain that though there are numerous minor arts (avataarakalas), they are capable of being comprehended under the main accomplishments, numbering sixty-four (Shringaraprakasa, Chapter XVI).

KALA JEEVITAM TANNE (Malayalam) is a book by Kuttikrishna Marar. Though a Sanskrit scholar trained in the traditional way, Marar is notable for his unorthodox critical views on aesthetics, as exemplified by his Kala jeevitam tanne (Art is life itself) which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966. The book is divided into five parts, viz. the realm of experience, general discussion, criticism of poetry, study of epic characters and thoughts on revelation, and contains, in all, 28 essays, written mostly in the forties and fifties. It was a time when a controversy on the function of art and its relation to life was sweeping over the literary landscape in Kerala, Progressivists affirming the overriding importance of social realism and classicists arguing for the beauty of art. Marar's aesthetic discussion concludes thus; 'Art is life', a declaration somewhat similar to Keats's famous dictum, 'Beauty is Truth and Truth Beauty'. Marar of course has not borrowed it from anybody else, whether Indian or foreign. He depends entirely on his own reflection which has the support of what he believes to be the scientific method. It is interesting to note that this independent thinking and subjective reaction he owes to his deep acquaintance with Sanskrit literature. He believes that one's experience and reasoning are the best guides in literature. A critic, according to him, must be free from external influences and be true to himself. Criticism too is an expression of the self, like creative literature, and Marar does not hesitate to say that a critic should truthfully follow his own personal likes and dislikes.

Further, Marar also vehemently attacks many of the conventional ideas expressed by A.R. Rajaraja Varma and questions the absolute truth associated with the 'Shvani' theory of Anandavardhana. He even agrees with Mahima Bhatta in pointing out that 'vyanjana' or suggestion is not the touchstone of poetic excellence. According to Marar, self-expression, not suggestion, is that touchstone. A striking example of his original thinking in this regard is his theory that even apparently rhythmless Sanskrit metres are built on specific rhythmic patterns.

An open-minded critic, Marar can appreciate a neoclassic poet like Vallattol Narayana Menon (1879-1958) as much as a modernist thinker-playwright like C.J. Thomas (1918-60). He points out that a little known verse of an obscure poet like Pattattu Kunjunni Nambiar is better than a well-known stanza written by Oravankara Raja. Thus the book is a challenging document, personal and, at the same time, objective and serves as a mirror of the inner world of Marar, who was a free thinker.

P.N.K.

KALAGITURA (Marathi). In Marathi 'tamasha' (folk drama), there are two troupes or schools called 'kalagi-walle' and 'turewale'. In fact, in the Urdu language both the words mean 'the feather in the cap', or a special ornament worn on the turban. The origin of these two words is traced to Turkish and these were subsequently adapted in Persian. In the folk drama, 'kalagi' stands for the symbol of 'maya', and 'tura' for Brahma. How these metaphysical meanings stuck to these terms is, however, not traceable. The apparent signs or ornaments of these schools are a small round garland of flowers called 'gajra' worn round the wrist for kalagi, a bunch of feathers for tura. They are popularly called 'Nagesh' and 'Hardas' respectively. The colour of the flag of the first is ochre and that of the latter is green or white. Kalagiwale worship 'Shakti', and Turewale worship Shiva.

In tamasha, these two folk singers stand confronting each other. One party poses questions and the other presents impromptu replies. They are called 'savalachi lavani' and 'jawabachi lavani' respectively. In this way the competition continues with counter questions. It is customary for the winner to snatch the flag and the small drum ('dat') from the other party.

These question-answer folk-songs, with double entendre are called 'bhedik' (mystic) lavanis. Whether the Prakriti is superior or the Purusha is generally the theme of the lavanis. Kalagiwale considers Shakti as superior and for Turewale Shiva is superior. The second group asks the question, "How was Prakriti born? Who created it?" The answer is equally mysterious.

In the upper strata there was nothingness (shunya)
It was born of the higher void (mahashunya)
In it was sleeping God (Narayana)
In the desire of the desireless, Shakti was born

There are many such mystic poems in the cult of Vishnu, Datta, Mahanubhava, etc.

Durga Bhagavat, an authority on Marathi folk literature, says, "In one such lavani, Tarakasura the demon runs away with Vedas, but he also folded the earth and ran away with her. Now if earth was not there, where was the ground on which this demon ran?" A similar question is posed in a German tale: "Christopher took Jesus on his shoulders. Christ has taken the whole world on his head. Where, then, is the ground on which Christopher walks?" Some of these ultimate questions have no answers.

Some of these folk-poets had not done any regular study of metaphysics but they had heard many epics. Some 'shahirs' (folk-poets) who composed erotic poems in their youth, composed such metaphysical poems in their old age. In Tuljapur and Ankarkhop (Satara District), there are many such bhedik lavanis. Such poems have influenced the folk-poems of Malwa, Rajasthan, Nimad and other states.

KALAM (Malayalam). M.T. Vasudevan Nair's Kalam (Time, 1969) is a novel centred on the experiences of an adolescent named Sethu, who was born in a traditional Nair family of Central Kerala about five decades back. The joint family, though feudalistic, had been impoverished by economic depression. The novelist is not concerned with social relations or economic conditions or even with caste distinctions. He is not a critic of society and is not in the least alarmed by social evils. But we get from the novel a true picture of how the traditional matrilineal joint family of the Nair community existed in South Malabar, how the inertia-stricken community was impoverished, how Muslims and Christians became masters of the land and how the poor earned their living. What the author intentionally depicts is the emotional life of the youth who, while staying in a nearby town for the purpose of his education, pays occasional visits to his home. This emotional relation is of varied colours in respect of different persons and the novelist's gift is to be found in identifying and portraying the emotion in all its details.

The ethos presented in the novel is in no way different from that reflected in Vasudevan Nair's another major novel, Nalukettu. In fact this atmospheric characteristic of the Nair household in Central Kerala pervades M.T.'s short stories as well. He became famous through the magic spell of his short stories which had a typical beauty and tenderness, and later, when he turned to novel he broadened the canvas but the colours remained the same. Even his miniature art did not undergo any change. But he improved his art of narration and in Kalam we see a poetic style with symbolism in it. The electric torch of Unni Namboodiri, one of the characters, is for instance, an interesting symbol. The characters seldom show development. What happens to them is less important than what they are. In a period of writers' preoccupation with social realism, M.T. struck a new note by concentrating on emotional exaggeration.

The novel received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1970.

KALAM-I-MAHJUR (Kashmiri) is a collection of poems of Ghulam Ahmad Mahjur in ten volumes prepared during Mahjur's lifetime. The poems were serialised in a number of small pamphlets from 1936 onwards and were published by Ali Muhammad and Sons, Srinagar. The rationale behind the order of ghazals, short poems and vatsuns is not known for certain; it was perhaps determined by the dates of compositions, because the serialisation had started as early as in 1936 and continued for several years.

The series of Kalam-i-Mahjur ran in several editions and did much in popularizing Mahjur's poetry. His poetry is a continuation of the lyrical tradition already exhausted by Habba Khatun, Mahmud Gami and Rasul Mir. However, in him we don't find emotions hung on the pegs of those poetic clichés and hackneyed expressions which had been annoyingly repeated by the earlier poets. His poetry, to a great extent, is free from Persian archaism, and it interests the reader for its simplicity and freshness of refined utterance. The poet in these poems seems to have been totally oblivious of the tumultuous conditions of the period. However, his later poetry does pay attention to these conditions. He seems to have written in total isolation from the literary currents of his time in Urdu poetry which he read with much admiration though. The poetry of Kalam-i-Mahjur is full of over-profusion and musical overtones, but the best of its lyrics are the result of pure inspiration. Most of these lyrics are beautiful in parts, at times it is the freshness of metaphor which fascinates, and at other times it is the picturesqueness of diction which attracts the eye. Mahjur experienced the colours of nature with preternatural sensibility, but depicted them with utmost vividness and clarity. He portrayed Kashmir's landscape in which he lived and when he loved, and tinged it with his own emotions. Besides the conventional love-lyrics, Kalam-i-Mahjur contains several ghazals also in which the poet approximates to a great extent the compactness of form, intensity of feeling and solemnity of the classical ghazal in Urdu and Persian. Kashmiri ghazal since the days of Mahmud Gami, had remained undistinguishable from the 'vatsun' except for its lack of refrain. Mahjur seems to have given up the consideration of music and tried to attain precision and completeness of individual couplets, which is a distinctive feature of the ghazal. Kalam-i-Mahjur contains his poetry written during a period of nearly twenty years - from 1918, when he wrote his first ghazal in Kashmir, to 1936, when he was influenced by the freedom struggle and became its exponent in poetry. Kalam-i-Mahjur needs a deeper study in relation to Mahjur's other collections as well as his unpublished works. It also needs an up-to-date reprint with full documentation, only then can one understand its worth and significance.

KALAM-I-RASUL, MIR (Kashmiri) Rasul Mir flourished in the mid-nineteenth century, but little can be said with chronological certainty about the events of his life or about his poetic career. A portion of his verse was published by Ghulam Muhammed Nur around 1920, followed by reprints and additions from time to time. An authoritative edition of selected verses from Kalam-i-

KALAM-KALAM-I-RASUL, MIR

Rasul Mir with a translation in Urdu was published by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages in 1960. No evidence is available of its translation in English, or any other language, except, perhaps, a verse or a stanza here and there.

The contents of Kalam-i-Rasul Mir are beauty and love. There are exquisite pen-portraits of beauty. In 'Rinda poshamaal' (spirited embodiment of flowers), Poshamaal, the embodiment of flowers, has set out for some amusement. Even the shadow behind her deserves admiration. This lyric sets the trend for the portraiture of the beauty of the beloved by the love-lorn male. In 'Dapaan chhi', the lover similarly extols the beauty of the beloved whom he calls 'shatterer of virtue'. The poet concludes:

Thou hast, Rasul Mir, earned a bad name for thy love of bud like moths,
Be happy, the loved ones never question your devotion and faith

Similarly in other lyrics where the lover is a male, the beauty of the female beloved is extolled, her coyness is underscored, and she is reminded of her breach of promise. The lover asserts the intensity of his love and expresses his readiness for any sacrifice.

The love of a woman for the male beloved is depicted in a parallel set of lyrics. The beloved is tall, handsome like a rose, with hyacinth-hair, bewitching almond-eyes, hands painted with henna and sharp claw-like nails. As a seeker of pleasure he is, of course, inconstant as mercury, and the love-sick woman is reminded of Sita's sacrifice for her Ramachandra (Nigaro). In 'Haariye thavakna kan' the female lover dismisses the gossip-mongers with contempt. So is it in 'Yaara loguth sangdil', 'Aamai', 'Myon dilbar', 'Chaani lolare', 'Vantai konai aav', 'Chhum me tamanaa', 'Ma'ts nera', etc.

Except for a very small number of poems in the conventional form, Kalam-i-Rasul Mir has been set against the tradition of mystic poetry and sings of human beauty and love of man for woman without inhibitions and embarrassment. The male lover asserts that 'without knowing either heathenism or Islam, he identifies faith and religion with the hair and face of his beloved' (Nigaro) and the female lover unabashedly scoffs at the gossip-mongers: 'If the lovers agree, what if the whole world gossips?' (Haariye). Rasul Mir's female lover is not a conventional woman—hesitant, shy, or lachrymose. She boldly claims to be a 'Padmini' who is widely spoken of as an ardent lover of her beloved. She says prayers for him and even keeps the fasts for him in the holy month. She is determined to lift a hundred thousand curtains for her beloved.

In making the male lover the mouthpiece of love for the female beloved, Rasul Mir again sets out on an unbeaten track. The joy he feels in delineating her form oozes from every verse, image and expression in the poems.

The ghazal form came to Kashmiri and to Rasul Mir through Persian, and its influence on him is obvious in his imagery (henna dyed hands, scimitar-like eyebrows, coral lips, etc.), diction (zulf-e-kamand, gonch-e-dahan, gulroi), conventional references (an Iranian sword, a Turk from Turkistan, the bow and arrows, i.e., eyebrows and eyelashes, serpentine curls, etc.) and some metres. Rasul Mir's diction, on the whole, also appears to be over-Persianised. But in retrieving his position, he instilled in it freshness, ardour, sincerity, music, and occasionally local colour. He has also used Kashmiri expressions deftly to vouch for his originality: gaili (gossip), veri (with a hankering for), absaavun (twist), tshal (trick). The instances of local colour are obvious in references to place-names, dress, ornaments, make-up, spinning 'shahtos', melting snow, Bombur, Lolre, Himal, etc. References to Padmini, Sita, Rama, and Poshapooza are a clear indication of his emotional roots in his own country, far away from Iran.

For their lightness of touch, intensity of love and unity of impression his ghazals stand apart from those of his contemporaries. They are not overlaid with thought, philosophy, allegory or metaphor. They are remarkable for their overall unity which often eludes the ghazal. As such they are closer to the lyric. There is joy and expectation, fulfilment, but no resignation or hopelessness.

Rasul Mir introduced a note of dazzling individuality with his emphasis on the worship of human beauty and pursuit of love. The beauty of other objects of nature serves to highlight the beauty of the beloved. Kalam-i-Rasul Mir depicts the beloved's beauty from different angles and different settings. There is an inner harmony of sound, beauty of ideas and expression. One would, however, expect from a poet of his stature greater originality in imagery, simile and metaphor, a simpler and more harmonious diction and a greater evidence of his appreciation of the beauty of nature bursting forth around him.

Kalam-i-Rasul Mir appears to have taken the lovers of Kashmiri poetry by storm and a number of contemporaries such as Nazim, Miskin, Maqbul, etc. paid their tribute by writing in his style. Poetry was freed of the shackles of mystical conventions and the hypocrisy of conformity. The self-confidence which pervades Kalam-i-Rasul Mir influenced other poets leading to the efflorescence of Mahjur. The latter acknowledged the inspiration he received from Rasul Mir who is unhesitatingly acknowledged as the father of the ghazal in Kashmiri.

KALAM KA SIPAHI (Hindi) is a biography of Premchand written by his son, Amrit Rai, and first published in 1962. Amrit Rai started his career as a writer of fiction, and therefore, this biography assumes the creative style of a novel. This is neither a bare collection of facts, nor a matter-of-fact record of the incidents of Premchand's life. Premchand no doubt is the character around whom the story has been woven. Amrit Rai himself says, "It is a novel the hero of which is Premchand. The only difference is that he is not a creation of my imagination, he is a man of history, who lived on this earth and left indelible impressions of his character and deeds on the sands of time."

The author has tried to present to the reader the livesketch of Premchand, the important events of his life, the various influences that worked on his mind and the resultant personality, the different facets of his character and the social, political milieu that made him what he was. Premchand was a literary giant, a doyen among the Hindi fictionwriters of his age. Therefore, we can judge his life and evaluate his genius only through setting his works against the sociopolitical background of the age. The author has done this with great success. The result is that Kalam ka sipahi is a synthesis of Premchand, his literature and the period in which he wielded great influence through his pen. When the author stumbled and the progress of the biography slowed down, an idea struck him. "Let me relate the life of this man with the events and social changes that were taking place in the country and lo; the obstacles disappeared. The simple life of this man required new meaning, assumed new dimensions and became more purposeful."

Starting with the description of the village, ancestral pedigree, family background, the author gives in chronological order the graphic description and detailed account of Premchand's childhood, early education, death of his mother, relations with his step-mother, his keen desire to receive higher education, his efforts to reach the goal, his life as a school-teacher, his transfers, his promotion as deputy sub-inspector of schools, and his resignation from that coveted post under the influence of Mahatma Gandhi. After leaving service, he became a freelancer and tried to make both ends meet with the meagre amount he earned from his articles, stories and novels. His first unhappy marriage, his sincere efforts to help his step-brother, his second marriage with a widow, his unbounded love for his children and the anxiety for their proper education are all recorded in a fascinating style. The last days of his life were spent in poverty, and mental strain chiefly because of his printing press, his journal Hans, and the attitude of his publishers.

The biography brings into focus various characteristics of Premchand's personality. He was a voracious reader and an untiring writer. Single-minded devotion, unflinching loyalty to the cause, love for simple village life, fearlessness, self-respect, tolerance, large-heartedness are other qualities of the head and heart which impress the reader of this biography.

One gets a glimpse of the socio-political atmosphere through its pages. The political upheaval under the guidance of Mahatma Gandhi, the social reforms through the efforts of Arya Samaj, the orthodox religious community, the poverty-stricken farmers and the woes of the middle class, all give us a compact picture of life in the days of Premchand.

Despite its style resembling fiction, Amrit Rai has endeavoured to make this first and complete biography of Premchand as authentic as possible. He visited the places where Premchand had lived, established contact with persons he had been associated with, read every line written by Premchand, traced his service-book and other valuable records connected with his life, studied them deeply, and then, after continuous hard labour for five years, undertook the writing of the book which presents a true picture of Premchand's life and his literary career which was a veritable achievement after hard struggle.

Like a novel, it is interesting from the first to the last page, keeping alive the curiosity of the reader throughout. It has a compact and an organically unified plot, and presents different styles—descriptive, narrative, analytical and dramatic. Mostly written in the third person, at places the author has also employed the flashback technique.

Both its content and technique are singularly novel. It is, indeed, a landmark in the history of Hindi biography.

KALAMEGHAM (Tamil), also known as Kalameghap-pulavar, is a poet of the mid-15th century, who is today remembered for his two poems 'Tiru Anaikkaula' and 'Chitra madal'. He was born as a Vaishnava brahmin, named Varadana, at Nandipuram and was serving as a temple cook in Srirangam Vishnu temple. Infatuated with the beauty of a temple dancer in the neighbouring Tiru Anaikka Shiva temple, he turned Shaiva and through the grace of Sarasvati acquired the gift of poesy and his new name. His patron was Saluva Tirumalaraya (1455-1468), a petty ruler in Tanjavur district. He was the greatest master of ready wit and 'the only Tamil poet of the past who can claim the name of satirist'. His stray verses, rich in double entendre (chiletai, Skt. shlesha) and paronomasia (yamaka), are very popular among all classes of people. Kalamegham (the dark, i.e. rain bearing cloud) was the name by which he was known because of his great skill to pour the verses on any subject, as a heavy cloud would shower torrential rain. Kalamegham has flooded Tamil with torrents of stanzas, some of them witty and sharp, some of them mere word juggleries, or, at best, palindromes and acrostics which were so current in late Sanskrit poetry after Magha.

The 'ula' (in 461 couplets) is a continuous poem in honour of Lord Shiva enshrined in the Tiru Anaikka temple in a conventional pattern where women in the traditional seven ages witness the procession of Shiva's image going along the streets and fall in love with the divine form. It describes in detail the reaction and longing of the women. The 'Chitra madal' is also a love poem (in 174 couplets) in praise of a local patron. Here a lover who has seen a young lady in his dream pines for her and says that he would mount the palmyrah horse and give up his life unless she is united to him. Mounting the palmyrah signified that the hero was prepared to give up his life unless his object was achieved. The two poems being some of the early ones of the types are good verse. He is immensely popular among all people because of the large number of his occasional verses of quick repartee and wit.

KALAPINO KEKARAV (Gujarati) is the only collection of poems of Kalapi (Sursinhji Takhtasinhji Gohel, 1874-1900), an extremely emotional and subjective Gujarati poet. It was poet Kant who first published it in 1903, after Kalapi's death. In 1931, another friend of Kalapi, 'Sagar' Jagannath Tripathi, published an enlarged edition, incorporating in it all the unpublished poems. Since then, numerous editions of varying sizes of this big compilation of two hundred and fifty poems, covering some 600-700 pages, have been published. A few selected poems have been published in small collections. This indicates the collection's popularity.

The poems in Kalapino kekarav are a manifestation of the most intense and subjective feelings of a young lover's heart. Depicted in these poems, in a very natural style, are the various psychological states of a blossoming young mind, like the intense desire for love, heightened attachment, the unbearable pangs of separation, restlessness, mental torment and the feeling of disinterestedness that is sometimes born therefrom.

In a way, it is a sort of autobiography of its emotional creator. Mostly, it depicts the poet's personal love-life, embracing the last eight years of his short life of twenty-six years. These poems which exhibit considerable formal variety, depict a unique love-story comprising so many elements like the love that was born in the poet's heart towards Shobhana, his wife Rama's maid, while educating her, the conflict that arose in his heart while he had equal love for Rama, the turbulence that disturbed the smooth and unobstructed course of the feeling of love when thoughts about the morality of such love troubled the mind, devotional in nature, the disinterestedness that pervaded the poet's mind after marrying Shobhana which eliminated the gnawing feeling of separation. 'Hridaya triputi', a long descriptive poem, is a straightforward narration of the entire love-story, while short poems, such as 'Bilwamangal' and 'Bharat', depict the tension born of an effort to save oneself from excessive attachment. This tension has been portrayed through the medium of the story of Bilwamangal and the epic story of the sage Bharat, in a somewhat indirect manner, but with a subjective feeling. There are sharp outbursts of romantic love even in short lyrics of straightforward protestations of love, such as 'Hamara-rah', 'Jyan tun tyan hun', 'Ek ferfar', and other short lyrics 'Pushpa', 'Sarasi', 'Ek gha' where the imagery of flowers and birds has been employed.

Nature constitutes the theme of another important group of poems in Kalapino kekarav. These poems are highly enjoyable because of the delicate portraits of nature that are true to life, and delight the senses, and depict the aesthetics of the enchanted feeling. The poet has frequently depicted nature and the world of birds as symbolizing his beloved, or for the purpose of 'anyokti' (a Sanskrit rhetorical device). The portrayal of nature that figures in his short poems as an effective background to the incidents and the felicity of description, also turn out to be delightful.

The poetry that was written during the last two years of the poet's life is of a devotional character. Once the overflow of love subsides, the poet's outburst of passion calms down and there come alive the inborn leanings towards disinterestedness, which were hitherto dormant. As a result of a study of the Holy Bible and Swedenborg after the poet's contact with his friend Kant, the poet's religious inclination and reflective bent of mind receive greater nourishment. He turns towards a search for the highest truth. In the poetry of his last years, the poet's style turns more mature. From this angle, 'Aap ni yadi sanam ni shodh', 'Tamari rah', 'Nava saiko' are the poems of great importance.

Kalapino kekarav contains poems presenting a variety of forms, long as well as short lyrics, ghazals, short poems, one-stanza poems and a long descriptive poem entitled 'Hamirji gohel' which was planned by the poet as an epic but remained incomplete. In comparison with the ghazals of personal love (Ishq-e-mijazi), written in the earlier years, the ghazals depicting love of God (Ishq-e-haqiqi), written during the last years, are more worthy of attention. From the point of view of form, the poet's ghazals suffer from certain deficiencies, but in respect of their internal temper—their ecstasy and heartfelt feelings—they certainly deserve attention. There is a beautiful portrayal of emotions in the peculiar temper of the ghazal, in love intensely felt and marked by passion, and in the living realization of the presence of God in a few of his ghazals. Emulating Kant, he wrote short poems which have not been able to attain the objectivity of the poetry of Kant and have occasionally suffered from weakness of structure and prolixity; however, from the point of view of natural and straightforward carriage of emotions, beauty of visual imagery that touches the heart, effective portrayal of the internal churnings of the characters and, in particular, a sweet style possessing ingenious simplicity, they bear the imprint of Kalapi's personality. Bilwamangal has been considered to be his best short poem.

Kalapi had a very sensitive mind and, therefore, the influences on his pursuit of reading, which covers so many books on literature, philosophy and religion, are reflected in the themes of his poetry and in poetic expression. One can discern the impact of Kalapi's favourite poets such as Wordsworth, Shelley and Keats on his poetry of nature and on his romantic technique of poetry. Kalapino kekarav contains free translations and transcreations of many poems of Goldsmith, Milton and Goethe, besides those of the poets mentioned above. Ghazals, short poems (khandkavya), 'Anjami gita' and the like are the forms of poetry which show the unmistakable influence of contemporary Gujarati poetic traditions also.

Though belonging to an age of poetry when it was being written by scholar-poets whose creations can be said to be not easily intelligible, and though Kalapi wrote in poetic forms current in that very period and in Sanskrit metrical styles, yet what made his poetry easily intelligible and attractive was a direct, transparent portrayal of emotion intensely felt. The depiction of love relationships marked by passion, have also played a great role in making his poetry popular. Thus, the chief poetic characteristics of Kalapino kekarav are straightforward, forceful expression of liquid and rich emotions, felicity and sweetness of language, the overflow of young romantic love, discernible in each form of poetry, delicate imagination and thought deeply steeped in emotion blended with lyricism. Even so, this poetry has, from the point of view of poetic excellence, remained of the middle standard because of the absence of artistic restraint, over-expressiveness and prolixity, and also the limited canvas of his world of experience. Kalapi's reading was vast, his nature was inclined towards thinking and reflection and he had very high notions and ideals about poetry, but emotional restlessness has made the poet stop at the level of mere outbursts. By the time he could acquire poise, and acquire greater experience in writing and improve his poetry, the poet died and the poetry, which, during the last years, was becoming somewhat well-balanced, stopped at the formative stage. Kalapino kekarav occupies this unique and peculiar position in Gujarati poetry.

KALAPURNODAYAMU (Telugu), the first work in Telugu of amazing inventiveness and skilful narration, is the outstanding contribution of Surana to Telugu literature. Composed during the second half of the fifteenth century, when the poet was patronised by Krishna Raja of Nandyal, the work was the first prabandha in Telugu, which did not borrow the story from any Sanskrit purana or work, it is thus also the first independent creation in Telugu. Praised by critics like C. Ramalinga Reddy, a distinguished educationist and literary critic for its originality in narrative technique and the organisation of a complicated plot which could well have got out of hands for a less competent writer, the work is considered to be the first novel in verse. The date of composition of the work also is significant in an assessment of its real value as a piece of imaginative writing. It was the time when Rabelais's Gargantua and Tasso's Orlando Furioso were being written in France and Italy; 'novella' had not reached the peak of its artistic achievement. At such a time, it was remarkable that Surana could compose a work of such inventive originality and technical virtuosity.

The story commences with a beautiful girl, Kalabhashini, in a mighty swing in the garden of Dwaraka. Narada, on his way to the abode of Vishnu, looked on the girl and commented that she was more graceful than the celestial damsels. These words were heard by Rambha, travelling with her fiancé, Nalakubara. After meeting Narada, she asked whether earthly women could be more beautiful than the apsarās. While they were coming down toward the earth, Kalabhashini got a glimpse of Nalakubara and immediately fell in love with him. During the conversation of Rambha and Nalakubara the name of Kalapurna was mentioned and, when Kalabhashini requested Narada to tell her about him, Narada said that he could not tell the story, since those who told the story would have to be born as human beings. In this way, right from the beginning, reader's curiosity was built up about Kalapurna, even though the story was told only in the sixth Ashwasa. Narada was also involved in a personal rivalry with Tumbura who had been once singled out for a unique honour, because he was serving Lord Krishna and his concerts who only could teach him divine music. Pleased by the service rendered by Kalabhashini during her discipleship at Dwaraka, Narada taught her the art of Kamarupa, assuming the desired shape. This leads to interesting events of mistaken identity, one comes across so often in the plays of Shakespeare, like The Comedy of Errors. Narada at that time had another disciple called Manikandhara with whom Kalabhashini entered into a romantic relationship. But at this point, she got infatuated with Nalakubara. Meanwhile, Manikandhara went on pilgrimage. Now enters the scene a Siddha called Manistambhudu who won the confidence of Kalabhashini through talk and show of supernatural powers and finally took her on his flying lion to a temple for sacrificing her to the goddess so that he could obtain some supernatural powers. At the temple, she was informed of the actual designs of the Siddha by an old lady, Sumukhasatti. When she tried to save Kalabhashini from being sacrificed, she was herself killed, but she came back to life with regained youth, while both the siddha and the other lady were whisked away by a powerful gale. After sometime, the lady returned to the temple and met the young lady, who was once the old lady, Sumukhasatti. Manikandhara arrived there and narrated the tale of confusion between two Rambhas on one occasion and two Nalakubaras on another. Really, the counterfeit Rambha was Kalabhashini and the counterfeit Nalakubara was Manikandhara; both these pretenders were cursed to short life by the real lovers. When Kalabhashini regretted that she was finally ravished by an unknown person, Manikandhara revealed that he was the counterfeit Nalakubara. Both feel happy that their love found its consummation in an indirect way.

At this point, to show that the ways of love are strange indeed Manikandhara narrates the story of Sugatri and Salina. Salina was not attracted by his wife, when she was decorated with all ornaments, but when she was simply clad he accepted her as his wife. But at one stage, she was blessed by Sarasvati that she would beget children, while her husband was promised that he would not have children. As their contradictory wishes could not be fulfilled in their lives, they decided to end them by jumping into a pond. They appeared later as Sumukhasatti and Manistambhudu. Later, remembering that Rambha cursed that she would be killed by a sword, Kalabhashini requested her lover to kill her. After some hesitation he killed her and handing over the diamond necklace to a Brahmin called Alaghuvrata left for Srisailam.

In the fifth Ashwasa, we find a child, who when the diamond necklace originally presented by Krishna to a king called Sugraha, was put on her person, would recollect her previous birth and narrate those stories. The poet used this technique to tell finally the story of Kalapurna about whom curiosity had been roused from the start. The child narrated the story of the erotic affair between Brahma and Sarasvati, how as the pet parrot of the goddess, she happened to hear the story of Kalapurna as related by Brahma during their privacy. The poet introduced an element of curiosity again by making Brahma say that Kalapurna was the son of a father called Sumukhasatti and a mother called Manistambudu, reversing the roles of man and woman. Into the story was introduced an element of crazy desire of a couple to change their sexes, which accounted for the strange parentage of Kalapurna. In fact, the whole story of Kalapurna was a symbolic extension of the natural phenomena around Brahma and Sarasvati. The town was called 'Kasaram' (pond of water), Kalapurna (the full Moon) is the king, the beloved was Abhinavakaumudi (the new moonlight), etc. But when the parrot narrated the story to Rambha, Sarasvati became angry and cursed her. Finally, Brahma decided that the parrot would be born first as Kalabhashini and then as Madhuralalasa (sweet desire) and marry Kalapurna, who was born to Sumukhasatti and Manistambhudu in their reversed roles. After the birth of Kalapurna, the parents recovered their original sexes. The boy acquired instant youth, married first Abhinavakaumudi and then Madhuralalasa and had two sons through his two wives. The story is finally rounded off happily. Into the work are introduced a few more sub-stories like those of Yajna Sarma, who sold away his wives to find money for continuing the practice of feeding the poor daily, and of Salyasura, who harassed Madhuralalasa and so on. But all these stories are knit together by the running thread of the main story concerned with the birth and growth of Kalapurna. The organisation of the several stories into a unified pattern is really an artistic tour de force winning the reader's instant admiration.

The amazing narrative techniques adopted by Surana have won the praise of modern critics. Mention may be made of the building up of reader's curiosity by mentioning the name of Kalapurna in the first ashwasa but withholding the actual story up to the fifth ashwasa, the revealing of the character of others through the dialogue of some others in the work, and from different perspective and the technique of flashback, which has become popular now through the medium of the film. The work may also be considered a portrait gallery in view of the breadth and subtlety of characterisation. Right from the exalted love of the creator and his lady, which is yet human, the idiosyncratic desire of Salina for unadorned feminescence, the humanness of an otherwise merciless demon like Salyasura, who is compared to Victor Hugo's Hunchback of Notre Dame by M. Kodandarama Reddy, the husband who sold away his wife, recalling Henchard of Hardy's The Mayor of Casterbridge, the ruler of Kasarapura, Satwadatma, who exemplified the Lotharios of today when he tries to attract Manistambhudu when he assumed the female sex, the uninhibited sexual acts of the couple in the airplane described in VI.124—all these present human character in its wide variety and complexity. All through the kavya the poet kept up a centrally directed narrative technique and the whole work could also be interpreted as an extension of a central symbol related to the rise and growth of 'kala' (art) first in the general experience of the poet (Creator, Brahma), then coloured by the individual response of the poet and finally the creation of art.

KALBURGI, MALLAPPA MADIVALAPPA-KALE PANI

Kalapurnodayamu, by all accounts, is an achievement of amazing originality and commendable virtuosity; it is a unique contribution to Telugu literature.

An early edition of the work was brought out by Revappermallayya at Madras in 1888. Vavilla Ramaswamy Satrulu & Sons brought out another edition in 1953. Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi brought out an edition under the editorship of M. Kodandarama Reddy in 1967.

KALE, KESHAV NARAYAN (Marathi; b. 1904, d. 1974) spent fifty years of his life in literary, dramatic and film activities. He wrote short stories, poems, edited literary magazines like Ratnakar (1929), Pratibha (1933-34), Maharashtra sahitya patrika (1940-42, 1946-1970), etc. In the field of drama, he wrote and directed plays and acted in them. This was true of his activity in a film producing company like 'Prabhat'. Yet, he was a philosopher of art and a progressive thinker. He translated Stanislavsky's works on the cine-art in Marathi.

He started his career in Gadney's school in Dapoli (Konkan). He had excellent command over Sanskrit and English, yet he kept up his reading on dramatic art and direction. He studied Greek and Marathi classical drama as well as European plays. An appreciation of his views is given by P.L. Deshpande in the introduction to Kale's posthumous publication Pratima, roopani rang (1974). He did his Matriculation in 1922 and B.A., LL.B. in 1928 and 1933. He edited three literary magazines.

Sahakarmanjari is a collection of his serious poems published by him in 1932. He wrote:

Nohe ha pratibhavas athava nohe kalavaibhava
Jen ale anubhutila rachivala shabdeni tad-gaurava

(This is not merely the luxury of a genius or mere artistic decoration; whatever I experienced, I have reconstructed it in best words)

He founded 'Natyamanvantara' in 1933 and produced a documentary on 'Prabhat'

He started Abhijat Chitrapat Ltd., and produced 'Municipality'. He acted in eight films. He was the secretary of Marathi Sahitya Parishad, and later, its executive president in 1935, 1943-45 and 1964-67. He was also a member of the Sangeet Natak Akademi, Delhi.

KALE PANI (Marathi) is a novel written by Vinayak Damodar Savarkar on the life of political prisoners in Andaman during the British rule. Savarkar was deported and underwent rigorous imprisonment in the Cellular Jail, Andaman. This novel was first serialized in Manohar magazine in 1936-37. First published in book-form in 1937, it had four more editions till 1968. The novel is singularly free from the political bias of Savarkar. It is a very tense piece of writing, with hardly any humour. All characters like Yoganand, the revolutionary, his relations Ramabai and Malati, the life-prisoner dacoit Rafiuddin Ahmed, Kishen, Naidu and others are very realistic and true to life. This novel has the background of Andaman dwellers, the tribals and others. For example, the eleventh chapter reads like an essay on the history, social structure and anthropology of Javra tribals, and even cannibals are mentioned here. The prisoners quarrel and try to commit homicide. A character like Kisan is repentant. The rest are prompted by the animal instincts of lust and jealousy, pugnacity and pride. The Hindu officers are shown as singing 'bhajans' and reciting Sanskrit shlokas; the Muslim officers offer prayers and recite Quranic 'ayats'.

As a novel, it does not have much literary value, but as a piece of fiction written by the great activist and powerful poet Savarkar, it has a special value as a period-novel, probably the only one in Marathi written against that particular background and about that particular locale of 'Black Waters' as Andaman was nicknamed.

KALE, V.P. (Marathi; b. 1932) is a popular short story writer, essayist and dramatist. One finds a lot of humour in his writings. His publications are, Ayatya block var nagoba, Intimate, Ek sakhe, Karmachari, Karc bhulalasi, Kahi khare kahi khote, Gulmohar, Ghar haravaleli manase, Chaturbhui, Chairs, Zopala, Takade Bhauji, Navara mhanava ajmla, Partner, Maya bazar, Ranga panchami.

He weaves his plots around the follies and foibles of middle-class Marathi men and women in small towns and the metropolis. His humour is not contrived but spontaneous, mostly based on the situation or on peculiar characters. He edits a popular journal, and has also popularized the 'story telling' programme.

KALELKAR, KAKASAHEB (Gujarati/Hindi/Marathi; b.1885, d.1981). A great prose-writer, personal essayist of the highest order, beautiful travelogue-writer, authentic interpreter of Gandhian thought, a close associate of Gandhiji, a freedom fighter, an apostle of Indian culture, Dattatreya Balkrishna Kalelkar was lovingly known as Kakasaheb Kalelkar in Gujarat and all over India. Though Maharastrian by birth, Kakasaheb was, in words of Gandhiji, 'Savai Gujarati' (125 per cent Gujarati). In Gujarat, nobody felt that he was a non-Gujarati writer writing in Gujarati. His mastery over Gujarati was unique, and he knew the intricacies of the language and its idiom to such an extent that a great critic like the late Balvantrai Thakore, as early as 1931, mentioned his name amongst the ten great prosewriters of the language.

Kaka Kalelkar was born at Satara and had his primary and secondary education at Satara, Karwar, Dharwar, etc. He passed his matriculation examination in 1903 and joined Fergusson College, Poona, for higher studies. In 1907 he passed his B.A. examination. He joined the editorial staff of Marathi Daily Rashtram in 1909. During 1910-11, he was appointed Acharya of Gangnath Vidyalyaya, Baroda. In the next year he went on a pilgrimage to the Himalayas with Anantabuvu Mardhekar and Swami Anand. He travelled 2500 miles on foot in the Himalayan region. In 1914-15, he went to Shantiniketan and started teaching there. When Gandhiji returned from South Africa in 1915 and visited Shantiniketan, he met him and joined Gandhiji when he made Ahmedabad his head-quarters. Since then Kaka Kalelkar's life was fully dedicated to Gandhiji and he served the country in various capacities. Mahatma Gandhi established Gujarat Vidyapith and Kaka Kalelkar was appointed its Vice-Chancellor in 1928. He was jailed several times during the freedom movement. Afterwards he was entrusted with the work of spreading Hindustani in the country. The mission of Kaka Kalelkar's life was to preach equality of all men and goodwill for all religions. The last years of his life were spent in Indo-Japan friendship mission.

After Gandhiji's assassination in 1948, he served the country in various cultural and educational fields. In 1952, he was nominated a member of the Rajya Sabha, and the next year he was made President of the Backward Classes Commission. In 1956, he was appointed adviser on the project of Gandhian Literature. Kakasaheb held many literary and cultural positions. In 1960, he was elected President of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. He was closely associated with Sahitya Akademi from the very beginning. A tireless traveller that he was, Kaka Saheb travelled almost to all the parts of India. But he had decided not to go abroad till the nation attained freedom. After Independence, he travelled to European countries, China, Japan, East Africa, etc. And as a result, we have got five travelogues from his pen, such as Brahmadeshno pravas (1931), Purva Afrikaman (1951), Ugamno desh Japan (1958). The best among his travelogue is, however, Himalaya no pravas (1924), a classic in Gujarati literature.

The first article that Kakasaheb wrote in Gujarati was about Rabindranath Tagore. In 1920, Rabindranath went to Ahmedabad to attend a conference of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. Kaka Kalelkar introduced Rabindranath to Gujarat. It proved to be a specimen, as it were, of how a great poet of any country could, any time, be introduced with such propriety and dignity. His writing work proceeded and Gujarat could discover in him a great essayist and prose-writer.

He wrote on education, culture, society, dharma, literature, etc. He wrote autobiographical and biographical works. The main form that he exploited and enriched by his contribution is the essay. Most of them are personal essays, and Kakasaheb will be remembered in Gujarati as a personal essayist. He has shown the beauty of the forest, rivers, lakes, valleys, mountains, clouds and constellations. Everything that he touched was transformed into gold. He has seen poetry in scorching heat of the sun and has narrated a poem of mud also. He has described the moon peeping through the palm tree, and vividly pictured the beauty of the night and shown to us 'books in running brooks'.

He has a keen eye for beauty. With the poet's sensitivity, he has given some excellent personal essays which are rightly described by Umashankar Joshi as poetry of Kakasaheb. His contribution to the essay form is unique and incomparable. Some of his excellent essays are found in collections like Jivanno anand (1936), Rakhada-vano anand (1953) and Jivanlila (1956). Kakasaheb believed in 'Art for life's sake' in contrast to 'Art for art's sake'. 'Jivan' (Life) was his favourite word. Some of his books were titled as Jivanno anand, Jivanvikas, Jivanbharati, Jivansanskriti, Jivanlila. But he has not become prone to didacticism at the cost of artistic excellence. Generally we find him a seeker of beauty. He himself said that to see the beauty of a thing is equal to seeing its truth. Kakasaheb's picturesque prose will continue to have an undeniable claim on us. The content of his personal essays is transformed by the author's aesthetic alchemy into a thing of beauty which is a joy for ever.

Kakasaheb was a born teacher. He was an education-ist par excellence. His treatise on education, Jivanvikas, contains a passage revealing his concept of education. In the translation by Umashankar it reads like this: "Vinaya (i.e. the spirit of education) says: I am no maidservant of power, nor attendant of law. I am no chaperon to science, nor a user of art, nor a slave of economy. I am the coming back of dharma. I, a mistress, hold sway over man's heart, reason as well as all his senses. Psychology and sociology are my two legs, art and craft are my two hands. Science is my head, dharma my heart, observation and reasoning are my two eyes, history my ears, freedom is my breath, enthusiasm and endeavour are my lungs. Patience is my vow, faith my life-spirit. Such a universal goddess am I, the sustainer of the whole world. He who is my votary will not need to look to anybody else. All his desire can be fulfilled through me."

His prose-style bears an unmistakable stamp of his personality. Generally he uses Sanskritized words, but at times his use of proverbs, idioms and colloquial words astonishes us. At times he coined new words. He is reasonable for evolving a new terminology. When a list of the coinages of Kakasaheb from his writings was being prepared for Kalelkar adhyayan granth, he said that such activity was not of human authorship and, thus, disowned his personal achievement. Kaka Saheb was a prolific writer. But he rarely wrote in his own hand. His friends and associates took dictation from him.

From amongst his numerous writings in book form, special mention, over and above his personal essays, should be made of Smarana yatra (Childhood reminiscences, 1934), Lokamata (Writings on rivers, 1334), enlarged edition under the title Jivanlila (1956), Otarati divalo (Playful incidents of Jail-life, 1925), Jivan bharati (A collection of critical articles, 1937), Jivan sanskriti (Reflections on culture and civilization, 1339). His Jivan vyavastha received the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1965. He wrote in Marathi and Hindi also. The influence of Kalelkar's writings on Gujarati writers was immense. Special mention should be made, in this respect, of the poets like Sundaram, Umashankar Joshi and Krishnalal Shridharani who came into direct contact with him.

Being a lone product of the Gandhian era with an essential grounding in multilingualism, Kaka Kalelkar expressed himself with as much felicity in Hindi as in Gujarati—the two major media of expression for him. Although Kaka Kalelkar's mother tongue was Marathi, he rose above the narrow linguistic limitations to associate with Rajarshi Purushottam Das Tondon and carry the work of propagation of Hindi with utmost devotion since Hindi formed one of the major planks of Gandhiji's 'Swadeshi' movement. Kaka's contribution to this field has been immense.

Kaka Kalelkar was a thinker and a visionary. He makes simple, fluent and impressive use of language to convey the deepest of thoughts and ideas. Simplicity and spontaneity are the hall-marks of his style in his Hindi writings. He is essentially an essayist and a travelogist. His essays belong to both reflective and aesthetic categories. His major works in Hindi are as follows: Smaran yatra, Dharmodaya (both autobiographies), Himalaya pravasa, Suryodaya ka desh, Us par ke parosi (travelogues), Jiwanlila, Bapu ki jhankian, Uttar ki divaren, Jivan ka kavya, etc.

Kaka Sahib was one of those integrationists who championed the cause of a uniform script for all the major languages of India. It was his well-considered view that gaps among the various language groups will narrow down considerably if they were to use the same script for their languages and this would immensely help the nation's emotional integration.

Kaka Kalelkar's contribution to the enrichment of the Hindi language and literature has been truly significant.

Kalelkar was a prolific writer and he wrote in three languages, viz. Gujarati, Hindi and Marathi. He was a well-known thinker and stands apart for his significant contribution in the field of the essay and the travelogue in all the three languages. The important works that stand to his credit in Marathi are Hindalgyache prasad (1934), Vanshobha (1944) and Khelkar pane (1964).

KALELKAR, MADHUSUDAN R. (Marathi; b. 1924) could not do much in his academic career and reached only upto the higher secondary level. However, in the field of literature, he is well-known as a dramatist, and his contribution to Marathi drama, both quantitatively and qualitatively, is rather huge. In his works, the so-called cultured upper middle-class in Maharashtra has been made a main target. He has very aptly depicted the characteristics of the middle-class families. But then, at the same time, he has not turned away his eye from the common man. He employs all that a common man expects of a popular drama.

His dialogues are simple, sweet and crisp, which keep the audience spell-bound. Familiar depiction of the family atmosphere is the popular image of Kalelkar. He prefers an attractive story-element which has a tremendous mass-appeal. The number of his dramas so far popularly staged, is more than 25. However, he has become the prisoner of his own set formula, which he has yet to free himself from.

He is a famous screen-play writer also. He has to his credit Dadasaheb Phalke Award, State Movie awards and awards from Marathi Natya Parishad for his valuable contribution to Marathi stage.

KALELKAR, NARAYAN GOVIND (Marathi; b. 1909) is a well-known linguist. Schooled at Baroda and Bombay, he obtained his first degree in Sanskrit (1932) and second degree in Ancient Indian Culture in 1934 from the University of Bombay. He joined the Oriental Institute, Baroda, as a research scholar in 1934. Three years later, sponsored by the then rulers of Baroda state, he left for Paris to study under the guidance of the celebrated French linguist, Jules Bloch. He studied in the College de France, University of Paris and Ecole des Hautes Etudes during 1937-40 and returned home with a diploma in French language and literature, on the eve of the Second World War. He paid a second visit to Paris (1949-50) to work again under Bloch and obtained his D.Litt. from the Paris University for his thesis on Mahanubhava philosophy (1950). As a Rockefeller Senior Fellow, he spent a year in USA in the Michigan and Yale Universities. Barring the period during which he was away from India, he taught French language and literature as well as linguistics first in Baroda college, and later, in the Maharaja Sayajirao University of Baroda till 1956, when he joined Deccan College, Poona as a Professor of Indo-Aryan and Indo-European linguistics. He worked in that capacity till his retirement in 1973.

He made substantial contribution as a member of the Sahitya Sanskriti Mandal and Bhasha Sallagar Mandal of the Government of Maharashtra. He knows several languages—three (Sanskrit, Prakrit, Pali) from the Old Indo-Aryan and Middle Indo-Aryan stock, five (Marathi, Konkani, Gujarati, Hindi, Urdu) from the Neo-Indo-Aryan, and two (English, French) from the European stock.

Kalelkar started his career as a writer with a Marathi translation, Buddha-kalina Bharatiya samaja (Bombay, 1936), of an English translation of the German original by Richard Fick, after which there was a long break of two decades. His major works after this break are all on linguistics: Dhvanivichara (Poona, 1955), Bhasha ani sanskriti (Bombay, 1960) and Bhasha: itihasa ani bhugola (Bombay 1960), of which the first two won Maharashtra State awards (1956, 1961) and the third, the Sahitya Akademi Award (1968). He has to his credit two more translations: the first, Comparative Method in Historical Linguistics (1963) of the French original by Antoine Meillet (Oslo lectures, 1925), and the second, Zadig by Voltaire (1747) into Marathi (Poona, 1981), besides Marathi translations of 50-60 French stories, poems and articles published in the Marathi periodicals Abhiruchi and Satyakatha from time to time. He has also produced the booklet Marathi (Delhi, 1965) to introduce the language to non-Marathi speakers. He contributed almost all articles relating to language and linguistics to Marathi vishvakosha (Encyclopaedia), an undertaking sponsored by the Government of Maharashtra.

Although, from the brief outline of his career traced so far, it may appear that pre-1955 Kalelkar is mainly a man of language, literature and philosophy, and post-1955 Kalelkar is a linguist. He was groomed to be a linguist ever since he joined the Oriental Institute, and subsequently went to Paris to study under the guidance of Jules Bloch, despite the inordinately long break caused by the Second World War. His major works on linguistics saw the light of the day after he joined the Deccan College; but as early as in 1947, the linguist in him had made himself felt, as may be seen from his scathing review of An Extensive Etymological Dictionary of Marathi by K.P. Kulkarni (Poona, 1947) which appeared in Abhiruchi published from Baroda. This eventually urged him to contribute his own to make Marathi linguistics scientific and upto-date.

KALESWARA RAO, AYYADEVARA (Telugu; b. 1881, d. 1960) was one of the stalwarts of the Indian National Congress in the Andhra region. Kaleswara Rao had his higher education at Noble College, Masulipatam, and did his Law at Madras. He was the leader of the bar of Vijayawada since 1906. He was elected Municipal Chairman of Vijayawada in 1923 and in that capacity he despatched an official communication asking the Simon Commission not to enter the Vijayawada Municipal limits.

KALHANA

He was elected to the Madras Legislative Assembly in 1946 and was the Speaker of the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Assembly in 1956.

The starting of Vignana Chandrika Mandali was a unique event in his life. With himself and Gadicherla Harisarvottama Rao, another freedom fighter as Secretaries, the Mandali, an organ of the Associators was founded in 1906. Komarraju Lakshmana Rao was its chief editor. The purpose of starting the Mandali was to bring out books on mundane knowledge in Telugu so that the average Telugu reader would be benefited by knowing physical sciences, history, economics and politics in daily life. The founders of Vignana Chandrika Mandali emphasized the necessity of making modern knowledge available in the mother tongue of the people.

The Vignana Chandrika Mandali published to its credit about 43 books on varied subjects like physics, chemistry, biography, history, historical novels and economics. Out of them, Ayyadevara Kaleswara Rao wrote five books on history. True to the noble ideal of Mandali, its first publication was a book on Abraham Lincoln who dedicated his life to the abolition of slavery in the United States.

Kaleswara Rao was much interested in the national awakening and social reforms taking place in the other developing countries of Asia. He was particular that all such knowledge should be made available to the Telugu people so that it would immensely help our countrymen to break the shackles of slavery and march forward on the path of progress. He made use of his frequent internments in Cuddalore, Rajahmundry and Vellore Central Jails for making a thorough study of the histories of other nations and producing several books on history in Telugu.

In 1922 he was imprisoned during the no-tax campaign and confined to the Cuddalore Central Jail for one year, where he wrote his first manuscript on the history of the French Revolution. Lest the British Government should object to the word 'revolution' and create hurdles for its sale and publication, he named it French swatantra vijayamu (Triumph of freedom in France) and had it published on behalf of the Vignana Chandrika Mandali in 1923. It was dedicated to Komarraju Lakshmana Rao, who passed away a few days before it saw the light of the day.

Two years later, his second book America samyukta rashtramulu (The United States of America), a work of 300 pages, was published on behalf of the Mandali. In this volume, he discussed in detail the American War of Independence, the American Constitution, fundamental rights provided to the American citizens, abolition of slavery, the negro problems, the American foreign policy, the freedom struggle of colonial people of Phillipine Islands, the American economic progress, etc. The book was dedicated to Pattabhi Sitaramaiah. Kaleswara Rao produced this work also during his confinement in Cuddalore Central Jail.

In 1930 during the Civil Disobedience Movement he was interned in the Trichinopoly and Vellore Central Jails for eleven months. During this period he developed interest in the study of freedom struggles in the Asian countries. Kaleswara Rao was highly impressed by these developments and produced a book, Turushka prajaswamikama (Turkish Republic), of 350 pages.

Kaleswara Rao was again imprisoned in 1932 on the charge of inciting people not to pay taxes. Again in 1932 when he was sent to Rajahmundry and Vellore Central Jails, he completed his work on the Chinese National Movement.

Later, on the eve of the Quit India Movement, he was imprisoned at Amraoti Central Jail, nearly for one year. During this internment he wrote two books one on Upanishatpathamulu (The lessons of Upanishads) and the other on the history of Egypt.

In 1958, as Speaker of the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Assembly, he took initiative for the establishment of the Telugu Academy of History and Sciences, of which he became the Chairman. On behalf of the Academy, his work on Egyptian History was published under the caption Egyptu desha charitra Arabbu jatiyata (History of Egypt and the Arab Nationalism). In a way, Kaleswara Rao made a successful beginning for the production of reading material necessary for the introduction of mother tongue as medium of instruction in higher education in later years.

KALHANA (Sanskrit, 12th Cent.), the author of the Rajatarangini, was the son of Champaka who was a minister of the Kashmiri king, Harsha (1089-1101) referred to as Kalyana. Probably at the instance of his teacher and patron, Alakadatta, who was 'sandhi-vigrahika' minister, Kalhana, who was well-versed in all the legendary lore, started writing his monumental work, the Rajatarangini, the most reliable work on the history of Kashmir. From the work we learn that, at that time, Jayasimha (1127-59), son of Sussala, was on the throne of Kashmir. The poet was an adherent of Kashmiri Shaivism. In Sanskrit literature no work of a directly historical character is available till after the Muhammedan conquest of India.

Kalhana utilised earlier sources, literary, epigraphic and numismatic, and added new matters. Except for the earlier portion of his work dealing with legendary kings, Kalhana is generally dependable for the history of Kashmir. From 600 A.D. onward his testimony is reliable leaving aside imaginary matters and those based on hearsay. Kalhana has maintained, all through, the standard of historical writings which he sets to himself. "That man of merit alone deserves praise whose language, like that of a judge, in recounting the events of the past, has discarded bias as well as prejudice (shlaghyah sa eva gunavan ragadvesha-bahishkrita-bhutarthakathane yasya stheyasyeva sarasvati—I.7). The poet's language is easy and his style racy. He shows poetic ability coupled with historical sense. Though the common sholka metre predominates, yet there are other metres which testify to his skill in prosody also. He was not only a poet but also a chronicler. Kalhana himself was neither a courtier nor a court-poet and though a brahmana by birth and a Shaivite by faith, he was free from any sectarian outlook.

Kashmir tradition attributes to him a poem Jayasimhabhyudaya dealing with the history of the achievements of king Jayasimha.

KALIAN (Punjabi), a plural of 'kali' is a poetic form which was very popular in the medieval age. Its literal meaning is a bud, a blossom especially of jasmine, but in Punjabi poetry this term is used in various forms. Generally a verse, especially of a 'bait' (a form of prosody) is called 'kali'. Sometimes the whole stanza of a bait having eight or twelve lines, is known as kali. The prominent feature of a kali is that it is both independent as well as part of the whole stanza, just as a bud has separate identity, but still it is an organic part of the whole plant. Most of the medieval romantic poetry in bait has adopted kalian as a unit. This form was very popular, and both folk as well as literary compositions are available in it.

KALIDASA (Kannada) is a critical study of the great Sanskrit poet-dramatist, in Kannada, by Sriranga (Adya Rangacharya). The book received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1971.

Sriranga taught Sanskrit in Karnataka College, Dharwad, for a number of years. There is in the book an implicit awareness of the important critical interpretations of Kalidasa, but the author eschews the temptation to discuss them. He projects Kalidasa as a revolutionary thinker. The technique of each of Kalidasa's plays receives full attention, and Sriranga discusses its implications. He recognizes that Kalidasa's works are to be read as literature in certain forms. But he is vitally interested in the response of Kalidasa to his age. He presents Kalidasa as troubled by the degeneration in the life around him, when kings were lured by women and luxury, and women lived in shackles in a man-dominated society. Kalidasa's third play, the Abhijnanashakuntala is his prayer to the Lord to bestow on the land an emperor who will adhere to dharma, honour and chastity. The book portrays Kalidasa as a great poet and dramatist, intensely interested in the world around him, combining erudition with the spirit of inquiry, and literary genius with serious thought, a poet who is great not only because of the literary excellence of his compositions but also because of his commitment to values like chastity, responsibility and the dignity of labour, which ennoble life.

KALIDASA (Sanskrit) by common consent is the greatest classical Sanskrit poet and the greatest Sanskrit dramatist. In India he is called 'mahakavi' (great poet), the term 'kavi' (generally translated as 'poet') connotating both poet and dramatist. The native place of Kalidasa still remains unknown and his date is also still controversial. The time of Kalidasa, however, according to different scholars, ranges from the 2nd century B.C. to the 4th century A.D. based on the one hand on the assumption that the Shunga king, Agnimitra, the hero of the Malavikagnimitra was his contemporary, and on the other on the Mandasore and Aihole inscriptions of the 4th and the 7th centuries A.D. Description of Raghu's conquests in Kalidasa's epic Raghuvamsha bears a very faithful resemblance to the description of the military expedition of Emperor Samudragupta (c. 350-375 A.D.) as presented by his minister poet, Harishena, in the Allahabad Stone Pillar Inscription, giving the impression that the former was modelled on the latter. Kalidasa's long poem, the Kumarasambhava, seems to have been given such a title on the model of the name of young Kumaragupta, the heir apparent of Chandragupta II (c. 375-415), to whose court Kalidasa is supposed to have belonged during the golden age of ancient Indian culture. This may be warranted by the presumption that Kalidasa's drama, Vikramorvasiya, has been so named for associating the memory of his patron Chandragupta II, who assumed the title Vikramaditya (A sun in valour). According to an Indian tradition, Kalidasa was one of the 'nine jewels' (nava ratna) of a certain king who had the epithet Vikramaditya. Hence it is presumed that Kalidasa received the royal patronage of Chandragupta II and Kumaragupta I (415-455), 'and thus saw ancient Indian courtly culture at its zenith', which is also duly reflected in his poems and dramas. Incidentally, this art of naming a literary work on the model of the names of patrons finds an analogy with the naming of Spenser's Faery Queen, the title whereof is supposed to allude to Queen Elizabeth, for, in the first three books of this work 'the shadowy Faery Queen sometimes represents the glory of God and sometimes Elizabeth, who was naturally flattered by the parallel'.

Kalidasa was the author of two 'mahakavyas', i.e. secondary epics or long poems: the Raghuvamsha (Dynasty of Raghu) and the Kumarasambhava (Birth of Kumara, i.e. Karttikeya); two 'khandakavyas', i.e., shorter poems: the Meghaduta (Cloud-messenger) and the Ritusamhara (Cluster of seasons) and three dramas: the Vikramorvasiya (Urvashi won by valour), the Malavikagnimitra (Malavika and Agnimitra), and the Abhijnanashakuntala

KALIDASA

(The memento and Shakuntala). The authorship of many other works attributed to him is doubtful.

The Ritusamhara contains 158 verses in different metres, and there are six Cantos, devoted to the description of the six Indian seasons beginning with the summer and ending with the spring.

While the Ritusamhara was a product of youth, the Meghaduta was a product of maturity. This poem contains some 115 verses uniformly in the 'mandakranta' metre, which is recommended by the traditional critics like Kshemendra as most suitable for the description of the rainy season; and, in fact, this long drawn metre can symbolically evoke the idea of the slow and dignified gait of the cloud.

Incidentally, the Meghaduta provided the model for a genre called 'dutakavya' to which, e.g., the Pavanaduta of Dhoyin (12th cent) belongs, and also inspired the German poet Schiller to compose the Maria Stuart.

The Kumarasambhava is available in seventeen Cantos but only the first eight Cantos are genuine composition of Kalidasa, and the latter nine Cantos are apocryphal. The poem begins with a description of the Himalayas as a mountain, as a god personified and as the father of Uma, whose beauty is also described at great length. Then it informs that god Shiva was performing meditation in the Himalayas and Uma was waiting upon him as a devotee. Then it is narrated that the life of the gods had been made unbearable by the demon, Taraka.

The poem may appear to be religious since its characters are deities of the Indian pantheon but the atmosphere of the poem is essentially secular. Here the descriptions of natural objects and human beauty and the delineation of the sentiments of love and sorrow and filial attachment are really very appealing. The poem is embellished with figures like simile (upama), metaphor (rupaka) and corroboration (arthantaranyasa). The message conveyed by this poem is that love's intensity depends more on the appreciation of inner qualities than on the infatuation caused by outward physical beauty, and love between men and women should be wedded to the purpose of doing some good to the society, e.g., giving birth to a child capable of bringing peace and prosperity to the society.

While in the Kumarasambhava Kalidasa describes the marriage of Shiva and Uma (i.e., Parvati), he begins the Raghuvamsha with a salutation to the divine couple as the parents of the whole creation. The Raghuvamsha contains nineteen Cantos and some 1570 verses. Indian tradition recognizes this longest poem of Kalidasa as a typical mahakavya (court epic) conforming faithfully to the characteristics of this genre as laid down by the traditional theorists. The poem presents an account of the lives and achievements of the kings of the race of Raghu, beginning with the story of Raghu's father Dilipa, treating at greater length the story of Rama, Raghu's great grandson, and ending with the lack-lustre lives of the later descendants like Agnivarna, whose widow anticipates an heir in the last verse of the poem. It is noteworthy that while the Kumarasambhava is concerned with the birth (sambhava) of a child (Kumara), in the Raghuvamsha also the birth of a child serves as an important motif; e.g., it begins with Dilipa's urge to have a child (Canto I) and ends with the anticipation of a child (Canto XIX) as stated above. The Raghuvamsha is characterised by simplicity of expressions and varieties of metres and figures. Just as the Ramayana of Valmiki proceeds from an urge to depict Rama as the most ideal human being, this poem proceeds from a desire to delineate the kings of the dynasty of Raghu as the most ideal adherents of the principles of 'varna' and 'ashrama' (i.e., four social divisions depending on quality and calling and four temporal divisions of the life of an individual).

The Malavikagnimitra is perhaps the earliest drama of Kalidasa. It is a comedy of harem intrigue, being concerned with the love of King Agnimitra of Vidisha for Malavika, the younger sister of the king of Malava, who happened to reside incognito in the palace of Agnimitra himself as a girl student of one of the two royal dance-teachers.

The Vikramorvashiya is traditionally recognised as a play of the 'trotaka' variety. It is concerned with the love between the mortal king, Pururavas, and Urvashi, a damsel of exquisite beauty, who belonged to the race of the apsaras, i.e., celestial dancers. The original story has been hinted at by a Rigvedic hymn (X.95) and told more elaborately in the Shatapatha-brahmana.

These two plays are enjoyable, rich in aesthetic appeal and pithy sayings. But the Abhijnanashakuntala is the masterpiece. According to a traditional Indian opinion also 'the drama is the most enjoyable of all the literary forms, and of all the dramas the Shakuntala is the most enjoyable' (kavyeshu natakam ramyam tatra ramya Shakuntala.) The story was already there in the form of a dull narrative; but, Kalidasa turned the same into an elegant work of art with a lot of innovations.

Love in union and love in separation are both depicted in this drama with a greater degree of perfection. The moral is that love should not make one forgetful of one's obligation towards the society. Dushyanta made a mistake by getting married without a reference to the guardians of Shakuntala and leaving the hermitage without making any provision for his wife and Shakuntala made a mistake neglecting her duty towards guests like Durvasas. Hence they had to suffer from the pangs of separation. Love, polluted by the rashness of youth, became purified by a process of suffering and austerity, like gold purified by fire, and hence their reunion in the hermitage of Maricha was a matter of deeper conjugal love, where it did not depend on the outward glamour of physical beauty, and where even the rustic attire of the beloved undergoing austerities would not be a deterrent. Another salient feature of this drama is the part played by Nature. While Kanva (Kashyapa) was the foster father of Shakuntala, nature was her foster mother. Her love for Shakuntala was obvious, but her presence was as ethereal as that of the deceased mother of Christabel in Coleridge's celebrated poem of the same name.

KALIKAMANGAL

Kalidasa is indeed one of the greatest poets (kavi) of India of all times. But he may be reckoned also as the national poet of India and as insofar as he cannot be definitely assigned to any part of India, he shows his intimate acquaintance with every part of this country. Moreover, the message of his writings that one should enjoy the pleasures of life while remaining conscious of one's obligations to the society is in full conformity with the ideal of 'enjoyment with a spirit of renunciation' as taught by the Ishopanishad with the expression, 'tena tyaktena bhunjithah'. Obviously it is paradoxical to enjoy and to remain detached at the same time. But for the Indians this paradox is compatible with the very nature of the individual soul, which has two opposite aspects as represented by the symbolism of two birds, one an enjoyer and the other a disinterested onlooker, residing in the same tree in the form of the human body, as given by the Vedic verse, 'dva suparna' etc. (Rigveda, I. 164.20). Kalidasa's literature is a legacy of this very quintessence of the traditional Indian view of life. To show how Kalidasa's greatness is acknowledged by non-Indians also, it may perhaps suffice to quote the following from A.L. Basham: "Kalidasa, besides being a poet of ideas, was also a poet who seemed to have derived his inspiration from the people around him and the folklore tradition of his country. He gave powerful expression also to the feelings of the common men and in his Raghuvamsam he condemned a ruler for disregarding the interest of his subjects.

"His (Kalidasa's) beauties and merits are tarnished by any translation, but few who can read him in the original would doubt that, both as poet and dramatist, he was one of the great men of the world."

Kalidasa was not a prolific writer. The complete work of his undisputed authorship consists of two epics, three plays and a long lyrical poem. In fact no other world poet could achieve so much on so little. For though few in numbers they reveal a range and depth, and an insight both into the national ethos and the intricacies of human experience, which are, by any standard, remarkable. Kalidasa was a poetic genius who could invest every borrowing,—and he did not, like other great writers, spend his energy on inventing—with a new meaning and significance, glow and lustre. He saw man, nature and the creator as a continuum and celebrated with passionate and sensuous ardour each separately and all of them together forming a grand design with a kind of poetic beauty and excellence which remains a height still unattained. He may even surprise a reader by his awareness of social problems. For in his Raghuvamsha he condemns a king for being unjust to his subjects. His greatest achievement, however, was one of a master artist who could make a rich language richer by his exquisite poetic imagination and his most poetic use of the language. Human sentiments and ideas acquired in his writing a colour and insensitiveness which made them poetically more real. All successive poets found in him an infallible but inimitable model; all poets the finest examples of all conceivable poetic devices. As the great German poet said, heaven and earth could indeed be seen conjoined in his work. Kalidasa is one of the greatest poets of all times, both for the perennial ideas he has configured in his work, and for the perennially beautiful way in which he has expressed them.

KALIKAMANGAL (Bengali) is a type of religious narrative in medieval Bengali dedicated to the Goddess Kali (Kalika) who plays an important role in such narratives. The theme of this narrative is how Sundara, a beautiful Prince wins Princess Vidya, a paragon of beauty, with the help of Goddess Kali.

Originally it was a love story, the story of Vidya and Sundara, based on Chaurapanchashika and Vidya-Sundara written by Sanskrit poets like Bilhana and Vararuchi. We may remember also the other compositions like Vidya-Sundaracharita, Vidya-Sundaropakhyana, etc. composed by different Sanskrit poets. Bengali poets, who were no mere translators, painted the story in local colour.

Primarily, Bengali poets like Dwija Shridhar (16th century) and Sabirid Khan (17th century) narrated the story as a romance. In this romance, the pre-marital love between Vidya and Sundara was illicit in character and was not acceptable to our medieval society. No doubt, a social recognition was necessary for the story. So the later poets cleverly introduced a new character. She is Goddess Kali. She appeared as a benefactress in this love affair. According to her desire Sundara fell in love with Vidya and he overcame all the obstacles to win the beautiful maiden as his wife by the grace of Goddess Kali. In this way, Vidyasundar kavya became famous as Kalikamangal kavya.

Some of the poets who wrote Kalikamangal kavya in the 17th and the 18th centuries are Krishnaram Das, Balaram Chakravarti, Bharatchandra Ray and Ramprasad Sen. It is beyond doubt that Bharatchandra surpassed all of them in respect of poetic beauty and artistic excellence.

KALIMUDDIN AHMAD-KALINGATTU BHARANI

KALIMUDDIN AHMAD (Urdu, 1909-1983), one of the most influential, and certainly the most controversial of modern Urdu critics, was the last of a long line of westernisers in Urdu literature. He was also, perhaps, the most unbending for he held to the end of his life rather drastic views about Urdu literature.

Born in Patna in a family of distinguished scholars, Kalimuddin Ahmad had a brilliant academic career, culminating in his graduation from Cambridge in 1933. At Cambridge, Kalimuddin Ahmad studied with F.R. Leavis who has often been mentioned as an influence on his thought. Even though little trace of Leavis' concern for culture, moral values and "total significance of a profoundly serious kind" (whose lack Leavis felt in Dickens) can be found in Kalimuddin Ahmad, he may have inherited his authoritarian and almost dogmatic manner from Leavis.

As a writer, Kalimuddin Ahmad was rather late in emerging on the scene. His first notable work, Urdu sha'iri par ek nazar (A glance at Urdu poetry), came out in 1940. It immediately became notorious and threw everyone on the defensive. Kalimuddin Ahmad declared the ghazal to be a "semi-barbarous" art form, because a ghazal didn't deal with one single theme and lacked coherence and organization. The view that a poem should have unity and organisation is essentially Greek. There is no reason for applying it to the literary productions governed by non-Greek poetics. Unfortunately, the prestige of western ideas was so great, and Kalimuddin Ahmad's exposition of his theme so commanding, that although there was a storm of protest, the simple reply that Greco-European ideas about poetic forms were not necessarily valid for all cultures, didn't occur to anyone.

Kalimuddin Ahmad's next book, Urdu tanqid par ek nazar (A glance at Urdu criticism), was no less explosive. It was first published serially in a magazine (1940-41), and then put together in book form in 1942. Kalimuddin Ahmad declared criticism to be non-existent in Urdu. He examined the major critics up to his day and relentlessly pronounced them all to be deficient in system, erudition and original thought.

Having profoundly disturbed the complacency of Urdu poets and critics alike, Kalimuddin Ahmad turned with characteristic insouciance to an entirely unrelated subject. He wrote a series of articles on the Urdu 'dastan' (oral romance). The book, published in 1944 as Urdu zaban aur fann-e dastangoi (Urdu language and the art of dastan narration), was immediately recognized as an important contribution to the study of this prose form. Here again, Kalimuddin Ahmad was quite westocentric; he insisted on judging the dastan in terms of the western novel. The result was obvious: he found dastan to be worthy of attention, but pronounced it to be artistically deficient, almost primitive. Kalimuddin Ahmad's failure to recognize that dastan was generated by a different grammar was all the more noticeable in the context of his extended discussion of Morte D'Arthur. He, however, implied that Morte D'Arthur was superior to the Urdu dastan, while 'oral romance' as a whole was inferior to the novel.

Kalimuddin Ahmad's reputation was made with these three works. His wide erudition, his command over several eastern and western languages, his uncompromising commitment to the western literary values, and his obvious contempt for critics and rivals alike, invested him with a halo of power and infallibility which remained largely undimmed. It suffered a serious knock only in 1977 when his Iqbal: ek mutal'ea (Iqbal: a study) was published. Kalimuddin Ahmad found Iqbal seriously wanting in poetic as well as philosophical merit. Without much analysis or logical argument, he condemned Iqbal as much inferior to western "philosophical" poets like Lucretius or Ovid. Iqbal's merit and standing were, however, so universally recognised by 1977 that Kalimuddin Ahmad's evaluation by 'fiat' didn't convince anyone. His autobiography Apni talash men (In search of myself) also did not add much to his stature, devoted as much of it was to trivial matters of the academic and official world.

Kalimuddin Ahmad's scope was extremely wide. He wrote Psychoanalysis and Literary Criticism (1948) in English; collected many of his papers under the title, Sukhan hai guftani (Things to say) in 1955; edited the 'diwans' of a number of classical poets, besides editing other works like the essays of Qazi Abdul Vadud, Vol I (1977), and two Tazkiras (1959). He worked on an English-Urdu dictionary, produced a glossary of literary terms (Farhang-e adabi istilahat, 1986) and published two slim collections of poems (1965 and 1966).

Kalimuddin Ahmad occupied a number of eminent positions in education and government and was awarded Padmashri in 1981.

KALINGATTU BHARANI (Tamil) is a poem giving a vivid account of a Chola expedition to the North Kalinga country under the leadership of Karunakara Tondaiman, generalissimo of the Chola monarch. It abounds in the rhythmic excellence and the diction and display of metrical effects add to the majestic flow of a martial theme. Sweet and mellifluous and at the same time, pompous and high-sounding where necessary, the loftiness of the work is reflected more than adequately from beginning to end. Blending of the highly imaginative with historical martial exploits, the verses which are in the talichai metre and the grandeur of the style and the majesty of the gait couched in swift, stirring and musical language are a treat for the ear.

Jayankondan, the author of the poem, earned the appellation Bharanikkor Jayankondan, 'the Emperor of Poesy.' He was born in Tipankudi. He is said to have had Jaina leanings, but as he gives the first place to Umapati in his invocation part of the work, he must have professed the Shaiva faith. He was the court poet of Kulottungan, who ruled from 1070 to 1120.

Of all the bharanis, the pride of place goes to Kalingattu bharani. The poem is in 13 Cantos with verses closely nearing 600. It opens with a prayer to Umapati, Brahma, the Sun God, Ganapati, Murugan, Sarasvati, Durga and the Seven Mothers, invoking their blessings for the monarch. The poet sings for the well-being of the men of scriptures and wishes for copious rains and the prosperity of the emperor and his land.

The second Canto begins with the story proper and as in Homeric epics, a later sequence is dealt with first, following the modus operandi in media res. The fair spouses in slumber of warriors gone to the battlefiled are addressed by their companions to open their portals to listen to the tidings of victory. Beginning with a soft and pleasing note, feminine beauty is sung of in a charming manner with the choicest phrases in scintillating rhythm. Bristling with poetic excellence and oriental imagery in plenty, the poet depicts the fair sex in all their sculpturesque movements dealing with their love, jealousies and seeming quarrels. The verses defy translation but a few of them freely rendered are worth quoting.

You damsels twist and wear,
Fragrant red blooms on your hair,
And tucked together the life so dear
Of young apprentice lovers in despair,
Amidst such clustered flowers fair,
Young beauties! Open the portals I declare

Oh, ye maidens of soft rhythmic speech!
Waking from slumber as a peacock,
To the tune of anklets tinkling, tinkling,
Open the portals please, I declare.

The third and the fourth Cantos are imaginary descriptions of the parched desert land, looking like a flattened platter of red made of fire and the temple of the goddess, Kali. Eulogies in praise of the goddess, a portrayal of her attendant spirits and exhibiting skill in witchcraft by one of the goblins are described in Cantos 5 to 7.

The eighth Canto contains valuable information about the Chola pedigree from the mouth of a spirit on the authority of Narada and is in many respects in agreement with the accounts found in the inscriptions. For instance, events like Karikalan fixing the tiger insignia on the Himalayas, the embankment of the river Kaveri, presentation of 16 lakhs of gold coins to the Sangam poet for his Pattinappalai, deserve particular mention. Another piece of information to students of the history of Tamil literature is a reference to the imprisonment of the Chera king, Kanaikkal Irumporai, by Kopperum Senkanan and securing the release of his monarch by the poet Poykaiyar by singing Kalavali narpatu.

The approach of the Kalinga war is foretold by one of the attendant spirits of the goddess in the ninth Canto, while in the tenth, the birth and life of Kulottungan, his education, accession to the throne and many martial exploits get a detailed treatment from the goddess herself.

In the eleventh Canto is given a description of the splendour and gaiety of Emperor Kulottungan's court at Kanchi. The vassal chiefs were waiting at the gates for paying their tributes. Asked about the defaulters, the monarch was informed that the chief of North Kalinga had twice withheld his tribute. The prime minister and the generalissimo of the Chola army, Karunakara Tondaiman, bowed at his ruler's feet and prayed for permission to invade the North Kalinga country, which was readily granted. Raising the banner of the bull at the head of an army vast as an ocean, Karunakaran marched towards the north crossing many rivers including the Krishna, the Godavari and the Gotamai. In the fierce battle that was fought, Karunakaran was the victor and with a rich booty of elephants and heaps of gold, he returned to Kanchi and placed them before his monarch.

The showing of the battlefield to her attendant spirits by Kali is depicted in the twelfth Canto. In the thirteenth Canto, one finds the goddess commanding the demons and goblins to cook the bharani-k-kul (bharani gruel). The same was offered to the goddess first and then distributed to the spirits who danced with glee and satiated their hunger. Having had a meal to their hearts' content, the spirits sang the praise of the emperor.

Despite his anxiety to chronicle a historical war expedition, Jayankondan was moved more by his poetic urge than by the desire to record the historical details. He must have written the poem immediately after the invasion between 1084 and 1090 or at the beginning of the twelfth century.

KALITA, DANDINATH (Assamese; b. 1890, d.1950), well-known for his humorous and satirical poems, made valuable contributions to different branches of Assamese literature. After taking higher education in Cotton College, Gauhati, he taught at Tezpur Government High School till retirement. He was closely associated with a number of social, literary and cultural organizations in Tezpur.

Dandinath's literary career began from his school days. Phul (1908) is his first historical novel based on the Burmese invasion of Assam. In Kalita's second novel, Sadhana (1928) and third novel, Abishkar (1938), social reform is the theme. The heroes sacrifice all their personal happiness at the altar of social reform. But too much of idealism to some extent mars these works. Kalita's other novels are Ganabiplab (1940), Parichay (1950), Adrishta and Hatyakari kon. Kalita has also to his credit two collections of short stories, viz., Satsari (1925) and Atmanandar atmakahini, depicting social pictures; two collections of tales, viz., Sati kahini and Sanskrita natakar sadhu (1951) and two biographies, viz., Karmabir Chandranath Sharma and Gohain Baruar jibani.

Dandinath has left behind seven dramas. In Agni-pariksha (1937) and Kichak-badha (1950) tales from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata were faithfully rendered into the dramatic form without much alteration. Satir tej (1931) is the only historical drama in which Kalita carefully depicted the character of the Ahom princess, Jaymati, who sacrificed herself for the welfare of her husband and the country. Kalita's Pehaniya kukur, Muktir abhijan, Nagarar bihutali and Parachit are the social playlets in which the hypocrisy, falsehood and shams of the so-called leaders of the society have been exposed satirically.

The outstanding contributions of Kalita to Assamese literature are his three collections of humorous and satirical poems, viz., Rahghara (1916), Ragar (1916) and Bahurupi (1926). The poems are unrivalled in their sparkling wit, humour and penetrating satire. A consummate skill in the selection of words and arrangement of matter make the verses enjoyable.

Kalita composed an epic in blank verse, Asam sandhya (1949), based on the declining phases of the Ahom rule. There is a faithful reproduction of history set forth in a simple graphic episode, but the epic suffers from a lack of imaginative richness in characterization. Kalita's two other collections of poems are Dipti (1925) and Binar jhankar (1951).

KALITTOKAI (Tamil) contains 150 poems of unequal length in 'kali' metre dealing with the five major divisions of love theme with an invocation. The work has five parts, each part attributed to a poet. The first part (2-36 poems) relates to the Palai theme, the second (37-65) to the Kurinchi, the third (66-100) to the Marutam, the fourth (101-117) to the Mullai and the fifth (118-150) to the Neytal. The Peruntinai and Kaikkilai which respectively speak of mismatched love and unrequited love are also dealt with as additional situations. Palai Patiya Perunkatunko, Kapilar, Marutanilanakanar, Nalluruttiranan and Naliantuvanar are the respective poets. Nallantuvanar, the author of Neytal kali is the compiler of this anthology and the invocatory verse is also attributed to him.

Kalittokai has a detailed and excellent commentary of Nachchinarkkiniyar, Kalittokai was first published by C.V. Damodaran in 1887. This was followed by I.V. Anantaramaiyar's edition of Kalittokai in three parts (1925, 25 & 31 respectively) with long lists of useful comparable passages. I.V. Anantaramaiyar has also published the text of Kali in 1930. In 1938 Pakaneri Ramil Chankam's edition appeared.

Kalittokai, generally ascribed to a later period, is different from earlier classical tradition in many aspects: in metre, in diction, in theme and in tone. The conversational style and repetition of a motif or expression demanded by the metre, the folk-lore forms, motifs, expression and profuse references to puranic allusions favoured in this period have given this anthology an altogether different structure and texture. Kalittokai which gives room to sing of the love (akam) of common man (tunainilaimakkal) makes a clear break with the earlier literary tradition. The Mullaikali neither speaks of the patient waiting of the heroine during the hero's separation nor the advent of the season nor the hero's arrival but deals with the sentiments of the people of the pastoral land. Baiting the bull, a common custom prevalent among the shepherds (by which the man to wed the heroine was identified) is depicted. The sentiment of the lovers are expressed in a style peculiar to their cultural milieu.

Neytal kali magnifies the sorrows of the heroine in separation, the traditional theme of neytal i.e., 'irankal' (desolation). In a few poems the heroine is portrayed as almost mad with grief; the commentator, Nacchinarkkiniyar, finds the expression of 'terutal olinta kammattu mikutiram' (the state of excess love which refuses to be consoled) in these poems and attributes them to Peruntinai. Kapilar's Kurinchi kali poems make use of the complex verse form of kali to present the successive stages of clandestine love in one poem (eg., Kali 39). Even the setting of the love situation treated in the poems has undergone changes. Picturesque descriptions of Ilavenil (autumn) abound in Palaikkali. There is a considerable difference between the riverine setting found in Kalittokai and in the earlier anthologies.

Rich in similes and metaphors, Kalittokai has advanced over the earlier works in word-play and other figures of speech. 'Yathasamkhyā' has reached its poetic height in some of the kali poems. 'Slesha' makes its appearance in kali and 'utpreksha' becomes the poetic structure of a few kali poems (95-98).

KALLOL (Bengali) was a literary magazine founded by a group of talented young men in 1923 who had a year earlier formed the Four Arts Club and published Jharer dola—a collection of four stories by Gokulchandra Nag, Dineshranjan Das, Suniti Devi and Manindralal Basu. Its editor was Dineshranjan Das, a man of refined taste and suave manners, who seldom wrote himself. He was assisted by Gokul Nag, a painter and florist, who had an intense passion for beauty. Nag had a frail health and died of tuberculosis while Kallol was in its seventh year. The office was located in a poorly furnished room at 10/2 Potuahtola Lane in Calcutta. At the start, Kallol betrayed a precoccupation with short stories but gradually poems, novels, translations and other articles began to appear. The size at first was demy but soon it changed to the double crown usual in those days. The price was 4 annas (25 paise) per copy at first and 5 annas (30 paise) later. The cover-design changed five times but there were always sea-waves in the drawing as the word 'kallol' in Bengali means sound of the waves.

Regular features for the first two years were Sangraha (collection)—quotations from other literary works; Alochana (discussion)—introduction to books, journals, theatres and other trends of thought of the time; and samachar (news)—information from within the country and abroad. A new section, Dakghar (Post office), appeared from the third year which contained all sorts of writings like book reviews, obituaries and editorial comments. Photographs of famous men and full-page colour paintings—some of them done by Jamini Roy and Debiprasad Roychowdhuri,—were its special features.

The magazine became notorious for its boldness in handling sexual themes, for its defiance of Rabindranath Tagore, and for its avowed disregard to all conventions. It shocked the conservatives.

The young writers loudly proclaimed their sympathies for the oppressed classes. Workers, beggars, pick-pockets and prostitutes entered in a mass for the first time in Bengali literature. Regular contributors of Kallol were Sailajananda Mukherjee, Bhupati Chowdhuri, Prabodh Sanyal, Premendra Mitra, Buddhadev Bose, Saroj Roychowdhuri, Manish Ghatak, Jagadish Gupta, Achin-tyakumar Sengupta and Tarashankar Banerjee.

The poems were of a mixed type. A few great poets like Jibananand Das, Bishnu Dey and Buddhadev Bose came to the limelight through Kallol. Poets like Kazi Nazrul Islam, Jasimuddin and Narendra Dev also contributed.

The journal tried its best to introduce great writers from other languages to the Bengali readers. Articles were published on Thomas Mann, Galsworthy, Noguchi, and Johan Bojer. Translations from Tolstoi, Proust, Romain Rolland, Gorky and Knut Hamsun appeared in Kallol.

The journal distinctly made a strong impact and broke fresh grounds towards the modern trends in the twentieth century Bengali Literature.

KALOJI (Telugu; b. 1914). Kaloji Narayana Rao, popularly known by his surname Kaloji, was born in Hanumakonda, Warangal district, Andhra Pradesh. He is the younger brother of the famous lawyer and Urdu poet, Rameswara Rao. Kaloji, though a lawyer by profession, is more interested in poetry. He extended his vast study into the realms of English, Urdu, Parsi and Marathi besides Telugu. He was an active participant in the Telengana movement against the Nizam Government. He was imprisoned thrice and tortured in jail. Later, the same government expelled him from Warangal district. Afterwards he actively participated in the Independence struggle also. After Independence, Kaloji was disgusted with groupism in political parties and left active politics gracefully.

He found that his talent lay in writing poetry. Whatever he wrote he wrote for the well-being and uplift of the oppressed and downtrodden. His patriotism is made immortal by his fiery poems. He chose colloquial Telugu as the medium of expression. Poetry is his chosen vehicle to carry on his mission.

Kaloji's 57 best poetic pieces are compiled under the title Na-godava (A chant of myself). Some of his well-known poems are 'Netaji', 'Kokila' (cuckoo), 'Kannitilo enno kalavu' (Things treasured in tears), and 'Sandhya rupam' (A point of twilight). He tried his hand at short story writing, and turned out some volumes.

His style is simple, lucid and chaste. His poems flow from the bottom of his heart. Late Mahakavi Sri Sri paid the highest tribute to Kaloji's greatness in these words:

"Undoubtedly Kaloji is the poet of all Andhras. The frontiers of Telengana do not wall him apart".

He got elected a member of the Legislative Council. He served the Telengana Writers Association as its President. Kaloji never bowed before any rich man for patronage. He depends on the goodwill of the man in the street.

He has earned a permanent place among the modern Telugu poets.

KALPA (Sanskrit). Derived from the root 'krip' with the suffix 'ac' or 'gha' the term 'kalpa' has quite a few primary and secondary meanings, such as 'an alternative', 'a dictum' 'a long span of time, measured by the days and nights of Brahma' 'religious codes' etc. It also means a class of later Vedic literature which is considered to be one of the six Vedangas (lit. limbs of the Vedas, i.e., essential auxiliaries of the Vedas). As a limb, Kalpa has been figuratively described as the arms of the Vedas. The entire literature of Kalpa has been written in the 'sutra' form, and hence, it is collectively called the Kalpasutras. This literature primarily comprises the ritualistic codes for Vedic sacrifices. Sayanacharya says, "Kalpa is so-called because it supports the procedures of the sacrifices (kalpyate samarthya yagaprayogo treti byutpattih—Introduction to the Bhashya on the Rigveda)". The Kalpasutras are directly related to and most probably they descended from the Brahmanas; there are passages in the Brahmanas and the Aranyakas which have been adapted and compressed into sutras in the Kalpasutras. The purpose of the Kalpasutras is three-fold. They codify the liturgical procedures of the Vedic sacrifices and domestic rites and lay down the traditional codes of conduct for the followers of the Vedic religion. Hence, the Kalpasutras are classed under three divisions, viz. (i) the Shrauta-sutras, (ii) the Grihyasutras and (iii) the Dharma-sutras. As corollaries of codes of conduct, rudiments of state administration and civil and criminal laws form part of the contents of the Dharma-sutras. The Shulba-sutras which lay down the methods of construction of sacrificial altars and their measurements are but appendices to the Shrauta-sutras and became the forerunners of Indian mathematics, geometry and trigonometry. The Shrauta-sutras contain procedures of establishing three sacrificial fires for the daily ritual of Agnihotra, the new-moon and full-moon sacrifices (darsha and purnamasa), the sacrifices of seasons, animal sacrifices (pashuyaga), the Soma sacrifices with many variations, long sacrificial sessions (satras), state sacrifices like Rajasuya and Ashvamedha, etc. The Grihyasutras describe the procedure for the domestic rites such investiture of the sacred thread (upnayana), beginning and completion of the Vedic studies (Vedadyayana and Samavartana), marriage, rites for the departed (shraddha, reception of the distinguished guests, madhuparka), etc.

In addition, such customs and ceremonies are described as refer to house-building, cattle-breeding and farming. The Dharma-sutras prescribe the duties of the four castes (varnas), of four stages of life (ashramas), of the king, and describes the rules regarding the permissible and forbidden food and drink (bhakshya and abhakshya).

Each recension (shakha) of the Vedas had its own Shrauta-Grihya-and Dharma-sutras, some of which are now lost. Only the Apastamba and Baudhayana schools of the Krishna-Yajurveda have the complete series of three sutras. The following Kalpasutras deserve mention:

1. Rigveda: Shrauta and Grihya Sutras of Ashvalayana and Shankhyayana. 2. Samaveda: Masakakalpa, Latyayana-shrauta-sutra, Drahyayana-shrauta-sutra, Gobhilagrihya-sutra, Khadira-grihya-sutra. 3. Shukla-Yajurveda: Katyayana-shrauta-sutra, Paraskaragrihya- sutra. 4. Krishna-Yajurveda: Shrauta, Grihya and Dharma-sutras of Apastamba and Baudhayana, Satyashadda-shrauta-sutra, Bharadvaja-shrauta-sutras, Kathaka-Shrauta sutra, Manava-shrauta- and Grihya-sutras, etc. 5. Atharvaveda: Vaitana-shrauta-sutra and Kaushikashrauta-sutra.

It is difficult to ascertain any precise date of the composition of the Kalpasutras because they were written and redacted during a very long period, almost a millennium. It may, however, be presumed that the writing of the Kalpasutras started somewhere near 1000 B.C. and the process continued till the end of the 2nd cent. B.C.

KALPASUTRA (Prakrit) is a Shvetambara Jain Agamic work that deals with the code of conduct for the monks. The meaning of the word 'kappa' or 'kalpa' is the pious conduct of the Jaina ascetics. The Kalpasutra explains the ten types of kalpas or 'sadhu-samachari's. The Kalpasutra is attributed to Bhadrabahu. It has three sections. The first section contains the biographies of the Thirthankars. The main portion in this section is the biography of the Thirthankara Mahavira. The second section of the text gives a list of patriarchs and their religious orders. This list contains names of the pontiffs upto Devarddhigani, nearly thirty generations after Bhadrabahu. Therefore, it is not possible that this list has been compiled by Bhadrabahu himself. The third section of the Kalpasutra contains the rules for the ascetics, namely, the rules to be observed during the rainy season. It is believed that this is the oldest section of the Kalpasutra, and was the work of Bhadrabahu. Indeed the complete title of the Kalpasutra is Pajjosanakappa, and that is the eighth 'Uddeshya' of the Chhedasutra. The other two sections according to the tradition were added later by Devarddhigani. In the canonical literature of the Shvetambaras, originally there were twelve canons. They are also called Vedas. But at present the twelfth canon and parts of the others are missing. Actually it is recounted in the Chhedasutras. The Kalpasutra is one of the six Chhedasutras. This important work was first published by a German scholar Hermans Jacobi, from Leipzig in 1879. The complete work is in Prakrit prose. The language of the work is called Jaina Maharastri. The work was also translated into English by Jacobi in the Sacred Book of the East (Vol. XXII). The original work was published from Bombay in 1939 with the commentary of Samayasundaragani.

The Kalpasutra contains the following ten Kalpas: (i) Achelakya, (ii) Auddeshika, (iii) Shayyantara, (iv) Rajapinda, (v) Kritikarma, (vi) Vratikalpa, (vii) Jyesthakalpa, (viii) Pratikramana, (ix) Masakalpa and (x) Paryushana.

The ten Kalpas deal with the following subjects:
1. 'Achelaka' means without clothes. Jinakalpi ascetic

KALYANAMALA-KALYANASAUGANDHIKAM SHITANKAN TULLAL

lives without wearing clothes or anything else. He lives a life of extreme activity and joy. His asceticism has a fascinating charm, and what seems a torture of the body to the ignorant is a delicious enjoyment of constantly increasing power and knowledge.

2. 'Uddeshya' means prepared for the monks. An ascetic does not take anything (water, food, medicine, etc.) that is prepared purposely for him.

3. 'Shayyantara' means having the permission of the owner of that house. A monk cannot take any thing except straw, ash, slab of stones, slab of wood, etc. without the permission of the owner.

4. A monk is not expected to eat the food obtained from the house of the emperor, the king, the commander, and the priest. A monk may not be received with due reverence at the gates of these people because they may find the visit of a monk as a bad omen. To eat such food has been referred to as 'Rajapindadosha'.

5. It is obligatory for the monks to greet, to show respect and to bow before the monks who are senior to them. But a nun even though she might have been ordained for fifty years will show respect to a male monk even though he might have entered in the religious order a day earlier. This rule of precedence among monks is called 'Kritikarma'.

6. Monks should keep away from violence, falsehood, theft, lust and attachment. These are five great vows. To follow these vows in daily life is called 'Vratikalpa'.

7. The seventh one is 'Jvesthakalpa'. A monk receives the vows of religion through Yoga or meditation. If both the father and the son join the religious order together, the father will be senior to the son. But, if the son entered the religious order first, the son shall be senior to his father.

8. The monks who are living within the ruling period of the first Tirathankara and the last Tirathankara are obligatorily required to do 'Pratikarmana' whether or not they have committed any sin.

9. Except in the rainy season lasting for four months, the monk is expected not to stay at any place for more than one month. However, the general rule is that a monk should not stay for more than 5 nights in a city or town, but in a village the monk is expected to stay only for a night.

10. When a monk stays in the rainy season at a place for penance etc., it is called 'Paryushana'. To worship 'Samvatsari parva' is called 'Paryushana kalpa'. Samvatsari parva should be celebrated from the 5th day of Bhadrpadā Shukla that is the 50th day from Ashada's Purnima.

KALYANAMALLA (Sanskrit; 16th cent.), referred to as 'bhupati' (king), composed the Anangaranga for Lakhana, son of Ahmed Khan of the Lodi dynasty of Oudh. Some would like to identify him with the patron of Bhārata Mallika. He was the son of Gajamalla but there is difference of opinion with regard to the name of his grandfather. However, the name of this Kalyanamalla's grand-father is stated by some scholars as Trailokyachandra while the patrons appear to be different. A biography of poets, Kavi-charika, states that he was a native of Kalinga and by caste a brahmin, who flourished during the region of Anagabhima (12th cent.) alias Ladadiva, the king of that country. This statement is, however, not supported by any manuscript of the work.

Kalyanamalla's work on erotics in ten chapters, the Anangaranga, deals with the arcana of love. A special feature of the work is some recipes for secret potions and spells for erotic purposes (aupanishadika). Though drawing upon the earlier masters, like Vatsyayana, it introduces some innovations in the mode of erotic enjoyment.

The Anangaranga has a commentary, 'Prakashika', by Ganesha. A poem, Sulamanacharita, dealing with the story of Solomon, son of David, described in the Old Testament, is also attributed to Kalyanamalla.

KALYANASAUGANDHIKAM SHITANKAN TULLAL (Malayalam). Tullal is a visual art form of Kerala. The word 'tullal' means up-and-down movement, jump, etc. But it has got a new dimension which gives the meaning of a particular type of masculine dance form introduced by Kunchan Nampiar, the celebrated poet. It is a mixture of classical and folk elements. There were some art forms like kolam tullal, patayani, tullal, etc. in the earlier periods but it was in the 18th century, that tullal became a refined and established form as we find it now. There is a legend behind the origin of tullal.

Kunchan Nampiar was born in the community whose main profession was to play the drum 'mizhavu' for kuttu and kutiyattam. Kunchan was staying in the royal capital of Ambalappuzha, famous for its temple of Srikrishna. Kuttu was regularly performed during festival seasons. One day while playing on the mizhavu, Kunchan happened to fall asleep and the satirist, Chakyar, who was performing kuttu made fun of Kunchan for his dereliction of duty during the performance. Kunchan immediately went out of the stage leaving the orchestra. On the same day he planned to introduce his own art form and not to assist in the performance of the Chakyar any more. The authenticity of this incident has not been established.

KALYANCHE NISHWAS

The next day at the time of the kuttu, Kunchan appeared at another venue of the temple with his own newly invented art form, tullal. All the people went to him, leaving the Chakyar's kuttu. Kunchan had composed a poem for presentation and he had formulated a new type of dance form. It was the refined form of tullal which he had already seen in kolam tullal, patyani, etc. 'Ottan', 'parayan' and 'shitankan' are the three forms of tullal which existed earlier in some other crude forms. They were modified and at the first instance Kunchan presented shitankan tullal. It is firmly believed that the first tullal was the Kalyanasaugandhikam shitankan based on the puranic characters of Bhima and Hanuman. The story reads as follows:

Panchali, the spouse of the Pandavas, one day requests Bhima to get her some of the fragrant 'kalyanasaugandhika' flowers. Bhima sets out to the forest to get the flowers. On the way he sees an old monkey obstructing the path. Bhima, wanting to get rid of the monkey from the path, asks him to get away. The monkey refuses to move. They quarrel and fight fiercely. At last Bhima is defeated and he realises that his opponent is not a mere old monkey but his own elder brother, Hanuman. Bhima apologises and he is granted permission to go into the forest. After searching for a long time, Bhima reaches the garden lake of Kubera in the valley of the Gandhamadana mountain where the saugandhika flowers are in full bloom. Bhima jumps into the lake to get the flowers. Then he is attacked by the guard, Krodhavasa, but Bhima defeats him and gets enough flowers for his wife. On the way back he pays homage to Hanuman and returns to Panchali.

The word 'kalyana' means 'bliss', 'well-being', 'gold', etc. It can suggest either golden saugandhika flower or the flower which gives lasting pleasure.

The story is depicted by Kunchan Nampiar in his tullal with wonderful narrative skill and sarcasm, and immense poetic beauty and metrical charm. Kunchan Nampiar wrote about fifty tullal songs and among them the Kalyana-saugandhika is a major work. At the dramatic moment of Bhima's meeting with Hanuman, the former says in a satiric tone.

Oh, look here, damn monkey
Who blocks my way, get away hence,
What is your reason for lying
Here to obstruct the passage?
You are an old wild monkey,
You don't know how to behave with the stately lords
You are born in species
That lack discrimination;
Did your jump go wrong, and you fell?
Why is there no companion with you?
Immediately clear away, or
You will have to pay the penalty.

It is a very interesting text and is written with poetic grace.

The mastery over the vocabulary, the fine sense of humour, dramatic vision and metrical skill are all manifest in the lines he composed for this tullal. But it is practically impossible to translate tullal poetry. Kalyanasaugandhikam shitankan tullal contains about 1300 lines written in various Dravidian metres. It takes one to two hours to perform this tullal. Kalyanasaugandhikam is perhaps the longest shitankan tullal out of a dozen or more. Shitankan tullal has definite 'aharya' (costume) as in ottan tullal and parayan tullal. In shitankan tullal the decorations are made of palm leaves. A closely-pleated and coloured cotton cloth is worn round the waist like a skirt, and the head is covered with a coloured cotton piece which is known as 'konda'. The dancer also wears 'nupura' on the legs. The dancer, the mridanga-player and the cymbal-player make the tullal troupe. The whole performance produces the effect of simplicity, subtlety, social satire and puranic discourse. No doubt the tullal poetry owes much to the kuttu and as an art form it has assimilated many aspects from classical as well as folk traditions.

V.S.S.

KALYANCHE NISHWAS (Marathi), a collection of eleven stories by a woman writer with the pen-name 'Vibhavi Shirurkar', published by Pratibha Prakashan in 1933, created a great controversy. As the title suggests, these are the 'Sighs of buds'—a depiction of the sorrows and the travails of young and adolescent girls, who were asked to 'sacrifice', but, in the name of love, animal relations were forced on them by the chauvinists. The titles of some of the stories were sufficiently vocal, e.g. 'Sighs of buds', 'Sacrifice', 'Is love nectar or poison', 'Are you the mother or the enemy', 'Sister, this is the happy family life', 'Empty vessels thunder', 'How shall my father's family life be mine', 'Love or animal lust'.

The sociologist and encyclopaedist, Shridhar Vyankatesh Ketkar, opined in the introduction: "The publisher says that the author of this book is a young woman graduate from the Saraswat community. I don't know her. I have never seen her. This is her first book. I read the stories and am more than satisfied. Women folk have hardly spoken so frankly about themselves." He, then, traces the history of Marathi short story and how male authors painted women with extra sympathy or tried to imitate women's style. But the women writing about themselves have a different value and charm. Ketkar found 'the curiosity for the other sex' increasing in the readers. It is not mere chivalry but the awareness of another person's viewpoint. He appreciated in these stories the subjective narration, the emphasis on the generation gap, the changing pattern of filial piety, the necessity for inter-caste marriages, the shades of lust and love in the affairs between cousins, sympathy for the fallen women.

When Malatibai Bedekar (the real name of the author came to be known much later), wrote these stories, the readers were simply shocked. Some said that the stories could not have been written by a woman but by a man with a pseudonym. The stories took the literary world by storm. They finely delineated tender feelings but were not sentimental; they advocated 'women's liberation movement' but were not loud; they were devastatingly realistic and clinical and yet they were not morbid. They denoted the observations of a poetic heart and cultured mind, who knew her subject intimately, but kept an artistic distance. Later Vibhavari Shirurkar wrote novels like Hindolyavar and Viralela swapna, and after Independence, Bali, on bonded labour.

KALYANI AMMA, B. (Malayalam; b. 1883, d. 1959) was married to Swadeshabhimani Ramakrishna Pillai, the stormy petrel of Travancore politics at the turn of the present century. A devoted wife, she has left a remarkable work of auto-biographical reminiscence, Vyazhavatta smaranakal (Reminiscences of twelve years). She was one of the editors of a journal for women called Sharada. She published many articles in it. In 1913 she passed the B.A. examination and got a job as a teacher in the Government Girls' School in Cannanore. Hers was a life of suffering and deprivation in the company of her husband who because of radical political views was banished from Travancore in 1910.

KAMALAMPAL CHARITTIRAM (Tamil) by B.R. Rajan Iyer (1872-1898), also called Apattukkitamana apavatam (The slander that has become a ground of misfortune), is one of the earliest of the Tamil novels. It was first serialised in a Madras Tamil monthly called Vivekachintamani between 1893 and 1895 and later edited with improvements and published in book form in 1896. The subsequent editions and impressions appeared in 1904, 1910, 1915, 1930, 1944, 1957, 1972 and so on. Kamalampal charittiram (The story of Kamalampal) is the first realistic novel in Tamil compared to its predecessors like Piratapamutaliyar charittiram (1876) of Vetanayakam Pillai (1826-1889), Premakalavatiyam (1893) of Kuruchuvami Sarma etc., with their lack of realism. The sub-title and the generic name, charittiram, are in conformity with the tradition of the time but the naming of it after the main woman character is the author's own innovation.

The scenario of the story is a remote village called Chirukulam in the Madurai district of Tamilnadu and the story tells how the loose talks of the gossip-mongering female relatives caused convulsions and great misfortunes in the tranquil and happy life of the innocent people like Muttusvami Aiyar and Kamalampal.

The marriage of Muttusvami Aiyar's daughter, Lakshmi, with Srinivasan and the consequent misunderstanding between Muttusvami Aiyar and his younger brother Subbaramaniya Aiyar, due to the intrigues of the 'gossip group' headed by Subbammal, a female relative, set the story in motion.

The story moves with the notorious dacoit Peyantittevan lifting away the race bulls of Subbaramaniya Aiyar and his subsequent arrest and release. The successive shocks in life one after the another, i.e., the unexpected betrayal of his brother Subbaramaniya Aiyar in the case against Peyantittevan, the kidnapping of his child, Natarajan, by Peyantittevan, the untimely death of Subbaramaniya Aiyar, the heavy losses in his business enterprise in Bombay and the concocted sexual scandal of his wife Kamalampal, propagated by the despicable 'gossip group' drive Muttusvami Aiyar to the extent of trying to commit suicide, which is fortunately prevented by Sacchidananda Svamikal. The concluding part of the novel consists of Muttusvami Aiyar's reaching of Kashi with the Swami, the attempts of his family to trace him after a series of calamitous events, and the final happy reunion and return of the family to Sirukulam. Muttusvami Aiyar and Kamalampal settle to a spiritual life with a perfect maturity of mind while the evildoers are properly punished by law and the turn of fate.

The natural unfolding of the story and the realism in the first half lapse into a romantic dream in the latter half and after the climax, the denouement is reached rather abruptly, revealing an evident asymmetry in the construction of the plot. Some episodes, e.g., the kidnapping incident, the gossip group's ill-will mission to Muttusvami Aiyar, the train accident, etc. and the final happy ending enabling all the characters to come to Kashi towards the end, smack of popular techniques of the later day Tamil cinema.

The realistic pen portraits of the 'gossip group', the grandiose and expensive marriage celebrations, the life in the school, in the village and in Madras city etc., in the 19th century are rare and refreshing pieces of good writing, which acquire authentic historical and sociological value today.

The cultured Muttusvami Aiyar and Kamalampal with their live quarrels, intellectual discussions, and spiritual pursuits, the educated and accomplished Srinivasan and Latchumi with their loose talks and letters, Subbammal and her comrades with their petty jealousies and pond-side gossips, the learned Ammaiappappa Pillai with his ludicrous exposition of classical literature with an outmoded idiom, Peyantittevan and Kuppipatti with their historic and hysterical behaviourism are brought to life in flesh and blood by the author with rare creative power and artistic perfection.

KAMALAKANTER DAPTAAR-KAMALESHWAR

Being a happy blend of literary and ordinary varieties of language, Rajan Aiyar's prose style is direct and simple, interspersed with literary verses, phrases, proverbs and folk songs. Subbammal's debased variety of colloquial language, and Ammaiyappa Pillai's highly pedantic and antiquated style are rare specimens of the author's effective use of different dialects. Many nice narrative portions which read like poetry and the amusing and felicitous dialogues with which the novel progresses in many places like a drama are other notable features. Complex and long sentences made up of several simple connected sentences mark his style of writing.

Among the Tamil novels both earlier and modern, Kamalampal charittiram stands out as unique due to its realism, authentic background, good characterisation, poetic narrations, sparkling humour, pleasing style and lofty ideals.

KAMALAKANTER DAPTAAR (Bengali) is a collection of satirical essays by Bankimchandra Chatterjee. The essays came out first in Bangadarshan, a monthly magazine he edited during 1873-1875. These were published as a book in 1875.

The second enlarged edition (1885) contained two other sections—'Kamalakanter patra' (Letters of Kamalakanta), and 'Kamalakanter jabanabandi' (Confessions of Kamalakanta), the first section being Kamalakanter daptaar (The office of Kamalakanta).

In a preface, Bhismadev Khosnobis, a fictional character, describes Kamalakanta as a crazy man, educated but not keen on professional success. Kamalakanta is said to have got a clerical job with an Englishman but lost the job because he used to write poems and paint pictures in bill-books.

All the pieces are humorous sketches of the contemporary Bengalis, their follies and foibles, their laziness and pretensions, their servility and cunning, their cowardice and fears, their stunted aspirations and lofty talks, their mindless living and deplorable future. These are an amalgam of the writer's social, political, economic, religious and literary views, couched in the language of an opium-addict, apparently a disjointed pattern but really a bitter commentary on the prevalent mores. Supposed to be influenced by Thomas De Quincey's Confessions of an Opium-eater and Dickens's Pickwick Papers (Sam's Confessions), the articles were an instantaneous hit by virtue of the language and the content. Kamalakanta is now an illustrious member of the gallery of literary characters in Bengali and many later authors have written essays under the pseudonym of Kamalakanta. Kamalakanta today stands for a wry commentator, an intelligent, informed, self-pitying person without any illusions, and without any rancour either.

KAMALESH, PADMASINGH SHARMA (Hindi, b. 1915, d. 1974) is known to the connoisseurs of literature as a poet, writer of prose and critic. Beginning his struggle for existence as an ordinary hawker of newspapers, he went through various professional experience, achieving steady progress step by step in succession through sheer perseverance and willpower. He worked as a teacher of Hindi at the Rashtrabhasha Prachar Mandal, Surat, became principal of the Hindi Vidyapith, Bombay, was appointed as a lecturer at the Agra College, and finally rose to the distinguished position of Professor of Hindi Department at the Kurukshetra University, Kurukshetra (Haryana). His was a life full of struggles, constant worries about livelihood, humiliations, and yet marked by progress at both intellectual and economic levels.

From his very childhood, he had a love for poetry. His poems written as a child appeared in the Sainik. The poems of his adult years express the boundless confidence and unabated vigour of youth. Some of them reflect a spirit of rebellion against social evils, while some others reflect a deep compassion for the whole mankind.

His poetic compositions are Main sukhi hun (Agra), Tu yuvak hai (Agra, 1949), Dub ke ansu (Agra, 1952), Dharti par utro (Agra, 1953), Digvijay (Agra) and Ek yug bit gaya (Allahabad). Publishing interviews with Hindi literary figures in Vishal Bharat and other literary journals, he introduced a new genre of prose in the world of Hindi literature. These have been published in the book Main inse mila (Delhi, 1952) in two parts. In the realm of criticism too, he made his own contribution.

KAMALESHWAR (Hindi; b. 1932) was born in Mainpuri district of Uttar Pradesh. He received his Masters degree from the Allahabad University. He was the editor of the prestigious short story weekly Sarika (1967-78) and lived in Bombay for a while where some of his novels were filmed. Subsequently he was called to Delhi as Additional Director General of Doordarshan, but later, he resigned due to his other preoccupations.

He is well-known in the literary field as a very forceful fiction writer. The trials and tribulations of the fast changing social scene are very well-depicted both in his short stories and novels. In spite of a documentary atmosphere wherein all the horrors of contemporary society are highlighted, one can sense the author's the groping for a new sense of values in the face of the total disintegration of the old system. Various facets of life are exposed in a sensitive rhetoric, for example, the human sensitivity has been revealed in its fullest extent in 'Neli jhel'. Khoi hui dishayein (1966) is a tragedy of today's metropolises where loneliness and estrangement loom large, while one can see the shades of Zola in Mans ka darya.

The strength of Kamaleshwar's fiction lies in his total sympathetic attitude and lack of romanticism, within the framework of his themes. His novels, whether having political or social innuendos, are uniformly well knit and balanced. His utter self-restraint in experimentation both with technique and form, lends a forceful character to his treatment.

Undoubtedly he is one of the leading and most popular short story writers of the post-Independence era. But, his involvement with the big as well as small silver screen seems to have affected the creative urge in him, for he has not produced anything of his own standard for quite some years now.

FURTHER WORKS: Short story collections—Raja Nirbansia (Delhi; 1957), Kasbe ka aadmi, Bayan (Delhi, 1972), Kamaleshwar ki shreshtha kahaniyan, Meri priya kahaniyan Jinda murde (Delhi 1969), Novels—Samudra mein khoya hua Aadmi, Dak-bangla (Delhi), Laute huc musafir (Bombay, 1971), Ek sarak sattavan galiyan (Delhi), Badnam basti, Tisra Aadmi, Delhi Kali andhi, Aagamiatit. KAMANDAKA (Sanskrit), also known as Kamandaki, is the author of a didactic work called the Nitisara best known as Kamandakiya nitisara. Kamandaka is acclaimed as an authority on nitishastra or science of political ethics. Kamandaka's Nitisara is a metrical treatise dealing directly with the principles of ancient Indian polity and statecraft.

The date of Kamandaka is still unsettled. Tradition makes him contemporary of Chanakya or Chandragupta Maurya. He has not been referred to by Vishnu Sharman, the author of Panchatantra, Kalidasa, Dandin or even by Vishakhadatta; but Vamana (8th century) has quoted him in the Kavyalamkarasutra (IV 1.2). Besides, some scholars make him contemporaneous with Varahamihira who is said to have lived in 550 A.D. Kamandaka's work was taken to the Bali Island in the early centuries of the Christian era, where it became most popular and found a prominent place in the Kawi literature by the 10th century.

The Nitisara consists of twenty Cantos which are further divided into thirty-six sub-sections called 'prakarnas' which deal with miscellaneous topics. Kamandaka's work is said to be one of the sources of the maxims of the Hitopadesha. On the other hand, Kamandaka seems to have abridged in his treatise the contents of Books II, III, IV, and XIV of Kautilya's Arthashastra. Thus, the Nitisara is professedly an abridgement (samkshiptagrantha) of the comprehensive work of Kautilya. For Kamandaka confessed that 'he has drawn the nectar of Nitisara from the great ocean of the Arthashastra'.

Nevertheless, Kamandaka does not altogether lack original thinking; the subject of foreign policy has been dealt with in full theoretical elaboration in cantos IX-XI. Kamandaka also show enough interest in didactic morality—a subject not touched by the celebrated author of the Arthashastra. The earlier edition of the Nitisara by Rajendralal Mitra has been thoroughly revised by Sisir Kumar Mitra with an English translation published by the Asiatic Society, Calcutta, in 1982).

KAMASHASTRA (Sanskrit) means texts dealing with the science of erotic. The Kamasutra of Mallanga Vatsyayana, which was composed about the end of the third century A.D., is the first complete work dealing with the science of erotic and as such it has a great historical importance. Referring to his sources Vatsyayana says that Auddalaki Shvetaketu first gave an exposition of the Kamashastra in five hundred chapters which Panchala Babhravya condensed in a hundred and fifty chapters under seven distinct sections. Dattaka composed a text on the prostitutes and his example was followed by Charayana, Suvarnanabha, Ghotakamukha, Gonardiya, Goni-kaputra and Kuchumara, each of whom wrote a monograph on the subject of his choice.

Vatsyayana was anxious to reconcile 'dharma', 'artha' and 'kama', the three recognised ends of life, by emphasising their equal importance and harmonious blending and hence it was not possible for him to bring down his work to a gross sexual level as his successors or imitators did in the subsequent erotic writings. He went through the Vedic texts, the epics and the earlier law-books and also the Arthashastra of Kautilya which had become the model of his work. His Kamasutra comprises seven parts (adhikaranas) dealing respectively under different chapters the general principles (sadharana), sexual union (samprayogika), courtship and marriage (kanya-samprayuktaka), wife (bharyadhikara), wives of other people (paradarika), prostitutes (vaishika) and secret lore of extraneous stimulation (aupanisadika).

From Vatsyayana's Kamasutra we get a highly interesting account of the Nagaraka, the wealthy man of the town. There is a graphic description of his gilded life, his house luxuriously furnished, his friends and assistants in affaire d'amour, his taste and accomplishment in poetry, music and various arts, his elaborate toilet and personal adornment, his round of pleasures, his interest in various sports and amusements, etc. The society of the urbanised wealthy people as described by Vatsyayana reveals the type of patriarchy which Manu and other law-givers tried to introduce. According to Vatsyayana, the wife should adore the husband as a divine being and behave in accordance to his likes and dislikes. The Nagarakas at his time were mostly polygamous, and hence he has given a long list of the duties of wives in such a household. The widow who seeks to enjoy married life, because of her uncontrolled passion, is named 'punarbhu' whose position is distinct from that of the wedded wife, a mid-way between the wife and the courtesan. References to female ascetics and nuns of various orders, generally known as 'pravrapikas' or 'bhikshunis', are found in the Kamasutra. They did not enjoy a high reputation for morality. Their help was often sought by the Nagarakas in affairs of love. Their houses often formed the rendezvous for lovers. Some of the lower occupations are mentioned in the Kamasutra such as 'malakara' (maker of garlands), 'gandhika' (perfumer), 'rajaka' (washerman), 'nilikusumbharanjaka' (dyer), 'napita' (barber), 'shaundika' (vendor of spirituous liquor), 'tambulika' (seller of betel leaves), 'sauvarnika' (goldsmith), 'manikara' (jeweller), 'vaikatika' (diamond cutter), 'kushilava' (actor), 'gayana' (singer), etc.

According to Vatsyayana, a courtesan is expected to know the traditional 64 arts and 64 special arts of which 24 are technically known as 'kamarahasya', 20 are based on wagering, 16 are bedroom arts and 4 are known as 'uttarakalas' to be done last. The courtesan should attract people, wealthy, decent, intelligent and generous persons, with their physical appearance and personality and court with them for material gain remaining unattached. She should have a good understanding of human nature. But she must be ruthless in extracting wealth from her lover. A courtesan should avoid temporary or permanent relationship with persons who have acquired wealth with difficulty and who are associated with the king and the administration. Various classes of prostitutes are mentioned. A 'rupajiva' (beautiful maidservant of the courtesan's household but doing independent business) should earn as much as to maintain a house, ornaments, utensils and a number of servants. A 'kumbhadasi' (bawd) should earn as much as to have sufficient food, maintain the cost of perfumes, a few golden ornaments and so on. Among other classes Vatsyayana mentions 'parichakra' the maidservant who is often handled by her master, 'kulata' and 'svairini' who court with other persons avoiding their husbands, either for money or for physical pleasure, 'nati' or dancing girl or actress, 'shilpakarika' or the wife of an artisan and 'vinashta', who when her husband is alive or after his death is kept as concubine by another person.

The second section of the Kamasutra deals with the art and practice of sexual union treated from the viewpoint of age, inclination, dimension of the organs, various modes of caress and postures of coitus, with a concluding topic on lover's quarrel. From the viewpoint of size, the male organs have been divided into three types—rabbit (small), bull (medium) and horse (large) and the female organs into deer (small), mare (medium) and elephant (large). Thus there are three equal unions between men and women of corresponding sizes, and six unequal unions in which the dimensions of the organs do not correspond. Vatsyayana refers to twelve kinds of embrace, twelve kinds of kissing, seven kinds of nail-marks, eight kinds of teeth-marks and fourteen kinds of postures of sexual union. A complete chapter is devoted to the opposite union or 'viparita-rati' in which the woman assumes the role of man. One chapter under the title 'auparishtika' deals with oral union with the eunuchs, both manly and womanly. Vatsyayana also describes seven kinds of 'chitrarata' or the circumstances under which sexual union takes place. The seventh or last part of the Kamasutra, which is divided into two chapters, is really an appendix in which the artificial means of increasing youth and vigour, use of tonic, medicines and artificial aids are prescribed.

The commentary on the Kamasutra is known as 'Jayamangala' which was composed by Yashodhara about the thirteenth century A.D. Yashodhara has amplified or modified some of the views of Vatsyayana especially in regard to the 'samprayogika' section on the classification of males and females, embracing, kissing, nailmark, teethmark, postures of union, striking and its reaction, woman assuming man's role, oral union and the entire procedure of sexual act of which he makes a simple classification into 'shuddha' and 'samkirna'. Yashodhara, following Vatsyayana, says that the women of the middle country are fond of embrace, but they do not like the use of nail and teeth marks as essential conditions of love play. Women of Bahlika and Avanti likewise hate nail and teethmarks, but they are fond of varieties of coital postures. The Malavas and Abhiras like all acts of samprayoga. Women of Strirajya or Vajravanta country and Kosala are fond of striking and thrashing. Women of the Dravida country are satisfied with a single set of coital dealings while those of the Gauda country like soft body.

The later Kamashastras show no feature of essential interest and they simply echo what has been said by Vatsyayana. These works are rather metrical amplifications of the sex topics, and curiously enough they omit the section on prostitutes. Among such works mention should be made of the Ratirahasya of Kakkoka (twelfth century,) the Nagarasarvasva of Padmashri (some time between the 10th and the 14th century) the Panchashayaka of Jyotirishvara (first half of the 14th century), the Ratimanjari of Jayadeva (some time between the 14th and 16th century), the Ratiratnapradipika of Devaraja (15th century) and the Anangaranga of Kalyanamalla (16th century). The authors of these works were blind imitators. Instead of forming creative hypotheses based on observation and experiments they resorted to a fantastic imagination. For example, the conception of 'kamasthanas' and the theory of 'kamodaya', i.e. the centres of passion in women's body, their excitement from one centre to another in accordance with the stages of the waxing and waning of the moon have been described in detail by these writers, but none cared to verify by a simple enquiry whether these were real. They conceived of as many as 729 varieties of sexual union. This absurdity is also found in the endless process of multiplication and coinage of terms regarding embrace, kissing, scratches made on the body, titillation of the organs, etc. The only exception is the more extensive Kandarpachudamani of King Virabhadra of the Vaghela dynasty composed about 1577 A.D. which is an amplified, but faithful metrical exposition in seven chapters of Vatsyayana's Kamasutra. Of recent works of minor importance, mention may be made of the Ratishastra of Nagarjuna with Samaratattvaparakashika commentary of Ravanaradhya, the Shringaramanjari of Ali Akbar Shah when an eighteenth century Telugu work and which has been rendered into Sanskrit and a few other texts which are still in manuscript forms.

KAMASURABHI (Malayalam) is a collection of sixty original poems and a liberal translation of O.W. Holms's 'The Chambered Nautilus' by Vennikkulam Gopala Kurup. It won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1974. All the poems except three, 'Vasantaswapnam', 'Kanalaya kamukan' and 'Viphalaprateeksha', are in Dravidian metres and they vary from 12 ('Lobhavum mohavum') to 164 lines ('sona') in length. They deal with such a variety of scenes, situations and personalities that the reader can easily gain an insight into the poet's tastes, temperament and preferences. There is also an earnestness of purpose, a warmth of feeling, a clearness of vision and a sense of direction characterizing almost all of them. Thus some of them lead us to the luxuriant fields and soporific songs of Kerala (e.g. 'Keralaganam', 'Meenappatam' and 'Oru tarattu') while some others take us to the thronging streets of Tamilnadu or the history-packed city of Delhi. Again, if it is the self-immolating Zamorin who set fire to the prison where he had been put as a captive by Tippu Sultan who greets us in 'Ti koluttumpol', it is the unflinching Porus who stood with unbowed head before the Greek conqueror Alexander that commands our admiration in 'Pouravan'. 'Vazhiyile vairam' presents an other-worldly man, Pakanar, burying in sand a glittering gem that comes across on his way so that his wife coming behind him may not in her feminine weakness for such things be tempted to pick it up but finds himself outwitted by her words: "What is the difference between the gem and the sand?" Similarly 'Oru laksham' leaves a matchless musician stunned when he learns that the reward of one lakh rupees publicly announced by his Maharaja who was spell-bound by his music was only an oral gesture of his appreciation and that there was no intention to implement it. Gopala Kurup, though primarily a poet of Kerala, sees India as a whole and is invigorated and inspired by the country's glorious cultural legacy, perennial wisdom and broad vision. 'Nilakkatta chalanam' and a few other poems in the collection show how proud he is of our country and her past. Of the present, however, he has some reservations, though pessimistic he is certainly not. In 'Veerashasanam' the poet, while paying tribute to the father of the nation as the embodiment of all that is best in Indian culture laments that the present generation has ungratefully rejected him. A few other poems also echo the same or similar sentiments. But he is neither a revolutionary nor an anarchist. In him we can hear not the roar of an infuriated lion but the helpless cry of a wounded deer. Even in a poem like 'Keralalapam' he only persuasively exhorts the Tamils who had demanded a 'Tamizhakom' including the Tamil-speaking areas of the erstwhile state of Travancore, to stop their agitation, remembering that they and the Malayalis are children of the same parents' daughters. 'Sona' however, stands as a solitary exception and the poet does make a trumpet call for reform through the vociferous musings of the Buddhist nun against her forced isolation from the male world.

KAMAT, M.N.-KAMAYANI

'Vishwapushpam' stands apart from the rest in that it tries to bring the entire universe in its sweep; akin to it are: (1) 'Tozhukaiyode', in which the poet lays bare his heart's desires before the supreme controller of that universe and (2) 'Ullarayil' in which he makes a review of his joys and sorrows and attributes them to his lingering desires.

Finally, the language used is uniformly simple and perceptibly mellifluous, leaving no room for ambiguity or bitterness. Of the original figures of speech, the simile in which Indians who quarrel among themselves when the load of slavery is off their backs are compared to the bullocks which fight against each other as soon they are unyoked is noteworthy; the technique employed is often dramatic and sometimes descriptive and narrative.

K.S.N.

KAMAT, M.N. (Kannada; 1884-1941) was one of those pioneers who was responsible for the propagation of modern Kannada literature in South Kanara. He was a Saraswat brahmin by birth and hence his mother tongue was Konkani. However, just as other Saraswats of South Kanara, he had his education in Kannada and later developed his taste for the Kannada language and literature. He was born in a poor family in a village known as Mundkur situated in Karkala Taluk. Therefore, he could not pursue his studies after F.A. He studied in Mangalore Canara High School for two years where he had the opportunity of having M.Govinda Pai as his classmate. Even when he was a student in the High School, he had an aptitude for literature. He published a manuscript magazine in English called Angel with the cooperation of M. Govinda Pai. He wrote his articles under the pen-name 'Robin Redbreast'. It is learnt that he was yet a boy of sixteen years. He was married very early. Evidently he was forced to earn his livelihood. Therefore, he had to go to Bombay in search of a job. There he worked as a clerk in a private company. Later he was transferred to another branch of that company in Calcutta. Though it was an ordeal for him to live in a big city like Calcutta, it was a blessing in disguise because he realised there the love of the Bengalis for their language. This inspired Kamat to serve Kannada as best as he can. Due to some circumstances, he came back to Mangalore in 1910. Immediately afterwards he had to go to Madras for training in teaching. When he returned to Mangalore, he served as a teacher in Udupi, Mulki and Bantwal. Ultimately he had the fortune of joining the staff of Canara High School where he had studied before.

Ever since he became a teacher, his career as a writer in Kannada progressed well. He used to contribute his articles to leading journals of his time published in South Kanara. As he was closely associated with his students, he wrote a number of one-Act plays for staging during the school festival and on other occasions. Although, he was a teacher in Geography, his love for Kannada was remarkable. He edited a paper known as Ananda for sometime. He was an associate editor of Bodhini printed at Udupi. He was a successful speaker also and he had a good sense of humour. This was mainly the reason why he wrote light essays and interesting short stories. In fact his short stories became popular in those days throughout Karnataka. He was elected President of Short Story Writers' conference held at the Bangalore in 1940. Kamat, with all his genius, had to struggle very hard till the end. He was just fifty-seven when he died on the 24th April 1941.

Among the literary contributions of Kamat, one-Act plays, which amount to forty in number, stand foremost. He covers all the aspects of the society in his plays. A genuine sense of humour is the most remarkable feature of these plays. Some of them are highly satirical. A play dealing with the well-known theme of Shakuntala is adapted to a modern farce which is full of humour. His rich collection of plays include both mythological and historical subjects. It is seen that he has used fresh techniques for children's plays. However, one can undoubtedly say that the name of Kamat is unforgettable in the history of one-Act plays in modern Kannada.

Kamat is one of the earliest short story writers in Kannada. He is placed along with the other pioneers of Kannada short story writers such as Kerur Vasudevacharya, Panje Mangesha Rao and Srinivasa. His first collection of short stories, Andina Avooru was published in 1918.

He has to his credit a number of prose works most of which deal with mythological themes. His light essays are lively and deal with contemporary life. Though he has written a good deal of poems, they are scattered in several papers and journals. There is a need to bring out a good collection of his poems.

FURTHER WORKS Drama: Aswathamriga (1914), Chandrasabhyudaya (1914), Kumara Bhimasimha (1914), Premapipase (1914), Maurya simhasana (1919), Anchemane (1924), Arjunana chaturmasa (1929), Uddarananda (1930), Punarjanma (1934), Marji (1936), Sadri Subba (1938), Sikshana Pareekshe (1961). KAMAYANI (Hindi) of Jaishanker 'Prasad' published in 1935 and considered to be the most outstanding epic of modern Hindi is the story of 'a lost angel from a ruined Paradise'. Manu, the central character, has lost his angelhood and is struggling to acquire manhood which would be modalized adequately to start a new human race. Having seen how the cities of gods have gone to the seeds because of their blind and unrelieved search for pleasure of the cruelest type, the father of the human race is searching for a harmony which would accommodate sudden silences as much as nagging noises. Jaishanker 'Prasad' is the only epic poet who does not try to project any religious ideas like Dante, Ariosto, Tasso, Spenser, Milton and other Western writers of epic, and his work is totally motivated by the metaphysics of psychology, a subject almost not known when the epic was written. It has 15 Cantos: 1. Chinta 2. Asha 3. Shraddha 4. Kama 5. Vasana 6. Lajja 7. Karma 8. Irsha 9. Ida 10. Swapna 11. Sangharsh 12. Nirved 13. Darshan 14. Rahasya and 15. Anand.

Manu, the lone survivor of the great 'Deluge' amidst the desolate snows of the Himalayas, remembers how the cities of gods are all annihilated. The civilization of man was going to accept a balance between external order and internal impulse and Manu was to start a new world where pleasure was not accepted as a rational right, but taken as the search for fulfilment of the natural potentialities of the mind. In this sense it is not wrong to say that Kamayani is a saga of the victory of the inner faith over complacent rationality. It has been so accepted by the scholars of Hindi. But it is not only that Prasad has stated in his foreword that in Rigveda both Manu and Shraddha appear as hermits. These two hermits come together to originate the race of man. The idea of the 'Daughter of Cupid' (Kamagotraja) herself being a hermit, sounds a note which is the predominant note of Hindu art and philosophy. Such a union between a disillusioned mind like that of Manu, and a dedicated soul like that of Shraddha, was prevented from achieving the best results by the priests of the 'Asuras', 'Kilat' and 'Akuli', who induced Manu to make 'animal sacrifice' which would shake the foundations of the new world. One of the questions which Manu asks himself, and which misleads him is, "Should I live in fear of a world which I have created myself?" He wants to transcend death and 'change', being a descendant of the gods. Ida, the woman who leads Manu away from peace to a self-willed autocracy, says, "One who is for ever competing with himself and excelling is the one who is the real king. You are the maker of rules and, therefore, not subservient to and beyond rules". Ida is not unsympathetically portrayed as some people have observed. She, the queen of the 'Saraswat Pradesh,' is trying to make Manu conscious of his responsibility towards the people, when drunk with his own might Manu holds her in his arms proclaiming that, like any other object, she, too, is the property of Manu. Manu stands alone to fight against his own people like a kind of dictator fighting to impose his will. Ida is shouting at the top of her voice, "What a devastation and destruction is taking place! O the proud one, wait, live and let live." It is worth noting that contrary to the popular opinion, Prasad has not let down rationality. Rationality teaches "Live and let live". Faith alone can explain what is living. Life is explained by Shraddha, the daughter of Kama (Eros), in the Canto called Rahasya. Life is happy when 'desire, knowledge and action are harmonized by faith and love'. This harmonization brings pure bliss to life in its entirety.

Though based on fragments of the legendary stories, Kamayani reflects the conflicting problems of the modern times characterised by the predominance of materialism.

Here is the poetry of a vast natural panorama, a background against which life itself sings its varying tunes of sweet and delicate love.

KAMBA RAMAYANA (Tamil), composed by the great poet Kamban, is a transcreation of Valmiki's Ramayana in Tamil. In this version, Kamban tried to bring home to the Tamilians the peerless hero and heroine in tune with their own social and literary tradition. For this, he transposed Valmiki's phrases and ideas as well as the settings, in some cases. Sanskrit poets had made daring innovations in the original story of Rama and the puranas too contained different versions. Kamban took note of all this and made his own selection and made his version an appealing and admirable work of universal significance.

Kamban's epic was publicly released in 885 A.D. according to the traditional view. It consisted of about 10,000 verses of four lines each but interpolations have been made down the centuries. The narrative covers only the incidents up to the coronation of Rama at Ayodhya.

In the first Canto (Bala Kanda) we have the descriptions, in Tamil literary convention of the rivers, the countryside, the capital city, Ayodhya, and the ruler of Khosala, Dasharatha. What is striking is the initial stress on right conduct in the kingdom. The monarch is stated to be only the 'body' of the State, nourished by the people who are its 'life'. The ruler is said to labour hard for the people's welfare just like a poor husband who has to eke out a living from a small plot of land.

The narrative then goes on to the ruler's childlessness, the special sacrifice he performed to ensure progeny, the birth of four sons to his three prime consorts: Rama to Koushalya, Bharata to Kaikeyi and the twins, Lakshmana and Shatrughna to Sumitra, in that order. The story now gains momentum. The princes grow up. The great sage Vishvamitra demands of the fond father, (to his great dismay) that the eldest boy, Rama, be sent to protect him from the demons obstructing him in the performance of a unique sacrifice. The colloquy between the sage and the ruler is portrayed by Kamban exquisitely. Dasharatha finally lets himself be persuaded to send Rama and his inseparable brother, Lakshmana, with the sage. On the way, Rama has his maiden fight with an awesome demoness, Tataka, at the instance of the sage. The final triumph is set forth magnificently. Next, the sage points out to Rama, the ancient hermitage from where the Lord had played the role of Vamana-Trivikrama of yore to put down Mahabali. Kamban's account of the sage's narrative here is superb from his own angle. It beautifully concludes that the Lord, after encompassing earth and heaven with his feet, stretched himself down to rest on the couch in the milky ocean, when the soft touch of his consort over the feet made them wince in pain. (The idea is not new, but Kamban's use of it in this context is fine). Next follow Rama's triumph over the demons, his journey to Mithila along with Lakshmana and Vishvamitra, and the redemption of Ahalya on the way. Here Kamban follows the puranic and later versions of Ahalya having been initially deceived by Indra, the celestial ruler and her being cursed by her irate husband, Gautama, to become a piece of rock. At Mithila Rama, the fair youth, and the lovely maiden, Sita, standing on a balcony, chance to glance at each other, and straight away fall in love (This is a departure from Valmiki's version and is in consonance with the Tamil tradition). The pangs of love suffered by Rama and Sita are set forth by Kamban exquisitely. The meeting of Rama Lakshmana and Vishvamitra with Janaka, the ruler of Mithila and foster-father of Sita, takes place next, with mutual introductions. Janaka had set a condition for Sita's wooers that they would bend and string the mighty bow of Shiva that he had with him. Seeing the youthful Rama, the citizens chide Janaka for sticking to his impossible test instead of accepting Rama immediately. The trial soon takes place and Rama easily bends the bow and breaks it too. A maid-servant conveys the news to the anxious Sita in the inner apartment in delirious joy. The triumph of Rama is conveyed to Dasharatha in Ayodhya and he marches with a great entourage. The dalliance of lovers in the party during the march and other sports are described elaborately by Kamban according to the literary convention. But some scholars would dismiss these verses as superfluous interpolation of later times. The preparations for the wedding of Sita and Rama (as also of his brothers with Sita's kinfolk maidens) then get under way, Sita and Rama in the web of love being portrayed as impatient of the inevitable delay in their union. The wedding rites are soon over with universal blessings. Dasharatha then starts for Ayodhya with his sons and daughters-in-law. On the way there is an unexpected encounter with the irate Parashurama, the sworn enemy of all rulers. Rama triumphs over Parashurama and the latter proclaims the victor's divinity. Then they reach Ayodhya safely and there is happiness all around.

Early in the first Canto, the destruction of Ravana is proposed and Vishnu himself promises to come into the world as the son of Dasharatha to destroy that Rakshasa. The reader's interest is drawn continually to this theme. The killing of Taraka is presented as heralding the down-fall of Ravana, and the subsequent events make us expect great things of Rama as the Avatar.

In the second Canto 'Ayodhya Kanda', the main events are old Dasharatha's proposal to make Rama, his eldest son, the ruler, which is applauded by the citizens and ministers, Rama agreeing to this merely as a command of his father to be implicitly obeyed, the festive preparations for the coronation, the dismay of the hunch-back maid of the youngest queen, Kaikeyi, at this, her distorting the pure mind of her mistress by adroit words against Rama and persuading her to demand of the king, her uxorious husband, the coronation of her son, Bharata, who was visiting her father's house, and the exile of Rama to the forest, on the strength of two general boons granted her of yore by the king, and not availed of till then. Here Kamban points out that Kaikeyi's change of mind was brought about to fulfil the Lord's pledge to the celestials for the overthrow of Ravana. Dasharatha is shocked into granting Kaikeyi the two boons that would cost him his life soon. Kaikeyi then sends for Rama and acquaints him with his father's desire (as she puts it) that he should go into exile for 14 years. Rama is undismayed: his face glows like a fresh-blown lotus. He at once bids his step-mother good-bye, saying that her command too was sacred to him. Rama next conveys the sudden turn in his fortunes to his old mother, Kaushalya, and his wife, Sita. The colloquy here as described by Kamban is magnificent art. Sita and Lakshmana force Rama to take them with him in his exile. The shocked citizens also decide to follow Rama in his exile but he persuades them to go back. He proceeds onward to meet the hunter chieftain Guha and acclaim him as the fifth brother in his own family. Guha helps Rama, Sita and Lakshmana to cross the river Ganga and lets them settle in Chitrakuta, a neighbouring hill. Meanwhile Dasharatha dies of grief in Ayodhya. Bharata is sent for: he is shocked at the events that has taken place in his absence, renounces all claims to the throne and sets out with a large retinue to meet Rama and persuade him to return. Guha's initial suspicion of and indignation against Bharata and his subsequent recognition of his sublime nature—(will a thousand Ramas be equal to you) are highlights of Kamban's version. The meeting of Bharata and Rama and the dialogue between them are effectively depicted. Bharata has to return only with Rama's sandals as a pledge for Rama's return after 14 years. He enthrones the sandals in a suburb of Ayodhya and rules from there, as an agent, living an austere life. Rama enters Dandakaranya.

The characterisation of all the individuals concerned in this Canto is marvellous.

In the third Canto (Aranya Kanda), the first 13 years of Rama's exile, spent among the sages pass rapidly, Kamban, however, reminding us now and then of the purpose of the Avatar. In the 14th year at Panchavati, the passion of Ravana's sister Shurpanakha, a widow, for Rama unchains a whole series of events. Kamban makes her appear before Rama in a most charming form (in contrast to Valmiki) visualised for us in spell-binding phrases. Shurpanakha is disfigured by Lakshmana when she attempts to seize Sita. At her instance, 14,000 Rakshasas confront Rama in a battle but he annihilates them single-handed. Shurpanakha then flees to Lanka and incites Ravana's passion for Sita by describing her unique charms. Ravana decides to abduct Sita through a stratagem. He forces his uncle, Maricha, to appear before Sita as a golden deer. At Sita's instance Rama goes after that deer despite Lakshmana's warning and is lured far into the jungle when he strikes down the quarry by his shaft. When dying the animal becomes a Rakshasa and lets out a loud cry for help in Rama's voice. Hearing this, Sita becomes distraught and with cruel words compels the unwilling Lakshmana to go in search of Rama leaving her alone. Ravana, who has been waiting for this opportunity, appears before Sita in the guise of an old ascetic. Kamban uses all his art in describing the colloquy between the 'ascetic' and Sita, the bursting of the false form in wrath at Sita's chiding, and the subsequent abduction of Sita by Ravana, carrying her along with her cottage, daring not to touch her. This is a departure from Valmiki to appease the hearts of sophisticated readers with their own sense of chastity. The vulture-King, Jatayu, hears the cry of Sita in distress and boldly fights with Ravana going in his aerial chariot, and is eventually struck down. Ravana then resumes his flight and keeps Sita under guard in the Ashokavana in Lanka hoping to wear down her resistance in time.

Meanwhile, Rama and Lakshmana return to the place of their erstwhile abode. Rama gives way to utter grief at the desolate emptiness before him but Lakshmana consoles him. The two then set out in search of Sita, meet the dying Jatayu and learn about the abduction. Jatayu dies and Rama performs the funeral rites as for a father. This is a scene of great pathos.

Proceeding further, the two heroes meet monster, Kabandha, who being burnt on a pyre as desired by him, gets a celestial form and advises Rama to become friends with Sugriva, the vanara chief in Kishkindha.

The fourth Canto (Kishkindha Kanda) introduces us to a new set of characters, the evolved monkeys. Hanuman, minister of Sugriva meets Rama, recognises at once in him the ordained Master for all time and takes Rama and Lakshmana to the presence of Sugriva and ritually cements a friendship between Rama and Sugriva. (The portrait of Hanuman here is unique).

Hearing from Hanuman that Vali, the elder brother of Sugriva, had persecuted the latter and deprived him of his wife as well due to a misunderstanding, pledges to slay Vali. Rama makes Sugriva challenge Vali to a combat and during the ensuing encounter, shoots down Vali with his unerring shaft from behind a cover. The dying Vali discovers the name of Rama in the arrow struck in his breast and reproaches Rama, who now comes before him, for dishonourable conduct in interfering unseen in a fight between brothers. Vali's words as portrayed by Kamban touch the high water-mark of art. Vali is finally convinced that his punishment was merited, makes peace with Sugriva and entrusts his only son, Angada, to the safe-keeping of Rama before he dies calmly. The scene is most touching and brings out the final grandeur of Vali.

Sugriva now becomes the ruler when Angada as the heir-apparent. He promises Rama to send emissaries in search of Sita after the rainy season is over. He then gives himself up to revelry while Rama pines in loneliness in a cave outside Kishkindha. Finding that Sugriva has not met him at all for long Rama is piqued at the apparent breach of trust and sends Lakshmana to make inquiries. Lakshmana's mounting wrath is appeased at the sight of the woe-begone Tara, Vali's widow. He is reminded of his own widowed mothers in Ayodhya (Kamban has departed from Valmiki in presenting Tara as continuing in widow's weeds, instead of becoming the wife of Sugriva, according to tribal custom). Then Lakshmana meets Sugriva and gets reconciled to him, learning that arrangements had already been made to muster the Vanara hosts, though Rama had not been informed of this. Soon the search parties are sent to all quarters. The party going South is headed by Angada and includes Hanuman. Rama feels that Hanuman alone will be successful in discovering Sita and gives him his signet-ring to be delivered to her. All other parties return within the prescribed time of one month and report failure. The Southern party, too, is unsuccessful, despite a longer search. When they are in the throes of despair, Sampati (the brother of Jatayu) meets them and says that Sita is in Lanka's Ashokavana. This puts cheer into the hearts of the Vanaras and it is decided that Hanuman, the ablest of them all, should leap across the sea, to Lanka and locate Sita.

The fifth Canto (Sundara Kanda) deals with Hanuman's flight to Lanka overcoming unexpected obstacles and trials on the way, fortified by the name of Rama, his overpowering the demoness-guardian of the city, his wandering in all areas in a diminutive form at night, his frustration at not finding Sita till he beholds her wasted form at Ashokavana... Sita is meanwhile in grief, lost in nostalgic memories.

Hanuman next sees Ravana coming there in all splendour, in the early hours before dawn, begging of the woe-begone Sita.

Sita spurns at his advances, foretells his doom and tenders wholesome advice in her compassion. Ravana's wrath is aroused, but hopeful lust supervening, he gives her some respite to reconsider her will, and bidding the demoness guardians to persuade Sita by all means, goes away. The fearsome guards threaten and cajole Sita, who gets desperate and contemplates suicide. Hanuman in hiding realises the risk, puts the guards under a spell, and approaches Sita, gently intimating that he was a messenger from Rama. Then he proves his identity and gives her Rama's ring. In great joy and relief (Kamban portrays her state in a series of superb similes), Sita blesses Hanuman, and inquires how he had crossed the sea with his diminutive form. Hanuman then shows her his cosmic form. Sita recognises his innate power but gently declines his proposal to take her to Rama on his back.

She then gives Hanuman her crest-jewel and asks him to arrange for her rescue within a month, failing which she would give up her life.

Hanuman now considers that he should leave tangible marks of his visit on Lanka and also secure a personal meeting with Ravana. He destroys the Ashokavana and makes short work of all Rakshasa warriors sent to fight him, including the indomitable Prince Aksha. Indrajit, the eldest son of Ravana now appears on the scene, and Hanuman, after a splendid fight, allows himself to be seemingly caught in the clutches of the Brahma-missile, hurled by the foe, though he is proof against it. Hanuman is then bound and dragged before Ravana, in all his glory and holds colloquy with him giving him good counsel and warning about a red rain, if he persists in his misdeemeanour. (Kamban excels himself here) Ravana wants to kill the audacious monkey, but his youngest brother Vibhishana points out that it would not be right to kill a messenger. So Ravana decides only to mutilate the tail, the proud ornament of a monkey. Hanuman's tail is accordingly set on fire. Sita, hearing of this, prays to the fire God to be cool to the hero, on whom her future depends. Hanuman, unharmed sets the whole of Lanka on fire, except the mansion of the righteous Vibhishana. Next, he cools his tail in the sea and returns to Sita, to assure himself of her safety. Bidding her a final adieu, he leaps back to the mainland, and joins his welcoming comrades. The entire party then find their way to Sugriva's camp. Then Hanuman prostrating himself towards the South, where Sita was, says to Rama.

Aye, seen have I the jewel of chastity with mine own eyes—beyond doubt

In the southern city of Lanka, washed by the foaming waves of the sea;

..Lord, celestial! Cast away all doubt, Sorrow no more.

..Ah, how much has she accomplished

The solar race has become thine

Likewise her illustrious race has become hers alone;

And the cruel tribe of the knave

That had parted her from thee.

She has gifted to Death

To the host of immortals, she has given life!

And my own ancestry, she has glorified
What else remains?

Next, Hanuman gives Rama Sita's crest-jewel and intimates that she has to be rescued within a month. The vanara hosts now march towards the sea with Rama and Lakshmana.

The sixth Canto (the Yuddhakanda) deals with the final battle scenes in Lanka after the burnt city has been restored by the architect, Maya, Ravana seeks counsel as to how the foe should be met without giving up Sita. All the army chiefs volunteer to overwhelm the foe. Kumbhakarna, the immediate younger brother of Ravana, chides him for unrighteousness but counsels straight fight, as the only course open then; Vibhishana, the youngest brother now advises reconciliation with Rama, to avoid impending general disaster. He recounts here the story of Hiranya of old, who despite his stupendous might, was destroyed by the lord because he forswore him and persecuted his own son, Prahlada, the unflinching devotee of God. The introduction of this puranic episode in this context is an innovation of Kamban, marvellous in portrayal. Of course, Ravana remains obdurate and scorns Vibhishana, who is forced then to seek refuge in Rama, who is now on the other shore of the sea. Rama's acceptance of him after holding counsel with all the army chiefs in pursuance of his general code of granting refuge to all that seek it is set down by Kamban in immortal words.

Next Rama has a causeway built across the sea along with the Vanara hosts. Angada is sent to Ravana with a final ultimatum to make peace, restoring Sita. Angada acts himself well here. But of course he has to return unsuccessful in his mission after proving his valour.

Soon the battle ensues. At the end of the first day, Ravana is deprived of all this appurtenances by Rama, who then sends him away chivalrously!

"Go back today, and if you will; return tomorrow fully refreshed."

These words ring down the corridors of time to the eternal glory of Rama, the peerless hero.

Kumbhakarna has now gone into his periodic deep slumber. Ravana has him aroused by violent means. (Kamban is very picturesque here) Kumbhakarna vainly advises Ravana to do the right thing. Then he goes to battle as a matter of brotherly duty, fully conscious of his doom.

In the battle-field Vibhishana meets him with the intent to win him over to Rama's side. Kumbhakarna applauds Vibhishana for having chosen the right path, but says that his duty is to die for his elder brother, who had shed his body all along. Kumbhakarna is struck down by Rama. In his last moments he beseeches Rama to protect the righteous Vibhishana.

Other great warriors of Ravana then fight and fall. Indrajit once binds Rama and Lakshmana with a serpent noose, and on another day strikes them down with the Brahma missile. The heroes are saved by the intervention of Garuda in the first instance, and later by Hanuman bringing the peak of a distant hill with medicinal herbs. Indrajit now takes recourse to a stratagem. He cuts down an illusory Sita over the battle-field. When Hanuman and the rest are unnerved by this sight, Indrajit goes in secret to acquire magical powers. But this is foiled by Lakshmana with the aid of Vibhishana. Indrajit is slain. Eventually, Ravana, too, is slain by Rama after a fierce fight.

Vibhishana is now crowned king of Lanka and Hanuman conveys the news of Rama's triumph to Sita. She is then brought before Rama by Vibhishana. Unexpectedly, Rama expresses doubts about her chastity during her captive days. Then she decides to undergo a fire-ordeal from which she emerges triumphant. The gods and Dasharatha, too, from heaven appear aloft and bless Rama and Sita, who are now re-united in joy.

Next, Rama, Sita, Lakshmana, Vibhishana and all the vanaras fly in a magical aerial car towards Ayodhya, halting only at Kishkindha to pick up the vanara ladies. The news of Rama's safe return is conveyed by Hanuman to Guha and the expectant Bharata, just in time to prevent him from immolating himself in the fire, unable to bear the apparent failure of Rama to return, after the period of exile. The narrative now moves swiftly to the climax and consummates in the reunion at Ayodhya and the glorious coronation of Rama.

In the last Canto, there are alternating scenes of pathos, grand heroism, despair and hope and repeated battles, each uniquely drawn by the master-hand.

Throughout the epic, the unrivalled fullness, variety and sufficiency of rhythm comes uppermost, in tune with the grandeur of the ideas. The composition can be savoured with relish in any part at any time with profit, as the appeal is perennial. Kamban everywhere plumbs the depths of human emotions.

KAMBAN (Tamil; c. 9th cent.), the great Tamil poet, popularly acclaimed as the Emperor of Poesy (Kavi Chakravarti) was born at Tiruvazhundur in Tamilnadu. There is an icon for him at the local Vishnu temple; and a nearby open high ground is known as Kamban Medu. Tradition has it that his great epic Ramavataram, now generally known as Kambaramayanam, was publicly released before an Assembly of scholars in the Srirangam Temple in Saka 807 (A.D. 885), after he had first sung the praises of the greatest of the Vaishnavite Alvars Satakopa (Nammazhvar), the composition being known as Satakopar-antati. This account, together with the fact that in his epic there are analogues to the songs of the Alvars particularly Tirumangai Alwar (the last of these 8th century), may be taken as corroborative of the general theory that his period was the 9th century. Some scholars would put his date much later, 12th or 13th century. This is not generally accepted.

There is a memorial to Kamban at Nattarasana Kottai (in the Ramanathapuram district of Tamil nadu) reported to be his place of burial. There are legends portraying him as having the patronage of the then Chola ruler first, and then, as a consequence of some misunderstanding, going to the Chera ruler, before a final reconciliation with the former patron. There is also a popular story that the Chola ruler put to death Kamban's son Ambikapati, for daring to love the Chola princess. But such stories are not historical. However, it is true that he enjoyed the beneficial patronage of the rich landlord, Sadayappa Vallal of Toruvennainallur, to whom there are specific references in the Kambaramayana.

Kamban was well-versed in Sanskrit and Tamil, with proficiency in all the lores extant at the time. Besides his epic and Satakopar-antati, he is popularly credited with some small compositions like Erezhupatu (In praise of agriculture). He is said to be the son of Addittan a non-brahmin priest, in the local Kali temple. It is also held that he was a contemporary of Ottakkuttar, the Chola ruler's poet-laureate and that his epic was in fact composed in response to a challenge by the laureate. But this lacks historical proof, though there is a composition of the Uttarakanda of the Ramayana attributed to Ottakkuttar, as a sort of surviving supplement to Kambaramayana, which covers only the previous six kandas.

Valmiki's Ramayana had spread throughout India and even the far-east, thousands of years ago. The story of Rama is referred to in the Sangam literature of Tamil Nadu (pre-Christian era). By the time of the poet Ilango's Silappadikaram (early Christian era), Rama had been popularly accepted as divine Incarnation. In the Prabandham of the Vaishnavite saints Alvars too, the Ramavatara is mentioned, though not as profusely as the Krishnavatara. By the time of the later Acharyas, the story of Rama had grown very high in popular esteem and it has remained so till the present day. Indeed, there are many places in Tamil Nadu, boasting of some association or other with Rama. The commentaries pertaining to Tamil literature make us infer that there should have been poetical compositions in Tamil, bearing on the whole or part of the Ramayana before Kamban which have been lost to us.

Anyway, Kamban began his great epic in an age when Rama was adored as God. His native place was also free from sectarian prejudice and this freedom is still evident in local festivals. Kamban was a universal man, who hitched his wagon to the prime Absolute that manifested on Earth as Rama. His epic therefore stresses this aspect.

Indeed, Kambaramayanam would seem to have led to the erection of separate temples to Rama in many places in Tamilnadu.

His plot in almost all its details is Valmiki's but he has treated the situations, their development and gradation, in a unique, masterly way. The architectonics and structure are also superb. The innovations he made in Valmiki's narrative are generally in accord with the tradition that has grown by his time and are intended to bring the motif in tune with Tamil culture and literary milieu. In Sanskrit, the puranas too have different versions of the Ramayana to which Kamban would have had access, apart from local stories.

What we may specifically refer to here is Kamban's personality. He was a child of Nature, drinking deep of its splendour and charm. He was a student of the human mind, plumbing its depths and scaling its heights. The social life, habits, politics, economics, all the facets of Tamil culture, were well-known to him. He was also proficient in the fine arts, music, painting and dance. He also seems to have mastered science, philosophy, mathematics, astronomy and the like.

Needless to say, he was the master of all post Tamil literature, and tradition (grammar and rhetorical laws included). In a sense, it is a tribute to his genius that he could give Tamil fresh powers of articulation and make it serve the purpose of perfect poetry, despite his vast learning.

For a poet of lesser calibre, it would have been almost unthinkable to improve upon the long tradition of the Sangam literature and the songs of the Alvars and Nayanmars. In fact, the poets before him did follow a beaten track, contenting themselves only with trimmings and artifices here and there. This is why after Kamban, their works fell into practical oblivion. But Kamban had preserved all that was best in Tamil tradition, so that it is not really lost to us. The poets who came after him also delighted in incorporating his words, phrases and thoughts, in their compositions, sometimes in a large measure, so that Kamban has become immortal—a household word in the country.

In regard to the metre, Viruttam, he adopted, he did full justice to the perfection already achieved by the Jain poet Tirutakkatevar in his classic, Jivaka chintamani. A rare feat indeed.

But the poets and scholars of his day could not easily appreciate the strange ways of Kamban. Even later commentators failed to cite Kamban's verses. The general fanatical Shaivism of the time also stood against the innate worth of Kamban's work, apparently devoted to the glory of Vishnu. This was characteristic of the medieval period in Tamil literature. Earlier, Buddhist and Jain works in Tamil had been applauded as great contributions to Tamil; later too, this was the case with Muslim and Christian writers.

But from the beginning, the general mass of the people took to Kamban. He spoke their language, and gave them faith and hope. All legends bear testimony to the popular acclaim. Other poet-laureates who were hailed in their day, due to royal patronage, as Kavi Chakravartis, have lost their title since, Kamban alone being deemed to be worthy of this honour.

He had given the people of Tamilnadu the wonderful work of Valmiki in a form they could assimilate, as though the events had happened in their own region, the hero and heroine being of their own race, as it were. Truly, Kamban had brought God from heaven down to the earth, to mingle freely with the people. In the South, the Ramayan of Valmiki continues to be expounded to large numbers of people, the learned and the unlettered alike by professionals, almost everyday. Here too, the expounders find it necessary to quote from Kamban profusely. Kambaramayanam also is expounded to the people by scholars, engaged in its exposition, like those expounding Tulsidas's Ramcharitmanas in the North.

Of late, the study of Kambaramayanam as a superb non-denominational composition has gained force, so that Kamban is now again a household work, despite his denigration in the recent past by atheistic politicians.

Kamban is Tamilnadu's gift to the world, like Tiruvalluvar, as the great national poet Subramania Bharati declared.

KAMBAR, CHANDRASHEKARA B. (Kannada; b. 1938) is a Kannada poet, playwright, novelist, film director and folklorist. After taking his M A in Kannada from Karnatak University, he taught in several colleges. He did his Ph.D. in 1975. His first collection of poems Mugulu (The bud, 1958) showed his promise as a poet. His next collection Helatena kela (Listen, I will narrate, 1964) established him as one of the outstanding younger poets. The title poem uses a folk metre, which had been earlier used by Bendre, to tell the allegorical story of a young villager who is ruined by western influence. Even the idyllic village is turned into a westernised town by a Rakshasa. The poem is also a reaction to the then dominant Navya Kavya which was at its zenith under the leadership of Gopalakrishna Adiga. It is not a sustained allegory, but the enchanting lilt of the poem casts a spell on the audience. His third collection of poems, Takararinaru (Hecklers, 1974), had a variety of tones and moods and we see the poet trying to forge an idiom which draws its strength from the urban as well as rural imagery. His fourth collection Savirada neralu (Deathless shadows, 1979) is mainly a collection of songs. As a poet Kambar excels when he is lyrical, and at times when he is satirical. Side by side with poetry Kambar also started writing plays. Bembattida kannu (Haunting eyes, 1960), Narcissus (1969) Rishyashrinaga (1970) Chalesha (The Bespectacled or the man of forty, 1971) were followed by Jokumaraswamy (1973). This play based on the rituals of the phallic god Jokumaraswamy with its songs, revelry and erotic tickles not only drew the inhibited middle class to overcrowded shows, but also won him the prestigious Smt. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya Award for the best play of the year and also the State Sahitya Akademi award. Jaisidanayaka (The victorious hero, 1975) won him the Vardhamana Prashasti. Then came the other plays Kittikaathe (The story of Kitty, 1976) which is a children's play, Sangya balya anabekonadolaga (1977) which is an adaptation of the folk play, Alibaba (1980) another play for children, Nayikaathe (The story of a dog, 1980) and Kadukudure (The wild horse, 1980). Besides poetry and drama, Kambar has published a novel Kari mayi (The dark mother, 1978) and several love stories. He edited Sangya balya, (1965) (a folk play, Bannisi hadavya nana balaga (Acclaim by relatives, a collection of folk songs, Matadolingave (1972) (a collection of folk songs, Lakshapati rajana katha (1973) (a folk narrative, Bedara huduga mattugili (1979) (folk tales,) and Kasigonda seru (Folk tales, 1979).

KAMDAR, KESHAVALAL HIMMATRAM-KAMESWARA RAO, BHAMIDIPATI

His research work on folk theatre is to be found in his Uttara Karnatakada rangabhoomi (The folk theatre of North Karnataka, 1964) and Bayalatagalu (1972) which is a study of a folk form.

Kambar has directed two feature films, two documentaries and has composed music for three feature films and two documentaries. As a Fulbright scholar in 1968, he taught in the University of Chicago. He is at present a Reader at the Bangalore University. He is also editing the Folk-Lore Dictionary for the Kannada Sahitya Parishat.

KAMDAR, KESHAVALAL HIMMATRAM (Gujarati; b. 1891, d. 1976), a well-known historian of Gujarat, was born at Gondal in Saurashtra. He graduated from the Fergusson College of Poona in 1912, and thereafter, obtained the M.A. degree in 1916. He had specialised in the subjects of history, economics and politics. He worked as the Professor of History and Economics at the Baroda College, affiliated then to the Bombay University, from 1919 till his retirement. He edited a monthly, Gram-jivan (Rural life) for some time.

Kamdar's contribution to literature includes mainly his Gujarati works on history and his inter-disciplinary study of history and literature. He wrote A Survey of Indian History (1757-1958) in 1922, A Political and Administrative History of India in 1924 and A History of the Mughal Rule in India in 1928. Similar volumes were also written by him in Gujarati. His memorable literary historical contribution is the work entitled Svadhyaya (2 volumes, 1939). Renowned man of letters and critic, Ramnarayan Pathak, inspired him to write articles on Gujarati literature in which historicity was involved. He examined Gujarati literature from a historical point of view. His series of articles on the politics of Sarasvatichandra (An epic novel by Govardhanram) was very famous. His deep study of literature from the historian's point of view is remarkable. Specific mention should be made of the detailed analysis and interpretation of historical and political ideas presented by Govardhanram Tripathi in the epic novel Sarasvatichandra, particularly in its fourth volume. The ideas woven in the allegorical style by the author are lucidly explained at length with a critical insight by Kamdar. The subject has been treated very exhaustively by the critic. The significance of Mallarajbhavan of Ratnagiri, the allegorical presentation of the Mahabharata and the allegories woven into the dreamworld of Sarasvatichandra and Kumud are treated at length. He has also examined Govardhanram's Utopia presented in the scheme of Kalyangram. His other noteworthy articles in Svadhyaya relate to the analysis of the Gujarati culture, the concept of the study of history, the ideal of a historian and evaluation of Narmad as a historian (particularly based on Rajjarang, a historical work by Narmad). Kamdar used to write under various pen-names. In those days of the British rule, he wrote a number of articles on the political philosophy of the Independence movement of the thirties under the pseudonym of 'Gurjar Rashtira' in the journals like Kumudi, Prasthan and Vasant. His inter-disciplinary approach to history and literature is noteworthy, and as such, it paves the way for the studied approach involving more disciplines.

KAMESWARA RAO, BHAMIDIPATI (Telugu; b. 1897, d. 1958) was an actor, play-wright, humorist, critic and musicologist. Born in a brahmin family, to Lachamma and Narasavadhunulu, he was a graduate in English literature, bachelor in Education, and a post-graduate in Hindi. He got by rote a good many of the vedic 'riks' and often recited them to demonstrate their correct intonation. He was also an authority on the compositions of Tyagaraja, a saint-musician of South India. For two years from 1920 to 1922 he worked in the Accountant General's Office, Madras, but due to his prepondering love for literature, he resigned his clerkship and settled down as a teacher at Rajahmundry. He was content to be an ideal teacher and until he retired in 1953 as headmaster of the Vireshalingam High school. His life was a steady stream of literary production and music-research. In 1953 the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi made him its Fellow and in 1957 the citizens of Rajahmundry celebrated his sixtieth birthday in a befitting manner to honour him and his achievements.

His greatest achievement was his sense of humour. As man he was a store-house of wit and repartee. As writer he indulged in clean and tickling satire, healthy pun and enjoyable criticism. He always aimed at making the reader and the listener enjoy his wit, himself remaining stoically serene. Writing was his penance and his books were his instruments to cleanse the Telugus of their foibles. In recognition of his glorious services in the realm of humour in 1934 he was given the title Hasya Rasabrahma by the Maharaja of Jeypore.

Kameswara Rao was one of the early Telugu playwrights who recognised the importance of the amateur theatre and worked tirelessly for its growth and development. All his plays, therefore, were intended for the amateur stage. Every anniversary celebration of the Govt. Arts College, Rajahmundry, invariably had his play for production, newly written for the occasion. Along with the production of the play, Kameswara Rao had to read out a humorous skit or an essay. It went on uninterruptedly until he died. Now and then he had also appeared on the stage either in the role of Shakti Samanta in Chandragupta written by Dvijendralal Roy, or in some grave character in an English tragedy. His rendering of the dialogue and his great acting talent coupled with an extra-ordinary stage sense gave him the necessary training to write plays that would instantaneously become successful. When he added to them the spice of humour they became unparalleled and Kameswara Rao gained a permanent place for himself among the Telugu humorists.

Kameswara Rao started his dramatic career with Bagu: Bagu in 1923. Since then he wrote hundreds of essays and about ten plays. There was nothing under the sun that he did not touch. From God to mosquito, from a physician to a widow, from dinner to dust and from wedlock to deadlock, all this he analysed and published in three volumes under the title Kalakshepam (To spend time, 1928-42). He authored more than fifty farces in the fashion of Moliere, William Frederick Ferar, Sheridan and Bhasa. Here and there he adapted themes and imitated them, but by and large they are replete with his native genius. His characters like Bhagayya and Chikkeswararao in Bagu-Bagu, Parvatala, Panakalu and Amritam in Eppudu inte (1926), and Mandalam Kamandalam Satyanandam and Purvanandam in Kachata tapaln (1927) are types, no doubt, but they exhibit human frailties like jealousy, pride, hate and ego in all their lawlessness and hilarity. Evall godava valladi (1940), Rendu rellu (1942), Swarajyam (1953), and Na mate neggindi (1945) are a few others among his popular plays. Each play is unique for its humour and peculiar word-jugglery.

Among his many literary productions two books stand on a different note. They are Tyagaraju atma vicharam (The agony of Tyagaraja, 1951) and Andhra nataka padya pathanam (1957). He divided the six hundred compositions of Saint Tyagaraja into nine parts and explained each composition in a beautiful prose style which is at once lucid and illuminating. It reveals his critical acumen and his knowledge of the intricacies of the Carnatic music. Andhra nataka padya pathanam is his life's work. As it was born out of a casual remark made by O.J. Couldrey, his Gurudeva, he dedicated it most worshipfully to him. It was blessed by Kashi Krishnacharya, the former poet-laureate of Andhra Pradesh and commended by the scholar-poet Madhunapantula Satyanarayana Sastri, his contemporary at school. The book is an argument that the Telugu poem must be rendered in all its pristine purity, keeping it aloof from distracting and distressing music.

His life was not very eventful, but his literary contribution brought a freshness to Telugu prose and drama.

KAMIL, MUHAMMAD AMIN (Kashmiri; b. 1924) is commonly known as 'Amin Kamil' or 'Kamil Kashmiri'. He obtained his B.A. and I.L.B. degrees from the Punjab and Aligarh Muslim Universities respectively, joined as a lecturer in S.P. College, Srinagar, and then, was appointed an editor to edit two literary journals: Shiraza and the bi-yearly Son-adab in Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages. Kamil originally wrote Urdu poetry under the pen name of 'Gariq' and after the death of Mahjor, switched over to Kashmiri poetry in early fifties. He is a master of Kashmiri ghazal and has to his credit poems of eternal value. As a critic he has acquired wide recognition. He has written dramas and novels and is one of the pioneer short story writers in Kashmiri. He has edited for sometime two literary journals, Naeb and Gulrez. He has edited the poems of Sheikh 'Vali' entitled Nurnama. His three volumes on critical analysis of mystic poetry of the Kashmiri language under the title of Sufi shairi is still considered a pioneering work on the subject. He has further translated some plays of Tagore and written a book on Kashmiri poetess Haba Khatun (1960). He won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1967 for his book of poems, Lava te praveh (1965). Padis pod tshay (1972) and Masmalar are his other poetic compilations. For the former he shared the first prize of the Jammu and Kashmir State Academy with Ghulam Nabi Gauhar's novel, Meol, in 1975.

KAMSA BADHA-KAMSAVAHO OF RAMA PANIVADA

KAMSA BADHA (Manipuri) is an epic by Aramban Dorendrajit Singh, first published by A. Jamini Devi, wife of the author in 1945. The second edition of the book came out in 1960.

Kamsa badha (The killing of Kamsa) deals with the death of Kamsa at the hands of Shrikrishna, a theme popular in Indian classics. The poem was started in 1935, completed in 1939 and then modified in 1942. In seven Cantos the epic relates the story of the birth of Shrikrishna, his pranks and other activities ending with the killing of Kamsa. In form and content it follows the traditions and conventions of the Indian epic.

The author was well-versed in Sanskrit and Bengali and was acquainted with some of the epics in these languages. The influence of Michael Madhusudan Datta's Meghnadbadh kavya in Bengali can be felt in his attempt at innovations in the language and structure and in the conception and execution of the whole plan. Dorendrajit Singh, in the same way as Michael Madhusudan Datta, experimented with coining new words and using the different parts of speech in unconventional ways with results sometimes happy and at other times not so. But in his treatment of the story he was deeply rooted in tradition which probably accounts for why he could not humanise Kamsa or the other characters in the epic. The deep religious outlook of the author can be felt in every line of the poem.

Kamsa badha is one of the few epic poems in modern Manipuri literature and is considered an important work.

KAMSAVAHO OF RAMA PANIVADA (Prakrit). Rama Panivada's Kamsavaho is an ornate poem in Prakrit with 233 verses divided into four Cantos: Kamsa has sent Akrura to Gokula to invite Balarama (Rama) and Krishna to Mathura to attend the Bow-festival. This invitation is only a pretext to cover his real intention of killing them. Krishna fearlessly accepts the invitation and the covert challenge and they all leave for Mathura. The departure of Krishna means deep pangs of separation for the Gopis. On Krishna's instruction Akrura asks them to put up with the temporary separation. Akrura drives the chariot. They halt on the bank of Yamuna. It is here that Akrura has the wonderful and unique experience of seeing Krishna everywhere. Soon Krishna and party reach Mathura (Canto i). In Mathura they meet a washerman carrying the clothes of Kamsa. They demand some clothes from him. On his refusal and insulting threats Krishna forcibly takes the clothes slaying the washerman. Later on they come across a hunch-backed maid carrying saffron for presenting it to Kamsa. By his divine touch Krishna transforms her into a maiden of wondrous beauty. She falls in love with Krishna who assures her of his return soon. Krishna and party then proceed towards the royal residence. Rama and Krishna go to the gymnasium for archery. There Krishna breaks the bow when he tries to string it. They then move through the streets of Mathura, which appears to Krishna as if it were heaven itself on earth (Canto ii). The next morning Rama and Krishna proceed towards the city-gate. Ambastha, the keeper of Kamsa's elephant, Kuvalayida, tries with the help of the elephant to overpower Krishna. Krishna, however, kills them both. Later on, the two boys Krishna and Rama are, as desired by Kamsa, engaged in a duel with the two heavy wrestlers, Hanura and Mustika respectively. The two boys, after a thrilling fight kill their opponents and rout the wrestlers who try to overpower them. Kamsa desires to imprison them. Krishna, however, attacks him and slays him. The wicked brothers of Kamsa too are killed. Gods, delighted at their valour shower from heaven flowers on them (Canto iii). The slaying of Kamsa by Krishna is a source of great relief to the whole world. Krishna appoints Ugrasena as king and releases his parents from the prison. Then Akrura comes, pays respects to Vasudeva and Devaki and narrates the various events in the childhood of Rama and Krishna right up to Krishna's slaying of Kamsa (Canto iv).

The poem describes, as the title indicates, the central episode of the slaying of Kamsa. In addition, it gives the biography of Krishna in his childhood by adding the fourth canto which is not germane to the theme of the poem. The poem is based for its events solely on Bhagavata (X). Although the events are taken from Bhagavata, Rama Panivada shows originality and skill in narrating them with some dramatic effect. The incidents of the washerman and the hunch-backed saffron-maid, as portrayed by the poet, illustrate the truth of this statement. Sisupalavadha of Magha, one of the five famous mahakavyas in Sanskrit, was the model in front of our poet when he wrote Kamsavaho. There are close similarities between the two poems in regard to some situations, a number of ideas and turns of expression. Despite these similarities, Rama Panivada is not a slavish imitator. He follows Magha but has almost everywhere his touch of originality. He has a though mastery over vocabulary. His style is dignified and full of vigour. It inclines more towards elaboration rather than suggestion. Some of the scenes portrayed by the poet in the section of the bards' songs or in the description of Mathura are worthy of a good poet of considerable poetic-ability. They are decorated with figures of sound like 'anuprasa' and 'yamaka' and figures of sense like 'upama' 'utpreksa' 'rupaka' 'drastanta'. He gives quite a few happy 'arthantara nyasas' as well. He uses over twenty metres, 'Vamsastha' 'Vasantamalika' and 'Praharsini' being his most favourite. He uses Maharashtri Prakrit but shows some of the traits of Sauraseni as well.

Compared with his earlier work Usaniruddham his Kamsavaho is a work of his mature poetic genius.

KANADA-KANAKADASA

KANADA (Sanskrit), an ancient sage, is the earliest known authority on the Vaisheshika system of Indian philosophy. The word 'kanada' primarily means one who lives on small particle of food, vide Nyayakandali of Shridhara) which may have some implication on the basic tenets of the school that the universe is formed of the minutest units of matter called 'anu'. Kanada is also referred to by the synonyms of his name, e.g. Kanabhuj and Kanabhaksha, or by his clan (gotra) name Kashyapa. He is also known as Uluka which name literally means 'an owl'. Tradition explains this name with a legend that God Shiva Mahadeva appeared before the sage in the form of an owl and revealed to him the knowledge of philosophy. It is traditionally believed that Kanada lived and taught in Varanasi.

Kanada is credited with the authorship of the Vaisheshikasutra, the basic text of the system, but his time cannot be precisely ascertained. While the tradition believes him to have flourished in the 8th century B.C., the modern scholarship assigns the composition of the Sutra to the first century A.D. The basic tenets of the system were known to the early authors of the Charakasamhita—not only to its final redactor Charaka, but to its original author Agnivesha, who must have flourished several centuries prior to the Christian era. The Vaisheshika philosophy as propounded in the Sutra is presupposed by several schools of the Buddhist philosophy, particularly the Madhyamikas and the Vaibhashikas. The Pali work, Milindapanha which was written in the 1st century A.D., mentions Vaisheshika as an established branch of Indian learning.

The Vaisheshikasutra is divided into ten chapters (adhyayas) and the first seven of them are further divided into two sections (ahnikas) each. The basic theory of the Vaisheshika philosophy may be summarised as follows: all the entities are classified under six categories (padarthas), viz. i) 'dravya' (substance), ii) 'guna' (quality), iii) 'karma' (action or motion), iv) 'samanya' (genus or generality), v) 'vishesha' (individuality) and vi) 'samavaya' (inherence). True knowledge of these categories and their sub-categories along with their inter-relations and interactions constitutes 'Dharma' which, in turn, leads one to prosperity (abhyudaya) and emancipation (nihshreyasa).

The Vaisheshika philosophy is well-known for its theory of 'anu' (popularly translated as atom) which is the smallest conceivable unit of any substance. The system aims at explaining the formation of the material universe, accepting it as real and existent. This position of the school induces some scholars to think that the Vaisheshika is basically a materialist and atheist philosophy. The Vaisheshika does not discuss the concept of Creator God or Ultimate Reality (as Brahman) or the role of either in one's achieving emancipation. But like all other schools of Indian philosophy, except the Charvaka, Vaisheshika as found in the Sutra, fixes emancipation (what is, by definition, transcendental and hence beyond phenomenal world) as the goal of human life. It accepts the authority of the Vedas as the valid means of cognition and recognises 'Ishvara' as the source of the authority of the Vedas.

There are reasons to believe that the Sutra of Kanada has been redacted several times by different acharyas in subsequent centuries and there must have been more than one recension each of which has been commented upon. There have been several commentaries on the Sutra, quite a few of which no longer exist. Most important among the available commentaries is the Vaisheshikasutropaskara of Shankara Mishra I (15th cent.). An older and anonymous commentary (12th/13th cent.) has been discovered and edited by Anantalal Thakur (Darbhanga, 1957). Chandrananda's Vritti, another classical commentary which has been edited by Muni Jambuvijaya (Baroda, 1961) records an older recension of the Sutra. Chandrakanta Tarkalankara (19th cent.) wrote an erudite commentary (Calcutta, 1887).

The most outstanding and widely studied work of the school is the Padarthadharmanagrantha of Prashastapada. Though the work is popularly known as the Prasastapadabhashya, it is not a commentary on the Sutra, but an independent compendium of the tenets of the school. This work also has been commented upon by several savants in the field of Nyaya-Vaisheshika, such as Vyomashiva, Udayanacharya, Sridhara, Padmanabha Mishra and Jagadisha Tarkalankara.

KANAKADASA (Kannada: b. 1509, d. 1607), a noted Kannada bhakti poet among the Haridasas of Karnataka is as popular as Purandaradasa. Both of them were contemporaries and they were the disciples of Vyasaraya. On this evidence, Kanakadasa is said to have lived in the 16th century.

Kanakadasa was a non-brahmin by birth. The scholars are divided in their opinion about the exact caste of Kanakadasa. A few are of the opinion that he was Kuruba and a few others believe that he was Beda or Nayaka. His father was a chieftain and was in charge of a village known as Bada situated in Dharwar district. It is said that he begot a son by the grace of Lord Venkateshwara and he named him Timmappa, who is no other than Kanakadasa. After the death of his father, Timmappa became the chieftain. He was well-trained in warfare and he had also won a number of battles. Now and then, Lord Venkateshwara appeared in his dreams and advised him not to waste his precious life in mundane things. Timmappa did not heed these words. He had implicit confidence in his physical strength. It so happened, he was overpowered by his enemies in one of the battles. He fell unconscious in the battle field. All his followers deserted him. When he regained his consciousness, to his great surprise he saw Lord Venkateshwara consoling him sitting by his side. The unexpected incident, narrated by himself in one of his songs, changed the whole course of his life. He gave up all his riches and submitted himself to the service of God. In the meanwhile, he discovered a great treasure which was hidden in the earth. He utilised the whole amount to construct a temple at Kaginele, a little away from Bada. Lord Kesava was installed in the temple. Timmappa Naik, the noted soldier, who became a great devotee of God, in the first instance became well-known as Kanakappa on account of his pious deeds. His regard for Ramanujacharya and Tatacharya, presupposes that he was brought up in a particular section of Bedas or Nayakas who are said to follow certain principles of Sriashnavism, which was liberal in religious outlook. Even to this day, it is learnt that this section of Nayakas pay homage to the representative of Vaishnavism, whenever he visits them and gets 'Chakrankitam' by him. If this argument can be put forward to justify the regard shown by Kanakadasa to Vaishnava leaders, both in his songs and in his work, Mohanatarangini, it is obvious that he was wedded to Prapatti of Vaishnavism before he was influenced by Vyasa Raya, who had started Dasa Kuta to spread the message of Sri Madhvacharya. Those scholars who consider him to belong to Kuruba community point out in support of their voice to his well-known songs in praise of Biredevaru and calling himself a shepherd. These differences of opinions may be reconciled provided that the term shepherd is considered as a simile used only by Kanakadasa. Until we get more solid evidence, it is advisable not to harp on this point too much, since Kanakadasa himself has proclaimed in one of his popular songs that caste and creed do not count in estimating the greatness of a person. One thing seems to be true that Kanakadasa had attained a certain amount of maturity in his devotion when he approached Vyasaraya. This is established by Vyasaraya when his pupils raise objections against the undue preference shown to Kanakadasa by his master. Anyhow, ever since Kanakappa joined the Dasa Kuta, he became popular as Kanakadasa. As he is mainly responsible for the construction of a temple at Kaginele and for the installation of Adikeshava, it is befitting, indeed, that he had 'Kaginele Adikeshava' as his 'ankita' and sparingly he used 'Badadadikeshava' which may be his birth place.

Though Kanakadasa's compositions are small in number when compared to those of Purandaradasa, they are very highly commendable from the poetic point of view as well as from the spiritual. He seems to have been much humiliated on account of his low birth. Evidently, his words are poignant whenever he speaks about caste. He cannot tolerate the pretensions in the sphere of devotion. He does not spare anybody while condemning those who indulge in such pretensions. Almost all the religious creeds and their shallowness have been exposed by him. Among the Haridasas, none can compete with Kanakadasa in attacking some superstitious beliefs and meaningless customs. He advises the masses to adhere to truth righteously. He is capable of reinterpreting the puranic and mythological stories. He is bold enough to interpret the whole war of Mahabharata as nothing but a puppet-show conducted by Krishna for his fun. Similarly, he ridicules those who complain that Pandavas are responsible for the downfall of Kauravas. According to him, the so called elders and the well-known heroes belonging to Kaurava army are responsible for their ruin. Such is the spirit of Kanakadasa's faith. But his faith in God is unshakable. He declares openly that one need not lose his confidence in God, who is bent upon protecting all objects, animate or inanimate. He refers particularly to the trees and frogs which solely depend upon the grace of God. He sums up that each and every being works for the sake of a morsel of bread and a piece of cloth. He applies this dictum to one and all without discriminating between high or low in society.

He has written a number of songs which are like riddles called 'mundiges'. Many of these have not been solved till today. Kanakadasa's style is individualistic. It is generally crisp and poignant.

Kanakadasa's contribution to Kannada poetry is equally vast and valuable. Haribhaktisara is a devotional poem written in Bhamini satpadi consisting of nearly 100 stanzas. It aims at devotion to Hari. It has, thus, all the qualities of shataka. These stanzas are very popular both among children and the elders. Nalacharitre narrates the well-known story of Nala and Damayanti in an appealing manner. It is also written in Bhamini satpadi and Kanakadasa has handled the whole story so well that it is understood by all. He is a good narrator. His expressions are apt to convey his ideas. There are nine chapters and the unity of the whole story does not suffer in any way. Though there are a few works about the same subject in Kannada, his work is unsurpassed even to this day. Mohana tarangani is another work written in Sangatya metre running into 42 cantos. It deals with the burning of Manmatha to ashes, his rebirth as Pradyumna, the death of Shambarasura in the first half and the victory of Pradyumna over Banasura in the latter part. The love episode of Usha, daughter of Banasura, and Aniruddha, son of Pradyumna, is depicted most effectively. Kanakadasa has utilised the opportunity to exhibit his poetic skill throughout the work. One can find in it all the traditional characteristics prescribed for a work of this kind. The different episodes and events whether about war or love are graphically described by the poet. The scholars have tried to show how Kanakadasa has attempted to reflect in his work the contemporary life that prevailed during the days of Krishnadeva Raya. They even go to the extent of equating Krishna's character with that of king Krishnadeva Raya. This supposition is not convincing because Kanakadasa was not a court poet. Moreover, Krishna plays a predominant role in the latter portion of the work. On considering the whole subject, it is interesting to observe that the supremacy of Krishna, i.e. Vishnu, is accepted by Shiva himself since he advises his devotee Banasura to have a truce with Pradyumna by offering his daughter to Aniruddha, the son of Pradyumna. The happy wedding of Shaivism with Vaishnavism is a novel thought befitting the revolutionary outlook of Kanakadasa. Thus, Mohana tarangini is considered as an important work written in Sangatya. Kanakadasa's Ramadhanya charite is a rare piece in Kannada. It is written in Bhamini shatpadi containing 58 stanzas. The poet has adopted a folk-tale in this poem. It is about the utility of ragi and rice. Rama is the judge to decide this factor. He comes to know the quarrel between ragi and rice each claiming superiority over the other. Rama puts both the food grains in a closed cell for sometime. When they were taken out after the stipulated period, it was found that ragi retained its stamina and rice had lost all its strength. The whole story is allegorical. It is easy to infer that ragi stands for the poor and rice represents the rich. When there is a clash between the poor and the rich, Kanakadasa is of the opinion that the ultimate victory goes to the poor. As Kanakadasa was a non-brahmin, he had the advantage of coming in close contact with the poor class. True to his genius, he has been successful in projecting his view. Rama also is said to have been impressed by the inherent strength of ragi, and by virtue of its quality he named it as 'Raghava dhanya' (corn of Raghava, i.e. Rama) by which the work 'ragi' is said to have been derived. Though the linguists may not agree with this derivation, the concept of the folk story is illuminating and interesting. Kanakadasa's one other work known as 'Narasimhastava' has not yet come to light. Some scholars believe that the most popular short narrative poem known as Tirukana kanasu (Beggars' dream) has been written by Kanakadasa. A few are of the opinion that its author is Muppina Shadaksari. Due to the paucity of manuscripts, its authorship is yet undecided.

A glance at the several works of Kanakadasa confirms that he was not only a staunch Haridasa, but also a popular poet.

KANAKAMBA, KANCHANAPALLI (Telugu) is well known throughout Andhra Pradesh as a learned woman. She is a triple confluence of scholarship, poetry and devotion. Even from her early childhood she showed her intellectual insight in so many ways. For sometime she was a teacher in Nellore. Later she continued her English education at the Brahmana Vitantu Sharnalayam in Madras. Ramanujacharyulu, Nrishimhacharulu and Mrs. Drindale were her tutors in Telugu, Sanskrit and English respectively. She became learned in these three languages. Amritanandaswamy was her preceptor in the path of devotion.

After taking her 'Vidwan' degree, Kanakamba worked as a Telugu teacher at Lady Willingdon High School Madras. Later she served as a Lecturer in Telugu at Queen Mary's College, Madras. By her lectures, she roused interest in literature in many a young woman.

Even as an adolescent, she composed Telugu poetry. Many of her publications came out of her Kavitalaka granthamala. Her poetic talents received the admiration of the learned. She wrote a number of books, including Radha, Gautama Buddha charitramu, Sri jivayatra, Ham-sa vijayamu, Ramayana kathasangrahamu, Tomalaiya, Chakkani kathalu (a collection of stories), etc. She contributed many articles to journals like Hindu Sundari, Savitri Zanana, Deshabhimani, Andhra patrika, Grihalakshmi, etc. Her book Sri jivayatrar earned her much name and fame.

Kanakamba's poetical style is elegant and faultless. The great poet, Challapilla Venkata Sastry, once wrote about the majesty of Kanakamba's charming poetic personality in glowing terms.

Kanakamba was responsible for starting an institution by name Shri Tirumala Srinivasa Trilinga Maha Vidya-Peeth. Under the auspices of this institution, she invited many the poets and scholars and duly honoured them. Admirers from different regions of Andhra Pradesh invited her and honoured her. 'Kavitalaka' and 'Kavita Visharada' are the titles conferred on her. She spent much of her time in meetings and discourses, in diligent, philosophic and literary pursuits. She used to broadcast radio talks. She worked tirelessly for the emancipation of women. She is a memorable personality in modern Telugu literature.

KANALVARI (Tamil) is made up of two words 'kanal' and 'vari', the former inter alia meaning seashore and grove or forest on the seashore, and the latter connoting a kind of musical composition, pertaining to dance. Kanal-vari are love songs of fishermen sung in coastal regions, resorted to by others also frequenting seashore groves. Kanal was the 'neytal' of the ancient Tamils, namely seashore and its environs. One of the Cantos of Silappadikaram, the second century Tamil epic, carries the title of Kanalvari.

Happily married were Kovalan and Kannaki, son and daughter respectively of two merchant princes of Pukar. As ill luck would have it, Kovalan is attracted by the courtesan Matavi, a danseuse of repute, he lavishes his wealth and love on her, forgetting his wedded wife. They enjoy the spice of life, but the course of love hardly runs smooth. While Kannaki was languishing at home devoid of jewellery save her own beauty, Matavi and Kovalan joined the many hundreds of revellers on the foreshore of the beach in Pukar, during the festival in honour of the celestial god Indra. They had their loving quarrels and reconciliations and Matavi treated Kovalan to a feast of dances from her repertoire. As a climax to the celebration of the festivities, they did not wish to miss the opportunity of singing Kanalvari, appropriate to the location and occasion. The accompaniment was 'yal' the lute. Matavi made her obeisance to the yal while receiving it from her maid when she stopped there in the company of Kovalan for revelry and enjoyment. The yal looked a handsome bride with dark eyes made darker with collyrium. She gave the yal to Kovalan after conditioning it and said "It is not for me to command. I await your lead".

Then Kovalan began singing sea-shore love-songs, or Kanalvari, the opening three pieces depicting the Kaveri as a lady of chastity par excellence. The Chola king and his sceptre, just and straight, are praised keeping to tradition. This type of songs is known as Arruvari, coming under the category Mukamutaivari, opening songs that exhibit the first indication of the face. The theme of Kovalan's succeeding three lyrics relates to Pukar, the capital port town of the monarch.

We know him not, sire,
Whether lover or stranger,
Who came behind us
Our town is Pukar,
Where the bee oscillates
Between the lady's eye above
And the blue lotus below
Not able to determine Which is which .

Kovalan goes on thereafter to the tune of the lute to the third set of three songs on the other parts of the body of the beloved except the face. On the sandy seashore fishes are dried and birds chased away by the maiden. But, indeed, in the lover's estimation, she looks a celestial being holding a flower in her hand. The lover sees the beloved and exclaims:

Hail! See the noon therein'
That is the face on which
The fish, the bow, the dark clouds,
And the act of Cupid
Are writ large and writ complete
Is that the moon from the heaven
Sojourning in the seamen's hamlet
Afraid of the snake in the sky?

The above is one of the three lyrics classified as Nilai-vari. In the next three pieces of Murivari, Kovalan exclaims his exuberance of joy of the physical features of the ladylove, such as her hip, eyes as of death, young, beautiful breasts and full moon-face tormenting him. The concluding seven lyrics pertain to Tinainilaivari. The beloved's gait dashes to pieces his heart.

The seashore songs of Kovalan have been couched in the nature of clandestine love.

Now came the turn of Matavi who was touched to the quick, assuming that Kovalan had some other mistress in mind. Though not inclined otherwise inwardly, she began her love songs as counter offensive to the sentiments contained in Kovalan's. Matavi's opening songs were also on the Kaveri and her lord, the Chola monarch. A comparison of the love songs of Kovalan and Matavi reveal their masculine majesty and feminine delicacy respectively. If Kovalan's imaginary maid could expatiate on her mistress's charm, so could Matavi's companion trumpet the infidelity of Kovalan.

Is she taunting him or is this a sinister sentiment attributed to him, one cannot say. Matavi is thrown off her feet with the approach of the evening and her state of single blessedness in the absence of her lover. The six lyrics that followed the earlier six are in Mayankutinainilaivari, three of which are put in the mouth of her maid. The ladylove is restless as darkness spreads with the setting of the sun. Overpowered by passion, she addresses the bird not to retire in her grove for the night, but appraise the lover of her affliction. She then changes the tune from one of love to one craving mercy. Obsessed that Matavi had somebody else in her mind, Kovalan withdrew his clasping hand abruptly and left her.

As between themselves, Kovalan and Matavi sang, according to the commentator, nine varieties of 'Vari' songs, the common factors being four and the exclusive ones, three each of Kovalan and Matavi. Three of the Cantos in the Silappadikaram carry the titles: 'Kanalvari', seashore songs; 'Urchulvari', songs soaked in grief while going round the town; and 'Velluvavari', hunters' songs. It can be deduced that vari songs pertain not only to music and dance of the sophisticated, but would also cover within its ambit folklore of the common people.

The commentaries on the Silappadikaram, coming several centuries after the work, provide valuable information on Vari songs. Such songs may either be in praise of the gods or of men, and are of three kinds of the latter category, 'Mukamutaivari', opening songs indicative of the face, 'Mukamilvari', songs dealing with parts other than the face and 'Pataippuvari', creative songs. Different kinds of Vari songs including Kanalvari sung in seashore groves by lovers bear the nomenclature Kanalvari. The venue is 'neytal' (seashore) and its environs, the corresponding time, flora and fauna, setting sun, seashell and fish, conch and the like, find mention in Kanalvari. Treatment of love, as in Sangam poetry, is echoed in abundance in the Kanalvari songs in the Silappadikaram.

KANARA BAMDHAD (Kokani) is a historical novel in eight volumes, written by V.J.P. Saldanha, the eminent Konkani novelist who writes in Kannada script. The first volume Devache kurpen (By the grace of God, 1961), portrays the political situation, social conditions and cultural life of Kanara Christians. The hero of the novel is Sardar Simaon. His arch enemy, the villain of the story, is Sardar Anton. Both were generals in the army of Tipu Sultan, the ruler of Mysore (1784-1799). The story revolves around the rivalry of these two characters who challenge each other to marry Agnes Cecilia, the heroine of the novel. The second volume, Balthangadicho Balthazar (Balthazar of Balthangady), depicts the adventures of Sardar Simaon in Seringapatam, the capital of Tipu's kingdom. The third volume, Sardaranchi singol (Sign of Sardars, 1966), describes the actual captivity, sufferings and heroism of Kanara Christians during their persecution at the hands of Tipu. In the fourth volume, Infernachim daram (Gates of hell, 1970), the suffering of the captives at Seringapatam are described in detail. The fifth volume, Sardaranchem sannidan (In the presence of Sardars, 1972) has two parts. The theme is Simaon's exploits in warfare and the adventures of the Kanara Christians in Tipu's army. Bandhanant balidan (Sacrifice in the captivity, 1973), the sixth volume, and Sovo surngarun (Decorating the couple, 1974), the seventh volume, elaborate the original subject of captivity with more details and anecdotes. The final volume in the series in Mogachi mahima (Glory of love, 1975). It develops the original episode of romance of Sardar Simaon and Agnes and discusses the events of the liberation from the captivity and marriage of the hero with the heroine. The story is set in Goa from where the ancestors of Kanara Christians migrated to the coastal Karnataka. The series is regarded as a masterpiece in Konkani literature. The texts were originally serialised in Poinari Rakhnno, Kanik (Weeklies) and Amchi Mai (Monthly).

KANAVI, CHENNAVEERA SAKREPPA (Kannada; b. 1928) is a poet, who is at present Director of Prasaraanga, Karnataka University, Dharwar. He had his schooling and collegiate education at Dharwar up to M.A. Even in college, he distinguished himself as a poet and scholar. He joined the Karnataka University as Secretary of Prasaraanga and was elevated to the position of its Director in 1956 which post he has held with distinction. He began his literary career with Kavyakshi, a collection of poems, in 1949. He was then just twenty-one and doing his B.A. The poems showed great promise though under deep impact of Bendre and K.V. Puttappa. They are in regular stanzaic patterns typical of the romantic verse then prevalent. A more ambitious long lyric, named Bhavajeevi (1949), which is marked by deep autobiographical, confessional element, already authenticated his poetic status. Stray lyrics collected in the next three books, Akashabutti (1953), Madhuchandra (1954) and Deepadhari (1956) continue the early Bendre-like versification and strong descriptive inclination. But two new elements enter—the theme of marital bliss and a controlled streak of progressive, leftist bias. He had come in touch with progressives like Kattimani, Niranjan and a young Communist named Shiveshwar Dodamani who was a poet and collector of folk-songs. However, Kanavi's slight leanings never crystallised into a regular party ticket or open public 'progressive' loyalties. He retained quasi-religious sympathy for the poor and the down-trodden out of which he drew inspiration for his fine poetry. By 1960, when 'new verse' was already ten years old, he developed an attachment to this recent genre. However, cut away from its centre of gravity (which was Bangalore), he tended to take new verse as a mode of progressive verse. His next two books, Mannina merevanige (1960) and Nela mugilu (1965), show a synoptic tendency to combine the better elements of both movements. In these collections, 'nela' (earth), for instance, becomes a symbol of search for roots as well as agrarian work ethics. The problem was resolved when he joined the Samanwaya movement started by V.K. Gokak in 1968. He became aware that new verse was already a spent force. The next three collections, Eradu dada (1969), Nagaradall neralu (1974) and Chirantana daha (1975) bear stamps of disillusionment with literary movements and cynical witticism at the expense of political public figures. The last-named book is a fine expression of the final tragedy of man's disillusionment with his own being, his frittering away, his lack of commitment. It contains some very poignant lyrics. Beside being a poet, Kanavi is a fine scholar too. Three collections of essays, Sahitya chintana (1966), Kavyanusandhana (1971) and Samahit (1977) contain fine critical essays on Vachanakaras, fellow poets and others. He has edited festschrifts and collaborated with K. Raghavendra Rao in translating Kannada poetry into English under the title Modern Kannada Poetry (1970). Karnatak Vidyavardhaka Sangh celebrated his fiftieth birthday. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award for Jeeva dhvani in 1981.

KANCHANAI (Tamil), initially titled Kanchanaiyin kanavu, was an early novel from the pen of Lakshmi, who received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1984 on her recent work Oru kaveriyai pola. The writer was in her youth and was yet to acquire the experience and mellowed maturity which mark her recent work; the novel Kancha- nai manifests some exuberance of youth together with the marks of an early work.

The story concerns the fortunes of a poor girl who has lost both her parents and is brought up by her grandfather, who had retired from the position of accounts clerk in a zamindar's establishment, at the commencement of the story. Her elder brother Sabhesan who has been educated with the greatest financial strain, becomes a doctor. The old man lives only to fulfil his cherished desire to get his grand-daughter Kanchanai married to a proper young man.

The young zamindar under whose father the old man worked, accidentally meets Kanchanai, falls in love with her and despite opposition from his mother, marries her. This is a sensational social leap upward for her, and for a while she enjoys the amenities of her new position.

But she soon realises that her husband has a roving eye and that he is deeply involved in an extra-marital relationship with a highly endowed girl called Bhanumati; the daughter of a prostitute. The young Lothario spends a lot of his wealth on Bhanumati and exhausts his family assets for buying costly presents for her and through thoughtless investments.

A child is born and relations improve temporarily between Kanchanai and her husband. But the arrival of Dr. Sita, a relation of his, produces further tensions, and Kanchanai leaves the house, unnoticed. She is given asylum in an 'ashram' given to social service and through it she arrives at Sita's house, full of rancour. Sita was earlier in love with her brother Sabhesan, but Kanchanai in her outraged frame of mind, had written a letter to her brother strongly condemning Sita as an unscrupulous flirt as a result of which the lovers had got estranged.

Though their meeting starts in a stormy fashion, they realise each other's worth, and in no time they become fast friends. A cholera epidemic breaks out in the village where Sabhesan had chosen to work; this brings Sita and Kanchanai to the village and Sita brings the badly infected Sabhesan back to life. Their love is restored and their wedding is announced.

In the meantime, the Zamindar misses his wife, and on the urging of his mother, they attend Sita's wedding: where he expresses his contrition to Kanchanai and they are reunited.

The novel is quick-paced and easy to read; there are a number of incidents packed in and the reader's interest is sustained throughout. In fact these characteristics can be discerned in all the novels of Lakshmi and they constitute her chief title to fame.

The initial title 'Kanchanaiyin kanavu' does not seem very appropriate as no dream of significance has been described in connection with Kanchanai. The style is not particularly felicitous and the dialogue is not always appropriate to the character. These defects have been largely overcome in her later novels.

KANCHIKAVERI (Oriya), medieval Oriya narrative poem by Purusottama Das (1550-1600), has the singular distinction of being the first historical romance in verse, the first kavya that depicts Lord Jagannath as a literary character, and the first war poem, all rolled into one, combining in its fold history, romance, myth and legend neatly executed against the background of the poet's pious devotion to Jagannath and his partiotic fervour. Written in the usual puranic style with *ā*diction—simple, unsophisticated and catching—the Kanchikaveri contains 911 two-lined verses, but is not divided into cantos and has only one metre all through. It was first mentioned in 1822 as an epic poem by Andrew Sterling and later in 1879, Rangalal Banerjee rendered the poem into Bengali with literal translation of certain portions here and there. The first Oriya edition was published in 1906 by Gobinda Rath.

Kanchikaveri is based on the brief Madala Panji (chronicle of Jagannath Temple) account of the reign of Gajapati Purushottama Deua (1467-1497). His marriage was to be solemnized with Padmavati, princess of Kanchi. But when the king of Kanchi visited Puri to witness the 'ratha' festival and found Purushottama Deua performing the customary rite of Cherapahamra (sprinkling scented water and sweeping the road in front of the great rathas) with a golden broom, the visiting king characterized the latter as a chandala (scavenger) and so, the marriage proposal fell through. Purusottama was pained at this double insult to him and to his Lord, who knew his devotee's feelings and directed him through the chief priest to invade Kanchi. As the army proceeded, a cowherd woman, Manika, approached the king with a diamond ring, reportedly left with her by two of the king's horsemen, one riding a black steed and the other a white one, as a token to be produced before him for the price of curd supplied by her. To the great astonishment of all it was found to be the signet ring of Lord Jagannath. There was no doubt that the Lord Himself riding the black steed and His brother Balabhadra the white one were leading the army. The Kanchi forces were routed; their king was slain; even Gananath, the Kanchi god, had an ignoble defeat in his battle with the divine horsemen, and eventually formed part of the king's war-booty which included the beautiful princess Padmavati as well. But Purusottama Deua would not marry her, and ordered his minister to get her settled in the house of a real chandala (scavenger). The minister, however, knew his master's heart. As the next ratha festival came, and as the king was performing Charapahamra, he very cleverly styled the king, who then was working as Jagannath's chandala, to be the greatest of all chandalas, and offered to him the hand of the sorrowing princess. The king bowed to the will and appeal of the millions assembled and accepted the dear offer.

Kanchikaveri has a distinct merit in being named after a kingdom, Kanchi, and a river, Kaveri, contrary to the poetic traditions in Sanskrit as well as Oriya. It symbolically signified the poet's devotional concept of the pervading Jagannath spirit extending up to the sacred Kaveri, the southernmost limits of the Gajapati kingdom, a fact which is borne out by the dominance, in the Kavya, of Jagannath, the Divine Arbiter as well as wonderful horseman to such an extent that Purushottama Deua has been relegated to the subsidiary position of His agent only; Jagannath becomes the hero of the kavya. The immortal picture of Manika, the youthful cowherd woman of the Orissan village, and of the witty horseman are unique examples of skilful characterization. The war materials listed and the lively descriptions of the expedition and the war record, for all times, a historical picture of warfare contemporaneous to the poet and finally the poet's subtle description of the sad plight of the Kanchi god, Ganesh, rolling in the dust, when his carrier, the rat, took to heels in fright at the sight of Jagannath's steed, appearing at His instance, in the guise of a cat, in an example of pariotic satire providing humour and laughter to the otherwise serious war scene.

The tale of the Kanchikaveri was not only popular in Bengal through the translation of Rangalal Banerjee, but it had also attained the status of a folk tradition in the eastern region; for, in Assam, too, the story finds place in the Assam Burunji.

KANDALI, ANANTA (Assamese) was a sixteenth century Assamese poet and scholar born at Hajo near Gauhati. His family name was Haricharan. He came to be known as Chandra Bharati for his proficiency in Sanskrit grammar, as Ananta Kandali for his scholarship in Nyaya shastra or logic, and as Bhagavatacharya or Bhagavata-Bhattacharya for his masterly exposition of the Bhagavata-purana. His father, Ratna Pathaka, was also an accomplished scholar in the Bhagavata-purana.

That he used to live on a small hillock in north Gauhati is evident from a stone inscription which reads:

Shite tarani-tapena grishme Lauhityavayuna/sukhadokhila lokanam mandapah chandra bharateh

(This is the bower of Chandra Bharati that comforts people with the rays of the sun in winter and with the cold wind of the Lauhitya in summer).

Shankaradeva (1449-1569), in collaboration with some of his followers, rendered the Bhagavata-purana into Assamese verse. Ananta Kandali also collaborated with him and translated the middle and the last part of its tenth book.

His Vritrasuravadha is a retelling of the story of the killing of the demon Vritra by Indra. The story is taken from the last part of the sixth book of the Bhagavat-purana.

The work for which Ananta Kandali is better known and in which his fame as a poet of high order rests is Kumaraharana, the abduction of the prince Aniruddha. The episode leads to the marriage of Usha, the daughter of Bana and Aniruddha, the grandson of Krishna and the fight between Hari and Hara. The theme is taken from the Harivamsha which is developed with some side episodes taken from the Puranas.

Ananta Kandali had keen insight into the human mind and integrated his experience into the poetic convention of his time. Thus, he depicts in his characteristic manner the pining of Usha for the youth whose company she had enjoyed in a dream. She was almost at the tenth stage of separation (viraha) when her friend Chitrlekha came to her rescue and brought about her secret union with Aniruddha. The initial surprise of Aniruddha on seeing the charming Chitrlekha, his libidinous advances to her, her promise and words of consolation and ultimately the journey of the two from Dwaraka to Shonitapura—all these have become lively by his masterly treatment.

Ananta Kandali rendered Valmiki's Ramayana into Assamese verse after about one hundred fifty years of the first rendering of the same by his worthy predecessor Madhava Kandali. It is significant that Ananta Kandali rendered only five kandas—the Bala and Uttara kandas, being left out.

The explanation offered by Ananta Kandali as to what prompted him to undertake the rendering of the Ramayana while Madhava Kandali's version was in circulation, is noteworthy. He says: "Madhava Kandali composed the Ramayana in verse. Listening to this I do not find solace in my heart, because only the commonplace saintly qualities of Rama have been brought out. The idea that He is God himself and is to be worshipped, has not been fully expressed. Hence, my attempt is to make verses on the devotional line." This shows his shift of emphasis.

FURTHER WORKS Madhva and shesha dashama (the middle and the last part of the tenth book of the Bhagavata); Bhaktisadhana (The definition of devotion), Mahiravanavadha (The killing of Mahiravana), Brihat syamantaharana (Elaborate narration of the stealing of the gem, named syamanta); Janmarahasya (The mystery of birth)

B.S.

KANDALI, MADHAVA (Assamese) is the fourteenth century Assamese poet and scholar, also known as

KANDALI, RUCHINATH

Kaviraja Kandali (Kandali meaning the king of the poets). Nothing is known about his parentage, date and the place of birth. He received royal patronage in his literary pursuit from the king Mahamanikya of the Varaha dynasty, under whose command he rendered Valmiki's Ramayana into Assamese verse. Maha Manikya and his predecessor might have ruled over a small kingdom situated in the modern Nowgong district of Assam. Madhava Kandali has been eulogised as the 'unerring poet predecessor' by Shankaradeva (1449-1569) the great Vaishnava saint-poet of Assam. The gap of time between the two is not less than one hundred years, and, hence he might have lived and worked in the mid-fourteenth century.

The surname Kandali indicates his scholarship in general and proficiency in the Nyayasastra in particular, and this surname is still in vogue in that part of Assam. He asserts that he can write well in Sanskrit verse. However, for the benefit of all people including women, he composed the Ramakatha in Assamese verse. He is credited with the authorship of another work named Devajit (the conquest of the gods) composed in verse. In this work, the victory of Arjuna over Indra by the grace of lord Krishna in a fierce battle, has been described.

Madhava Kandali's Assamese version of the Ramayana is one of the earliest regular renderings of the adikavya into the regional languages. Madhava Kandali's version of the Ramayana, as has been handed down, contains only five kandas. His work begins with the re-entrance of Rama into the city of Ayodhya with Sita from Mithila and ends with the ordeal of Sita and the coronation of Rama at Ayodhya. It appears that the poet has not included the Balakanda and the Uttarakanda in his scheme. The rendering is faithful but at places it is abridged making the long description short. He has not added more than one or two episodes from the Puranas and the Upapuranas and popular folk-tales to the story. Of course, at places, he has added descriptions of scenic beauty, local manners and customs, fairs and festivals.

Madhava Kandali might have followed the eastern version of the Ramayana. In his depiction, Rama stands as an ideal man, while Sita represents the ideal woman. They are not deified.

Kandali is the brightest of the early Assamese poets and is followed by a host of successors. He gave a definite shape to the system of the rhyming and metre, verbal and noun forms. In addition to the usual 'pada' or 'payara chhanda,' he used 'dulari', tripadi' and 'chabi' which display his mastery of metre and skill in handling rhymes. All these are long metres with more than 16 syllables in a foot, but befitting the description, he also used short metres like jhumuri. He did not confine himself to the poetic convention in describing physical beauty and using similes, but drew upon the contemporary society and everyday life.

While his style is beautiful and forceful his poetic diction is masterly and the description charming. The vocabulary, metres, similes and idiomatic expressions used by him served as a great storehouse for his successors.

With his extensive studies in the Sanskrit literature and philosophy, which is abundantly evident in his works, and with a fine poetic sensibility he was able to tell the immortal Ramayana story to his countrymen in their own idiom.

B.S.

KANDALI, RUCHINATH (Assamese). There were as many as four verse-renderings of the Markandeya Chandi in medieval Assamese literature. The earliest one composed in the sixteenth century is the work of Pitambara Dwija (Kavi), a contemporary poet of Shankaradeva. He composed this at the request of Maharaja Shukladhvaja of the Koch dynasty. The next important translator of the Chandi in verse is Ruchinath Kandali, who flourished during the reign of king Rajeshwara Sinha (1751-1760) of the Ahom dynasty. Ruchinath in the introduction states that his grandfather Ratna Kandali lived in Narayanpur in the present Lakhimpur district on the north bank of the Brahmaputra, but his father, Krishnanath Acharya, was invited to settle in the newly established capital, Rangpur (modern Sibsagar town), by king Rudra Sinha (1696-1714). Accordingly, the family migrated to the capital where it received a liberal land grant from the king. Ruchinath approximately lived between 1710-1770. Before he undertook the work of translating the Chandi he had rendered the entire Kalki-purana into Assamese verse. So, he was a mature poet when he translated the Chandi episode of the Markandeya-purana. He, however, did not follow the original faithfully. He rather reinforced the episode by supplying the lacuna noticed in the Sanskrit version. He candidly admits in the work that he took the help of the Kalika-purana, the Vamana-purana and the Brahmavaivarta-purana to make up the deficiencies in respect of the Chandi-akhyana as narrated in the Markandeya-purana. From the Kalika-purana the poet adopted the episode of Dakha-yajna, the birth of Durga and emergence of Bhadrakali, Ugrachandi and interfused them with similar narratives described in the Prakritikhandas of the Brahmavaivarta purana and with the incidents of Sumbha-Nisumbha episode from the Vamana-purana. Most of the verses of the original sources were rendered into smooth Assamese verse briefly or elaborately according to the needs of the kavya. Ruchinath was probably one of the court poets of Rajeshwara Sinha. His translation of the Kalki-purana has not yet been found; he completed the Chandi in 1769, the year in which Rajeshwara Sinha died.

KANDALI, SHRIDHAR-KANDAPURANAM

KANDALI, SHRIDHAR (Assamese; 16th century) was a poet of the Vaishnava period. Exact dates of his birth and death are unknown and no information about his education is available. He has two books to his credit. Kankhowa (the ear-eater) and Ghunucha Jatra. Another work, Ashvamedha parva is also attributed to him by some scholars.

Kankhowa is a collection of two long poems each of which depicts a beautiful domestic scene of motherly love and filial affection between Jashoda and Krishna with lively dialogues of the two. The second verse-work is based, according to the poet himself, on the Jagannatha purana, which might be a Upapurana available to the poet in his time. It is centred round the theme of goddess Lakshmi's envy of Ghunucha, another wife of Krishna. Like the two goddesses depicted in their human weaknesses, Lord Krishna is also depicted here in his human traits facing a world of domestic problems. The character of Lakshmi, possessive and domineering, is a foil here to Ghunucha, who is meek, mild and submissive.

As a poet of the Vaishnava School, Shridhar Kandali helped in the spread of Vaishnava religion through these two poems, as Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva of whom he was either a contemporary or an immediate successor, did through their writings. Indeed in some respects, Shridhar Kandali betrays Shankaradeva's influence on him. For example, the mother-child relationship and the way of building up the theme through conversation in Kankhowa resemble those of the poem Dadhimathan by Shankaradeva while the characterisation in Ghunucha Jatra resembles that of Parijataharana, a play by Shankaradeva again. In spite of this, these two books in their portrayal of divine characters as human beings and in the creation of very familiar domestic scenes with profuse use of local colour bear the stamp of Shridhar Kandali talent. But Kandali does something more than this in these poems. His divine characters of Krishna, Jashoda, Lakshmi and Ghunucha which are brought down to the ordinary level with the master stroke of his artistic skill are raised at the same time to the universal level of mother-child and husband-wife relationships.

KANDAPURANAM (Tamil) is one of the major Tamil Puranams. It possesses all the elements requisite for a great epic.

The available editions at present are (1) Arumuka Navalar's edition of 1891, (2) the edition of Shaiva Siddhanta Mahasamajam of 1934 and (3) the edition of the Kashi Matt of 1952.

It was written by Kacchiyappa Shivachariyar, a Shaivaite. He was the son of Kalattiyappa Shivachariyar, who was a priest in the temple of Lord Murugan at Kanchipuram. Kacchiyappa Shivachariyar attained proficiency in various literatures and Shaiva religious philosophy. The Kandapuranam written by him, is the adaptation of 'Sankara sangitai', one of the six parts of Sanskrit Skandapurana.

There are divergent views about the age of the work, ranging from 9th century to 14th century. Taking into consideration several literary evidences, the age of Kandapuranam may be assigned to the period between the later half of the 12th century and 14th century.

Kandapuranam consists of six 'kandams' (chapters) having 10,346 'viruttam' verses in total. The six kandams are (1) Urpattikkandam, (2) Asura Kandam, (3) Mahendra Kandam, (4) Porpari Kandam, (5) Deva Kandam and (6) Dakka Kandam.

The birth of Lord Murugan, His divine sports, His heroism, His benevolence, are vividly described in the work. Although the kandams are found in the order mentioned above, the great story begins in Dakka Kandam.

As a result of his severe penance, Dakkan, the son of Brahma, obtained immense power and wealth through the boons of Lord Shiva. In course of time his power and wealth made him egoistic and he disregarded even Lord Shiva. In the two 'yagas', one performed by Brahma and the other by himself, Dakkan insulted Lord Shiva by not giving offerings to him. Brahma and Dakkan were punished for their insult to Shiva by Nanditevar and Virapattirar respectively, and the 'Devas', who participated in the 'yagas', were cursed to the effect that they would be subjected to sufferings by Surapatuman.

The Asura Kandam narrates the birth of Surapatuman, his brothers and sister and the sufferings inflicted by him to Devas. His parents were Kachipan and Mayai. After doing severe penance for a number of years, Surapatuman obtained boons from Lord Shiva for his life for 108 yugas and to reign over 1008 universes (antankal). He made invasions in all directions and subjugated Tirumal, Brahma, Indran and other Devas. Surapatuman married Patumakomalai and had Banukopan and several other sons by her. In the middle of eastern sea he created a city called Viramakendram and from there he ruled his entire domain. He coveted to have Indran's wife Indrani. Indran escaped with his wife from heaven, came down on the earth and lived at a place Sikali. By the order of Surapatuman, Indran's son Jayantan and other Devas were brought to Mahendrapuri and were imprisoned there.

The Urpattilekandam deals with the birth of Lord Murugan on the representations of Indran and other Devas to Lord Shiva of their untold sufferings. Shiva created Lord Murugan with six heads and twelve hands, the flames emitting from the eyes of his six foreheads, for the destruction of Surapatuman and other asuras.

Having decided to wage a war with Surapatuman, Lord Murugan sent Viravakutevar as a messenger to Surapatuman. Viravakutevar reached Viramahentrapuri. He met Surapatuman after encountering successfully several asura heroes, and conveyed to him Lord Murugan's message to release the Devas from the prison and to lead the path of righteousness. Enraged to hear the message, Surapatuman spoke ill of Lord Murugan. After warning Surapatuman that he and his kith and kin would be extirpated by Lord Murugan, Viravakutever returned to Sentil and explained to Murugan Surapatuman's egoistic words. This is explained in detail in Mahendra Kadam.

The Porpuri Kadam narrates Lord Murugan's war with Surapatuman. Murugan with his army of Devas and Butas invaded Mahendrapuri. Surapatuman collected his several armies. A fierce battle ensued. All the sons of Surapatuman except Iraniyan, his minister, brother and other asuras were killed in the battle. Undeterred by the successive defeats, Surapatuman himself fought against Lord Murugan using all sorts of magic powers. Ultimately unable to face Murugan's severe attack, Surapatuman ran into the sea and stood there in the shape of a mango tree. Murugan cut the tree into two parts with his weapon called 'utampiti'. Surapatuman appeared as a peacock with one part and a cock with another part. Murugan used the peacock as his 'vahana' (vehicle) and the cock as his flag. After releasing the Devas from the prison, Murugan returned to the city of Sentil.

From Sentil Lord Murugan reached Tirupparankunram. Indran gave his daughter Deyvayanai in marriage to Lord Murugan. After the Marriage Lord Murugan reached the mountain called Kantaverpu with his wife Deyvayanai. This is the gist of Dava Kadam.

The last portion of Dakka Kadam deals with Lord Murugan's marriage with Valliammai.

Kandapuram is written in a lucid language embellished with figures of speech such as similes, metaphors, etc. The work abounds in Shaiva siddhanta philosophy.

KANE, PANDURANG VAMAN (Sanskrit; b. 1880, d. 1972) was born in a middle class Chitpavan family at Pedhem in the Ratnagiri district, now in Maharashtra. A brilliant student from the beginning, Kane passed the Matriculation in 1897, B.A. with Bhau Daji prize in 1901, M.A. in Sanskrit with Jhala Vedanta prize in 1902, L.L.B. in 1908 and L.L.M. in 1912. He started his career as a teacher and served different government schools in Ratnagiri and Bombay for seven years. He was enrolled as a pleader in the Bombay High Court in 1911, and started practice. He was professor of Law in the Government Law College from 1917 to 1923. A successful lawyer and Professor of Law though he was, the Sanskrit studies, with specialisation in literature and Dharmashastra (Hindu socio-religious codes) were Kane's forte. His sound legal background and mastery of the Sanskrit language made him an authority on Hindi Law.

In this field of Sanskrit literature, Kane's contributions are substantial. He published edition of the Uttararamacharita of Bhavabhuti with the commentary of Ghanashyama, the Sahityadarpana (1910) and the Kadambari of Banabhatta, all with his own translation and notes. He also brought out a critical edition of the Vyavaharamayukha of Nilakantaha, a medieval digest on Hindu Law and Jurisprudence. His outstanding contribution to the study of Sanskrit literature is History of Sanskrit Poetics (4th ed. Delhi. 1971). His major work is, however History of Dharmashastra (1930-1962) in five volumes, the fourth volume of which earned him the Sahitya Akademi Award for Sanskrit in 1956. These volumes cover 6000 printed pages and constitute an authoritative and encyclopaedic work on the civil and religious laws of ancient and medieval India. It is not only a collection of valuable data from hundreds of authors and texts in Dharmashastra ranging from 600 B.C. to 1800 A.D. but it also presents this vast material in a proper historical perspective. Kane endeavoured to reconstruct the history of the Hindu society.

Since 1941, honours came to him in rapid succession. The title of 'Mahamahopadhyaya' was conferred on him in 1942 and he received D. Litt (Honorary) from the Allahabad University in the same year. He was the Vice-Chancellor of the Nagpur University from 1947 to 1949. In 1946 he was elected the President of the All India Oriental Conference in Nagpur.

Kane was a rationalist and had a broad outlook in the matters of social reform.

KANEKAR, ANANT ATMARAM (Marathi; b. 1905 d. 1980) was a Marathi poet, essayist, travelogue writer, short story writer and journalist.

Kanekar was a son of a policeman and hailed from a lower middle class Vaishya family of Malvan (Dist. Ratnagiri). He was born and educated at Bombay and graduated from St. Xaviers College. He got the LL.B. degree and practised law for a brief period. After the famous Meerut conspiracy case (1928), he was fascinated by the communist ideology, and to propagate it, he edited Chitra, a popular Marathi weekly owned by Lotwala for about five years. Disillusionment which came with Stalin's autocratic regime, made him leave active politics and take up an academic career as a teacher of Marathi in Siddharth College. He taught there till his retirement.

Kanekar began his literary career as a lyrical poet. His love-poems express a deep sense of longing. The down-to-earth quality of his notion of love proved to be a foil to the unrealistic Platonic notion of love found in the Ravikiran Mandal poets. Some of his love lyrics have been popularised by the noted stage singer, Jyotsna Bhole. Some of his poems betray his leftist inclination. The only collection of his poems, Chandarati ani itar kavita, was published in 1933.

Kanekar's informal prose column, like Chesterton's in a monthly magazine, developed into the personal essay. The first collection of his essays Pikli pane (1934) also reflects the leftist influences. Pandhari shide (1956) is almost a complete edition of his essays. Kanekar toured widely and wrote half a dozen travelogues. The description of his tour from England to Soviet Union, aptly entitled Dhukyatun lal taryakade (1940), with its subjective element lifted travelogue up in Marathi and gave it a form distinct from the traditional travel accounts.

To subdue the craze of translations of Khalil Gibran that raged in 1945, Kanekar played a hoax on the readers. He published his own allegorical tales in a tiny book Ruperi value (1947) declaring it to be the translation directly from the original Gibran book in Arabic. Prominent critics were taken in and praised the book to be a work of an epic genius. Another collection of his Haravi Rai (1972), contains over fifty of his short stories, some of which are significant for their social realism.

Since college days Kanekar took a keen interest in the modern theatrical movement. Along with S.V. Wartak and K. Narayan Kale, he founded 'Natyamanwantar' (1913), a theatre group devoted to Ibsenite realistic drama. He adapted half a dozen of western plays, notable among them being Gharkul (Ibsen's Doll's House), Zun (Galsworthy's Strife), Phans (Somin's Attention). He also has to his credit a collection of one-act plays Samber ani Itar ekankika (1964). His songs and dialogues of the film 'Manus' (Hindi 'Admi') were highly appreciated. His autobiographical book Anantika (1979) is also a good work.

The most salient features of Kanekar's literary contribution are its freshness and district appeal. He was honoured by the Government of India with 'Padmashri'. He presided over the All India Marathi Literary Conference and Marathi Dramatic Conference in 1956 and 1963 respectively.

S.G.M

KANETKAR, VASANT SHANKAR (Marathi; b. 1922) did his M.A. from Bombay University. In 1946, he became a Professor of Marathi and English at H.P.T. College, Nasik. He is a life-member of Gokhale Education Society. He prematurely retired in 1972 and devoted himself entirely to writing plays.

His works in Marathi include 32 full length plays, seven collections of one-act plays, four novels, three collection of short stories, one work on literary criticisms (drama) and one autobiographical work. He received Sangeet Natak Akademi Award for the best play Raigarhala jenva jag yete in 1962. He presided over the Marathi Vangmaya Parishad, Baroda, Indore, and the All India Marathi Natyasammelan in 1971. He received the National Award for drama-writing in 1984, from Sangeet Natak Akademi. In May 1986, he was president of the Sahitya Sammelan, Pune. In 1982, his play Gaganbhedi was staged in London. He regards Shakespeare as his guru.

His plays are mostly social, excepting a few which have mythological and historical trends. His comedies like Vedyche ghar unhat (1957) and Prema tujha rang kaisa (1961) were very popular. His play written in 1972, Himalayachi savali is on the life of the great pioneer of women's education, Dhondo Keshav Karve. Many of his plays have been translated into Hindi, Gujarati, Kannada, Bengali and other Indian languages. He seems to have complete control over the witty dialogues, portrayal of the realistic characters and convincing situations. The problems he handles are mostly the conflict that arises from the clash between the tradition and the modernity, the individual and the society, one generation and another and the clash of values. His plays are very popular as they are neatly constructed, good and stageable pieces. Except for Raigadala jenva jag yete, or a few others, the majority of his plays are not very outstanding as literary works. His experiments in novel writing had great psychoanalytical possibilities. He is not one who is a zealous propagandist of any political or social ideology, but is interested in the human situations and interplay of characters.

KANGHAM PADMAKUMAR SINGH (Manipuri, b. 1934) is a poet. He graduated from the Gauhati University with Honours in Philosophy in 1959. He teaches philosophy at N.G. College, Imphal. Sadhyagi ishei (Song of evening), which is his first book of poems, appeared in 1972. He edited Thambal pareng (Garland of lotus) and Anouba sheireng (New poetry) which are anthologies of modern Manipuri poetry, and Bharat sahitya (Indian literature) an anthology of prose. He also edited Punshi murti (Image of life), an anthology of modern Manipuri short stories published by the Naharol Sahitya Premi Samiti. He is a founder member of the Cultural Forum, a literary and cultural organization of Manipur and was editor of the poetry section of its journal Ritu for about ten years, and was Vice-President of the Naharol Sahitya Premi Samiti twice. His poetry is marked by an intense feeling of loneliness and sense of alienation, though it is romantic love that gives a new twist to his world-view, as depicted in his poetry.

I.R.B.S.

KANHADADE PRABANDH (Rajasthani), the work by Padmanabh, Visanagara brahman, was composed during the year 1455 under the patronage of Chauhan Akhairaja of Jalor. It is mainly concerned with the battles fought by Kanhadade, against Allauddin Khilji. He was Akhairaja's predecessor and head of the Sonagara clan in the fifth generation preceding his times, about one hundred and fifty years back. In its published form it contains about 1000 stanzas and is a narrative poem enriched with descriptions of different varieties. The poet, however, states that there are eleven hundred stanzas. The main story runs thus: During the time of Kanhadade, there was a ruling prince named Rana Sarangade in Gujarat, who insulted a brahman named Madhava. It was Madhava who was the root cause of his troubles. Instigated by Madhava, Sultan Allauddin Khilji deputed a large force under Alafakhan to invade Gujarat. As Kanhadade refused to allow passage to the invading army, it marched through Mewar. Having conquered Saurashtra and Gujarat, Alafakhan uprooted the 'Linga' of Somnath and loading it in a cart proceeded towards Delhi. His army took the road passing through Jalor, but he was badly defeated by the Chauhans. Enraged at this Allauddin himself headed the campaign and laid a siege to Samiyana situated near Jalor and occupied by Santalsinha, the nephew of Kanhadade. When nothing substantial could be achieved for full seven years, he thought of a cynical and contemptible device. Having slaughtered some cows, he managed to throw their limbs in the water reservoirs on the hill during the night. Against this sacrilege, the religious minded people residing in the fort decided to protest by remaining thirsty. They put up fight to the last breath. The brave women practised 'Jauhar' by consecrating themselves to the flames. The Sultan had his way and overran the fort. He then sent a proposal to Kanhadade advising him to accept his suzerainty, which he turned down. The Sultan's daughter Firoza was also in the harem that accompanied the Sultan in the battle. She took a fancy for Viramadeva, son of Kanhadade, being struck by his heroism and for other virtues. Having known this, Allauddin proposed to Kanhadade for her marriage with Viramadeva, but the proposal was turned down on account of the pride of caste and clan cherished by the house of the Sonagaras. Princess Firoza, accompanied by some soldiers, went to the fort to see Viramadeva. She was accorded a warm welcome. She herself proposed to Viramadeva for marriage which he refused. Kanhadade arranged for her return and presented many precious articles. After eight years, the Sultan again laid a siege. All businessmen of Jalor surrendered their goods to Kanhadade for the defence of the State. When preparations were in full swing, a 'sejawal' (the driver or incharge of a curtained conveyance used by the ladies of the royal household) named Bika leaked out the secret of a private approach to the fort. Though he was killed by his own wife for this treacherous act, the wrong was already done. She informed Kanhadade of this incident, but no alternative was left to him excepting the surrender or the sacrifice of his life. Kanhadade naturally preferred the latter. On his father's death, Viramadeva took charge of the campaign. The hero thrust his own dagger in his stomach when he realised the possibility of his capture. The queens jumped into the fire. Firoza had the head of Viramadeva searched out through her foster-mother. A funeral ceremony according to Hindu rites was arranged by her on the banks of Yamuna, and she also put an end of her life by jumping into the deep waters of the river.

This work is considered very important among those of its kind written in the 15th century. It presents precious material for the study of the gradual development of the old western Rajasthani, an off-shoot of later Apabhramsha. Not only in Rajasthani, but also in Hindi there is no work of the early period which mentions a date of its composition. It has its own importance from the point of view of linguistic studies. The text of the work in its original form is almost well preserved and presents a strong base for the study of the growth of the language of the period. It is a remarkable work from the historical point of view also. The historical events are faithfully described. Wherever the events are not authenticated by history, it is because of the fact that Padmanabh was a poet first and then a historian. As such, he was fully justified to invent his own stories and use them to make his work more meaningful and interesting. His geographical knowledge is also noteworthy. As for the students of social and economic conditions of the age, he presents in this poetical work extra rich material in the form of contemporary customs and practices, social behaviour, traditions and beliefs. From the literary point of view, it is a fine piece of art. In his plain, simple and intelligible style, he has expressed himself in an easy but powerful way. The love of his land and the racial pride so deeply cherished by Kanhadade, the indomitable and continuous fight put up by his own clansmen and other warriors against the Sultan's army, their unflinching will-power and the culmination of events in their death, are so graphically described that they leave a permanent impression on the readers' mind. The diminishing glory of the local princedom and the sacrifices of lives for upkeeping high ideals turn into haunting memories full of pathos, besides infusing pride. As demanded by the context, the poet has given descriptions of town planning, the array of the army, the march for the battle-front, the setting up of the cantonment and the vigorous actions of the fight. The entire work is written in a narrative form, and nowhere any embellishment of style or stilted expression is evident.

KANHADDE PRABANDHA-KANITKAR, KASHITAI

The book, however, carries much weight for its cultural material. Heroism reigns supreme in the entire work. Incidentally, the strange, the violent, the erotic (in its 'virah' aspect) and the pathetic feelings also find place as demanded by the situation. Two of the characters are far more important than others, and they are Kanhadade and Firoza. While the one lays down his life to defend his racial honour and pride, the other performs 'sati' for her love which is likely to be fulfilled in the cycles of births according to traditional beliefs. The poet has inter alia composed in this work some verses which are moralistic in nature.

KANHADDE PRABANDHA (Gujarati) is a long, narrative, historical poem of the medieval period, composed by Padmanabha. It depicts the valour of Kanhadde, king of Jalor, in the battle between him and Allauddin Khilji, the Sultan of Delhi. Allauddin's army was marching to Gujarat to conquer the region, and the Sultan asked for Kanhadde's, permission to march through his kingdom. Kanhadde refused to oblige, and Allauddin's army had to change its route. After conquering Gujarat, Allauddin returned and attacked Jalor. The battle lasted for twelve long years, and due to the treachery of the soldiers inside the fort, Allauddin won the battle. Kanhadde fought bravely upto the last and was killed, and the ladies of the harem immolated themselves by jumping into the fire. The poet forcefully describes the heroism of all the members of Kanhadde's family. Besides heroic and tragic sentiments, the poet's romantic sentiment also comes to the fore while depicting the love of Allauddin's daughter, Firoja, for Vikramde, son of Kanhadde, who died fighting in the battlefield. Vikramde had so much aversion for the Muslims that when his head was brought to Firoja after his death in the battlefield, the head turned away from her face. Broken hearted, Firoja committed suicide by jumping into the river Jamuna. Thus, reality and imagination are effectively blended in the poem. It gives a graphic description of the route of the march of the army, the battle scene, the geographical locations, cultural history and life style of the people.

A volume named as Geetasar and one volume of poems, written by him are his notable contribution.

KANHOPATRA (Marathi; 15th century) was a fifteenth-century Marathi saint-poetess. Her poetry signifies the literary awakening of the downtrodden classes as reflection of the Varkari movement. Encouraged by the sense of social equality created by this religious movement the feminine sensitivity became more vocal in creative expression. Kanhopatra represents an example of such sensitivity. Her mother was a prostitute and wanted the daughter to continue in her profession. But an ascetic by nature. Kanhopatra refused to do it and became a great devotee of Lord Vitthal. Having heard of her legendary beauty, the King of Bidar sent for her. To escape from him she ran to Pandharpur and took shelter in the famous temple of Lord Vitthal. It is said that she breathed her last while praying to the Lord. People buried her in the premises of the temple and a tree was planted in her memory which stands there even today.

Her 23 verses are included in the famous anthology of saint poetry Sakalsantgatha. Most of the verses are autobiographical and express the humiliation she suffered at the hands of the people. Her poetry is marked by pathos. Her style is unadorned and lucid. Simplicity of expression makes her poems more appealing.

KANIYAN PUNKUNRAN (Tamil), literally meaning astrologer of the flowery hill, indicating perhaps his profession and native village, was one of the poets of Sangam Anthology in Tamil of the last centuries B.C. and early centuries A.D. It is said that he was the court poet of Kipperum Cholan of Uraiyur. Of his two poems in blank verse in 22 lines, the poem in which the poet proclaims himself is a citizen of the world, is the most famous. The poem in gist is: "Every place is my hamlet; all are my kin-yatum ure yavarum kelir. Evil and good do not come because of others, volition. Pain and relief are one's own creations. From the wise we learn that death is nothing new. Neither do we feel elated when prosperous, nor dejected when in want. As the raft caught in the mountain stream dashing through boulders roaring, this beloved life of ours is on its ordained path. Hence we do not stand in awe at greatness of the great nor run down those lowly placed."

Besides his robust affirmation of universalism, the poet takes life in his stride, wishing to lead a life of contentment. The message contained in this poem has evoked admiration from scholars of the East and the West.

KANKABATI (Bengali), the finest and most popular work of Trailokyanath Mukherjee (1847-1919), was first published in 1892. The fragment of a story embedded in a Bengali folktale for children has been utilised as the point of departure for this narrative work. Kankabati is divided into two parts, the first part has fifteen chapters, the second has nine—and then there is a concluding chapter. The first part and the concluding chapter have all the elements of a novel. The whole of the second part can be viewed as a strange fairy tale with satirical elements thrown in. Therefore, if Kankabati is called a novel, it is a very strange kind of novel—unique inasmuch as it is an admixture of the realistic novel, satirical sketch and fantasy. The locale of the first part is Kusumghati village. The main protagonists are Kankabati, her father Tanu Ray, Kankabati's admirer Khetu and the village zamindar, Janardan Chaudhuri. Khetu and Kankabati want to get married, but through the machinations of the zamindar and his brahmin henchmen, Khetu is ostracized. This part of the story contains a scathing criticism of the social order of the nineteenth century rural Bengal, its iniquities and hypocrisies. When marriage with Janardan becomes inevitable, broken-hearted Kankabati falls ill and for twenty-two days remains unconscious. The second part of the novel records the delirium and fantasies of Kankabati. She moves from the world of fishes to the kingdom of ghosts, and then to those of frogs and mosquitos. She comes in contact with Nakeswari and Khokkas and for a short while even travels to the moon. The comic element here provokes genial laughter; satire is there but without its sting. In the concluding chapter, the author gives two rational explanations of Kankabati's dreams. The second one is worth noting. "The external world is realized by the imagination of our waking senses. Kankabati's dream is likewise the creation of the imagination of her sleeping senses. Between the two, the difference is not great. Whatever Kankabati has seen, heard or thought, have gone into the creation of this dream-world". The real is concealed behind the unreal. Therefore, the author takes us to a dreamland where reality is reflected in the distorting broken mirror of the fantastic and the grotesque. And it is the second part which makes the novel so original and unique.

It is not known whether the author had read Alice in the wonderland by Lewis Carroll, but there are similarities, and Mukherjee's shaping of the world of fantasy is of the equally high standard. Comic fantasy, satire and the grotesque cannot be harmoniously blended without empathy, imaginative power, sense of balance and simplicity. All these four qualities are there in Kankabati which make it equally enjoyable for young and adult readers. He juxtaposes the natural and the supernatural world, and in doing so gives proof of his prolific imaginative power. While bringing together human beings and beasts and ghosts, djinns and fairies, the question of credibility does not enter his mind and even then we feel the presence of a hidden causality in this apparently topsy-turvy world. Occasionally the fantastic inventiveness of the narrative sparkles with allegorical significance.

The best criticism of Kankabati to this day remains in Rabindranath Tagore's review of the book in Sadhana immediately after its publication. He wrote: "The work is mature and clear. The author has inspired our sense of humour and pity in an easy and simple language and given proof of his imaginative power without exaggeration... It is an example of extraordinary talent to write well such a piece of grotesque fairy tale. There being no set rule in the world of the impossible, it requires a genius to channelize the free-moving imagination through a path of secret order. However incredible and extravagant the content of the narrative, it is necessary to discipline the material by imposing the rules of literary form to achieve artistic excellence. That the author has been able to maintain the true nature of the fairy tale, its childhood-simplicity, its undoubted credibility—is something to be admired’.

KANKHOWA (Assamese) is a collection of two long poems by Shridhar Kandali. The writers of the Vaishnava School of Assamese literature wrote for the spread of the Vaishnava religion, drawing their material generally from two epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, and from the Bhagavatpurana. But these writers very often transform the stories of these divine characters into stories of day-to-day domestic life. In Kankhowa Shridhar Kandali does the same.

The poems are in ‘dulari’ verse written about two small incidents of child Krishna’s life. In the first one the author depicts a beautiful domestic scene of the little boy Krishna in relation to his foster-mother Jashoda. Jashoda is trying here to nurse her child Krishna to sleep, singing a lullaby when the child, unwilling to sleep, is complaining and murmuring. Jashoda’s love and affection for her foster-son and Krishna’s loving protestations and affectionate complaints are drawn in a very lively manner. The scene of the child being nursed to sleep is a very commonplace one, but the poet raises this commonplace scene to a universal level of mother-child relationship.

One evening Jashoda tries to nurse her foster-child Krishna to sleep by singing a lullaby about Kankhowa or the ear-eater, a demon. Krishna, like an ordinary child, is frightened at first. But soon with a knowing smile he asks his foster-mother about the whereabouts of this demon. When Jashoda fails to satisfy him with her answer, Krishna declares solemnly that he himself is the creator and preserver of this universe. And yet he himself has not known anything about this demon called Kankhowa. Even in his earlier ten incarnations he did not meet this demon anywhere. The author, thus, shows Krishna as a divine child even while showing him as an ordinary one.

In the second poem, the author continues with the same story and shows the same loving gesture of Jashoda towards Krishna and Krishna’s filial affection for his mother, though in a different situation. Jashoda this time rouses Krishna from his sleep when the latter starts protesting and murmuring. Jashoda asks her cowherd son Krishna to get up since his fellow cowherd boys are already up and they are coming to him. Krishna protests and affirms that he would neither get up nor eat anything for days to come. It is all because of Jashoda’s looking upon him as a cowherd and not as a prince. Here, too, the author makes Krishna narrate his different achievements in different incarnations while lamenting that now in Jashoda’s house he has been reduced to an ordinary cowherd, under-fed and neglected. Though Jashoda is a queen he murmurs that she has not given him even one golden flute. Jashoda is moved, takes the child in her lap and assures him to redress his grievances if only he would stop indulging in mischiefs and escapades.

But the poems are written in the form of lullabies and Assamese mothers even today sing these verses while lulling their children to sleep. The purpose of the poet behind these two poems was, however, to rouse Krishnabhakti in the mind of the reader. The unabated popularity of both these poems shows the fulfilment of the author’s purpose.

The familiar domestic scenes and the apparently ordinary conversations are dotted with humour and wit which make them lively. In adding a dual nature to the characters here as god and man at the same time, the author shows his power of vision. It has earned the same amount of popularity as is enjoyed by Shankaradeva’s Dadhi-mathan, which, too, is permeated with a religious spirit while creating a domestic and social atmosphere with divine characters in their human traits.

KANNADA KUALAYANAND (Kannada, d 1758). Post-Jayagounda, the author of Kannada kuvalayanand, was the son of Lingagounda, who ruled a tiny state, Toragale by name, during 1660-1716. Jayagounda himself has stated in Kannada kuvalayanand that he was direct descendant of Lingagounda and that his mother’s name was Lingambe. He has also stated that he was very unfortunate to lose his parents soon after his birth, and that his generous stepmother (elder Queen), Chennambika, was all responsible for his upbringing and proper education. Jayagounda, intelligent as he was, soon acquired knowledge and became a scholar in both the languages, viz Kannada and Sanskrit. In fact, it is said that he was a multi-linguist, having mastery of nearly six languages. He inherited great qualities like righteousness, generosity, bravery, statesmanship, etc., and was very much loved and respected by his people. Jayagounda, too, took great interest in the welfare of his people and the prosperity of the State. He used to patronise the learned people and honour them. He was himself a great poet. He composed two works, Kannada kuvalayanand being one of them. This work has attained a unique place in the history of Kannada literature on account of its characteristics, particularly in Kannada rhetorics and metrics.

It is a known fact that the influence of Sanskrit literature on Kannada is as old as ancient times. The ancient Kannada litterateurs were generally bilingual scholars of Kannada and Sanskrit. Sanskrit was regarded as an ideal language by Kannada scholars, and therefore, it had its full influence on all the works of Kannada literature. The Kavyalankar shastra (rhetorics, metrics metronomics, etc.) of old Kannada literature is not an exception to it. Compositions of Sanskrit scholars like Dandi, Bamaha, Rudrata, Mammata, Vamana, Jayadeva became the source for such an effort. Independent Kannada compositions or views as such, therefore, were rare on rhetorics in Kannada literature.

Kannada kuvalayanand is a poetic treatise on poetic craft and rhetorics. Due to its characteristics, it has a unique place in the history of rhetorics in Kannada literature. Nrupatunga's Kaviraja marga is the first available maiden work on rhetorics in old Kannada. Nrupatunga of Kaviraja marga was none else than the famous king Nrupatunga of Rashtrakut dynasty, who ruled between 817-877. In the period between that of Nrupatunga and Jayagounda, there were a number of Kannada writers who wrote on rhetorics in Kannada. Nagavarma's Kavyavalokana (1210), Tirumalrya's Apratimavira-charite are some of the important works on rhetorics during this period. They were also based on the works of great Sanskrit scholars like Dandi, Bamaha, Rudrata and others.

The Kannada rhetoricians refrained themselves from advocating or expressing their own independent views or thoughts on rhetorics. This marks a great loss to the growth of Kannada Alankarashastra.

If Kaviraja marga of Nripatunga is the maiden work on Kannada rhetorics, Kannada kuvalayanand of Jayagounda is the last important work on the same subject. But there is a marked difference between these two compositions. Jayagounda the author of Kannada kuvalayanand has altogether trodden a new path by abandoning the old practice and style of writing 'lakshanas' in 'kanda' and 'lakshyas' in 'champu'. Instead he has adopted a new practice of writing the whole compositions in 'shatpadi'. Even the illustrations are selected and quoted from Kannada shatpadi works. This is one of the main characteristics of Kannada kuvalayanand and it also rightly justifies the title.

At the beginning of the work Kannada kuvalayanand Jayagounda has invoked his personal deity in the traditional form and thereafter, he has set about to classify poetry in detail in 3 ways, viz. 'Dhvani-kavya', 'Gunibhuthdhvani kavya' and 'Chitra-kavya' as classified by Appaiah Dixita in his Chitra-mimamsa. He has also given gradings to kavya as of first rate, second rate and of mean rate, following suit of Appaiah Dixita again. He qualifies the use of 'Arthalankara' in kavya in preference to 'Sabdalanakara.' Lakshan and Lakshya verses are written in shatpadi form. All the illustrations either quoted or self written are also written in shatpadi form. Most of the quoted shatpadi illustrations are selected from various Kannada shatpadi compositions like Kannada jaimini bharata; Chitra bharata, Chyan-bharata, Raghavanka kavya, Udbhata kavya, Bhixatan kavya, Bhava-chinta-ratna, Soundarapurana, Guru-Mallesha shataka etc. Thus, Jayagounda's Kannada kuvalayanand is exclusively a shatpadi composition in Kannada. About 100 alankaras, based on Chandraloka sutras of Jayadeva, have been attempted to explain in 'Vrutti' form as adopted by Appaiah Dixita in his work. The Kannada prose so used is Sanskrit-dominated and is very difficult to understand. It is more so with the people who are not acquainted with Sanskrit. On the other hand, the shatpadi stanzas are quite easy to understand even by a common man. This is because of the colloquial language freely use in the stanzas.

The work Kannada kuvalayanand is not considered as a great work from the poetry point of view, but it has great importance due to the subject it has treated. The history of Kannada rhetorics is big and lengthy enough as it is the outcome of many efforts put together by Kannada scholars through many centuries. Poet Jayagounda occupies a prominent place in this galaxy of Kannada scholars.

KANNADA SAHITYA CHARITRE (Kannada) is a history of Kannada literature (1953) by R.S. Mugali, which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956. Researchers like E.P. Rice and R. Narasimhacharya had earlier collected invaluable material. There was need for an up-to-date history of Kannada literature which utilized this material and offered a study of the history of Kannada literature from the point of view of the modern reader. Mugali's work is comprehensive, based on the researches and the assessments of earlier and more recent scholars, and is characterized by balance and objectivity. While providing information about the age and the life of a writer Mugali is more interested in the study of his work. Earlier historians had divided the history of this literature according to the religion of the major writers; Mugali has considered both the major writer and the dominant form in characterizing different ages. His sober and balanced assessments of writers and works, combining as they do sympathy with a sense of critical responsibility, have come to command respect. Mugali has, in the subsequent editions, taken note of the most recent researches.

Poona University awarded Mugali the D. Litt. degree on this book.

KANNADASAN (Tamil; b. 1927, d. 1981) is one of the most prominent poets of Tamilnadu. His real name was A.S. Muthiah. He was the poet laureate of Tamilnadu from 1.4.1978 till his death. He is only the second person to hold that position of distinction, the first being the late lamented poet Namakkal Kavinar V. Ramalingam Pillai.

Born in a remote corner of Tamilnadu, as the eighth son of Chathappan and Vishalakshi Achchi, Kannadasan had the literary bent of mind from his early age. After discontinuing his studies in Standard VIII, the poet joined the Tamil journal Tirumakal in 1944, which had the distinction of publishing his first poem. From then onwards, he wrote tirelessly till he died. He was connected with many journals such as Tirai oli and Santa marutam. His journalistic career was at its peak when he edited his own weekly Tenral (Zephyr or the southern wind), a monthly Mullai (a flower by that name) and Tenral tirai (a weekly devoted to Tamil films). Later he also edited a monthly Kannadasan and a daily Katitam for sometime.

Kannadasan's work excelled others both in quantity and quality. He was widely popular in the cine field from the day he wrote his first lyric in Kanniyin katali in 1949. He was connected with the film industry in many ways. He wrote stories and dialogues for many films. He was also the producer of some remarkable Tamil films such as Irattat tilakam (Tilak in blood), Shivagangaik Shimai (Shivaganaga country), Malaiyitta mankai (Lady who garlanded) and Kavalai illata manitan (The man without sorrow). Kannadasan has written more than 5000 lyrics, a landmark in Tamil, and it will take many more years for one to break this record. Apart from this, Kannadasan has written more than 4000 poems, which found their place in various journals and books.

He has to his credit 5 epics, 21 novels and a score of other prose works, mostly religious. His publications are more than one hundred.

On the request of a Christian Mission from Trichy, Kannadasan wrote an epic 'Yesu kaviyam' (The epic of Jesus) which is yet to be published.

His other epics are Attanatti atimanti which sings the tragic tale of the Chera prince-dancer Atti and his beloved Atimanti, the daughter of Chola Karikalan, Mankani (The mango fruit), a historical love poem and Kallakkuti makaviyam based on the agitation for renaming the old Dalmiapuram town as Kallakkuti.

Among his major novels, special mention is to be made of Ayirantivu nakayarkanni, Velankutitruvila (the festival at Velankuti) and Cheraman katali (The lover of Chera king), the last of which fetched Kannadasan the coveted Sahitya Akademi Award in 1980.

His autobiography Vanavasam (The life in the forest) and Manavasam (The life in heart) are marked by the revelation of naked truth. He was never afraid nor ashamed of expressing his failures, drawbacks and vices in public.

Raja tantanai is a biographical play written by Kannadasan on the life and death of the great poet Kamban.

His lyrics in hundreds of films are of high merit both in content and craftsmanship. He blended the folk-theme and folk-music with those of classical literature and prosody to bring out a new form and style of writing. The result was a highly successful and unique form of film lyric.

Kannadasan adopted his own style in writing both verse and prose. His dynamic pen never rested till his last days. Simplicity, frankness, clarity and rhythmic beauty are the hallmarks of his writings. Most of his lyrics directly touch the heart of a listener. He was a writer for both the masses and the elite.

Here is a description of the beautiful young damsel in Mankani:

A peacock which did not spread the colourful tail!
A white flower which had not been closed to The bee!
A lily-like face which did not smile at the sight of moon!
A youthful charm which had not been touched by anyone!
She! the genius of the sweet age!

Kannadasan started his political sojourn as a staunch follower of the late lamented Arinar C.N. Annadurai, the founder-leader of the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam. He was one of the top leaders of the party till his breaking away from it. He started the Tamil Techiya Katchi (Tamil National Party) alone with E.V.K. Sampath, another leader, in 1961. Later, he joined the Congress Party and followed in the footsteps of the late Kamaraj, former Chief Minister of Tamilnadu. During his last days he was with the Congress (I).

He fought the election to the State Assembly from his home constituency as a D.M.K. candidate and lost it. In the year 1953, he was arrested for the agitation organised by the D.M.K. to rename Dalmiapuram as Kallakkuti, and was sentenced for one and a half years.

Kannadasan, a legend and a household name in Tamilnadu, died in the Chicago hospital (U.S.) when he went on a visit to that country to attend a Conference of World Poets in September 1981.

KANNAN, JANARDANAN (Malayalam; b. 1885, d. 1955). One of the tribe of prolific writers who have not become as famous as they deserve to be. Kunnathu Janardana Menon, or Kannan Janardanan as he is better known, was born in Palghat and had his entire formal education in the high school attached to the Victoria College there. Falling out with his teacher while in the matriculation class, he returned home and went on reading books, thereby acquiring a mastery of Tamil, a smattering of Sanskrit and a good deal of English. Thereupon he travelled widely and came back to accept a small government appointment. It was during the few years he spent in that capacity that he cultivated the acquaintance of some of the leading literary figures of the day and wrote some of his works. Later, he worked as a journalist in a number of periodicals one after another almost until his death.

Janardanan's works cover a variety of genres. There are to his credit, ten biographies, eleven works based on epics and puranas, about 30 stories and novels, four plays and Lokamahayuddham (The world war), a book dealing with history. His biographies of V.C. Balakrishna Panikker, Pandalattu Kerala Varma and Kumaran Asan are remarkable for their literary qualities and appreciative approach, while the novels Talapushkatram and Matangi-ni show his creative power almost at its best.

KANNASSA PANIKKER (Malayalam). There are three poets associated with Niranam, a village near Tiruvalla in Alleppey district. They are Kannassa Panikker alias Rama Panikker, Madhava Panikker and Sankara Panikker, the first being the son of the sister of the other two, and perhaps, the best-known. They are believed to have flourished between 1350 and 1450, a period which witnessed the struggle of Malayalam to free itself from the choking influences of Tamil and Sanskrit, and emerge as an independent language. Rama Panikker's principal works are Ramayana, Bhagavataj Shivaratri mahatmyam and Bharata. The first, no doubt, the best of the lot, is an excellent rendering of Valmiki-ramayana, with the author's own additions as well as omissions of the ideas and situations in the original. The metre used almost throughout the work is also a contribution of the Niranam poets. His Bhagavata also, a translation from Sanskrit, is a great work in its own right, though less commendable than the first. His Shivaratri mahatmyam tells the story of a brahmin named Sukumaran, who, in spite of his long voluptuous life with a Chandali, was able to enter the abode of Lord Shiva after death as a result of his having casually worshipped Him from a distance on a 'Shivaratri' night. Critical verdict is that this work does not suffer much in comparison with Panikker's own Ramayana. It is doubtful whether the last work mentioned above has been completed, but it also appears to be a voluminous work.

K.S.N.

KANNUNIRTULLI (Malayalam), though the only major poem and an elegy at that, written by Nalappattu Narayana Menon, has entitled him to eminence as a Malayalam poet. Each stanza of the poem, which literally means tear-drop, had been percolating down into the minds of readers from time to time ever since its publication in 1936. This is mainly because of its provocative thought content and evocative imagery. This was a new experience in Malayalam poetry, which had not come out of its neo-classic framework at that time.

The background of the poem is the death of the poet's wife, Madhavi Amma, within a year of their marriage. The incident touched him more as a universal dilemma of life than as a personal calamity. Reflections on death lead the poet to reminiscences right from the childhood, and he ponders over human destiny, thereby raising many a question, but most without any answer.

The poem, as mentioned above, is an elegy, but not in the western fashion. It differs from the western type mainly in that the element of lamentation is almost absent. Again, the form is not an important consideration here. The poet has used a Sanskrit metre which is not much rigid. He has not cared for rhyme or any other sound effect. Some of the stanzas are even grotesque and unbalanced. Neo-classic tradition is likely to condemn such things as 'lapses', forgetting its vital power of subjectivity and free flight of imagination that mark the poem. These are exactly the qualities of a new school of poetry in which some of his contemporaries and successors revelled. Thus, the poem has broken new grounds and has become a landmark in Malayalam poetry. Look, for example, at the following lines:

The way our globe progresses is a never-ending one,
Unknown and inexplicable
Man sees it at some point
Some where-what can he know?

The sense of wonder and even bewilderment found in such lines only sharpens the poet's vision which ultimately longs to see the entire universe within a grain of sand. Thoughts here are not conceived by the rational mind, but are the offspring of a deep feeling, which itself remains unexpressed. There is melancholy accompanied by remorse and optimism, and a tenderness and subtlety superficially undiscernible. Poetry runs like an undercurrent. That is why Kannunirttulli is regarded as one of the most remarkable poems in modern Malayalam poetry.

KANSHI RAM, BABA (Dogri; b. 1882, d. 1943). after completing his education in a local primary school, started his career as a shopkeeper, but plunged into freedom struggle in 1912. He became a political activist of the Indian National Congress and went from village to village, arousing the feelings of nationalism in the masses with his speeches in 'Dogri Pahari'. He went to jail first in 1922, and almost the same time started writing poetry. He went to jail about a dozen times and served a total sentence of about 9 years. On coming out of jail on the eve of Sardar

KANT, V.R.-KANTA O PHULA

Bhagat Singh's execution, he vowed that he would wear only black garments until India became independent, and came to be called 'blackrobed general'. He had a sweet voice which got him the title of 'Pahari bulbul' from the nightingale of Indian English poetry, Sarojini Naidu. But he was more popularly known as 'Pahari Gandhi'—an epithet used by Jawaharlal Nehru for him during the Hoshiarpur district session of the Congress. His health deteriorated during his last prison term in 1942 where he suffered great hardships. He died soon after his release in October, 1943.

Baba Kanshi Ram is said to have written 300 to 500 verse compositions in 'Dogri-Pahari'. Since his education had been in Urdu, he wrote them in Persian script. They have not been published in book form yet. Some of them have been transcribed into Devanagari script by his grandson Ravikant. All his poems are didactic, written with a purpose. Their subjects are patriotism, condemnation of disloyalty to the motherland, untouchability and other social evils, propagation of 'khadi', social upliftment and so on. Some of the poems are set to folk-tunes and are eminently singable. He borrowed from the folklore and also added to the folklore, because quite a few of his poems and songs have passed into folk-song tradition of Kangra. The range of his composition is fairly wide and consists of Khandakavyas like Nanaji di kahani and Kunale di kahani, long poems like Najar ghuma di and Zindagi aur maut, Ek kahani, songs like 'Ujjari Dogre des jana' and 'Des paramesara kinyan bassana' and poems like 'Nikke nikke mahnua jo dukh bara bhara' and 'Nan kar gallan mundua'. He is also said to have written a few short stories in his mother tongue, but he is better known as a poet of nationalism and Gandhian ideology. He is the only writer from Duggar to have been honoured by the issue of a 'postage stamp' by the Indian Post and Telegraph Department in 1982, to mark his 'birth centenary'.

He worked from 1934 to 1944 in the Agricultural Department of Hyderabad State, and from 1944 to 1954 as Programme Producer in All India Radio.

He started his writing career from 1925. His first poem was published in Mandaramala in 1928. He was chosen President of the Marathawada Sahitya Sammelan (Kavi sammelan). He received State Government awards for the collections of his poems in 1977-78 and 1979-80. His poems are known for their romantic lyricism as also for progressive thought.

KANTA O PHULA (Oriya), a collection of satirical poems by Godabarish Mohapatra, a well-known Oriya poet commonly called 'Niakhunta', was first published by Janasakti Pustakalaya, Cuttack in 1958. The collection contains ninety poems depicting the socio-political scene of contemporary Orissa. The name of the book is symbolic. The word 'kanta' (thorn) stands for muddy path and 'phula' (flower) signifies the innocent life, which springs up from social and political turmoil. Poems of this collection deal with the various maladies and evils of the society along with the day-to-day happenings of an ordinary man. As a result, some poems have a genuine appeal to the common man. The poem like 'Chati' (The slippers) symbolises the downtrodden class. The poet cries out to elevate the socially oppressed class.

The poem like 'Pecha' (The owl) describes the various activities of the so-called workers. The owl stands for the black marketeer and the bloodsuckers of the society. The satire is pin-pointed and ridicules the follies of mankind.

In this way, the entire collection is full of bitter satire against the contemporary socio-political life. The poems like 'Chati' (The slippers), 'Saguna' (The vulture), 'Pecha' (The owl), 'Kana' (The ear), 'Mrityuni shobhajatra' (The procession of death) are examples of good satire. Of course, some poems in this collection have personal attack. They may be called lampoons. They have no universal appeal. Even then Kanta o phula (The thorn and the flower) is full of wit and humour. It had a note of pathos and pity for human soul. The poet is out and out a humanist. He very often mocks at human follies which he comes across in different spheres of life. Most of the poems of this collection centre round the political scene of the day and were originally written for the Niakhunta, a political monthly magazine edited by the poet himself. The style is simple and lucid, and the language is pin-pointed and sharp. Hence Kanta o phula is a happy blend of satire and artistic beauty.

KANTAM KATHALU-KANTHARIA BALASHANKAR ULLASRAM

KANTAM KATHALU (Telugu) is a collection of short stories written by Narasimharavu 'Munimanikyam', woven around the character Kantam. It is an enchanting portrait of a Telugu housewife who enlivens thousands of homes across the Telugu land. Kantam kathalu, about a hundred in number, portray Kantam from the time of her joining her husband up to her demise, in her various moments and moods, as a loving guardian angel of her husband, as an affectionate mother, as an amicable and entertaining mother-in-law and so on. She is highly sensitive and yet always at ease in taking the day-to-day problems of life in her stride. Though Kantam does not figure prominently in a few stories like 'Tagu number three' and 'Sundaram bharya' (Sundaram's wife), her presence is felt even there, as the narrator of these stories is her own husband, who cannot forget Kantam even for a minute. Even in 'Tirumaliga', a short novel attempting to picture the vacuum created by Kantam's demise, one feels that Kantam is the presiding deity. Yathartha drishyalu (Real scenes, 1945, Secunderabad), a collection of 5 prose-plays, three of which have been broadcast from A.I.R. Hyderabad, seems to present Kantam's personality in its ripe and mature form. In its preface the author says: 'Kantam kathalu contributed not a little in moulding the ethos of a generation by making them see how they could make a heaven of their married lives.'

KANTAVALA, HARGOVINDAS DVARKADAS (Gujarati; b. 1849, d. 1931) was born in a poor family in Umreth in the Kaira district of Gujarat, and did his matriculation in 1864. He was well-versed in Sanskrit, Marathi, Urdu and English. He had been a school teacher, headmaster and a clerk in a Collector's office.

Later, he became Assistant Deputy Educational Inspector, and then, the Principal of the Teacher's Training College at Rajkot. He successfully implemented Maharaja Sayajirao Gaekwad's scheme for making primary education compulsory. Between 1849-1894, he undertook the onerous task of collecting, editing and publishing poems of the old Gujarati poets with the collaboration of Nathashankar Shastri and Chhotalal Narbheram Bhatt. They published in all 75 collections of poetry, big and small, with explanatory commentaries. This is Kantavala's major and significant service to Gujarati literature.

He had also worked in the army and took part in the operations to crush the Rajput uprising at the Pilvai town. He retired from service in 1900 and devoted nearly five years to writing. The government awarded him the title of Rao Bahadur in 1903. He was appointed the Dewan of the Principality of Lunavada in Gujarat in 1905, and in 1912 he started a textile mill.

He presided over the sixth session of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad and Sayaji Gaekwad awarded him the title of 'Sahityamartand'.

His other major works include: Collections of poems: Panipatnun Yuddha (Battle of Panipat, 1867); Vishvani Vichitrata (Strange things of Universe, 1913); Novels: Andheri Nagarino Gardhavasen (Andheri Nagari's Gardhavasen, 1881); Be Baheno athava ek gharsansari varta (Two Sisters or a tale of a family life, 1898); Children's stories: Tachukdi panchso vato (500 little tales), school editions of some books on grammar of Gujarati language (1889); Kanya Vachanmala (A reader for girls, 1904); these works were written in collaboration with Lalshankar U. Dave. In addition, he wrote considerably about social problems, social reforms, moral issues, worldly duties, promotion of indigenous crafts as well as a travelogue describing his visit to Mysore.

KANTHARIA, BALASHANKAR ULLASRAM (Gujarati; b. 1858, d. 1898), known as 'masta kavi Bal', belonged to the Sadodara Nagar community of Nadiad. He died at Vadodara after a brief illness of plague. He was born in a very wealthy and aristocratic family, but died in penury.

His father, Ullasram, who was Tehsildar in the revenue department, was well-versed in music and Persian. Balashankar inherited these interests from his father. He was born rich, and because of his capricious and gay temperament, his education remained limited only to the Matriculation grade, despite all the facilities at his disposal. He was happily married to Manilaxmi. In 1894-95, Balashankar went to Bombay for his law examination, but when he saw the lovely sculpture at the Townhall, he abandoned the idea of appearing at the examination, and started writing ghazals. This very incident is a key to understanding his life and work, his intense love for the language and literature and his gay and zestful temperament. The very attitude towards life brought him misery and unhappiness, and earned him the none-so-praiseworthy remarks like inefficient, upractical and devoid of wisdom. Nevertheless, Gujarati poetry was rewarded with the wealth of his ghazals.

He inherited wealth after his father's death and set up a factory with a view to building a colony to be called 'Kavilok', where the people devoted to literature could live peacefully. It was a fantastic idea involving a lot of money for transforming it into a reality. The factory ran into huge losses reducing him to poverty to the extent that he had to sell his personal effects in order to sustain himself and his family. In addition to Gujarati, the 'masta kavi' was well-versed with Hindi, Sindhi and Sanskrit. He contemplated to make available in Gujarati the translations of the best works in Sanskrit and Persian. In 1887, he started a book-magazine called Bharathhushan and published 18 issues during the period of five years till 1895. This magazine was essentially devoted to poetry, but it also included articles on historical and political topics as well as the translations of the Sanskrit works like Sahityadarpan and Mrichchhakatika and eight ghazals by Hafiz. Being interested in compiling and editing historical material, he got interested in studying ancient coins and edicts. He published some facts about the history of Gujarat and India based on his knowledge of Persian and also some data for historical discussion. He wrote authentic articles on the subject. Editing and publishing literary works was an activity close to his heart. Hence, with the munificent help of the Nawab of Junagadh, he started Itihasmala, a monthly, in June 1896. In this journal, he published translations of historical articles, their discussions and analysis. With the help of another friend, Sankalchand Sheth, he also published for a brief period a monthly called Krishnamahodaya for the Vaishnavas.

Notable among his poetic creations are his long works Klant kavi, Haripremapanchadashi, verse translations of the poems of Hafiz, and Saundarya lahari. Klant kavi, published in 1884, is a poem in the sufi style, written in 100 stanzas in 'shikharini' metre. Just as Narasinhrao's Kusumamala published three years later in 1887, ushered in an era of new lyrical poetry in Gujarati, Klant kavi, which is an admixture of Sanskrit and Persian poetry, is a noteworthy contribution of historical importance. In this early poetry of Balashankar, there is vigour of the boisterous life of a poet in the prime of his youth. At the same time, the language is clumsy and loose, and at certain places there are distortions of the metre. Because of the uninhibited expression of 'shringara', some critics of the time, who insisted on decency, had suggested that his poetry depicted homosexuality and adulterous love. Umashankar Joshi, who has made a special study of this poet, has discussed this point by giving appropriate supporting evidence for his own views. By preparing an edited version of Klant kavi, he introduced the poetry of this powerful poet to Gujarati.

From the point of view of the development of modern Gujarati poetry, Balashankar's notable contribution is in the field of ghazals. There are 18 ghazal compositions in Haripremapanchadashi. The collection is called Panchadashi because each ghazal is in fifteen stanzas. At the time of publication of Panchadashi, the Gujarati ghazal was still in its infancy. The best compositions of Balashankar are noteworthy because of the delicacy of expression. As Umashankar Joshi says, 'masta kavi' Balashankar is the embodiment of the poetic sentiment, who belonged to the early phase of the modern Gujarati poetry.

KANUNGO, BINOD (Oriya; b. 1912) left his studies and joined the Non-cooperation movement of Gandhiji in 1930, and was imprisoned many times by the British Government. His prison life started in Bihar. While in prison, he came in contact with some of our leaders and was inspired him to lead a life of dedication in the service of the country. He joined the Gandhi Seva Sangha.

He is the author of Jatiya kavi Birakishora (Birakishora, the national poet), Lokanayaka Jayaprakash (1975), Deshasevaka Gopabandhu, all being biographies. His other publications are Loka-sahitya (Folk literature, 2nd ed., 1951), Utkalare Gandhiji (Gandhiji in Orissa).

His outstanding work, however, is an encyclopaedia in Oriya entitled Jnanamandala, about 40 volumes of the projected 75 volumes of which have already been edited and published by him. The subjects are treated alphabetically in these volumes. He has dedicated himself to the stupendous work single-handed, and what he has achieved so far is remarkable by any standard. He has not only collected elaborate material for innumerable entries on diverse subjects, but also used them in his work both for the benefit of the general readers of the Encyclopaedia and the neo-literates and semi-literates of the country. He has also published booklets on many of these topics in simple and attractive Oriya. Some of these booklets have also been translated into other Indian languages. Binod Kanungo works with a missionary zeal and the material he has collected during the last four decades will be a valuable asset and store-house for all the Encyclopaedia makers of the country if the institution known as Jnanamandala where he works, functions as a national centre for Encyclopaedia-making in India.

KANURU HEGGADITI (Kannada) is K.V. Puttappa's earliest major work. It was first published in six volumes in 1936 under the title Kanuru Subbamma Heggaditi, but the name Subbamma was dropped in the subsequent editions. It was brought out in a single volume in 1938 and has seen several reprints. This immense work of fictional art is a landmark in the history of Kannada literature. It has 81 separate chapters totalling 637 pages. This is a well-written novel depicting a rural society in the earliest state of transition toward modernisation, and just opening its eyes to the stench and stagnation around, shuffling its feet to rise, and realising the dark mire of superstition and feudal economy it has taken for granted so long. With admirable care and restraint, Kuvempu (K.V. Puttappa) shapes his well-made story with malice towards none and condemning nothing. He shows and leaves the judgement to the reader. In his lyrics he reveals moral commitment to sensitive aesthetic life of receptivity to nature's beauty and messages of harmony and love it implies. The novel, being a depiction of Malnad life, has a lot of nature writ large on its pages; but this is also 'nature red in tooth and claw'. The stagnant feudalistic economy lovelessly hangs on nature's breast for bare existence and gives back little; and this lack of love and total indifference to nature's beauty and bounty results in its own stagnation and decay. Hoovayya, the one sensitive educated lover of nature, pushed into this confined space, finds himself alienated. His nearly vain attempt to empathise with its people meets with unfriendly resistance; but he symbolises hope, a remote hope. The course of history has changed the countryside and what appeared remote hope in the novel is now realised, though not without its own constraints. The novel is a monument to a phase of transition and, therefore, has a historical significance which lifts its interest from time-bound art to timelessness. It becomes an immortal pattern of history. Given these conditions, life necessarily is shaped, thus, by the shaping forces of time itself.

This objectivised (but not rarefied) existence is depicted with rare artistry. The novel is multi-centred, the main centre being the Headman of Kanuru, Chandrayya Gouda. Basically a good man, he commits a number of tactical blunders, the main one being his third marriage to a very young girl, Subbamma. Not so affluent, but enjoying the social position of feudal "gentlemen", are four more families confined to the narrow space of three or four Malnad villages, aristocrats in name and by caste, some of whom are neck-deep in debt. Subbamma is the daughter of Peddegouda, one such caste aristocrat, who has to bear the burden of social dignity, but who does not know where his next meal will come from. There is the next generation of this caste aristocracy of landowners. They are not generally given to education, but meekly accept the life of paternal inheritance. They depend on parents for their daily bread and timely marriage. Hoovayya, the nephew and Ramayya, the son from a dead wife of Chandrayya Gouda, have the benefit of city education, but are poles apart in their nature. Hoovayya is a liberal idealist, but not yet touched by leftist egalitarianism. In inheritance matters, he accepts the share of his father's property as settled by uncle Chandrayya Gouda without haggle and philosophically as what God gave, though he knows he is being cheated. The lion's share is retained by Chandrayya Gouda. More serious and painful is that the coveted hand of Sita whom Hoovayya loves, goes to Ramayya, the inheritor of Chandrayya's property. This is decided by her father, though her love for Hoovayya is known to him. She goes hysterical and refuses to share Ramayya's bed. She is subjected to torture and humiliation to rid her of 'ghostly' possession. Hoovayya has to suffer the knowledge of her suffering, but submits to the social order, withdrawing into himself. Illiterate Subbamma suffers torture at the hands of her old spouse Chandrayya Gouda and walks out on him to stay for a time with her father. Chandrayya sends for her through his foreman and labour manager, Seregara Kangappa Setty. Setty is a known debauch, who has an eye on the young wife. After Chandrayya's death, the young wife takes over the headmanship. For a time she has to struggle to establish her authority which she does by increasing the superstitious rituals for petty deities. But once ensconced, she runs the estate with remarkable efficiency, surprising in such an illiterate repressed woman. But alas, she ultimately succumbs to the allure of Rangappa Setty, gets with child and dies in childbirth. Whatever the tragic denouement, and however unimportant she is in the rest of the novel, she is a dynamic, developing character, revealing surprising features of her hidden nature whenever she gets a chance for self-expression. The novel is rightly named after her. Almost all characters in the novel are 'static', because their perception itself is limited to their field. But only Subbamma has the inherent quality of leadership (suppressed for a long time in a man-centred static feudal society). But it must be remembered that she alone was capable of walking out on her husband, which even the cultured and good-natured Sita was not; and she officiates on her estate for better. Not even Hoovayya grows into a world of action. At best he can grow into intellectual withdrawal till he becomes a poet or a yogi effecting reconciliations and maintaining status quo with all his idealism. He does not mind his inheritance however small. Chandrayya Gouda has effective leadership qualities, but his most progressive act is the sending of the two nephews to school in the city. His potential for the good and the progressive is severely limited by his drink, debauchery and wealth. With the priest Venkappayya, he is the most regressive force in feudalistic society. Ramayya, despite his schooling, accepts the order and becomes small to adjust himself to the framework of his role. He is a contrast to Hoovayya. The aristocrats form a Shudra Sangha chaired by Chandrayya Gouda. Not unexpectedly its first meeting itself turns farcical. Even so, it is a symbol of the progressive impact, however faint. But, in dumb Subbamma, a tragic failure, Kuvempu has seen the flowering of a character's potentiality, no doubt within the limits of estate management. She is the real heroine of the novel in the Lucasian sense of the term, despite failure. The limits of her achievement are inherent in the social situation; but it is achievement.

This is over-simplified. To feel the real impact of the complex pattern of the story, the living presence of nature and setting, the activity of the servants and labours the reign of dark superstition, drink, and debauchery, the repression of confined environment and irredeemable fatality of the feudal times, one should read the novel itself. It has been rightly pointed out that the entire Malnad life is the undivided hero of this novel.

S.M.P.

KANYASHULKAM (Telugu) by Gurujada Apparao, is a play which has social reform as its main theme. The locale of the play being Orissa, the language of the region was liberally used throughout the play. There is a rich variety of action. Thus, the three elements of the play—theme, language and character—are so nicely integrated here that the total effect produced on the audience is overwhelming. The scene of action, no doubt, is limited to two districts only (Vizianagaram and Vishakhapatnam); but because of the noble theme, the play itself assumes wider and almost universal importance both in time and space. This in one way accounts for the popularity of the play in Telugu. As a perfect piece of literary art, Kanyashulkam bids fair to be admired as the crest jewel of the modern Telugu literature.

Girisham, Madhuravani and Ramappantulu are the leading characters of the play. Agnihotravadhanulu and Saujanya Rao, by their importance, are close behind the leading characters. Venkatesam, Putakullamma, Butchamma, Meenakshi, Head Constable, etc. are the minor characters.

This play had its origin in the social necessities of the times. During the later part of the 19th century, many social evils stalked the country in general and Andhra Pradesh in particular. Dowry system, child marriage and licensed prostitution were but a few of them. A follower of Veeresalingam Pantulu, the Andhra counterpart of Raja Rammohan Roy, Gurujada Apparao was also a reformer through literature. His play Kanyashulkam is his major work. "Its characters are living and they are bubbling with life," wrote Narla Venkateshwararao in Parishodhana, a literary magazine. This in fact is the secret of the grand success and popularity of this play all over the State.

Girisham, the hero of the play, is a man of many parts. His philosophy of life is that man should be, first and last, a worlding, and that he should enable himself to live well with neither a job nor education. He starts his career by placing himself in the house of Putakullamma, and well in her good books. "No life without patience" is his motto in life. Even without leaving the roof of Putakullamma, he wins over Madhuravani, a noted prostitute of the place. Finding him with Madhuravani, once Putakullamma beats him with a broomstick.

Girisham now changes his tactics. He now goes to Krishnarayapuram house in the capacity of a tutor to Venkatesham, son of Venkamma and Agnihotravadhanulu. Butchamma is the widowed sister of Venkatesham. "If I were the father, I would get her remarried and earn name", declares Girisham. That is only a noose set by him to win the heart of Butchamma.

Just at that time Agnihotravadhanulu throws a bomb-shell at his family by revealing the proposed betrothal of his younger daughter Subbamma to the eighty-year old Lubdhavadhanulu. All the other members of the family oppose this. On the pretension of a plan to foil Subbamma's betrothal, Girisham elopes with Butchamma and reaches Vishakhapatnam. Here he tries to secure a certificate from the leading social reformer of the place Saujanya Rao to the effect that he and Butchamma are remarried. With the timely intervention of Madhuravani his plan is frustrated. "Damn it! Tables turned then. Let me be off", so saying Girisham quits the scene. Thereafter we hear of him no more.

Girisham, by any standards of judgement, is a funny character; his is a career as unpredictable as the fate of a kite snapped in its thread and left to the winds. He has hidden his troubles under the cover of humour. His life is a boat which has lost its moorings. Many a time he has lied, and many a time he has boasted. At times he pretends humility and at other times displays courage. He humours some people and overrules some others. At times he plans to surmount his own difficulties. All his antics are only to eke out his livelihood. He neither dupes nor hurts anybody. His is a typical instance of a young man who has lost his way and yet strives to reach his goal.

Madhuravani is a prostitute by profession. Both Ramappantulu and Girisham patronise her for sometime. She plays a notable part in shattering the marriage contemplated between Subbamma and Lubdhavadhanulu. At times she outspokenly declares that to help others is her goal in life. With reference to Girisham she once pleads with others. "Please let him live". For all the legally valuable information she has furnished to Saujanya Rao, she in return to her services insists on getting a kiss from him. When finally after so much of hesitancy and deliberation, Saujanya Rao is prepared to kiss her, she stops him saying, "Sir, it is my mother's injunction not to spoil one who is not already spoiled. Hence I desist from accepting your kiss and you are thus saved of the trouble." Her nobility has immortalised her name. Even Saujanya Rao, who has a strong hatred for prostitutes, admires Madhuravani's character and shakes hands with her. She has saved Butchamma's character from being soiled at the hands of Girisham.

KAPADIA, KUNDANIK (Gujarati, b. 1927) is a Gujarati novelist and short story writer. She edited a literary digest, Navanit. She is married to Makarand Dave, a Gujarati poet. She writes a refined prose which has a lyrical quality. Vadhu ne vadhu sundara (More and more beautiful, 1967) is a collection of her short stories. They are simple, suggestive stories. She is not for experiments, nor is she in search of new forms, nor, at the same time, tradition-bound. In this collection, there are two stories entitled 'Shodh' (Search) and 'Jharnun' (Stream) which have been received well by the readers. While in 'Shodh' it is a constant search for happiness in life, the 'Jharnun' depicts the flow of life like that of a stream meandering its way on to the goal. Parodh thatam pahelam (Before the dawn, 1968) is a reflective novel in which she has presented poignant images of human suffering and search. In the novel Agan pipasa (Burning thirst, 1972), she has depicted the inner life of a youth, longing for love and peace within. Her other works include Dvar ane dival (A door and a wall, 1964), Premnan ansu (Tears of love, 1953), Kagal ni hodi (Paperboat, 1978). She has received the Sahitya Akademi award (1986) for her novel Saat Pagian Aakashman.

KAPALKUNDALA (Bengali) is the second major novel by Bankimchandra Chatterjee. It was first published in 1866. The heroine is Kapalkundala, a woman brought up in the seclusion of nature and away from social life. Her reaction as she comes into contact with the normal social life is the main focus of the novel. From the account given by Purnachandra Chatterjee, the younger brother of the novelist, it seems that the main theme of the novel came to the mind of the author almost six years before it was actually written. Bankimchandra was then working as a district magistrate in Nagna (modern Kontai), where he came into contact with a Kapalika sanyasi (an ascetic who is a follower of esoteric religious practice). Bankimchandra had once asked his friend Dinabandhu Mitra, the dramatist, what the reaction of a girl brought up by sanyasi in a seaside forest away from the normal world would be if she were brought into society at the age of sixteen. This question constitutes the basic theme of Kapalkundala. Kapalkundala, a foundling brought up from her infancy by a Kapalika, lives with him in a mysterious dense forest near the sea. Here Nabakumar, a young man and the hero of the story is deserted by his fellow travellers on a return voyage from the sea. Kapalkundala saves Nabakumar from the scimitar of the Kapalika who wants to sacrifice him for the completion of some religious rites. Then to save Kapalkundala from the wrath of the Kapalika she is married to Nabakumar by Adikari, another priest in a nearby Kali temple. In the course of the journey back home with his bride, Nabakumar suddenly meets Motibibi alias Padmavati, his long-lost wife, now converted to Islam. Motibibi, who till now was a woman of easy virtue and a coquette and lived in the harem of Selim (Jahangir), falls in love with Nabakumar and wants to possess him. She leaves her life in Agra behind and settles down in Saptagram, the ancestral village of Nabakumar where he now lives with Kapalkundala. By a clever use of the craft the novelist brings over also the Kapalika there. So we have all the main characters playing a part in the final evolution of the plot. The Kapalika is guided by revenge, Nabakumar by suspicion of infidelity on the part of Kapalkundala, Motibibi by passionate desire, and Kapalkundala by indifference to anything worldly, and all these factors put together bring forth the tragic end in which tossed up and down by a high summer wind, the bodies of Kapalkundala and Nabakumar float down the stream of the ever-flowing Ganges. Though written only a year after the publication of his first novel, Durgeshnandini, Kapalkundala has the mark of a confident professional. It is one of the author's shortest novels and perhaps surpasses all the rest in intensity of emotion and compactness. The structure of the novel is dramatic. It is divided into four parts which can be described as acts of a drama. Most of the chapters are rather short though symmetrical and proportionate. The character of Kapalkundala, totally uninhibited by any social prejudices and customs and an embodiment of Nature is unique in the history of Bengali fiction. The novel was translated into German in 1886 and into Sanskrit in 1937. It has also been translated into several Indian languages such as Gujarati, Tamil, Telugu and Hindi.

KAPILA (Sanskrit), an ancient sage, is believed by Indian tradition to be the early propounder of the Sankhya system of philosophy. The word 'kapila' which primarily means reddish colour or a person having tawny hair or tawny complexion, most probably indicates the complexion or the colour of the hair of the sage.

Kapila has been mentioned with great veneration as a great sage who has attained the highest spiritual wisdom; in ancient texts such as the Shvetashvatara upanishad, the Mahabharata, the Ramayana, etc. His system, viz. Samkhya and its basic tenets also have been referred to in those texts.

Many legends and myths have grown around Kapila's personality but his historicity cannot be doubted since his existence as a man of profound knowledge and original thinking have been corroborated not only by mythological texts like the Bhagavatapurana and the Harivamsha but also by Buddhist works, both Sanskrit and Pali, such as Ashvaghosha's Saundarananda (I. 57) and the Paramattha jotika commentary (vol. I, p. 353) on the Suttanipata. Both the works accept that Kapilavastu (Pali: Kapilavatthu), the place of birth of Gautama the Buddha, derived its name from Kapila, the sage.

KAPILAR-KAR, BALAKRISHNA

The mythological lore gives different names of his parents. For instance, according to the Bhagavatapurana, Kardama the sage was his father and Devahuti, the daughter of Manu, his mother and Kapila himself was an incarnation of Vishnu. Gaudapada, the commentator on the Sankhyakarika, says that Kapila was one of the seven 'manasaputra-s' of Brahma. The Mahabharata considers him to be an incarnation of Agni. As regards the place of his birth and abode, all the different traditions may lead to the conclusion that he was born near a lake called Bindusara in the Himalayas, lived for some time in the tarai region where the city of Kapilavastu was later built by the Shakyas, and passed the last phase of his life near the land where the Bhagirathi flows into the Bay of Bengal.

The Sankhya system is generally regarded as rationalism or realism because it analyses the nature (prakriti) into twenty-four subtle or gross elements. But it must be borne in mind that the Sankhya metaphysics accepts the existence of individual souls (purushas) as the twentieth entity and holds freedom from all sufferings (duhkha-nivritti) through spiritual emancipation (moksha or nihshreyasa) as the goal. It has always been a point of heated controversy whether Kapila was a theist or an atheist, i.e. whether he accepted a creator God. One of the aphorisms in the Sankhyapravachanasutra which is sometimes attributed to him without much justification, on the face of contradicting evidence, of course, explicitly states that God (Ishvara) cannot be established by any means of valid cognition (pramanabhavan na tatsiddhih v. 12). In ancient and classical India Kapila's Sankhya was a predominant school of Indian philosophy and its basic tenets such as the five gross elements, five subtle elements, five senses, etc. were accepted by other schools.

It is obvious that no authentic text has come down to us from Kapila but two aphoristic works, viz. i) the Tattvasamasasutra in twenty-five sutras and ii) the Sankhyapravachana-sutra in six chapters are attributed to him. It is probable that the former work is earlier and represents the basic teachings of Kapila. There are several commentaries on the Tattvasamasasutra and the Sankhyapravachana-sutra and the Samkhyaprachinabhashya of Vijñānabhikṣha (16th cent.) is the most comprehensive exposition of the latter work but the Vedāntin commentator has gone out of the way to give a theistic twist to his text. The most authentic work on the system, however, is the Sankhya-karika of Ishvarakrishna.

It is known from many classical works, particularly from the Karika that Kapila left behind him, a distinguished tradition, beginning with his pupil Asuri and Asuri's pupil Panchashikha. His philosophy influenced the contemporary thought and literature.

S.M.

KAPILAR (Tamil) is one of the outstanding wits of the Sangam age. His verse stands out both in quantity and in quality. He is represented liberally in all the Sangam anthologies. He is the author of 206 poems: the 7th section of Patirruppattu, Kurinjippattu in the anthology of Patirruppattu, verses on Kurinji in Ainkurunuru and in Kalittokai and several verses in Narrinai, Kuruntokai, Akananuru and Purananuru. Contemporary references to him are several and full of love and respect. He shows close acquaintance with many of the kings and chieftains of whom the Chera king Chelvakkatunko Valiyatan and the chieftain Pari are worth mentioning. After Pari's death, he took care of his daughters until he gave them away to Malaiyar. His Kurinjippattu was written to instruct an Aryan king Prahattan, the principles of Tamil poetry. His list of 99 varieties of flowers in this poem is superb. He is supposed to be a brahmin by caste and native of Tiruvattur in the Pandiyan kingdom. The legend that he was the brother of Tiruvalluvar and Avvaiyar is not believed now. He was par excellence the poet of the hill region, Kurinji. Judged by modern standards, he was veritably a king among Tamil poets.

Calcutta University and taught in high schools. In 1927 he established the Saraswata Press at Cuttack. His first works were: Chandragupta (a historical drama, 1926) and Phulachangudi (Basket of flowers, 1928) which is an Oriya version of an English original. Then he published Nuapatha (New lessons), Charupatha (Fine lessons, 1940) and the journals Jahnamamu (The uncle moon, 1932) and Madhukosha (Treasury of honey, 1944)—all these for children. KAR, BIMAL (Bengali; b. 1921), is an eminent short-story writer and novelist. He spent his childhood and early youth in Bihar and some of the adjoining areas of West Bengal. Two of his earliest stories were published in 1944 in a now defunct journal, Prabartak. His first important story was Indur (The rat), published in the periodical Uttarsuri in 1952. The story attracted popular notice and also the attention of the editor of Desh, an influential Bengali weekly. Since 1952 he became a regular contributor to Desh and Anandabazar Patrika where most of his short stories and some of his important novels have been published. He joined the editorial staff of Desh in 1954. In most of his stories and novels he stays close to his familiar settings in the suburban areas of Bihar, though one of his most successful novels, Dewal ('The wall'), a trilogy, deals with the impact of the World War II on lower middle class life in Calcutta. He usually follows the omniscient narrator's point of view, but in some of his stories like 'Niraja' 'Sahachari', 'Machhi', and the novel Asamay (1972), he used the first person singular method of narration with remarkable skill. In his persistent preoccupation with death he was probably influenced by some of his traumatic experiences in childhood and his experiences in Calcutta during the war years. In his writings he is less concerned with plot or incidents than with the inner perceptions, tensions, and self-questionings of his characters and with the creation of a mood or situation through short, suggestive dialogues and controlled understatements. His power as a short-story writer lies in his bold handling of submerged motivations and explorations of certain tabooed areas of human desires and relationships. He has a keen awareness of the beauty and the fulness of life, but his awareness is constantly darkened by a sense of insecurity, anxiety and panic, loneliness, disease and death. In his novels like Purna-apurna (1967) and Asamay there is a growing conviction that however imperfect we may be in our apprehension of the fulness of life, we can have some glimpses of the full circle of perfection through the broken arcs of love and friendship or dedication to some ideals of service to our fellow-mortals. Though apparently simple and unstudied, his prose is subtle in its power of evocation and emotive suggestions. He has added a new psychological depth and visionary dimension to Bengali fiction. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1975. Some of his stories and novels have been translated into Hindi, Malayalam, Gujarati, Assamese and Oriya.

KAR, BISVANATH (Oriya; b. 1864, d. 1934) was one of the greatest pioneers of the nineteenth century Renaissance. He was one among those who were acting as torch-bearers when Orissa was encircled by darkness of ignorance. He was born in a conservative brahmin family of the village Mulabasanta in Cuttack District of Orissa. He began his traditional education, being encouraged by his father Narayana in the village Parlour with lessons of Sanskrit epic poetry, drama and grammar. Afterwards he learnt English in Pyarimohan Academy and Mission School of Cuttack. During this period his progressive mind was disturbed by the many superstitions and taboos of Hindu religion. He could not reconcile himself to the idea of Hindu idol worship. So he took the revolutionary step to reform the Hindu society being converted to the Brahma cult of Raja Rammohun Roy.

Bisvanath was great innovator, influential editor and eminent prose writer of modern Oriya literature. He was famous as the writer of Bibidha prabandha (Miscellaneous essays) which was published prior to the publication of the magazine Utkal sahitya (1897) of which he was the founder editor. Most of the essays of this book were published during 19th century in the famous literary magazine Utkala prabha and Sambalpur hitaishini. In these essays the writer dreamt of a reformed and enlightened society. He wished there the flowering of free thought instead of the predominance of scriptures. Everywhere he was deeply concerned with the humanitarian thought. He also gave a call to fight against the humiliation of womenfolk, ignorance of the man, racial discrimination, child-marriage, drinking habit and traffic in women. With forceful argument he expressed his views in clear and simple Oriya language. For almost half a century his literary monthly, Utkal sahitya, was the literary mouth-piece of Orissa. This journal was responsible for 'Sabuja-movement' in Oriya literature towards the second quarter of the twentieth century. For years he used to write in the Utkal sahitya under the heading: 'Bibidha prasanga'. He also published Satya samadhan. He was nominated by the then government as a member of the Bihar-Orissa Council. He will be ever remembered for his strong faith in God, continuing literary work, free thought and attractive and impressive prose writing.

KARAIKKAL AMMAIYAR (Tamil; 5th century A.D.), the mother from Karaikkal is one of the canonised saints in Tamilnad Shaivism and her story is sung by Sekkilar in 66 fine verses. She was born as Punitavati in a deeply religious merchant family of Karaikkal and in time was married to a young merchant Paramadatta. One day the young man sent home two mango fruits received by him from some client. That day a Shaiva mendicant came to their house for food. She gave away one of the fruits to him along with rice for food. When her husband came for lunch, she gave him the other. Remembering the two fruits, he called for the other also. She did not immediately tell him that she had served it away to a visitor but prayed to Shiva and received another fruit. When she gave him this one, he found it much sweeter and asked her how she got it. Then she could not help telling him all that took place and, in a fit of disbelief, the young man bade her pray again and get another fruit from Shiva. The frightened girl did so, got another, and when he received it from her, it just vanished. He was now frightened and not willing to continue his life with Punitavati whom he now took for an angel; he quietly slipped away from the city by ship. After a successful trade, he returned to Madurai married again and settled there. He had a girl child whom he named Punitavati after his first wife. This news naturally reached Karaikkal and when she was taken to him, he prostrated before her along with his second wife and child saying that 'this was an angel from heaven'. Such an act from a husband towards the wife was not heard of in the Hindu society. On this she gave up her body by the grace of God. According to the legend, she took on a ghost form, went to Kailas and had the unique honour of being addressed as 'Oh Mother' by Shiva Himself. From that day she became Karaikkal Ammai (the Mother from Karaikkal). At His bidding she went to Tiru Alamkadu, a shrine near Madras and witnessing the Urdhva Tandava of Nataraja there, her soul attained eternal rest at His feet.

Ammal has sung three poems in a total of 143 verses. The first poem 'Arbhutat-try-antadi' consists of 100 verses in the venba metre, with the antadi arrangement, a familiar feature in Tamil literary history (Antadi is the arrangement of beginning a verse in a long series with the last phrase, word or syllable of the previous verse). Here she enunciates an absolute advaita philosophy. The second poem is in 20 verses, 'Tiru-rattai-mani-malai' garland of twin gems, the venba and the kalitturai metres alternating. This continues the same philosophy. Her third poems in the two decades is on the dance of Lord Nataraja at Tiru Alamkadu which express the joy of a simple child at witnessing the awe-inspiring dance of Shiva on the cremation ground.

Her songs form part of the 11th book of the Shaiva canon. They are the natural and soulful outpourings of an extremely joyous but simple being which had a blissful experience of divine manifestation. They are held in great esteem being called 'Arbhuta padikam' and 'Mutta padikam', the songs of the Devaram singers being considered as the younger padikam.

KARAKA, D.F. (English; b. 1911, d. 1974), was educated in Bombay and Oxford. While at Oxford, he was the President of Oxford Union. He published his autobiographical work I Go West in 1938 (London). A brilliant Journalist, he was initially a War Correspondent for The Bombay Chronicle. His writings are mostly journalistic in nature ranging from travelogue, Chunking Diary (Bombay, 1943) and With the 14th Army (Bombay, 1944) to the current affairs. His important works include: For Everything Indian: The Tragic Story of the Bankruptcy of Wisdom (Bombay, 1944), This India (Bombay, 1945), containing observations on journalism, samples of administration, life, sex, morals, freedom, Out of Dust (1942), Oh You English (Allahabad, 1945) with ironic sketches of British life, This Fight for Freedom (Bombay, 1940), I have Shed My Tears: A Candid View of Resurgent India (New York, 1947), Nehru: The Lotus Eater from Kashmir (London, 1953), Betrayal in India (London, 1955), Are Bhar: Being reflections on the Problems of Bharat. That is, India—an ironic satire on contemporary social life, Besides, he has attempted two historical monographs: The Fabulous Mogul: Nizam of Hyderabad, (London, 1955) and Shivaji (Bombay, 1969).

He has also written three novels. Just Flesh (Bombay, 1941)—perhaps the only novel up to his time by an Indian with a wholly western setting containing only British characters, There lay the City (Bombay, 1943) located in Bombay against the background of the second World War and We Never Die (Bombay, 1944).

Karaka wields a facile pen. His thumbnail sketches are vivid and lively and his satire, though pungent, reflects the irony of the current situation.

KARAKABITA (Oriya) is a collection of poems by Gopabandhu Das (1877-1928), popularly known as Utkalamani (The jewel of Orissa), poet, editor, social worker and famous freedom fighter and mass leader. Though basically a poet, he could not devote much time to poetry due to his more pressing involvements in the contemporary socio-political problems under the leadership of Gandhiji. Yet the poems that he wrote blazed a new trail of strong nationalism in Oriya poetry, and projected the dignity of man and the need of offering sacrifices and services for the benefit of mankind. His more relevant poems have been collected in three volumes, entitled Abakash chinta (Leisurely meditations), Karakabita (The poems from the prison) and Bandir atmakatha (The soliloquies of a prisoner), the last two mainly containing the poems that he wrote while undergoing prison sentence for taking part in the non-cooperation movement between 1922-1924.

Karakabita contains 13 poems. Though all the poems were written in the prison, all do not have specific references to the prison. In fact the poems can be divided into three or four broad groups. The most important group, of course, includes those poems that directly make references to the prison, and where the poet's feelings and meditations are seen against the restraining situations inside the prison. Such poems show a great urge on the part of the poet to free himself mentally on the one hand, and on the other, a sharp irritation at the fact that he has been most unjustly and most arbitrarily denied his rightful claims for freedom, equality and justice. The poems are 'Bandir biraha byatha' (The prisoner's feelings of separation), 'Bandir sandhya bhakti' (The prisoner's evening prayers) 'Bandir swadesh chinta' (The prisoner's thoughts for his country), 'Bandir sandhya bhabane' (The evening thoughts of the prisoner) and 'Pitruksha tarpan' (The offerings to the forefathers). At times, in these poems, the poet's irritation turns into anger when he contemplates how the whole country suffers under a self-motivating, fiendish foreign rule, which must be overthrown. In such cases the tone of the poem becomes open and direct, and the poetry becomes like a strident declaration, of a vow to destroy the evil designs of the foreign ruler, as in 'Pitruksha tarpan'. But the anger is not the last word. Even inside the prison, and in the midst of all pervading gloom, the poet dreams of a new resurgent India.

There are other types of poems, such as, an elegy which he wrote after hearing the death of a friend, a poem of deep passion expressing intimate feelings of love, a poem on Nilachal, that is, Puri, the seat of Lord Jagannath where he eulogizes the atmosphere of truth, equality and fraternity, and a group of about four poems, dealing with semi-religious mystical feelings, very personal in a way, communicating those subtle but strong threads that bind the individual's deepest emotions, almost like a love-relationship, with a transcendental all-pervading spirit.

The most popular poem in the collection is 'Bandir swadesh chinta' which is also the longest. It has an interesting format in the sense that it is an address poem, like an ode, where the wind is addressed as the cool, soft wind that blows occasionally through the chinks in the door. And as the wind blows from the south and the poet's own room faces the south (he was in the Hazaribagh jail in Bihar, towards north of Orissa), he presumes the wind to have crossed over the places he has known and has been familiar with, and recreates the same places in his mind's eye one after another. The poem begins with references to his own birth-place a small, shady village on the bank of Bhargavi, in Puri district, where the poet remembers many small details as well as the cosy intimate family life he had. Then as the movement of the wind begins from the southern point of Orissa, across Orissa, towards the north, the poet tracks the wind's movement and also at times, directs the wind where and how to move (almost like the banished lover in Kalidasa's Meghaduta, and goes on giving an account of places, more or less, in the proper geographical sequence. Thus beginning with Mahendra hills (the crown of Manjusha) it comes over the Ganjam (beautiful gardens full of tasty fruits) and to the river Rushikulya (like a slim girl), and to the lake Chilika (A "full grown beauty" with "blue long tresses") and then to Srikshetra Puri to blue hills, Lord Jagannath and the sea, where the poet wants to know what instruction the Lord has sent for him, and whether the Lord's devotees and people at all think of Swaraj. Then the wind moves over to Satyabadi, to the poet's own ashram in the midst of sweet-scented arbour and to the temple of Radha and Krishna, where it plays pranks with the divine lovers. Then comes Bhubaneswar and Khandagiri, showing the immense glory of the past, but now all 'broken and ruined', and then to Cuttack, the river Mahanadi and the fort Barabati, where the same feelings of past glory continue along with an immensity of present ruin. Then the wind spreads over to 'dark country', the ex-feudatory states, where people suffer through poverty, mal-administration and injustice and where not a single king realizes that he exists for the good of the people. Finally the wind moves to the west, to Hirakhand (Hirakud) and Sambalpur, the poet's favourite places, where the wind, to avoid heat, 'embraces the cool waters of Mahanadi'. The poem ends when the poet welcomes the wind once again, and hopes that it will not only cool his burnt heart, but also take away his feelings of loss and depression.

Karakabita contains fine pieces of poetry and it initiated a new powerful nationalist trend as a whole in Oriya poetry. But it is doubly important because of the stature of Utkalamani Gopabandhu as a great leader and nationalist. The feelings of the poet have been integrated with the convictions and commitments of the nationalist leader, and together they have made Karakabita almost a legendary book.

KARAN GHELO (Gujarati), written by Nandshanker Tuljashankar (1835-1905), is the first novel of Gujarati literature published in 1866. It is also the first historical novel. Nandshanker was employed in Education Department of the Bombay government. At the instance of the then education inspector, Russel, he wrote Karan ghelo. The work is based on the fall of the last Rajput king of Gujarat, Karan Vaghelo who, because of his erratic nature, was called 'Karan Ghelo' (mad), instead of Vaghelo. On seeing Rupsundari, the wife of his minister, Madhav, he is infatuated, and abducts her. Madhav takes revenge by inviting Allauddin Khilji, the Sultan of Delhi, to attack Gujarat. Allauddin attacks Karan and defeats him. Karan flees to Baglan, a small state in the south, and seeks asylum, where he dies in disgrace.

The aim of the author is to show that immorality ends in annihilation. When the author wrote this work, the people of Surat, native place of the author, indulged in immoral acts. The author, through the medium of the novel, conveys to the people the tragic end of the persons who indulged in immoral acts.

This is the first romantic work in Gujarati literature. It, however, suffers from many shortcomings. The author, instead of Karan Vaghelo, depicts his contemporaries, and his characters do too much sermonising on social reforms. However, the author is at his best when he describes the beauty of nature, historical places and the wars; nonetheless, he falters when he comes to depict the inner conflict of his characters.

Karan ghelo made much impact on the people and many historical novels were written in imitation. The novel was translated into Marathi as well.

KARAN SINGH (English; b. 1931) is a distinguished writer, thinker and a symbol of national consciousness. He is the son of the late Maharaja Hari Singh, formerly the ruler of the state of Jammu and Kashmir. Owing to his royal lineage, he was appointed the Regent of Jammu & Kashmir in 1949 by his father. He took over this position during the turbulent phase that marked the end of a feudal order and the beginning of the democratic process. He continued as Head of the state for eighteen years. He was christend Sadar-i-Riyasat from 1952-65 and was made Governor of the state from 1965 to March, 1969. He was Union Minister for Tourism and Civil Aviation for sometime and then became Minister for Health and Family Planning in 1973. He is an M.P. in the present Lok Sabha. He took his M.A. in Political Science from Delhi University from where he was awarded Ph.D. for his work on Sri Aurobindo. His collections of works include Aurobindo, Prophet of Indian Nationalism (1970), Contemporary Essays (1971), Towards a New India (Vikas, 1973), Population, Poverty and the Future of India (1975), In defence of Religion (1978), Heir Apparent (Oxford University Press, 1982), The Glory of Amarnath is his first literary work. Collections of his poems are Varied Rhythms (1960), Shadow and Sunlight (1962), Welcome, the Moonshine (1965). He has also translated from Dogri into English in his Anthology of Dogri and Pahari Songs. He was elected the President, Author's Guild of India in 1962.

Karan Singh was deeply influenced by the writings of Bertrand Russell, Aldous Huxley and the Vedas. His philosophical inquiry coincides with the quest for the spirit of his country and its people. According to him, the malady with the present age is the moral and spiritual crisis. The changing Indian society is becoming growingly materialistic and there is corruption in political institutions. Despite industrialisation, the gap between the rich and the poor is wide. Casteism, regionalism are still major factors in elections. he advocates the preservation of India's rich heritage of the past and the search for its relevance to contemporary socio-economic reality. He also believes in Aurobindo's concept of evolutionary man, importance of forests, wild life for human survival. His human outlook is a marked feature of his travelogues and poems. He pinpoints that India's strength is to be derived from the resurgence of her culture and traditions.

KARANDIKAR, GOVIND VINAYAK (Marathi; b. 1918) is popularly known as Vinda Karandikar. He is a prolific writer in almost all forms of literature. Acclaimed as one of the trend-setters of the modern Marathi poetry, he was a teacher of English at S.I.E.S. College, Bombay at the time of his retirement.

Poetry, short-short-essays, critical appreciations and translations of some English works found special favour with his imagination.

Swed-Ganga (1949), Mrudgandh (1954), Dhrupad (1959) Jatak (1968), Sanhit (1975) and Virupika (1980) are his famous trend-setting works of poetry. From 1961 to 1977, seven more collections of his poems for children were published. His poetry is known for its forceful, free and fearless search into the secrets of human existence.

His Marathi translation from Butcher's English version of Aristotle's Poetics is the only work of its kind in the Marathi language. His translations of Goethe's Faust in 1965 and Shakespeare's King Lear in 1974 speak for his skill in translation.

Parampara ani navata (1967) is the collection of his critical essays.

He is a winner of four central government and 10 state government prizes for different books and also a winner of Soviet Land-Nehru Award and Senior Full-bright Fellowship.

He is presently occupied with the translation in simple Marathi verse of Amrithanubhava, a great philosophical epic work by Sant Jnaneshwar.

KARANTH, SHIVARAM (Kannada; b. 1902), whose novel Mookajjiyakanasugalu won the Jnanapith Award in 1978 is not merely an eminent Kannada novelist. His interests are diverse and his achievement as an author many-sided. The forty novels he has published so far form about half his work. The other half is taken by non-fiction writing which comprises of a three volume book of knowledge for children, a four volume encyclopaedia of modern science for the laymen, books on Indian architecture and painting besides a compendium on Art. His work in the field of the folk-arts, especially the yaksagana, an indigenous form of dance-drama, has won international recognition. Books of travel, an autobiography followed by three stout volumes of memoirs, short stories, essays and sketches in addition to plays and other occasional writings add upto a voluminous and varied output. Diverse interests, quest for knowledge and experience, an open mind, sensitiveness to beauty in every form, a deeply humanist urge to enrich life in all possible ways have contributed to the unique many-sidedness of his personality and performance as a writer.

All that can enlighten the mind of the common man and educate him towards achieving for himself and others an enriched way of living has been the domain of his study and work. Educating the common man, young or old, to understand and appreciate the good things that life offers so that he can respond creatively to everything around him and thus make living worthwhile has been his primary concern and the main impulse behind the voluminous body of writing he has done during the last half a century and more. A rare combination of intellect and imagination, coupled with a sensitiveness to all that is elevating in nature, life and the fine arts has made him a creative writer of a very wide range and diverse dimensions. But he is first and foremost, and educator of men who has tried to wean their mind from all kinds of superstitions, intellectual, moral and spiritual, which ignorance breeds and has upheld those humanist values that can sustain and enrich personal, social and national life.

Born in 1902 in the coastal district of South Kanara in a middle class family of moderate means, Karanth responded to the call of the Mahatma Gandhi during the first Non-cooperation Movement. He gave up university education to become an ardent propagandist of the Gandhian ideals of celibacy, prohibition Khaddar, social uplift and self-reliance. These years of wandering and encounter with the realities of living cured much of Gandhian idealistic ardour but developed in him habits of disciplined and dedicated work in every sphere that many contribute to better living for the fellow men. His early, though short-lived, experiment in educative journalism made him a studious writer and gave him the occupation of his life. Doing it alone has been with him a way of life and thought. No amount of strain of work has ever deterred him for undertaking what he has considered worth doing. During the thirties he compiled, wrote and where necessary illustrated, singlehanded and published a three-volume book of knowledge for children called Bala-prapancha. Twentyeight years later, he performed a larger feat in compiling information for writing and publishing, all by himself, a four-volume encyclopaedia for modern science, both theoretical and applied, for the laymen, called Vijnana-prapancha. These seven volumes comprising nearly four thousand large-size printed pages should bear enough testimony to his indefatigable and self-reliant work and to his persistent concern for the education of the common man.

Love of nature and the fine arts, especially painting, sculpture and architecture, has literally drawn him to the ends of the earth. There is hardly another Indian writer who has travelled so widely and often, any number of times all over India and five times abroad. Visiting art-galleries and places of artistic interest or natural beauty has produced a body of writing on these subjects, both voluminous and informative. A series of books on Indian sculpture, Chalukyan architecture and painting in Karnataka has culminated in the publication of his Kala-prapancha, a comprehensive account of the world of art, which traces and illustrates the varied manifestations of the artistic impulse in man and the variety it has assumed through the centuries.

Another area in which his researches and experiments have won him international recognition is the field of the folk-arts, specially the 'yakshagana' a rich traditional form of folk-drama, with a distinct structure, costume and mode of presentation. Karanth not only studied its early history and development but also revived its stratified techniques of production by enlivening its dance-patterns and restoring to its original sense of harmony and colour in costuming and make-up. He went further and evolved out of its constituents what he calls the yakshagana-ballet by releasing it from the local language barrier and opening out its aesthetic possibilities to the outside world. His book on this subject entitled Yakshagana bayalata won for him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1959. The Swedish Academy awarded its medal for his contribution to the study of the folk arts.

Wide-ranging and diverse as has been his work in the sphere of the arts and allied of cultural activity, Karanth remains, first and foremost, a creative writer. His early zeal for social reform led him first to drama and then to the novel in which form he has found an adequate medium for the communication of the wide experience of life with all its changes during the past half a century. His early novels were impatient and satirical in tone and content, but soon he realised that seeming life steadily and portraying it in all its width and range was a better way of holding up a mirror to the many inhibitions that thwarted the possibilities of good life.

His first great novel, Marali manige, portrayed how three generations preceding and including his own reacted to the changing conditions and patterns of life. Such vivid portrayals figures prominently in his novels of the forties. This gradually led him to a consideration of what gave meaning to life and made its experience worthwhile. Compassion, tolerance and love are the values he upholds in several novels of the middle period, and as happens in the case of every growing artist and Karanth has never ceased to grow the creative search for the meaning and worthwhileness of human existence depend as the years passed. Novels like Alida mele which he has written during the sixties and later reveal more and more of this intellectual quest which culminates in his award-winning Mukajjivakanasugalu in which the central character stands for a way of uninhibited thinking about a life. Karanth is the most popular and most respected author in Karnataka today. He is also a Fellow of the Sahitya Akademi.

KARBAL KATHA (Urdu) is the only Urdu prose work of Fazle Ali Fazl. Written in 1732-33, it was revised in 1748-49. First published in 1961 from Delhi University with an introduction by Khwaja Ahmad Faruqi. The second edition (1965, Patna) edited by Malik Ram and Mukhtaruddin Ahmad, contains an elaborate introduction and a comprehensive glossary. Both the editions are based on the only extant manuscript of Karbal Katha (No. Ms. Orient: Sprnger 173) which is preserved in Berlin, West Germany.

Karbal Katha (The story of Karbala) deals with the happenings at Karbala in Iraq, in 680 A.D., culminating in the martyrdom of Husain, Prophet Mohammed's maternal grandson, and his companions. The book is planned after the conventional pattern prevalent among the Persian writers of that period. The opening verses (Fatihat) consist of 207 couplets. The preface (Dibacha) contains Hamd, Na't, Manqibat and an encomium to king Mohammad Shah; reasons for writing the book; chronogrammatic verses giving dates of composition and revision; and a prayer (Munajat) at the end. The introduction (Muqaddama) comprises Hadiths narrating how even nature and prophets bemoaned at martyrdom of Husain. The main body of the book is divided into twelve chapters, each entitled 'Majlis', a term for the meeting held to lament the tragic events at Karbala. It dwells upon the deaths of Prophet Mohammed, his daughter Fatima and grandson Hasan; the martyrdom of Ali, Muslim Bin Aqeel and his two sons, Hurr, Qasim, Abbas, Ali Akbar, Ali Asghar and finally that of Husain. The epilogue to the book (Khātima) consists of five chapters devoted to the account of events which took place upto the fortieth day after Husain's martyrdom and describing how the severed heads of the martyrs as well as the survivors were taken to Damascus and from there back to Karbala. At Karbala, the severed heads were sewn on the bodies before burial. As the book contains twelve chapters, it is wrong to call it Deh Majlis (Ten Meetings) as some critics have done. The author himself has nowhere used the title for it.

Karbal Katha was not intended to be a piece of literary composition. Having been composed with an avowed religious purpose, it was originally designed to be the translation of Mullā Alī Kāshifī's, Persian work Rozatush shohada (Shrine of martyrs) which used to be read to the assemblies of mourners on the first ten evenings of the month of Muharram; but, being in Persian, could not be understood by a majority of listeners. With such audience in view, Fazlī set about translating the book into Urdu and, in the process, made so many alterations that the end-product was a book so different from the original that it can be treated as Fazlī's own independent work.

Being a work of religious nature, its prose passages are interspersed with quotations from the Korān and Hadīth, besides Fazlī's own contribution in the form of Na'ts, Manqibats and Marsiyas. The prose, for all its archaism, is generally easy, simple and fluent. At times it is Persianised and cuphuistic. Examples of rhymed prose are also scattered here and there.

Having little literary quality, K.K.'s importance lies in its historical value as the first extant Urdu prose work in North India as no earlier prose work—whether original or translated—has come to light so far. It acquires significance from linguistic point of view in the context of its time when Urdu was gaining ground over Persian as the language of conversation at levels but was yet to become the medium of literary pursuits. As such, it is a document of Urdu language as it was spoken at a particular stage of its development when even its grammar had not been worked out.

KARENGAR LIGIRI (Assamese) is the second of Jyotiprasad Agarwalla's nine plays, three of which were left incomplete. Jyotiprasad started its composition in 1925 and finished it in 1927, when he was in Europe. It was first staged at the Ban Theatre, Tezpur, sometime after 1930, by which date he had returned from Europe and published in 1937.

As the author himself notes in the preface the plot and the characters are purely fictional, though it has the appearance of a historical drama and the characters have ahom names and titles. The theme projects the romantic idea of untrammelled freedom of the individual as opposed to social conventions and established norms. This central dramatic conflict finds expression in the opposition between the hero, Sundarkanwar's desire to follow the dictates and preferences of his own free will and his mother's pleadings and attempts to uphold the claims of social propriety and norms. While allowing free play to Sundarkanwar's romantic self-assertion and his revolt against the established norms and customs the dramatist also makes it amply clear that he is not unaware of the dangers, or tragic excess involved in the hero's romantic claims to unbridled freedom. This is brought home by the tragic end when the hero is made to realize his own folly in not recognizing the selfless love of Sewali, a maid servant in the royal household, at the appropriate time.

The drama opens with Prince Sundarkanwar's refusal to marry in deference to the wishes of his mother and his resolve to lead a free, unfettered life, pursuing his studies. The mother, on her part, insists that he should marry and carry on the tradition of the royal house with dignity. She also suspects that her son may have been seduced by the maids in the royal house or may have been led astray by his studies of the scriptures. In course of the subsequent scenes, we come to know of the relationship of love between Anangaram, son of a minister and the prince's friend, and Kanchanmati, daughter of the prime minister. Though Kanchanmati loves Anangaram deeply she however refuses to defy social norms and customs and marry him against the wishes of her parents. Sundarkanwar finally agrees to marry Kanchanmati in accordance with his mother's wishes but when he comes to know that she is in love with Anangaram he decides to offer her to Anangaram. This decision leads to Kanchanmati's committing suicide, and Anangaram leaving the country for the land of the Nagas. The queen-mother now becomes furious, and suspecting that the maid, Sewali, is the cause of the prince's strange conduct, sends her away beyond the frontiers of the royal territory so as to get rid of her. Meanwhile, the prince Sundarkanwar becomes aware of Sewali's love for him but thinks that it is prompted by selfish ambition, and enquires after her. When he finds out what has been done to her he becomes frantic and orders the soldiers to find her out. In the final scene, Sundarkanwar finds Sewali in the land of the Nagas and decides to bring her back; but Sewali chooses to bring her life to an end, proving that her love for the prince was free of any selfish interest. The prince now realizes the greatness of Sewali's selfless love, cries out in agony, and bows his head to that great act of self-sacrifice which has made his own excessive preoccupation with the self seem petty and mean.

The major characters in the play are Sundarkanwar, Sewali, Kanchanmati and Anangaram. Rajmao or the Queen-mother represents the established norms and social customs. Though her attitude and concern for her son's arranged marriage is typical and her cruel treatment towards Sewali is equally typical of her position, she does acquire some individuality by virtue of her talks and manners. The hero of the drama Sundarkanwar is a fine study of the romantic desire for breaking all established customs and for self-assertion with its attendant excesses. The women characters in the play are distinctly individualised. While Sewali has all the sweetness and charm of a gentle woman and her silent love for and devotion to Sundarkanwar and final sacrifice represent the highest ideal of love without self-interest, Kanchanmati is distinguished by her intellectual powers and free thinking, even though her actual decision and behaviour only reveal her meek acceptance of social norms. The other maids in the play have also been portrayed with individuality. Anan-garam's character also shows traces of development.

The play has been acclaimed by some critics as Jyotiprasad's best because of its inherent dramatic interest, fine characterisation and use of musical elements effectively. The play also has the historical value of blazing a new trail in the history of Assamese drama by amply justifying Jyotiprasad's dream of creating profound and effective plays based purely on Assamese tradition and resources.

KARIKA (Sanskrit) is the feminine form of the word 'karaka' which is derived from the root 'kri' (to do) with the suffix 'nvul' (i.e. aka). So the primary meaning of the word must have been 'one who performs an action', though the use of the term in this sense could not be traced to any ancient work. Patanjali (2nd. cent. B.C.), in his Mahabhashya (on Ashtadhyayi, VII.1.1), has cited this word as an illustration without attributing meaning to it. Lexicographers like Amarasingha (Amarakosha, III.3.15) and Medinikara (Medinikosha, I.63) record a few meanings of the word karika, e.g. 'a female dancer', 'trade', 'a business', 'torture', etc.

The word is widely used in the sense of 'metrical composition on some topic or doctrine'. Generally the karika-s embody short exposition of rules, or topics, or doctrines which have been earlier taught by terse 'sutra-s' (cf. 'vivarana-shloka'—Medini. I. 63; sankshipta-sutra-bhavartha-sucakah shloka karika—Padavyavasthasut-rakarika of Udayakirti). The oldest examples of karika-s are verses quoted by Patanjali in his Mahabhashya, though he does not use the term karika. The ancient most work which is called karika is Ishvarakrishna's Sankhyakarika. The Sankhyakarika presents short exposition of the doctrines outlined in the Sankhyasutra of Kapila, which is most probably, no more extant. Another important karika work is Goudapada's Mandukyakarika. Later on, authors, rhetoricians in particular, wrote original works, which are not expositions of earlier sutra works, in the karika form, with autocommentaries called 'vritti-s' e.g. Dhvanyaloka, Kavyaprakasha, etc. Vishvanatha Nyayapanchanana's Bhashaparichchheda, a manual of Nyaya-Vaisheshika is popularly known as Karikavali.

KARIM ABDUL (Bengali; b. 1871, d. 1953) was one of the well-known research-workers in Bengali literature. He did not get much of higher education. He had an indifferent health and could not complete the intermediate course. Working as a clerk in the School Inspector's Office, he spent his whole life as a research-worker unearthing new material of mediaeval Bengali. In this respect, his contribution as one of the foremost historians of Bengali literature is valuable. His most important work Arakan rajsabhay bangla sahitya (Bengali literature in the royal court of Arakan), was written in collaboration with Enamul Haque. His other important work is an edited version of Gorak-bijoy by Sheikh Faizullah. He wrote numerous articles on the Bengali literature of the middle ages, which opened up many new untrodden paths for future scholars. The people of Chittagong called him Sahityabisharad.

KARKANDACHARIU (Apabhramsha) is a narrative poem or 'kathakavya'. The author of this work is Muni Kanakamara, a Digambara saint, who was born in Chandra Rishi Gotra. He flourished in the eleventh century. Although Karkanda (Karakanda) is said to be a historical person, who lived before the 5th century B.C., we find that the whole work is a compilation of nine stories. The source of these stories is Gunadhyaya's Brihatkatha. The poem is not composed on the pattern of Puranas or 'charitkavyas'. The nature of the story is quite fanciful and legendary. The story of Karakanda is also found in the 'Kumbhakara-jataka' where he is mentioned as 'Karandu Raja'. With Devendra's Prakrit commentary on the Uttarradhayana-sutra it has some apparent similarities. The bulk of the present work considerably increased as it contained nine independent stories which are by and large folk-tales. The work consists of only ten sandhis. The poetry is quite impressive and has some romantic features showing chivalric love. It has many beautiful descriptions of a sea-voyage. The story begins with the love of King Dhadivahana for a beautiful girl brought up by a gardener. But in the end of the narrative, particularly the part of the story dealing with Karakanada's visit to Simhala island, his marriage with the Simhala princess, his return by the sea, separation from his new wife and the tale of Aridamana, it has folk-tale elements. The main story depicts incidents dealing with several previous births of the hero.

Like a folk-tale, Karakandachariu also employs motifs in the constituency of 'kathakavyas'. Some of the motifs are 1) falling in love, 2) dohada, 3) taking away of the queen by the vicious elephant, 4) the miracle in the forest: decayed garden blossoming up, 5) beauty becoming jealous of her, 6) the birth of the hero at the cemetery, 7) the curse of sages, 8) obtaining of the vidya, 9) worshipping of an elephant, 10) how the religious elephant attains heaven, 11) a ferocious elephant threatens, 12) the loss of the wife, 13) good omens, 14) Simhala island, 15) the 'khechara' in the form of a parrot, 16) a desert island, 17) breaking of the boat, 18) re-births, 19) renunciation, 20) good fortune, 21) election of a king by the elephant,

In the composition of this narrative poem the poet has used many metres; mainly it is Pajjhatika, intercepted by a few lines of single kadavaka. He has also used a Adilla besides the Dhruvakas.

The poet gives a picture by describing the ideas and actions of an elephant dramatically.. (II.20.10). The descriptions are highly imaginative and expressive. These are rich in imageries, similes and symbols. In the description of the Ganga river the poet presents a fine image of a serpent signifying the floating waves. Lamentations of Rativega and Karakandu are so realistic that these draw out sympathy from birds, animals, and other objects of nature. The king talks with plants and animals like a friend. The narrative is full of supernatural events. Some of these are as follows: I) The parrot has a meeting with the king and fabricates a false account, II) the horse takes away the king and the parrot across the sea, III) the prince finds a divine companion, IV) the King is carried away by a Vidyadhari, V) the appearance of goddess Padmavati, VI) the goddess grants a boon to Rativega, VII) Madanamara is turned into a parrot by an ascetic girl, VIII) the image of Parshva Jina becomes motionless and still on the mountain, ix) Deva appears and consoles the king, x) the havoc wrought by Vidya until overpowered by Champu king, xi) the curse of a sage.

The poet also presents a vivid picture of fierce fighting.

Thus, the whole work is a poetical composition having the preponderance of 'shringara', 'vira' and 'adbhuta' rasas. There is no doubt that these narrative Apabhramsha kathakavyas have influenced the literature of Indian medieval period.

KARMAKAR, GOVINDADAS (Bengali; 15th-16th century). In mediaeval Bengali literature one Govindadas Karmakar is known for his book Govindadaser karcha (i.e. the Handbook of Govindadas), which was later edited by Jaygopal Goswami and published in 1895. In this book, Govindadas presented a short life-sketch of himself. We come to know that he was born at Kanchanpur village in the district of Burdwan, West Bengal. Son of Shyamdas and Madhavi, Govindadas, out of some frustration, left home at an early age and went to Navadwip to meet Sri Chaitanya. Sri Chaitanya provided him with shelter and Govindadas served him with deep sincerity. After some time Chaitanya renounced the world and went to Nilachal as an ascetic. Govindadas accompanied him. He also accompanied Sri Chaitanya in his pilgrimage in southern India. In the Karcha Govindadas Karmakar describes this pilgrimage in verse. His book is a kind of journal wherein the poet minutely records his day-to-day experience with his master during the course of the two years of sojourn in South India.

Many modern historians question the authenticity of this book and doubt the existence of Govindadas. They maintain that the language of this book is not so old as it is claimed to be. Vrindabandas and Krishnadas Kaviraj, the noted biographers of Sri Chaitanya does not mention the name of Govindadas anywhere in their biographies. This reason, together with many anachronisms found in the book prompts literary historians to think that a later writer invented this Govindadas Karmakar and attributed this work with all the details of his life to him.

KARNABHUSHANAM (Malayalam) which literally means the ornament of Karna is a poem written in the form of Khandakavya by Ullur S. Parameswara Iyer (1877-1949). It is a master portrait of Karna, the heroic warrior of the Mahabharata. The intention of the poet is to bring out the greatness of Karna. It is interesting to observe the close affinity between Achilles of Homer and Karna of Vyasa. By all standards Karna is a noble man, eminently placed and exceptionally talented whose fall is brought about chiefly by a vice in him. He had an inordinate pride, a love for a reputation of being excessively generous. The purpose of the poet was to expose him in his native strength and hence the 'kundalaharanam episode' is chosen for the theme. His aim was not at all the recount the story in all its details such as the presentation of his ear-rings and armour to Indra in exchange for a spear.

In Karnabhushanam as Surya comes in the guise of a brahmin, Karna awakes and accosts him. He introduces himself as the son of a Suta and puts himself at the service of the guest. Surya narrates the entire story of Karna and his renunciation by his mother which the latter hears without showing any sign of emotion. At last Surya instructs Karna not to part with his ear-rings and armour for the sake of fame. Karna meets his argument with cool dignity. The thought that Indra would be begging to him for the gifts thrills his soul. His defence of fame is significant since it is posited against Surya's plea that life is more valuable than reputation. Karna's getting the spear in return for the gifts from Indra is dropped by the poet since it will belittle the stature of his hero to receive something in return and for his gift.

The choice of the poetic situation and the portrayal of Karna and Surya have made the poem one of the finest lyrics in Malayalam. It is enriched with poetic excellence of the highest order. It is a great poem, not only because of the profusion of its poetic imagery, not only because of the mastery the poet evinces in depicting the complexity of the characters, its greatness consists in the glorious attempt it makes to plumb the depth of the mystery of the human being denuded of all that he inherits and he acquires.

KARNAD, GIRISH RAGHUNATH (Kannada; b. 1938). Kannada playwright and author of some of the most significant plays and filmscripts of the later half of the 20th century. Karnad is also a film-maker and actor. Son of Raghunath and Kasibai, he was born in Maharashtra but has Kannada as his mother tongue. He worked as Assistant Manager (63-69) and Manager (69-70) of Oxford University Press, Madras. He was Director of Film and T.V. Institute, Pune, (1974-75). He is widely travelled, had had academic assignments to foreign Universities. He is now the Chairman of the Sangeet Natak Akademi, New Delhi.

His plays include modern classics such as Yayati (1961), Tughlaq (1964), Hayavadan (1971), Anjumallige (1977), and Hittina hunja (1980). His plays explore the human psyche and its social environment, sometimes taking for their theme traditional puranic themes as in Hayavadan and Yayati, giving a fresh interpretation. For Yayati he was given the state award. In 1972, he received Sangeet Natak Akademi's award for play-writing. For Hayavadan, Bharatiya Natya Sangha honoured him with the Kamaladevi Award. His plays have pioneered a style which unites the elements of traditional Indian theatre, such as 'yakshagana' and strikingly modern sensibility for contemporary socio-political realities.

He is an important film-maker and writer of film-scripts. He has written the script for the film Samskara (1960) based on the novel Samskara by U.R. Anantamurthi. With B.V. Karanth, he has co-directed the film Vanshavriksha (1971) in which he has also acted, and Tabbaliyu ninade magane (1977). He has also directed films like Kadu (1973) and Ondanondu kaladalli (1978).

KARNAGI MAMA AMASUNG KARNAGI AROIBA YAHIP (Manipuri), written by N. Ibobi Singh, won the Manipur State Kala Akademi award in 1982 and the Sahitya Akademi award in 1983. It was first published at Imphal by the author himself.

Karnagi mama amasung karnagi aroiba yahip contains two radio plays on the life of Karna from the Mahabharata: Karnagi mama (Karna's mother) and Karnagi aroiba yahip (The last sleep of Karna). The plot of Karnagi mama is the episode of the visit of Kunti to Karna on the eve of his battle against the Pandavas to dissuade him from the fight by disclosing her identity to him and failing that to beg of him his right thumb. The story is built up with the touching sentiments of a mother and her apparently estranged son who longed for a reunion with her. The last part of the play where Karna is engaged in a verbal duel with Kunti each taking a rigid stand has echoes of Rabindranath Tagore's 'Karna Kunti sanbad.'

The second play Karnagi aroiba yahip is based on the episode of the last day of Karna who died fighting a losing battle against insurmountable odds and the grand finale of the disclosure of the relationship between Karna and the Pandavas from the mouth of Kunti to her surviving sons.

Though written separately the two plays could be regarded as a single play in-as-much as the theme is centred round the last days in the life of Karna and the momentous revelations of many secrets of his life which ultimately acted as odds against him. In the two plays the playwright could make his point that Karna was not killed by Arjuna but got himself killed voluntarily and that he died a heroic death fighting valiantly. Not that Karna could not keep his promise which he never pronounced. His death is a voluntarily repose he desired so intensely. In the two plays the playwright brings out the values of eternal bond between a mother and her son, brotherly affection, manly honour and above all, the compassion and humanity of Karna.

N. Ibobi Singh became blind years before he wrote the play. Like John Milton he dictated the play. The language is highly poetical and this contributes a great deal towards building up of the play's atmosphere.

KARNATAK PANCHATANTRAM (Kannada), is the Kannada version of Vasubhaga's Panchatantra, composed by Durgasimha. Durgasimha lived in Sayyadi (Dharwada district). He completed this work on 8th March, 1031, as scholars have not computed. It is in 'champu' (mixture of prose and verse) and is in Old Kannada. Karnatak Panchatantram was first published in 1898 under the editorship of S.G. Narasimhachar and Ramanuja Iyengar. Another edition, edited by N. Anantharangachar, was published in 1973.

Durgasimha has rendered into Kannada, not Vishnusharma's Panchatantra but Vasubhaga's. Hence this is a unique work. It is also the first translation of Panchatantra into a regional language in India. Vasubhaga's version of Panchatantra is popular in South India, Thailand, Java, Laos and other parts of South-East Asia. Tantropakhyana is said to be the original work of Vasubhaga but is incomplete. Karnataka Panchatantram is the only work complete in every respect.

According to Durgasimha, Vasubhaga who listened to the innumerable stories of Brihatkatha narrated by Gunadhya in Paishacha language, selected only the Panchatantra fables, and retold them in the Sanskrit Panchatantra. Here, Vasubhaga is the narrator of the stories to the dull princes. In Karnatak Panchatantram there are about 68 stories including Kathamukha, Mukhakatha and other embossed stories.

Karnatak Panchatantram is different from Vishnusharma's version. In the former the second and the fifth tantras have changed places. The stories of Mukhakatha and other embossed tales are not the same; A few fables embody the philosophy of Jainism; some of the stories, like Vyasa and Valmiki, Sanjivaka and Pingalaka and the frog and the Brahmin are not found in Vishnusharma's Panchatantra; Even where the content is the same, Durgasimha's narration is more detailed.

Karnatak Panchatantram is interesting in that, while the great poets of the age, Pampa and Ranna went to the Mahabharata for their source, Durgasimha turned to the Panchatantra. Also, it offers valuable clues helpful in the search for the Sanskrit version of Vasubhaga's Panchatantra.

M.P. Pujari's Sri Durgasimha Panchatantrasara (1939) is a summary of the first Tantra of Karnatak Panchatantram. Varadaraja Huilgol's Durgasimhana Panchatantra Samikshe (1976) is a detailed study of all the fables in the work, while the same author's Vasubhaga's Panchatantram—A Critical Study (1987) is in English. His Vasubhagana Panchatantra Rathegalu (1982) is a collection for all the fables in the work.

Vishnusharma's Panchatantra was translated into Kannada in the 19th century by several authors, among them some Christian missionaries. Kannada Panchatantra by Rev. F. Kittel (1864) and by Rev Garrett (1865) are noteworthy; these are mostly narrations in simple prose for school children. Rev. Kittel's introduction is scholarly. Mummadi Krishnaraja is said to have translated Vishnusharma's Panchatantra into Kannada (1856). The present century has seen several versions, those by Devudu Narasimha Sastry, D.K. Bhimasena Rao and M. Jeevana being noteworthy.

KARNATAKA BHARATA KATHAMANJARI (Kannada) is a Kannada epic composed by Kumara Vyasa, a poet of the fifteenth century. His name was, in all probability, Naranappa, and he was a devotee of Sri Veernarayana of Gadag. The epic is popularly known as Kumaravyasa bharata or, since the poet belonged to Gadag, as Gadugina-bharata.

The poem narrates the story of the first ten 'parvas' of Vyasa 'Bharata'. Pampa had already composed his great epic based on Vyasa-bharata. Like him, Kumaravyasa assumes the freedom to modify the story, without distorting his original. Sometimes he just translates passages from the original. But he has an unflinching command of his material. Clearly he was familiar with Pampa's epic. Episodes, like Vidura snapping his bow in rage when Duryodhana insults him, and Suryadeva appearing before Karna to warn him against granting the boon that Kunti will seek, which are not found in Vyasa-bharata but are narrated by Pampa, are included in Kumaravyasa's narration. At times he seems to paraphrase a passage from Pampa. There are also episodes, not found in the Sanskrit poem or any other Kannada version of the Bharata, like the arrogant Duryodhana not rising to welcome Krishna, and them tumbling from his throne to the very feet of Krishna as the Lord presses the ground. These episodes may have been invented by Kumaravyasa, or they may have borrowed them from folk literature.

Kumaravyasa belongs to the age of 'bhakti': The Mahabharata is to him the story of Krishna, and the means of washing away all the devotee's sins. It is the fire that reduces to ashes the roots of all sin and sorrow. So Lord Krishna is the hero of the epic. The life of all men is but the manifestation of His will, the acting out of His plans. Kumaravyasa is always thrilled by the appearance of Krishna in the story, and not seldom does his paean ignore the demands of the situation. His Krishna is a remarkable creation. Perhaps he is the only epic hero in world literature endowed with a lively sense of humour. He is capable of gentle, affectionate humour, and can make fun of himself. He is capable of affection and pity—pity which extends even to those whom he is going to destroy, like Karna. He is the servant of His devotees. Kumaravyasa portrays him as omnipotent and omniscient, but yet his Krishna becomes intensely human and real.

Kumaravyasa miraculously reconciles an all-powerful divinity with man's moral responsibility. Duryodhana himself at one point declares that it is Krishna himself, in his (Duryodhana's) heart that makes a reconciliation with the Pandavas impossible. And yet the other characters have individualities of their own, and choose and act by themselves. Had the poet failed to make this reconciliation, his work would have just become a rhapsody of devotion. Partly the reconciliation is made possible by Kumaravyasa's interest in the variety of human nature. While he celebrates Krishna in the story, he also delights in the wealth and variety of human nature, so that not only a Duryodhana or a Bheema or a Draupadi is endowed with individuality but even a cowardly Uttara becomes thoroughly credible. Though he comes from Vyasa-bharata, Uttara gains here added interest by the sheer magnitude of his cowardice and his frank admission that he is satisfied with the belles of his court and would rather do without the 'apsaras' in heaven. Kumaravyasa's characters have distinct idioms and express themselves characteristically. Partly the reconciliation is achieved by making 'bhakti' the soul of true 'veera'. Veera rasa is prominent in Vyasa-bharata, while bhakti rasa dominates Kumaravyasa's version. The Kannada poet makes bhakti the arbiter of the destiny of the mightiest heroes—Bhima, Duryodhana, Arjuna, and Karna. It is the devotion of the Pandavas to Lord Krishna which saves them from all dangers and steers them to victory; Duryodhana is beyond question a great hero, but his opposition to Krishna seals his doom; and those devotees who, like Bhishma and Drona, stay with Duryodhana, are respected, but cannot stave off defeat.

There is a dramatist in Kumaravyasa. He can create unforgettable scenes, where mighty wills clash and character is revealed in action; he can make speech itself action.

Kumaravyasa is a master of language. He was evidently a learned man, with knowledge not only of the Sanskrit language and literature but of the different systems of philosophy, and of the fine arts. Pampa was the commander of an army, Kumaravyasa was a village scholar. And yet his descriptions of battles and of single combats are remarkably vivid and thrilling. He describes nature in her different moods, with a wealth of details; but his descriptions are functional, as for example, the glowing description of the irresistible loveliness of nature in the forest in spring. As beauty and joy transform nature, Pandu seeks his bewitching wife Madri, and the fatal embrace changes the destinies of royal families and of the entire country. The poet can draw an unforgettably picture with words. Generally Naranappa blends Sanskrit with Kannada judiciously—the former to create an impression of grandeur or sublimity, the latter to create an impression of homeliness. A whole stanza may be just Sanskrit words strung together; sometimes it is predominated by Sanskrit words, but suddenly a simple Kannada word props up to arrest the attention and focus on an important detail. Few poets reveal the range and power of the Kannada language as Kumaravyasa does. He is justly celebrated for his similes and metaphors; they issue forth from his mind sparkling and fresh. He can condense experience into a few words with all the effect of an age-old proverb. It has been said that, even to pick up the most powerful abuses and the most stinging insults in Kannada one has to go to Kumaravyasa.

Kumaravyasa creates a world ruled by a Supreme Power which is in favour of righteousness. Divinity becomes manifest in human form, but is endowed with rare liveliness and majesty and warmth. Even to the most righteous, earthly life is not smooth; suffering is implicit in it, but it is a trial of the soul's loyalty to 'dharma'.

The epic comprises about 8,000 shatpadi stanzas a shatpadi contains six lines, the third and the sixth containing more syllables than the rest; the second syllables of the lines rhyme. The verse is uniformly vigorous. The poet gave this stanza such variety and flexibility that for two centuries it reigned supreme.

For five centuries this epic has attracted the sophisticated reader and the illiterate man alike and even today 'gamakis' recite passages in big cities and little hamlets, to deeply moved audiences.

The standard editions of the epic is Kumaravyasa mahakaviya Karnataka bhārata katha manjari (1958), edited by Masti Venkatesha Iyengar and K.V. Puttappa.

KARNATAKA GATA VAIBHAVA (Kannada) is a historical treatise on Karnataka that created an epoch in Karnataka during the second decade of this century. Written by Alur Venkata Rao, the book opened the eyes of the Kannada people who had lost their very identity as a result of their territorial split into five major fragments of jurisdictions. It furnished a new outlook regarding nationalism and provincialism which, in the author's opinion, were not opposed to each other.

In the introduction of the 6th edition of the (1950), the author suggested that the need to study it from the scholar's point of view was still there for the attainment of an all round development for the unification of Karnataka.

Tracing the origin of the work, the author places on record his reminiscences of two events which had an indelible stamp on his sensitive mind. The first was his visit to the Navabrindavana (a group of nine holy samadhis of the Madhwa sanyasis) near Anegondi on the bank of the river Tungabhadra, which took him to the Hampi ruins on the 4th May 1904. Overwhelmed by the ruins of the capital of the Vijayanagar Empire, he felt the urge to study the history of the great empire and the other dynasties of ancient Karnataka. The journey into the glorious past of Karnataka, culminated in his solemn commitment to the cause of restoring the past glory 'gata vaibhava'. The second event was the unprecedented agitation of the Bengalis over the proposed split of the province of Bengal into two parts by the British rulers (1905). He compared the anti-partition agitation of the awakened Bengalis with the political apathy of the Kannadigas and discovered the truth that the circumstances of their territorial fragmentation for centuries, were responsible for the political indifference of the Kannada people. This prompted him to dedicate his life to the task of unification of Karnataka, the first step in this direction being the production of this work.

Taking a rapid survey of the contents of the book, one finds that the highly emotional tone makes this work a passionate historical treatise. In the first chapter the author condemns the derisive attitude of the Kannadigas towards their own land and language and pleads that the cynicism is due to the utter ignorance of their history. In the second chapter, he argues, with ample historical evidence, that Karnataka that was once great throbbing with spiritual vitality, can never die and that the country which manifested its matchless glory for over a thousand years continuously, is certainly, not dead. In the following nine chapters, the author proves the extent of the ancient Karnataka from the river Kaveri to Godavari, depicts, in brief, the life sketches of the ancient Vibhutis (great personages) and finally narrates the political history of all the important dynasties of ancient Karnataka from the Satavahanas to the Vijayanagara Emperors. And the last four chapters deal with their glorious adventures in all the fields arts and architecture religion and philosophy, language and literature. He once again exhorts in the concluding chapter that the Kannadigas should catch up the magic power that is there in the word 'Karnataka' which has come down to them from times immemorial and proceed further with determined will towards the fulfilment of the cause of Karnataka unification and its integral perfection.

Karnataka gata vaibhava does not teach history but it inspires direct action. The author himself admits in the introduction to the first edition, that he is fully aware of its defects as a history, and that he would be too happy to see that better books be soon published to replace it. Whatever the defects, this work will ever remain a unique and rare example of a book of power and inspiration.

KARNATAKA SAMSKRITI SAMEEKSHE (Kannada) is a study of the culture of Karnataka (1968) written by H.

Thipperudra Swamy, which won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1969; he was only forty when he received the award. The work, published by D.V.K. Murthy of Mysore, contains 861 pages. It contains 52 useful illustrations, representing the architectural wealth of Karnataka.

The author proposed to write a series of novels on the life and times of Basaveshwara, the Virashaiva reformer saint, and so took up an elaborate study of the cultural history of Karnataka. This led to the composition of this book. It comprises ten chapters dealing with (1) Indian culture, (2) the political history of Karnataka, (3) administration, education, religion and the social structure in Karnataka over the centuries, (4) the culture of Karnataka reflected in the epigraphs, (5) elite literature, (6) folk literature of Karnataka, (7) architecture, (8) sculpture, (9) music, dance and painting and (10) the summing up.

This is one of the important reference works on the cultural history of Karnataka. It provides a profusion of material. The material is well organised and lucidly presented. No book had up to that time offered such a comprehensive and many-faceted study of the literature and culture of Karnataka.

KARNATAKA SAMSKRITIYA PURVAPITHIKE (Kannada) is a work of S.B. Joshi (1967). The book traces the origin of ancient Kannada culture and its spreading in the north and central parts of India. The author of Kavirajamarga (9th century A.D.) said that Karnataka stretched from the Kaveri to the Godavari. Examining this statement, Joshi has journeyed to the distant misty past of Karnataka. This was a subject which had engaged him in research even in the early thirties, and he had written articles. His Marathi book, Marathi samskriti, also deals with the same subject.

Joshi has a distinctive approach to the subject. His source materials are drawn from linguistics, ancient history, geography, anthropology, literature, epigraphy, ethnology, epics, the Vedas and the Puranas. The work is multidimensional.

Joshi has discussed at length ancient Karnataka culture and its dissemination. His views, in brief, are: (1) 'Kannadau' is the correct form, and not Karnata. (2) Language and culture are two faces of the same coin. There is no culture without language. (3) 'Kandamil' is the source language of Kannada and Tamil, and the culture of the people who spoke this language makes its presence felt even in the Vedas. (4) Many place-names in Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh and Gujarat are of Kannada origin; they suggest that Karnataka culture had at one time prevailed in these regions. (5) Recent excavations at Tekkalkote, Brahmagiri and Chandravalli show the links of Karnataka culture with Saindhava culture (2000 B.C.). Joshi has based his arguments on the reports of Alchin and Nagarajara. (6) In course of time, as Karnataka waned,

KARPURA VASANTA RAYALU

Maharashtra gained strength; i.e., Maharashtra came to be carved out of Karnataka. (7) Karnataka culture originated in the region to the north of the Godavari—between the Narmada on one side and the Ganga-Sona rivers on the other side.

Thus Joshi has argued that Karnataka culture existed long before the Christian era began. It has played an important role in the cultural history of India. Some scholars do not accept his conclusions; they regard his arguments far-fetched and influenced by his love for Karnataka. There are others who have been inspired by Joshi's interpretations. This work has been keenly discussed.

But Joshi's astonishing range of scholarship and his intuitions have received wide praise. The work bears testimony to his exceptional scholarship, his sharp intellect and his courage based on faith in his evidence. The book received the Karnataka Sahitya Academy Award (1967) and the Sahitya Akademi Award (1970).

KARPURA VASANTA RAYALU (Telugu), described as a modern prabandha, is an early work of C. Narayana Reddy. Published in 1957, when the poet was a little over twenty-five years of age, the work gives ample evidence of youthful romanticism and exuberant imagination. The diction employed is in the tradition of the prabandha period and the work is embellished with a variety of descriptions. But the prosody employed is not of the classical variety; the poet used a variation of the 'matra' (quantitative) system of prosody made popular by Gurazada. The poet used this kind of prosody in Nagarjunasagaram (1955), in which he specially used khanda and tyashragati. In this work he preferred an increasing use of tyashra and mishra gati.

The story relates to the history of Andhra in the fourteenth century, when Kuamaragiri Reddy ruled over a part of the Andhra Desha with Kondaveedu as capital. He was an aesthete and a lover of fine arts, especially dance. According to the monumental work, History of Reddy Kingdoms by Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma, to whom this work was dedicated, Kumaragiri used to celebrate the herald of spring for nine days as Vasantotsavamulu and thus earned the sobriquet of 'Karpura vasanta rayalu'. Leaving the onerous responsibility of statecraft and wars to his brother-in-law, Kataya Vema Reddy, the king used to spend his time in the enjoyment and promotion of fine arts; he is also reputed to have composed a treatise on the art of dance, Vasantarajeyamu, inspired by the graceful court-dance, Lakuma, described as 'priya sadrishya priya'.

The composition commences with a description of the procession of the king during the spring festival and his participation in the gaieties, including the worship of Manmatha, the Lord of love. The poet describes the king in the classical similes of Indra, Vishnu, etc. On that occasion, the king happens to witness the dance of Lakuma and falls in love with her. Forgetting himself, he rises, goes to her and puts the garland round her neck. Soon, he makes her the court-dancer and spends all his time in her company. When Kataya Vema leads the expedition to Vijayanagar, he is unable to accompany his friend owing to his infatuation with the danseuse. Once on the insistence of Kataya, the king comes to the court but soon hurries out when he receives the message that Lakuma sprained her leg. The queen is perturbed by these developments, not so much for personal neglect as for the abdication of royal responsibilities by Vasanta Raya. When the entreaties of Kataya fail to wean the king from his beloved and even the advice of Lakuma herself is unable to send the king back to his duties higher than his personal pleasure, the queen makes up her mind to act. She goes to the palace of Lakuma one night and urges Lakuma to release the king from her hold for the good of the country. Lakuma receives the purport of the queen's message and decides to lay down her life in the cause of a higher entity, the society. Performing a terrific dance of death—'rudra tandavam'—she kills herself with a dagger and dies in the arms of the king. By this she is able to make the king aware of his responsibilities as a king. In her final act of sacrifice, Lakuma rises to the dizzy heights of a martyr; the poet describes her as 'a most respectable lady'.

The story as told by the poet is a blend of reliable historicity and imaginative detail. Historical documents merely mention Lakuma as a beloved of Vasantaraya. The poet weaves around the slight historical detail in imaginative tale of love and sacrifice and organically builds into it the message of the supremacy of the demands of the state over those of the individual. But the durable aspects of the work relate to the sweet lyricism, lilting cadences and evocative descriptions. The poet reveals commendable knowledge of the intricacies of the art of dance in the description of mudras in the dance of Lakuma. The description of the moon as 'the umbrella of pearls atop the chariot of the lord of love' is one of the several impressive descriptions. The description of Lakuma as an epitome of the several aspects of nature;

It's nightfall, when her eyes she closes in,
It's day resplendent, when her eyes she opens out;
The earth he finds in her bottoms round,
The water still he finds in the depths of her eyes,
The sky he observes in her sinuous middle,
In fine, she stands symbol to nature entire

This recalls an earlier poem of Reddy, 'The beloved of nature', in which he describes the stars as the jasmines in the hairdo of his beloved and finally implores dame nature to stand before him instead of his beloved. The work is characterised by delicacy of imagination and richness of perception. The dialogue between two aesthetes—Kumaragiri Reddy and Kataya Vema is full of brilliance. In characterisation, Lakuma rises above the others; she is symbolic of larger individualism. The poet leads the tale to its tragic denouement with consummate skill; the act of sacrifice of Lakuma is preceded by the dance of death. The scene is touchingly portrayed and the dialogue that ensues between them is sensitively depicted.

The work is on the whole an achievement for the young poet in giving full freedom to his imagination and powers of description and succeeds as a homage by a modern poet to the tradition of prabandha, which has all but gone out of modern Telugu literature.

The work published originally in 1957 is subsequently brought out as a pocket book edition by M. Seshachalam & Co. Madras in 1972.

KARPURAMANJARI (Prakrit) is a play of four Acts which appears to have been very popular in its time. The Act I centres round the marriage of a king called Chandapala and his beloved the Kuntala princes, Karpuramanjari, who is really a cousin of the queen, in order to win for himself imperial rank. As the play proceeds the king's jester, Kapinjala enters for announcing the arrival of Bhairavananda, a miracle-maker or magician, at the door. Permitted, he enters bragging of his Yogic attainments. As directed, he presents on the scene the damsel Karpuramanjari; the apparition tells her tale and queen decides to add her to the number of her attendants. The King and the damsel fall at once in love.

The second Act shows the amorous and gay king love-sick. His beloved is kept under strict vigilance of the queen and her watchful maids. The king seeks the help of his jester for arranging a secret meeting with his beloved. Vichakshana the maid, brings a letter from the princess avowing her love for the king. The poor princess, who is in a love-lorn condition has been assigned by the queen two important tasks: a play on the swing and the task of satisfying the 'longings' of three trees, Tilaka, Kurabaka and Ashoka in the 'pramadodyana' (Ladies' park). This may offer to the king an opportunity to see his beloved. As directed by Vichakshana, the king and the jester wait near the Marakatapunja (Emerald-bunch). There the king observes with romantic delight the swing-play of the princess. Later he also observes the embracing of the Kurabaka, the eyeing of the Tilaka and the kicking of the Ashoka plant, all this done by the princess Karpuramanjari to fulfil their 'longings'. Immediately the trees put forth flowers. It is now the time of the evening, the time of appointment for the first secret meeting of the hero and the heroine.

In Act III king is all the more love-sick. He describes a dream in which he saw his beloved princess standing at a hand's distance from his bed and how he tried to seize her by the skirt of her garment and she suddenly vanished.

The king and the jester then go out in the darkness of the night to the vicinity of the Rakshagriha (detention house) where the king's beloved princess has been confined. They both sneak in the detention house. The jester cleverly puts out the lamp and in the darkness suggests that they all go out in the open in the ladies' park. The king leads the princess holding her by the hand. The guards at the detention house raise a hue and cry.

Act IV shows the end of the subterranean passage opening on the garden completely blocked. The detention house is now being heavily guarded. Vichakshana and her sister Sulakshana have been discharged and Sarangika is now placed in charge of the princess.

With the dismissal of Vichakshana, the jester enlists Bhairavananda's sympathy and support for his friend, the king, for he (Bhairavananda) wields great influence, as that of a Guru, over the credulous queen. He consented to receive the gift and proposed by the way a marriage of the princess Ghanasaramanjari, the daughter of the Lata king, just because it was predicted that she would bring to the king whom she married the title of a sovereign ruler. The queen consents to this proposal, least suspecting that Ghanasaramanjari was Karpuramanjari herself. The wedding was fixed for celebration that very evening and the king was asked to remain present at the sanctuary of Chamunda under the banyan tree. Bhairavananda had arranged for a subterranean passage from the detention house to the removable idol of Chamunda which concealed its entrance. This passage enables the prisoner (Karpuramanjari) to play a game of hide-and-seek with the queen as directed by Bhairavananda. Ultimately Bhairavananda discloses the identity of Ghanasaramanjari who is no other than Karpuramanjari. The queen, victim of a mean tricks, celebrates the lover's marriage, the jester acting as the priest of the ceremony.

The writers on Sanskrit dramaturgy invariably cite the Karpuramanjari as an illustration of 'sattaka'. It is the earliest available sattaka, which is only a variation of the type of drama called 'natika'. The Karpuramanjari's performance on the stage must have proved a great source of attraction to the general contemporary spectators who sought some sort of diversion and amusement, for it presents the various incidents as so many surprising trick-scenes: The emergence of the heroine almost from nowhere as proof of the miraculous powers of the master-magician in the first act, the swing-play of the lovely maiden, and the satisfying of the longings of the three trees, one after another in the second act, the scenes of darkness alternating with the moon-rise in the third act, the folk-dances, the game of 'hide and seek' at the temple of Chamunda and the splendid spectacle of the ceremony of wedding, humour of the coarse and the crude with a free mixture of the elements of the ridiculous and the ludicrous would certainly delight the audience. Rajashekharra cultivated the art of expression and the Vaidarbhi style of exhibiting the characteristic features of compactness, clarity or lucidity and sweetness and elegance. He often impresses his readers by his original ideas and the glitter of newly coined words and expressions. Although there is no novelty about the theme of the sattaka, and although Rajashekhara's dramatic sense is poor, his ability to handle elaborate Prakrit metres is undeniable; in 144 stanzas in the Karpuramanjari he has seventeen varieties. His accomplishment in metres, especially the Sardulavikridita, his facility of expression which Ksemendra justly praises, is really praiseworthy. The Karpuramanjari contains substantial evidence to show that Rajashekhara had some real poetic talent. The swing scene contains really effective lines of word-painting, in harmonious metre. Excellent also is the king's address to the Ashoka tree when it was made to blossom by the touch of the foot of his young beloved.

He is more of a poet than a playwright. In the scene of squabble between the jester and the maid Vichakshana he portrays the jester as an ignorant, illiterate character devoid of any poetic talent but the same jester is shown to blossom into a great poet, when he describes the charms of the heroine in the swing-scene, when he narrates his counter-dream to the king, when he discusses the question of aids to beauty or the theory of love or when he vividly describes the folk-dances. Again, how inconsistent it is that the heroine who is very sick is taken over to the garden to play on the swing and to fulfil the longings of the three trees! Further, he misses in the third act the golden opportunity of depicting a lively, intimate love-scene between the king and Karpuramanjari. The king is shown wasting away the rare occasion of the moonlight meeting just on the recitation and appreciation of a few verses composed on the rising moon by himself. The wedding scene of the fourth act, which is frivolously conceived and childishly executed, is a further proof of his very poor dramatic sense. The quarrel scene between the jester and the maid, presentation of the heroine in an embarrassing state of wet semi-nudity (bathing beauty), the silly game of 'hide and seek' between the queen and the heroine do no credit to the dramatist, nor are they likely to provide entertainment to the trained spectators in the absence of an interesting story and thrilling dramatic action.

Rajashekhara is devoid of the power to create a character. The king is most unimpressive as a hero. Rajashekhara copies Shri Harsha in depicting his hero. His heroine, Karpuramanjari is without merit. His Vidushaka is a hackneyed character. The master magician, Bhairavananda is borrowed from Shri Harsha's Ratnavali and is spoiled in the borrowing.

In composing this sattaka Rajashekhara was heavily influenced by Kalidasa's Malavikagnimitra and Shri Harsha's Ratnavali although there is an attempt at novelty in some scattered scenes and incidents. The intrigue is poorly managed. The influence of Kalidasa and Shri Harsha has not, thus, proved advantageous.

The Karpuramanjari of Rajashekhara was a model for at least five later writers, to imitate. They are: The Rambhamanjari of Nayachandra (14th century), the Chandralekha of Rudradasa (17th century), the Vilasavati of Markandeya (17 century), the Shringaramanjari of Vishveshvara (18th century), the Anandasundari of Ghanashayam (18 century) who is said to have composed two more sattakas. As the Karpuramanjari of Rajashekhara is the earliest available sattaka, the credit of introducing this genre of dramatic composition goes to Rajashekhara.

KARSANDAS MULJI (Gujarati; b. 1832, d. 1871) was a social reformer, journalist and writer. He started thinking on public problems from his student days. The Jnan Prasarak Mandali (Society for dissemination of knowledge) held an essay competition on the remarriage of a Hindu widow. Karsandas wrote a portion of the essay on the theme and the unfinished piece fell into the hands of his orthodox aunt, and he was asked to leave the house. He was appointed the headmaster of Gokuldas Tejpal Seminary in Bombay. He joined the newly started Buddhivardhak Hindu Sabna (Society for the advancement of mental culture among Hindus). Karsandas wrote a paper on the advantages of foreign travels which in those days were considered a taboo and against the shastras by the orthodoxy. He read this paper (1853) in the open meeting organised by the Sabha. He started his own journal, the Satyaprakash (Light of truth, 1855) which he edited to the best of his honesty and ability. In the same year, a big religious controversy ensued between Shaivite brahmins and Vaishnava maharajas (Priests). Karsandas found this to be a good opportunity for exposing the degraded cult of the maharajas and their immoral practices. He wielded his pen with great force, unusual vigour and strict integrity in the columns of Satyaprakash. He published in it an article, pointing out that the maharajas were licentious in their sexual relations and advised them to take care of their conduct. Maharaja Jadunath, head of the Vaishnava sect of Surat, sued Karsandas as editor of Satyaprakash, and Nanabhai Rustomji Ranira as printer of the paper for libel in the court at Bombay. The judgement was delivered by the court in favour of Karsandas.

KARTIKA TIRUNAL RAMAVARMA MAHARAJA-KARUNASHRI

KARTIKA TIRUNAL RAMAVARMA MAHARAJA (Malayalam; b. 1724, d. 1798). King Ramavarma of Travancore royal family, popularly known as Kartika Tirunal Balaramavarma or Dharmaraja, was born on the 5th Karkatakam in the Malabar era 899 under the asterism of Kartika. His father was Keralavarma Koil Tampuran of Kilimanoor and mother Rani Parvati Bayi. King Marttandavarma (1706-1758), the architect of the erstwhile Travancore State, was his maternal uncle. At a young age he mastered the arts and sciences and became a votary of the poetic muse and an able soldier in battle. He acquired proficiency in languages like Sanskrit, Persian, Hindustani and Malayalam in addition to Portuguese and English which he studied under a tutor named Pietro de Vegas. He also had a working knowledge of Dutch. Fr. Paulino Bartalomeo, who visited the Maharaja in 1770, was impressed by the proficiency of the king in English and presented him with a Comparative Grammar in Portuguese, English and Malayalam which the foreign scholar had prepared. The king also evinced interest in literature, music, dancing and kindred arts in addition to his fascination for Yoga and Vedanta.

On the death of Marttandavarma in July 1758, Kartika Tirunal ascended the throne and ruled till his death. There were many memorable events during his period. He drove the Zamorin of Calicut from Cochin and later forced the ruler of Cochin to part with some important regions. He entered into permanent alliance with the Nawab of Arcot and concluded a permanent treaty with the English East India Company. He successfully withstood the incursions of Tipu Sultan.

As an author and patron of literature he occupies an important position. His Balaramabharata (Trivandrum Sanskrit Series No.118, Trivandrum, 1935) in Sanskrit deals with the techniques of Indian classical dance and drama in accordance with Bharata's Natyashastra. The work is the result of his practical knowledge and as such it is a unique contribution of Kerala to Sanskrit dramaturgy. It details the rules of expressive dance and records the author's views in many places. Kartika Tirunal was also a poet of distinction. In Malayalam he wrote six attakathas. A seventh one Narakasuravadham based on the episode in Srimadbhagavata was also partly composed, though it was completed by his nephew Asvati Tirunal. Kartika Tirunal has used to less than thirty-eight ragas in his Kathakali songs and this suggests his mastery of music. He was also a great patron of poetry.

He gave generous encouragement not only to Kathakali but also to other art forms. According to tradition he introduced 'mohiniyattam' in Kerala after witnessing the 'dasiyattam' of Tamilnadu. He popularised Kathakali in Kerala by arranging its performance during festivals in Kerala temples.

KARUNAKARAN, THIRUNALLOOR (Malayalam; b. 1923) is a talented poet who brought a genuine humanistic note to his poetry. Influenced by Marzian aesthetics, Thirunalloor's writings are focussed on the principle of work; they discuss the need of dedicated labour. His first collection, Soundariathinte padayalikal (The soldiers of beauty) is a juvenile exercise in protest and exhortation. But subsequently, he matured into a true humanist with sympathy for the down-trodden. His poetry is essentially autobiographical, in the sense that it is the expression of felt experience. Many of his poems have a ballad-like simplicity. The rural scenario is basic to his art. All his images and symbols originate from life in the village and its neighbourhood. 'Rani' is one of his fine narrative poems in which an unfulfilled love is described with simplicity as well as pathos. After 1981, there is the intrusion of an ironic note which suggests frustration and disillusionment about the dream of the golden age to come. He shows a partiality for Dravidian metres and uses them with grace and beauty. He never deviates from the traditional forms, and shuns steadfastly the experimental new poetry. Thirunalloor's knowledge of Sanskrit is of a high order. His translation of Kalidasa's Meghaduta is perhaps the best so far in Malayalam. He has translated Kalidasa's Shakuntalam also. He is a distinguished Professor of Malayalam and taught for the best part of his life in University College, Trivendrum. A specialist in Linguistics and Kerala History, he wrote a fine study, The Evolution of the Malayalam Language—Theories and Facts. The poems of Thirunalloor Karunakaran, published in 1984, was awarded the Kumaran Asan Prize for Malayalam Poetry.

KARUNASHRI (Telugu; b. 1912) is the pen-name of Sri Jandhyala Papaiah Sastry, a great poet who has enriched Telugu literature in various ways. A village named Kopparru in Guntur district is his native place. He is the youngest of five brothers. He passed many examinations in Sanskrit, Telugu and Hindi and established himself as a scholar in these languages.

Of his writings three books are famous: Udayashri, Karunashri and Vijayashri. They brought him immense fame. In Udayashri a wide variety of subjects are dealt with; some are narratives and some reflective poems. There are poems on characters found in our epics, on great leaders, on patriotism, love, nature, etc. Whatever be the subject, the presentation is beautiful. Karunashri deals with the sacred life of Gautama, the Buddha. Vijayashri voices the poet's own patriotic feelings. The theme is the Mahabharata battle. His books are very much in demand. The first part of Udayashri has seen 49 prints, the second part 26, Vijayashri 25, Karunashri 24 and the Telugu bala shatakam sold one lakh and 13 thousand copies. The fact bears testimony to the poet's great talents and the degree of appreciation of his poems.

Besides poems he wrote a large number of playlets which have been broadcast from AIR. He has to his credit many translations, editorials and forewards to books. He organised many literary gatherings. Judging by the reception of his writings, we can name him a people's poet.

Karunashri was felicitated by the All India Poets Meet in Delhi in 1961. Later in 1980 he was also felicitated by the Benaras Hindu University. In 1982, the citizens of Vijayawada performed 'kanakabhisheka' to Karunashri and presented him with a gold bracelet. In 1982 the Venkateswara University awarded him D.Litt. Many literary and cultural societies like Andhra Mahasabha (Madras), Andhra Sangham (Pune), Andhra Sanskritika Mandal (Sholapur), Andhrasamithi (Bilaspur), World Telugu Meet and Nannaya Utsava Committees bestowed on him titles like 'Kavita Kalanidhi'. His life is dedicated to poetry. He is a 'kala tapasvi'.

It is difficult to define Karunashri's style. It is soothing and gentle. It is beautiful expression of lofty ideas and tender feelings originating in the poet's heart. One finds in his a rare blending of Srinatha's solemnity and Pothana's piety and simplicity. He was inspired by Pothana and followed the latter in style and expression.

His admiration for Pothana is so intense that unwittingly Karunashri acquired a similar style. The sweetness that prevades Pothana's poems has flowed into Karunashri's pen. It is no exaggeration to state that Karunashri imbibed ease and elegance from his favourite poet. At the same time it is not at all an imitation. We find the stamp of originality in every one of his poems.

His writings have given opportunity to a number of scholars to reveal their own talents. Many a thesis was produced on his works.

Among his poems, 'Pushpavilapam' (from the first part of Udayashri) 'Kuntikumari', 'Sandhyashri' and 'Karunamay' from Udayashri are purple patches. They have earned for the poet many laurels. These poems were rendered into music by the gifted singer Ghantasala Venkateswara Rao.

KARUPPAN, PANDIT K.P. (Malayalam, b. 1888, d. 1938) was born in a family of fisherman in Cheranallur. He broke the shackles of social inhibitions and raised his firm voice through his literary compositions against the oppressive social and economic forces of his times. He was born in the village of Cheranallur in Cochin as the son of Ayyan of Kandattilparampil and Kochupennu. A firm believer in God, this boy belonging to the scheduled caste was taught Sanskrit and allied subjects like grammar by orthodox caste Hindu scholars like Rama Poduval of Annamanta, Valiya Kochunni Tampuran of Kotungallur, Godavarma Tampuran of Kotungallur and Sahrida yatilaka Rama Pisharoti of Cochin. The king of Cochin known under the august name of Rajarshi showed a particular affection for Karuppan who had already acquired some basic knowledge of English also.

Karuppan started his official career as a clerk in the department of fisheries in the State of Cochin and later joined the education department and became a Pandit (equivalent to a lecturer) in the Training School at Trichur. He also looked after the welfare of the backward classes and became the Convener of the Basic Education Reform Committee. He soon became a member of the Cochin Legislative Assembly. The king bestowed on him the prestigious title 'Kavitalakan' in recognition of his literary efforts. Towards the end of his career he became a Malayalam Pandit in the Maharaja's College, Ernakulam and the Superintendent of Oriental Languages. He died of pleurisy.

A prolific writer on a variety of subjects, he showed his talents in literary pursuits. Some of his works have even started controversies. His drama Balakalesham won the prize in a literary competition, but sparked a controversy that lasted for sometime in the literary circles. His Uḍyanavirunnu (The feast in a garden) was composed in protest against his omission from a feast which included all other members of the legislature. Possessed of a pleasing and energetic literary style, he also composed Kaliyamarddanam (Ottan tullal), Edward vijayam (Musical play), Bhaimiparinayam (Malayalam drama), Lalitopaharam (Kilippattu), Acharabhusanam, Shakuntalam (Vanchippattu), Jatikkummi, Dinasvaram, Tirunalkummi, Kairalikautukam (in three parts), Balodyanam (in three parts), Chitralankaram (in six parts), Jubileegagam (in three parts), Oru tarattu (a lullaby) and a book on songs of certain communities. His works include musical plays like Dhruvacharita, Saudamini, Panchavati and Shakuntala (second part). He also attempted a translation in verse of Manusmṛiti which he did not complete.

The underlying force of his compositions is his dominant progressive outlook which refused to accept victimisation and atrocities. The uplift of the down-trodden was his famous theme particularly since he had been at the receiving end of the communal disadvantages.

KARVE, IRAVATI (Marathi: b. 1905, d. 1971) was born at Myingyan in Burma and was educated at Pune and Berlin—M.A. (Bombay University), Ph.D. (Berlin University). She was Professor of Anthropology in Deccan College, Pune.

One of the members of the illustrious Karve family of Pune, Iravati was well-known for her scholarship, oratory and writing. She wrote with equal ease in English as well as in Marathi. Her books, not many in number, have made a mark in Marathi literature.

KASAYAPAHUDA

Iravati started writing rather late, by about 1947, when the personal essay, ruined by the technique-mongers of the previous generation, had not yet revived. Iravati gave it a new turn. Hers was a different kind of essay, not ostentatiously personal or informal, but with a personal flavour, serious in content.

Her writing seems to have no literary aim or ambition, and as such there seems to be no conscious effort on her part to acquire a literary style. As she says in her essay 'Sutaka' (in Bhovra), "How much can one earn in a life-time? When the stream of experience overflows, one invites others to share it". This was her way of writing. These essays are, therefore, her spontaneous outpourings, taking a form that her experience dictates, sometimes that of a travelogue, or a character-sketch, or else that of a reminiscence, or just a plain essay. These essays give us glimpses of a world she lived in; she playfully talks about the people surrounding her, her family and relatives, her teachers and personalities that shaped her, her domestic experiences and wider experiences in her field of work which carried her to all parts of India and abroad.

But what makes these common experiences uncommon and lifts them to a lofty level, is their analytical interpretation by a rare personality. Endowed with a sensitive, inquisitive and incisive mind, and enriched by vast learning and varied experience, it is a personality free from usual feminine prejudices, with a scientific, rational outlook, but still having deep religious feeling.

Because of this identity of her experience with expression, her literary journey reflects a journey of her own life. In her earlier essays in Paripurti, we find Iravati as a woman happily surrounded by her family and friends, their problems, all wrapped up in her work, her alert mind trying to interpret her new experiences in a larger context of life. Yet her writing has no philosophic overtones. Her mood and tone gradually change as seen in 'Bhatake' (in Bhovra). In Gangajal, posthumously published, which contains essays written during 1961-71, we see a mind troubled with doubts about good and evil, dilemma of knowing right or wrong action, human destiny and death. Confronted with serious illnesses and shadow of death, she probes deeper and finds utter loneliness of human soul (in 'Ekaki'). For her Vithoba (the lord of Pandharpur) has become a boy-friend (in 'Boyfriend') whom she turns to in her desolate mood. She seeks answers to her questions in the philosophy of the German existentialist Heidegger, the Upanishads, and the Mahabharata, which has been her constant companion. Yugant, her major work, is the fruit of these studies on the Mahabharata. In it she compares also the philosophy of the Gita with that of the Buddha and the existentialists. Most of the essays in Gangajal, like 'Ekaki', 'Manse atmacharitra kan lihitat', 'Kinkali', 'Ukal', 'Sarva tuch ahes' are written in that state of mind and have deep philosophic overtones.

Because of these qualities of her writing, Iravati has carved out a permanent niche for herself in Marathi literature.

Her publications include: Paripurti (1949), Bhovra (1952), Gangajal (1972), a collection of literary personal essays, Marathi likanchi sanskriti (1955), a collection of her speeches at Mumbai Marathi Sahityasangha, embracing sociological exposition of Maharashtrian culture, Yugant, a collection of articles which while portraying the key characters of the Mahabharata, discusses the sociological and cultural aspects of the era. It is considered to be the best epitome of her writing and was picked up for the prestigious Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968. Kinship Organisation in India is her major research work on sociology in English.

KASAYAPAHUDA (Prakrit) is written on the philosophy of Jainism. The Sanskrit title of this book is Kashayaprabhrita. It is described in the Churnisutra as 'Kasayapahude summatteti anigaddare'.

Pejjadosapahuda is another name of this text. The work is considered as the second Siddhanta grantha of the Digambara tradition. This text is an elaborated description of 'pejja' and 'dosa' which are nothing but 'kashaya' themselves. Pejja indicates 'raga' or passion and 'dosa' means hatred. It is called Kasayapahuda as it is the elucidation of 'kashyas', i.e. raga (passion), dosa (hatred) and 'moho' (ignorance).

This text is written in verse. Many verses are mere interrogation on the main subject. This text contains two hundred thirty-three verses, divided into fifteen chapters. The first verse explains the utility of the title of this text. The second verse enumerates the chapters (or adhikaras) mentioning the number of verses in each chapter. The Kasayapahuda is traditionally believed to have been composed in the fifth century B.C. but there is authentic evidence in the commentaries to prove that the work was written not earlier than the first century of the Christian era.

According to the Shrutavatara of Indranandin, Acharya Gunadhara, the author of the Kasayapahuda taught the work to Nagahasti and Aryamankshu who explained it in their commentaries.

The first eight chapters of the work describe the different stages of charming action from which this world (samsara) is originated. Different stages of weak action are explained in the last seven chapters. The relation between action (karma) and soul (atman) is nothing but the relation between 'the cover' (avarana) and 'the covered' (avrita). This relation is divided into four types in Jaina philosophy as 'prakriti', 'sthiti', 'anubhaga' and 'pradesha-bandha'. In this way this text depicts the four stages of action.

There are several commentaries on the Kasayapahu- da; the most important ones are as follows: Churnisutra of Yativrishabha, Uchcharanasutra of Uchcharanacharya, Chudamani of Tambalur Acharya, an elaborate commentary of Samakunda and Jayadhavala of Virasena and Jinasena.

The first standard edition of the Kasayapahuda was published in the Jain Sangha Granthamala in 1944.

The philosophy of action, and its results as propounded in the Kasayapahuda has been alluded to by many Jain creative writers.

KASHIKAVRITTI (Sanskrit), popularly known as Kashika is the oldest available complete commentary of the 'vritti' type on the Ashtadhyayi of Panini. The Vritti was written in Kashi, whence comes the title, by Jayaditya and Vamana, both known as Buddhists. The work is a unique example of joint authorship in ancient India, since the first five chapters were written by Jayaditya and the last three by Vamana. It is generally believed that both the authors flourished during the seventh century A.D.

The Kashika, written in easy but elegant language, fully explains all the grammatical intricacies in the terse sutras of Panini. The style of interpretation is very systematic. The authors first show the relation of a particular sutra taken up for interpretation, with the preceding and following sutras by showing the words which have to be repeated from both or either. Then they paraphrase the sutra and add examples and counter-examples. It is obvious from the introductory verse that the work was based on the Mahabhashya of Patanjali and an older 'Vritti' which is now lost. But the authors differ from Patanjali at several places.

Jinendrabuddhi (8th cent.), a renowned Buddhist teacher and grammarian, wrote an elaborate commentary called Kashi-kavivaranapanjika or Nyasa on the Kashika. Another commentary called Padamanjari by Haradatta (12th cent.) is well-known for its comprehensiveness and independent views.

KASHIRAMDAS (Bengali), the greatest among the versifiers of Bengali Mahabharatas, was the son of Kamala Das whose ancestral homeland had been in Indrani Pargana in the district of Burdwan, West Bengal. But Kamalakanta left his homeland and settled in Orissa. Kashiram was probably born in Orissa; but later returned to Bengal.

Kashiram's younger brother, Gadadhar Das wrote a poem entitled Jagannath-mangal in 1642, in which he mentions the Mahabharata of Kashiram. So, Kashiram's work must have been completed before that date. In the colophon of a manuscript of Kashiram's Birata-parba we find 1526 Saka (1604-1605 A.D.) as the date of its completion. Elaborate researches have shown that after the completion of the Adi, Sabha and Birata parbas of his Mahabharata, Kashiram started Bana-parva, but died before finishing it. Singers and scribes, however, compiled the remaining parbas from the writings of other poets and replaced their bhanita (signature) with that of Kashiram Das. As a result of this, we have got a full-fledged Bengali Mahabharata, consisting of eighteen parbas, bearing the name of Kashiram Das as its author. The writers of the later parbas of this Mahabharata have not been identified, except for Krishnananda Basu, and Nandaram Das (supposed to be a nephew of Kashiram), who later completed his work. Kashiram's literary style is simple but beautiful. Generally, he had followed Vyasa except in a few cases like Subhadraharana and Rajasuya Jagna (of Yudhishtira). In Bengal, his popularity as a poet is matched only by that of Krittibas.

KASHRI ADBUK TARIKH (Kashmiri,) by Autar Krishan 'Rahbar,' is an analytical study of the origin and development of the Kashmiri language and literature, especially poetry. Based on modern principles of historiography, the book portrays in a lucid style the theories of emergence, evolution and development of the language between 1200 and 1775. The very first chapter of the book elaborates different theories propounded by various schools regarding the origin of Kashmiri, and concludes in locating 'pishachas' as the earliest speakers of this dialect. Then follows a comparative discourse on poetry, and last of all life sketches of some prominent poets and sketchy analysis of their works.

On the inner title, the book has been mentioned as Volume I. But no additional volume has been brought out even after the lapse of two decades, in spite of the demand from the readers.

George Abraham Grierson, the well-known orientalist and linguist, was the first man to publish a comprehensive summary of the origin of the Kashmiri language. His classic work Linguistic Survey of India (1928) left an everlasting impression on our scholars for locating the origin of Kashmiri in the ancestors of Hurza and Nagar tribes and in their Dardic dialect. Grierson also compiled the first Dictionary of Kashmiri Language (1916-32). Being over-shadowed by the tall stature of this Irish scholar, every student of history of Kashmiri language tries to establish the 'Darads' as aborgines of the valley. It was Abdul Ahad 'Azad' (1903-1948) who, after Grierson, tried to give a critical estimate of the works of Kashmiri poets and wrote down their life sketches in his Urdu work in three volumes, Kashmiri zaban aur shairi (Vol. I. 1959,

KASTURI, N-KATAMARAJU KATHALU

Vol. II, 1962, Vol. III, 1963). His work is considered to be a meritorious book of his time. But, except for a few essays and scattered notes, no comprehensive work on Kashmiri was published by a writer in Kashmiri language itself. Hence Rahbar's work can rightly be called a 'basic work' on the subject. As recorded in the printline, the task involved him for six long years from 1959 to 1965, and has been published with some financial aid from the State Cultural Academy.

The Kashmiri language has never been a court language. It never enjoyed a fair treatment from the local elite and was rather shunned by kings and their counselors merely due to a false prejudice. The authorities in pursuit of their own prestige always had an adaptability either towards Sanskrit or Persian. the Kashmiri dialect, therefore, left for the unsophisticated masses. could accumulate very little qualitatively. Yet its miraculous survival before such a monopolization owes a lot to the rich folk and past traditions. Till recently people used to sit together in the evenings listening to folk-stories narrated by the elder man of the house. Women and children used to sing in courtyards the most popular love-lores which had come down to them through generations. Although discarded from palaces, the language flourished in the fields among farmers, workers and the common man.

We have been able to record a few references of the great works of some of the poets who flourished during the past six centuries, like Lal Ded (1335-1400), Nund Rishi (1378-1438) and other mystics, and we are made to believe them as our beginners.

Rahbar has tried to locate some references of Kashmiri prose and poetry written before Lal Ded and has quoted great works like Brahatkatha owing its origin to Pishacha language (presumably Kashmiri). He has also traced a reference regarding the use of Kashmiri language as far back as the 8th century when the Karkota King, Jayapida, ruled over the valley. In the second chapter, the definition of Prakrit, Apabhramsha and their influence of Kashmiri dialects, has been recorded in an elaborate manner. He has tried to classify the evolution of the Kashmiri language in four different periods, namely (1) early period, (2) preromantic period, (3) period of romanticism and mysticism and (4) modern period. The last category is sub-divided into pre- and post- 1947 literature. The classification has been done in lieu of the trends in literature and not century-wise or in terms of political divisions done by his predecessors.

Tarikh deals with periods as classified under No.1 and No.2 only. The other two, it appears, will be discussed in the following volumes of the book.

KASTURI, N.(Kannada; b. 1897, d.1987) was a Kannada humorist, novelist, dramatist and essayist. Born in Cochin, Kerala, and an M.A. and B.L. he joined Marimallappa High School, Mysore, as a teacher (1922) and later entered History Department of Mysore University. He retired as Superintendent, D.R.M. College, Davanagere, Karnataka in 1956. He learnt Kannada after he came to Mysore, and mastered it so superbly that he would critically read old Kannada classics, and write with genuine humour. In his sixties, after he entered Sri Satya Sai Baba's ashram he learnt Telugu well enough to edit a Telugu periodical, Sanatana sarathi. He spent the last thirty years at Puttaparthi. He knew Malayalam, English, Kannada and Telugu. He was honoured by the Karnataka Sahitya Academy (1981).

Associated with the famous humorous monthly Koravanji, Kasturi both contributed humorous essays and skits and encouraged a number of writers to write. His was gentle, friendly laughter like Stephen Leacock's. Among his collections of humorous essays are Allola, and Kallola and Yadwa-tadwa. He was a genius in coining new words on the analogy of existing words and twisting the meaning of words to suggest new angles and create humour. His Anarthakosha is a dictionary of deliberately perverse definitions. He wrote plays which generally evolved in an interesting fashion. Usually he and a group of friends enacted impromptu plays built around a chosen theme or situation; later these were given final shape by Kasturi. Among his popular plays are Gaggayyana oadibidi, Varaparikshe and Kadane. He rendered into Kannada Alice in Wonderland as Pataladalli papachi. Among his novels Changuli cheluva and Chakradrishti stand out. The former is the life-story of a mason delineated with sympathy; it shows the serious side to Kasturi's character. In the latter, the central figure, a clerk, does not appear at all; a number of people talk about him, revealing themselves in the process. He wrote a book on Ashoka and another on customs of marriage.

FURTHER WORKS: Donkubala (1944), Shankvadya (1948), Allo-la, Kallola, Upaya vedanta (1951), Dilleeshwarna dinachari, Nonda teeve, Maduve (1958), Shivashakti swarupa divya pavada (1964), Satyam shivam sundaram (3 parts).

KATAMARAJU KATHALU (Telugu), a well known lyrical ballad, is a favourite song of the masses in Andhra especially in the coastal belt. The collection of folk literature in Andhra Pradesh began in the second half of the 19th century.

Katamaraju katha is a ballad cycle with the name Katmaraju kathalu. It is believed that there are thirty-two stories in this cycle. But no one is sure of the names of all those stories. Six of these stories are in the Govt. Oriental Manuscripts Library, Madras. Veturi Prabhakara Sastri published them along with his introduction. Tangirala Venkata Subba Rao collected another eleven stories with their appendices. A.P. Sahitya Academy published them with his introduction in two parts in 1975. C. Tirupati Rao assisted him in this project.

Katamaraju kathalu is very much cherished by the Yadavas of Andhra. They were sung in Nellore, Prakasam districts and in some parts of Guntur, Guddapah and Kurnool also.

Katamaraju was a Yadava King who ruled in 13th century in Nellore district. He was a subordinate king of the Kakatiya emperor. He fought a battle with Nallasiddhi Raju, son of Manmasiddhi Raju. While trying to fix the date of composition of the work with the available resources, V. Yashoda Devi held that the date of the war as 1259. Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma doubted the historicity of this ballad and said, "Though the story is very interesting it lacks historicity. Except the names of the Nallasiddhi and Khadga Tikkana there is nothing historical in this work. The story might be true, but there is no evidence to prove its historicity. Nor is there any evidence to show that the persons mentioned either on the side of Katamaraju or on the side of King Nallasiddhi are historical". (Preface to Katamaraju katha) Sarma's doubts are true to some extent. Nallasiddhi one of the main characters in the ballad is a Pallava king whereas the king Nallasiddhi is a Chola King in history.

Katamaraju, the Yadava King had innumerable bovine cattle heads. His herdsmen used to graze the cows in the grass fields of Lankamala, Palakonda, Nallamala (Cuddapah, Kurnool districts). Due to the seasonal changes there was no green grass in his fields. So he sent his cows to the adjacent fields in Nellore district. He made an arrangement with Nallasiddhiraju to give some calves in exchange for the permission to graze his cows in grass fields. But Katamaraju's herdsmen grazed the cows in crop fields instead of grass fields. His herdsmen hunted the wild animals in forests. Nallasiddhi's huntermen suffered a lot due to this hunting. Poluraju, uncle of Katamaraju killed a parrot belonging to the concubine of Siddhiraju. This action enraged Siddhiraju and he ordered the herdsmen to Katamaraju to get away immediately from his lands. Katamaraju wanted to teach Siddhiraju a lesson. The war took place in 1259 according to some historians. T.V. Subba Rao after a deep study of the source material opined that the above war took place in 1282. It seems the main cause of the battle was the difference about the agreement regarding the grazing rights of the grass lands.

According to the ballad cycle Katamaraju won the battle. The versifiers of the ballad glorified the strength of Katamaraju in several ways. But local records say that the king Nallasiddhi carried the day. The geneology of Katamaraju was described in detail in the Gundlapalem inscription. Seventeen generations of his family were described in this inscription.

Katamaraju was born on Thursday (Phalguna Shud-dha Panchami) in the year 'Dhata'. Peddamma and Peddaraju were his parents. Even today Phalguna Shud-dha Panchami is an auspicious day for Yadavas. Katamaraju's family worshipped Shiva giving a pride of place to Ganga as the supreme deity. Katamaraju's surname was 'Kariyavala'. He had several other names as Katredu, Kata Koteswarudu, Pasuvalanna and Avulanna. It is said that he had seventy-two titles. He had a vast treasure of cattle. The composers of the ballads described that the cattle herds of Katamaraju occupied 48 square miles when grouped but when scattered occupied 96 square miles.

Katamaraju married Ganga of Marlavari family. They had no children. It is said that they did not live together.

Some Telugu scholars believed that Mahakavi Sri-natha wrote the lyrical ballad of Katamaraju, but it is not available. Gangula Pina Yellayya is the real author of some of the stories in the ballad cycle. Avula Valuraju katha by Vadarupa Madduleti Kavi, Pampadri katha by Mallayya, Avula Poluraju katha by Kanakabandi Ghat-tayya, Kariyavularaju katha by Pinayellayya, Katamara-juku pattam kattina katha by Marayya Kavi, Papanuka katha by Mangalapuri Venkatadri. Agumanchi katha by Jarugupalle Chenchayya were written respectively.

Avula Valuraju katha is the first story in the ballad cycle of Katamaraju kathalu. Avula Valuraju was the king of Yelamanchili. He fought with his neighbour Kalubhuta Gangaraju and died in the battle.

Pampadri katha is the second story. Peddiraju is the son and descendent of Avula Valuraju. For a long time Peddiraju had no children. He entrusted his kingdom to his brother Poluraju and went on a pilgrimage to Kalyana Pattanam.

In Peddiraju katha Peddiraju visited many places in his pilgrimage. Katamaraju was born to Peddiraju in his sixtieth year with the blessings of Kata Koteswara.

Among this ballad cycle Katamarajuku pattam kattina katha, Kariyavularaju katha, Battu Rayabaramu, Kotapati Jativriksham techche katha, Veduka bongarala katha, Errangaddapati potlata, Agumanchi katha, are very famous among the Andhra folk Several types of folk singers popularised the Katamaraju kathalu ballad cycle. Kommulavaru, Gollasuddulavaru, Poda Pothulavaru are famous among them. These folk singers first pray to the Lord Gananayaka for the uninterrupted blessings. Later they pray to Ganga, the supreme deity of Yadavas. These folk-singers celebrate Ganga Jatara or Ganga Tirunallu on a grand scale. Herdsmen and people belonging to various professions join this festival very enthusiastically.

Katamaraju is idolised and worshipped at Errogodda-

KATARVEL-KATAVA-KATIBANDHA

padu and Kanigiri. In Kanigiri temples were also built for Katamaraju.

After the folk-literature acquired status of an academic subject in several universities, deep study and research have taken place on ballad cycles. Not only literary scholars but historians and social scientists also showed much interest in these ballads.

Katamaraju kathalu reveals a lot of social history of the 13th century of Andhra Pradesh. Kings of those times cared for their cows very much and also valued and worshipped them. They worshipped cows and thought that killing a cow was a greater sin than killing a man.

The actual language in all its variations actually spoken by the common man of those days was imbibed in this ballad. Poetry of the masses rendered into this ballad achieved the appreciation of both the scholars and the common folk. Our scholars and learned men benefitted much on reading this ballad containing some original and novel ideas and maiden expressions.

KATARVEL (Marathi) is a compilation of assorted short stories by the renowned modern Marathi short story writer, Arvind Gokhale. The stories compiled in this book, twenty-five in all, have been selected from Gokhale's first four short story collections, viz. Nazrana (1944), Janmakhuna (1947), Unmesh (1947) and Tanuja (1948). These trace the development of Gokhale's art of short story-writing.

Gokhale had taken to writing about a decade before the publication of his first collection Nazarana. This was an age of short story-writing in Marathi literature, and the veterans like Phadke, Khandekar, Y.G. Joshi were already at their zenith and made the short story the most popular genre in Marathi literature.

Gokhale's earlier stories were inevitably imitative and on the subjects in vogue or topical, e.g. 'Adam ani Eve' tells of the pre-independence efforts to form labour unions. 'Biday Bondhu' portrays a Bengali prostitute—a victim of Bengal famine in 1943. Konkaranchi katha is about an illiterate villager, who is a run-away recruit in World War-II. First four stories, written earlier, do not bear his own stamp, but later ones show the writer expressing himself in his own new idiom.

Gokhale, along with Gadgil, broke a new ground in the genre and ushered in the era of new short story. What strikes one about Gokhale's stories is his freshness of outlook. Without appearing ostensibly new or eccentric in language, imagery or theme like Gadgil, Gokhale presents an entirely unusual or novel aspect of situations. 'Janhavi'. 'Dusari dasi'. 'Urmila'. 'Na takleli' and 'Konkaranchi katha' are some such stories included in this collection. 'Janhavi' is a village girl forcibly kidnapped by a Mang, but rescued by the brave youth of the village, an event publicly celebrated. But with Gokhale her real story starts when none is prepared to marry her with her stigma and she is compelled to find her own way out by going back to the kidnapper. In 'Urmila' (of the Ramayana), he imagines what this Janaka's real daughter must have felt while always playing a secondary role to 'Sita', his adopted daughter. The old couple in 'Bhatukali' hits a novel idea of entertainment in their boring, empty life. They play dolls like children. 'Dusari dasi' (Second slave) is the second educated wife of an artist who marries her for her 'intellectual' company, but she discovers to her own chagrin that she is no less a slave than the first uneducated wife. In their commiseration, the two become friends.

'Bujavne' (Scarecrow) is the story of a different category. Here the experience is intensely felt and it takes a different form. Narrated in the first person singular, it tells the saga of the frustrations of a self-denying freedom-fighter, who left school during the freedom struggle and underwent imprisonment and all sorts of hardships, but after the Independence finds, by a strange irony, his classmate—an Anglophile careerist, now a collector—exhorting people about sacrifice and patriotism on the occasion of the flag-hoisting ceremony on the 15th August.

Another main characteristic of Gokhale's writing is his dispassionate attitude, whatever the subject. He excels in identifying himself equally with any type of character, without being personal. He neither advises, nor comments. His stories usually depict emotional tension, and move on by their own emotional momentum, without the application of any propellant by their writer. He especially succeeds in painting the emotional world of his women characters.

Gokhale is well-known for his vast variety of subjects, characters, situations and locales. In 'Adam and Eve', he depicts the relationship between a Christian couple, while in 'Biday Bondhu' he takes us to a brothel. In 'Ghar-ghar', he peeps into the hovels of the underworld; in 'Sawadhan' (Beware), he paints an authentic atmosphere of a mediaeval family. 'Bhatukali' (Playing dolls) reveals the minds of an ancient couple, while 'Konkaranchi katha' gives the glimpse of the terrorised mind of a runaway army soldier.

A master craftsman, Gokhale's stories surprise their readers with unexpected turns at the end. Short story is Gokhale's only forte, and he has served its cause with a rare, single-minded devotion. He did not experiment with any other form.

KATAVA-KATIBANDHA (Marathi) is a form of verse based on the matra rhythm, it has the enjambement or running-on movement of the blank verse. It is a long-drawn composition of verse stanzas which are called

KATHA-RAJASTHANI

'kadaven', like the 'kadavaka' of the Prakrit-Apabhramsha verse forms. The term 'katibandha' used to signify katava, which seems to be a Sanskritized back-formation, for we do not get any reference to any such term in any treatise on prosody and versification written in classical or the medieval times or Katibandha really means any long verse, divided into subdivisions or 'katis', and was used by a 19th century 'shahjira' poet, Ananta Phandi.

Katavas had become very much popular with the 'Kirtankaras' in the 18th and 19th centuries. The only major poet who utilized this verse form to its fullest capacity, was the great lyricist Amritarai. The 'akhyana' compositions containing Amritarai's katavas spread from the north to the south, especially to such places as Baroda, Indore, Gwalior in the north, and Hubli, Gadag and Tanjore in the south. They were sure shots to engage attentions of the musical-minded audiences. Thus, they were veritable stock-in-trade of the kirtankaras.

Amritarai wrote scores of these katavas. But strangely enough, they do not actually form a part of any akhyanas. Though Amritarai is credited with a couple of such 'prakaranas', the katavas do not form any significant part of them. Amritarai selected popular incidents as narrated flatly or rhetorically by the kirtankaras, and composed his katavas around them, giving them an individuality and a rhythmic flow. The themes of these katavas range from the glorious to the pathos. They often narrated the names of the different famous warriors, pitched against each other in battle formation, or a catalogue of the various 'divine' weapons of 'astras', or strung in flowing rhymed lines the varying items of the popular Peshwai meals. In the actual presentation, the kirtankaras, along with the accompanying members of their kirtana-troupe, who were all expert musicians, changed the tempo and stresses in the narration, without hampering the basic rhythm or its even beats. In rhetorical apostrophes, they often addressed the absent gods and heroes like Shankara, Rama, Ganesha and Bhishma, Dharma and Karna, or Ravana and Meghanada. Then the tempo would naturally be high-pitched and the intonation would be full of nuances of emphasis and pauses. But when the topic would be light and humorous, the address would obviously be intimate and conversational, taking the audience into confidence. Later writers of 19th century and early 20th century composed such light-hearted katavas. They became stock-in-trade even in Gujarati kirtanas, the kirtanakara ('buva') obviously following the Dakshini (Maharashtrian) style of kirtana. Thus, katavas of Amritarai, like 'sansara-dukkhavarana', 'sitasvayamvara', 'sudama charitra' would contain serious passages, and 'draupadi vastraharana' would contain serious and light-hearted passages, when the poet would describe the wickedness of Dushshasana, and then, would enumerate the enormous length of garment of different styles and textures. The katava called (Narada)

Naradi is a sure piece to evoke laughter in audience when he would paint the penpicture of Narada, donning the apparel of a female and becoming Naradi. And while the Kirtanakara enumerates the catalogues and lists, he softens down his voice, descends in an almost conversational style, and the 'tala theka' also assumes a dimmer and lower range of its 'bolas' or strokes. In the composition of these Katavas, there are numerous verse stanzas, and the ending line of each of these stanzas of katavas is usually rhymed with the starting couplet which naturally is the burden of the song or the unifying strain. The main body of the katava has rhymed lines, which are not broken into rhymed couplets, but each stanza may have its own rhyming scheme, in which all the lines (of the kadaven) are loosely rhymed. The beat of rhythm is generally the 'dhumali' or 'kehrava tala' with a slow or fast movement as the Kirtanakara deems it proper. The opening lines of different katavas (the Dhruvapadas) are often in different 'matra' (syllable) groups or 'ganas', but the tala 'theka' remains the same and offers to the reciters or singers opportunities to expound his mastery over the tala beats, with pauses and breaks, in accordance with the composition of the Dhruvapadas. In an exceptional case like the "Dhruva-charitra", the tala beat is 'Dadara', the lines being broken into six-matra groups. In other katavas the lines have eight matra groups, suitable for the Dhumali-Keharava 'theka'. All this is not to suggest that the katava is a sort of 'musical' interlude. It is more or less a rhythmic and rhetorical device, a kind of digression, full of quick pace used to lighten the otherwise heavy atmosphere of the puranic akhyana.

Some of the editors of Amritarai's katavas have used the term 'kataka' as a synonym of katava. This term is also used by the bardic poets of 17th century 'povadas', to signify their long drawn-out heroic narratives, consisting of 'kadas' or 'katis', i.e. kadaven. The other synonym 'katibandh' is also used to denote the bardic or other compositions like 'povadas' and 'lavanis'. Poet Ananta Phandi has said so in one of his bardic povadas. But Amritarai himself has referred to his katavas as 'katibandhas' in one of his songs (song No.37).

KATHA (Rajasthani) may generally be taken as a 'vata' (story). Though writings based on a katha are both in prose and verse, the term katha used here carries a specific meaning. Among the various genres in Rajasthani prose, the 'khyata' the 'vata' and the 'katha' are the most important ones on account of their qualitative and quantitative aspects. There is a difference between a katha and a vata. The vata is predominantly pleasing and fictitious, and has a sufficiently broad base, while religion, moral conduct and preaching of righteousness are the main ingredients of the katha. The traditional meaning of a katha in the modern jargon is generally taken as a mythological tale with a religious bearing. It is aimed at giving a didactic turn to a story with a view to highlighting the religious import. There has been a long standing tradition of the Jain kathas in Rajasthani literature which are available in a written form in large numbers. The folk-tales have also been set down in writing. The Jainas have utilised them on a large scale as illustrations in their commentaries on various works. They are all didactic in nature and are aimed at preaching morals. There are Vaishnav kathas as well. A number of kathas based on vows, fasts, week days, and days of the month are too well known.

KATHA (Sanskrit). The beginning of Sanskrit prose-writings may be traced to a very dim antiquity, and the origin of this species of literature is shrouded in greater obscurity than that of the 'kavya' itself. The extant works of prose literature are of a comparatively late date. The extant prose literature may be divided into two broad classes: romance and fable. The prose romance first makes its appearance in a fully developed form in the works of Dandin, Subandhu and Bana. In early classical Sanskrit there were numerous types of prose romances, the two most prominent among them being 'katha' and 'akhyayika'. The akhyayika is specifically mentioned by Katyayana in his Varttika, and Patanjali, commenting on it, mentions the names of three akhyayikas whose form and content are not known. The very title of the Brihatkatha and the designation katha applied to each story of the Panchatantra indicate an early familiarity with the words katha and akhyayika, but the terms are simply used to signify a tale in general, having no specific technical meaning.

Dandin, who flourished in the seventh century A.D., writes in his Kavyadarsha that there is no vital point of difference in the nature of the two types of prose compositions, viz., katha and akhyayika and he regards them as the different names of one and the same species. But, according to Amarasimha, the lexicographer, katha is a purely poetic creation, while akhyayika possesses a historical basis. Bana himself alludes to the two classes of prose composition, called the katha and the akhyayika, intimating that his Harshacharita ranks as an akhyayika while, on the other hand, the Kadambari is a katha which lacks the specific features of the akhyayika. In point of matter, it has a complex structure of its own, since it consists of a long narrative in which other narratives given by the characters of the work are interwoven. In his Harshacharita, Bana glorifies his patron, King Harsha, who flourished during 606-647 A.D., and gives an account of his genealogy and early life as a great traveller. But his Kadambari is a unique Sanskrit prose romance of katha type which deals with the love story of Chandrapida and Kadambari wherein Bana makes lavish use of his poetic imagination in relating the story. Parallel to the main story runs the love affair of Pundarika and Mahashveta. The book also contains some biographical account of the author in the beginning. Bana's Kadambari is remarkable for long, involved constructions, unusual words, use of epithets after epithets with the verb held back for pages together, unusually long compounds, and fondness for details and descriptions, even to the neglect of the main narratives and action.'

Some notable characteristics of these two classes of writing as defined by Sanskrit rhetoricians are enumerated here:

(1) In an akhyayika, it is the hero himself who tells the whole story, while in a katha the story is told either by the hero or by someone else. (2) An akhyayika is divided into sections named 'uchchhvasas' and contains verses in 'Vaktra' and 'Aparavaktra' metres, while in a katha it is not so, (3) In a katha, such topics as the kidnapping of a girl, battles, separation, the rise of the sun and moon are described; it is so in an akhyayika, (4) A katha is distinguished for insertion of certain catch-words which the author intentionally puts in. It is essentially a fictitious narrative, which may sometimes be told in the first person, but whose primary interest lies in its invention.

B.N.H.

KATHA AHAMANI (Rajasthani) also called Katha aha-davanj, was authored by Delhaji, who flourished between 1433 and 1493 approximately. The date of composition of the work may be somewhere near 1470. It is the first narrative poem in Rajasthani dealing with Abhimanyu, the hero of the Mahabharata. Composed in various metres and meant to be sung in various ragas/raginis such as 'Dhanashri', 'Maru', 'Soratha', 'Gaudi', 'Dhavala', 'Asadhahadi', etc., it is a sizeable volume of 717 stanzas. Written in a dialogue form, it is full of narrations and musical renditions. It was found in a manuscript form and deserves publication with a well-edited text, carrying different variations. The story, in short, runs thus: Krishna killed many demons, and Ahlochana of Mathura was one of them. His pregnant wife hid herself in a forest and, thus, saved her life. She gave birth to a mighty son named Ahadanava. When he grew up, he came to know that is was Krishna who had struck at the very roots of his family. He took a vow to capture him and chain him. Being pleased with his intense penance, Vishvakarma gave him an amulet, and he proceeded to Dwarka. Krishna, in the guise of an old brahman, met him on the way. He told the demon that he was a priest of his father Ahlochana. Thus, gaining his confidence, Krishna advised him to enter the amulet. This being done, Krishna closed the amulet and blew his 'Panchajanya' conch at which the demon's body was transformed into a bee which continued to hum inside the amulet. Krishna returned to Dwarka with the amulet. When Subhadra opened the amulet, the demon, who was converted into a bee, quickly entered into her stomach through the mouth. Krishna told her the secret of 'Chakravyuha' (a specific strategy adopted in the great Mahabharata war) to which he responded as a child in the womb. Subhadra was married to Arjuna. In due course of time the bee was born as Abhimanyu. Instigated by Krishna, the demon Talu, lord of the nethermost world, attacked Indra. Arjuna went to the territory occupied by Indra to help him. Knowing that their own sister's son was their enemy, the Yadavas always lived in a state of fear. When Abhimanyu was 10 years old, his marriage was solemnised with Uttara, the daughter of King Vilha of Virata. Krishna again prompted the Kauravas to plan the strategy of chakravyuha. When the Pandavas were unable to penetrate it, Abhimanyu got ready to do so. A number of camel-breeders rushed to fetch Uttara from Viratanagar on camelback. Knowing that Abhimanyu was going to enter the battle field, Subhadra remonstrated with her mother-in-law Kunti on this decision. Uttara also requested Abhimanyu not to proceed to war, but he ignored all the appeals. Seven of the best of the heroes were defeated while entering the Chakravyuha, but they all struck Abhimanyu collectively and deceitfully. While dying he remembered his enmity of the previous birth with Krishna. At this juncture Arjuna returned from the kingdom of Indra. His sorrow knew no bounds when he learnt of the death of his son. At Arjuna's request Krishna promised to show Abhimanyu to him. For this they proceeded to Kurukshetra. On the way they saw that a brahman was lying dead of snake bite. Arjuna communicated this fact to the dead man's parents and his wife. The wife replied that those that lamented the death of a person were fools. At this Arjuna's grief was lightened. Further on, Arjuna saw Abhimanyu playing dice. He did not recognise Arjuna and only said that Krishna himself had put him to death, but to avenge his death he asked him to kill Jayadratha, as it was he who wounded him even after his death. When Arjuna promised to do so, Abhimanyu got up to be embraced by him. Arjuna then returned and killed Jayadratha. Later on, the entire army consisting of eighteen divisions of the largest size was destroyed. The poet ends on an ethical note.

This is an extraordinary work of its kind from the linguistic, literary and cultural points of view. It reveals the various forms of common parlance, idioms and proverbs of the period in an authentic way. There are three types of descriptions: the dialogue form, the poet's own utterances and expressions of his feelings by a particular character. The dialogues are dramatic and impressive, which have been used on 21 occasions. The second type of descriptions mainly include the episodes of the brahman, the birth and marriage of Abhimanyu, the she-camels, the city of Viratanagar, the marriage party, the feast, the canopy set up for marriage ceremony, the beauty and make-up of Uttara and the family customs while proceeding to the battle field. Subhadra's grief on learning that Abhimanyu was going to the battle field, and Uttara's agony when Abhimanyu left for the battle and later on, when he died, are the situations where characterisation appears at its best. The poet has presented lively pictures in these descriptions. The interesting descriptions of the old brahman and the she-camels, deserve a reading to be believed. The poet seems to be particularly successful in fathoming a woman's mind. Four of these female characters are worth noting from this angle. They are Subhadra, Uttara, Kunti and Uttara's mother. Their sentimental expressions as a mother, mother-in-law, wife and daughter are indeed, incomparable. A number of living pictures expressing the actions, demeanours, hopes, desires, thoughts and emotions in given circumstances befitting the fair sex, are found in abundance. The sentiments expressed by Subhadra and Uttara are unique. Among the male characters, Krishna is the central figure and the protagonist of the dramatic action in this poetical work. No where has any attempt been made to divert the events from the natural flow. This has helped in maintaining the easiness and a certain naturalness throughout. The basic difference brought out in this main puranic episode also helps in keeping the curiosity alive. Abhimanyu is the hero of this story. His enthusiasm, while proceeding to fight, has been vigorously expressed. His feelings of love or eroticism find scant attention in the work. The story has three turning points—one is from the beginning upto the marriage of Abhimanyu, the other is upto the death of Abhimanyu in the battle, and the third from Arjuna's return to Hastinapur upto the end. The second one is comparatively more important than the rest. Here we find human feelings permeating the fast moving current of events. When Abhimanyu leaves for the battle, it seems as if the dramatic depiction of pathos is in full swing. The poem contains the description of erotics, heroism, pathos and tranquillity of mind. It has a peaceful end. Every character has a common man's heart-throb and all are full of human sympathy and brotherhood. But Krishna is, no doubt, an exception, as he had a definite goal to achieve. The author has, at all times, encouraged the need of sublime virtues and the reader draws necessary inspirations from them. Glimpses of the soul of the desert land is visible at every stage of description.

KATHA BANASUR-KATHA GURUCHARITA

KATHA BANASUR (Kashmiri) of Bhattavatar is the earliest 'paband' or 'kavya-paband' (kavya prabandha) in Kashmiri that has come down to us, the earlier ones having all perished. Bhattavatar, the court-poet of Sultan Zain-al-Abidin, wrote this book on the alluring episode of Usha's love for Aniruddha as narrated in the Harivamshapurana, within the broader framework of the fierce battle between Bana and Krishna. As the very title of the poem indicates, the war episodes occupy a disproportionate space in the story encroaching thereby upon what should have fairly belonged to the romantic component of the theme.

Yet the paband is not a mere versification of the Harivamshapurana's story; it is qualitatively a different piece of writing, patterned on the puranic subject. The only formal affinity with Harivamshapurana that Banasurkatha betrays, is the interlocutory device whereby the whole narrative is framed within the scope of what Vaishampayana narrates to Janamejaya. The Harivamshapurana has a preponderance of the Anushtup with rare exceptions, while Banasurkatha has employed as many as twenty-six metrical forms, Sanskrit as well as Prakrit Apabhramsha. Among the Sanskrit chhandas used, we find Vasantatilaka, Malini, Sragdhara, Shardulavikridita, Pushpitagra, Praharsini, Drutavilambita and Mandakranta, while the Prakrit-Apabhramsh forms includes Thaddo, Dukkataka, Narkutaka, Kaddoda and Phiru. Non-availability of the earlier or subsequent documentation of most of these metrical forms (including Thaddo that sounds convincingly Kashmiri in nomenclature) is quite intriguing. The use to which these have been put, nevertheless, presupposes a precedent of considerably long standing.

The language of Banasurkatha, again, presents a problem; it sounds older than that of Lal Ded's utterances which are positively earlier, despite the possibility of their exposure to amendment during the course of oral transmission. Bhattavatar, in fact, appears to have deliberately harnessed the Sanskrit (even archaic) and Prakrit diction to his own use with a view to impressing the audience at the royal court.

Instances of monotony or artificiality in the poem are not many. On the contrary, the work (comprising 400 stanzas, mostly of four lines each, occasionally of six lines or more) maintains, on the whole, consistent simplicity and, on occasions, even elegance of diction. The description of the warfare, however, seldom rises above the level of mediocrity, while the treatment of youthful love, whenever possible, touches a fairly high level of competence. Here is a glimpse of the love-lorn Usha who has just had a dream in which Aniruddha enthrals her:

Crying like a separated swallow in space, shedding tears of blood from lovely eyes,
she was afire, even icy water wont cool her down
The damsel was consumed by her beloved's lover

P.N.P.

KATHA GURUCHARITA (Assamese) is the first prose-hagiography in Assamese literature, and the largest and most elaborate of all medieval Assamese hagiographies either in verse or prose. It is an anonymous, undated work. Internal evidences indicate that it must have been written by some Vaishnava devotee or devotees within the precincts of some Satra or Vaishnava monastery towards the end of the seventeenth or the beginning of the eighteenth century. The manuscript of the book originally contained 154 folios written on agar wood bark strips, each of the size of 6 1/2 x 18". Of these, 7 folios 22-28pp. are missing. Banikanta Kakati received the manuscript from His Holiness Chaturbhuj Misra, Satradhikar or the Abbot of Barpeta Satra in C.1925. At Kakati's behest, Upendrachandra Lekharu edited the book and added an Introduction and Appendices. It was published by Harinarayan Duttu Baruah in 1952 with a Foreword in English by Banikanta Kakati and Birinchikumar Barua. The book contains 622 pages, of demy 8vo size.

The work is a chain of records of as many as ten or eleven persons' lives, all of them being religious preachers of the preceding periods. Shankaradeva's life occupies the first and most prominent place, and then the author (s) deals lineally with the lives of Shankaradeva's successors in the religious order instituted by him. The accounts of the lives of these saints do not stand independently but are dovetailed together. But even the dovetailing does not make all the accounts a coherent whole. Thus this work appears to be more a chronicle of the sixteenth and seventeenth century Vaishnava saints and preachers and of the Vaishnava religious institution than a biography proper. The remark of Banikanta Kakati and Birinchikumar Barua that it "stands pre-eminently" as a "systematic prose-biography" in early Assamese literature, cannot, therefore, be accepted strictly in its true sense.

It is inappropriate to call it a biography proper for another reason. Like all other verse and prose biographies of the Vaishnava saints in medieval Assamese it resembles the medieval European hagiographies in its deification of the subject occasionally at the cost of veracity; and in its use of supernatural elements even at the cost of credibility. It is, therefore, more proper to call these medieval Assamese biographies of the Vaishnava saints and preachers hagiographies like their European Christian counterparts. It is significant that even from the medieval age these works have been described in Assamese as gurucharita or charita and not as jivani or biography.

With these reservations one can certainly agree with the two critics mentioned above that this work is not only the most voluminous and complete but also the most trustworthy and authoritative of all the medieval hagiographies in Assamese verse or prose. The work, however, records mainly and comprehensively only the lives of the two principal preachers and saints, Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva. The other lives are all cursorily portrayed. As a hagiography of Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva, it is distinguished from other works on the same subjects in the same genre in that it abounds in many small details of the subjects' day-to-day life, both public and private; and in many political, social, and economic references. The compiler treats the materials with some restraint, while attributing superhuman qualities to the saints and in the use of the supernatural, especially after the early part of the work. It is these qualities that make this hagiography unique in Assamese literature.

The work assumes a special importance in that it throws a flood of light on the contemporary social, cultural, economic and political condition. There is much important, and rare information about socio-economic, socio-political and socio-cultural life of the people of the time for which it has come to be regarded as a valuable source-book of reference for researches on seventeenth and eighteenth century Assamese life and society. The book gives us some new information in connection with Shankaradeva's pilgrimages to Northern and Southern religious places.

The book adds to our knowledge these aspects about the life and society of the region it covers (viz., the Brahmaputra valley and the present North Bengal): the special importance attached to the learning of Sanskrit; the Satras that flourished as centres of Vaishnava religion and culture, various social customs of the time including the Sati and slave-trading; trade and commerce; the handicrafts of the region and the special skill of the people in their handicrafts, political and commercial relations with the neighbouring kingdom of Bhutan, the political relationships among the ruling kings and principalities of the region, the Koch kings, the Ahom kings, the Kacharis, the Chutias, the Bhuyans, etc., the political relationship between Gauda kingdom and Koch kingdom, the Muhammadan invasion of the Ahom kingdom,—all these, too, find place in this hagiography.

The prose style of the book also assumes a special importance. In rather short simple sentences, its author or authors have not only very successfully recorded the events of the subjects' lives, but have also made the lives, especially those of Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva, very lively. This is done even while maintaining through the book a devotional ardour. Occasionally and appropriately, the style gets emotional and poetic while on certain other appropriate occasions, it becomes humorous and light. And yet, all along, it remains simple and rhythmic. It is for this lucidity and rhythmic quality that Kakati and Barua compare the prose-style of this work to that of the authorized version of the Bible. Its prose-style, no doubt, is a landmark in the history of Assamese prose.

KATHAKALI (Malayalam) is the highly evolved theatrical form of Kerala. It is a stylised and non-illusionistic art-form that integrates the elements of theatre, dance, music and poetry in its structure. In kathakali, the plots of the plays are usually taken from the puranas and other mythical tales of India.

Kathakali basically caters to an initiated audience. The actor in this form of drama resorts to an elaborate code of mudras, supported by body movements and facial expressions. There is no speech uttered by the actor; vachika or oral rendering is done by the back-ground musician who renders the text of the play, the meaning of which is depicted by the actor through his histrionic skill. The music in kathakali, set to 'raga' and 'tala' are captivating, and they have a vital role to play in establishing the context, mood and situation of the drama. The music is a combination of the classical Carnatic and the indigenous 'sopana' styles. The orchestra consisting of 'chenda', 'maddalam', 'chengila' and 'elattalam' serves to sets the mood and tempo of the dramatic situation. The costume and makeup in kathakali are stylized and spectacular. Rather than imitating life, they represent symbolic traits of character. The stage setting is minimal with only a huge metal lamp adorning the stage, the lighted wicks providing the stage-lighting. Traditionally the performance of kathakali begins after dusk and continues till day-break.

The libretto of a kathakali play is called 'attakkatha' ('attam' meaning 'dance' and katha, suggesting 'narration'). The language of attakkatha is a mellifluous mixture of Sanskrit and Malayalam, the degree of both varying from author to author. The structure of an attakkatha is made up of 'shlokas' (which have a narrative function) and 'padams' (which serve the function of dialogue). The shlokas usually serve as a bridge between two scenes, apprising the audience of what transpired in the earlier scene and what is to follow in the next scene. After enacting the meaning of the padam, the actor also has a chance to exhibit his scholarship and histrionic skill, by resorting to 'manodharma' (imaginative, improvisational acting).

Among the major plays of the kathakali repertoire, the first mention may be made of Kottarakkara Tampuran (17th century), who is said to have been the innovator of Ramanattam, the earlier version of kathakali. He composed eight plays based on the story of the Ramayana, covering the incidents in the life of Rama from his birth and marriage to his coronation. Though his plays are not marked by their excellent literary quality, Tampuran's plays have a historical importance. Some of the plays, including Balivadhama and Toranayddham are still popular on the stage.

The other important writers of kathakali texts include Kottayattu Tampuran, Unnayi Varier, Kartika Tirunal Ramavarma Maharaja, Irayimman Tampi, Kilimannor Tampuran, etc. Kottayattu Tampuran composed four plays—Bakavadham, Kalyanasaugandhikam, Kirmeera-vadhama and Nivatakavachakalakeyavadham—which are a combination of theatrical effectiveness and literary beauty. The plays have a tight structure and are ridden by dramatic conventions peculiar to the art form. They leave a lot of scope for the actor to embellish situations of theatric appeal.

Unnayi Varier's Nalacharitam is a major landmark in Kathakali. This play stands out from the rest in its multi-faceted appeal. Nalacharitam, composed in four parts to be presented on the stage in four nights, deals with the romantic story of Nala and Damayanti. Varier took the basic story from the episode of Nala discussed in the Mahabharata, but he gave it a new dimension by infusing the elements of poetic imagination and dramatic potentiality. The main task of realizing the different levels of experience in the text is on the actors who take on the roles of Nala and Damayanti, who have to possess a high degree of sensitiveness, combined with a thorough mastery of technique and capacity of expression. To give one example from the First Day's story: in the scene of Nala's pining for Damayanti after having heard about her from various sources, the mood of 'viraha' (love in separation) is built up to its very peak, and the actor is able to convey the intense manifestation of passionate love skilfully and persuasively, at the same time not bordering on vulgarity and coarseness. In the same manner, Nalacharitam offers limitless possibilities to portray all the elemental passions of anger, revenge, despondence and joy in their sweep and entirety; this is the reason why this play is hailed as the highest point in the repertoire of kathakali plays.

Among other major plays, mention may be made of Irayimman Tampi's Keechakavadham, Uttaraswayamvaram, Kartika Tirunal Maharaja's Rajasuyam and Narakasuravadham.

Though in its essence, it is intended for an erudite audience, Kathakali did not remain strictly elitist because it employed multiple channels of theatric communication, blending high brow dramatic action, music, spectacle, and also occasionally low comedy. This art-form, which had gone out of favour for sometime, received a great fillip at the hands of Vallattol Narayana Menon, the eminent poet, who tried to revive it by establishing Kerala Kalamandalam, an institution which gives rigorous training in the field of traditional performing arts. Of late, the attempts of institutions like Margi to revive kathakali and yet preserve it in its pristine purity have produced favourable results.

KATHAKAVYA (Rajasthani). Among the 'prabandha kavyas' (composite poems) written on individuals and events, those dealing with 'charita' (biography) and 'katha' (tale-based narratives) are important. It does not matter if they do not carry titles ending with charita and katha at all. There are Rajasthani works written by the Jain poets, which carry titles ending with 'chaupai', 'rasa', 'prabandha', etc. Nevertheless, these are essentially charita and katha kavyas. In the katha kavyas the story or the stories have an importance of their own and are interdependent, while in the charita kavyas, the story or stories are mainly utilised to depict the character of the hero. The Apabhramsha poets, perhaps, did not differentiate between the charita and katha kavyas, but the difference is quite clearly visible in such works written in Rajasthani. Katha Ahamani by Delhaji and Katha Chittodaki by Kesaji are katha kavyas, while giving other accounts also delineate the charita of Abhimanyu and Jambhoji respectively. But Katha Autarpat by Vilhoji, though named as katha, is essentially a charita kavya which focusses on the child-life of Jambhoji, while at the same time referring to several events.

KATHAKOSA (Prakrit). Out of the four 'anuyoga' (expositions) the 'prathamanyoga' or the 'dharmakathanuyoga' consisting of legendary tales of those who have attained the highest by leading a virtuous life, plays a significant role in illustrating the principles of Jainism. It is through this medium that Jain monks were able to meet the demands of their adherents. Jain authors compiled 'Kathakosas' or 'Treasury of Stories' from time to time, particularly during the period of the 11th and 12th century A.D. They are rich mines of tales and anecdotes and are worth studying from the point of view of universal literature. These tales are interspersed with appropriate gnomic sayings. There are numerous such Kathakosas which are still lying in manuscript forms in various Jain Bhandars. Their composition was not limited to Prakrit and Sanskrit only, but they were written in Apabhramsha, Kannada, Tamil, Old Hindi and Old Gujarati as well.

Kahanayakosa or Kathakosa-prakarana by Jineshvara Suri (11th century A.D.), is a popular treasure-house of delightful stories, mainly composed for the edification of religious and moral teachings. It comprises 30 Prakrit verses which have been illustrated with Prakrit stories mixed with prose and verse. Akkhanayamanikosa (Akhyanakamanikosha) or Kahamanikosa (Kathamani-kosha) by Devendra Gani (11th century A.D.) with the commentary of Amardeva (12th century A.D.) is a collection of numerous didactic tales. Devendra Gani has composed verses in Prakrit and Amardeva has provided us with an illustrious commentary. The commentator was well-versed in Prakrit, Sanskrit and Apabhramsha. The major part of his commentary is in Prakrit which is interspersed with Sanskrit and Apabhramsha narratives.

Kaharayanakosa (Katharatnakosha) by Gunachandra Gani, pupil of Sumativachaka, was composed in Prakrit prose and verse in 1101 A.D. The author has also used Sanskrit and Apabhramsha in his work. The popular stories narrated here are not stereotyped but are new and are rarely found elsewhere. Though the main theme of the stories is religious and didactic, in between the narration, we come across important secular material such as discussion about sneezing, the characteristics of a king, the art of interpreting marks on the body (samudrika), testing of jewels (ratnapariksha), cure of snake-poison, magic spell, mountain-festival, mining (khanyavidya), the disease of elephants, invocation of guardians of a quarter of the sky, sea-voyage, assemblies discussing questions and answers (prashnottara-goshthi) and the like. The Kumaravala-padiboha (Kumarapala-pratibodha) by Somaprabha Suri (12th century A.D.) is another collection of stories. The major part of the stories is written in Prakrit, but they are also narrated in Sanskrit and Apabhramsha. The last 'prastava' composed in Apabhramsha, contains two long narratives, one of them is in allegorical form. There are equally numerous narrative works composed in Sanskrit. The Brihatkathakosha by Harishena (10th century A.D.) is a mine of religious and popular stories, based on ancient Jain texts. It is very important for a comparative study not only of Jain narrative literature but also of social, cultural, historical and the lexical material contained therein. It has been edited critically with a scholarly introduction by late A.N. Upadhyaya. Prabhachandra (11th century A.D.) wrote another Kathakosa known as Aradhana-satkatha-prabandha in Sanskrit prose, with occasional quotations in Sanskrit and Prakrit. Another Kathakosa by an unknown compiler (last quarter of the 11th century A.D.) has been translated by C.H. Tawney in English (1895). It is a collection of 27 tales interspersed with Prakrit verses. Another Kathakosa (or Kathasangraha or Antarakathasangraha) is composed by Rajashekhara Maladhari (middle of the 4th century A.D.). The collection contains religious as well as humorous stories narrated in simple Sanskrit prose in a conversational style of the Panchatantra. Subhashila Gani (15th century A.D.) compiled still another Kathakosa known as Bharateshvara-Bahubali- vritti, giving the stories in Sanskrit prose and verse, interspersed with Prakrit quotations. The Katharatnakara (Ocean of stories) by Hamavijaya (1600 A.D.) contains 258 stories, most of them written in simple Sanskrit prose. Quotations in Sanskrit, Maharashtri Prakrit, Apabhramsha, Old Hindi and Old Gujarati are found throughout the work. Most of the stories are similar to those found in the Panchatantra. It was published with a German translation by Johannes Hertel in 1920, in Leipzig and Weimer. It was reprinted under the title Das Perlenmeer, edited by Roland Beer. Shrichandra compiled his Kathakosa in the 11th century in Apabhramsha with varied metres divided into 53 samdhis. Among Kannada Kathakoshas, mention may be made of the Vaddaradhane (11th century A.D.) composed in Old Kannada prose with quotations in Prakrit, Sanskrit and Kannada. Punyashravakathakosha was compiled by Nagaraja in 1331 A.D. The Jain Mathas of Moodbidri, Karkal and Sravana Belgola preserve such numerous palm-leaf manuscripts awaiting publication. The Tiruttakadeva is a collection of stories by Jivakachintamani (11th century A.D.) in Tamil.

KATHAKOSHA-PRAKARANA (Prakrit) also known as Kahanayakosh (Kathanaka-kosha) is a work by Jineshvara Suri. It is a collection of stories, perhaps the last work of the author, composed in 1051 A.D. in Dinduanagrama (in Marwar). The Kathakosa contains 30 Prakrit gathas, explained in Sanskrit, giving illustrative stories in Prakrit being an admixture of prose and verse. The object of narrating these stories, according to the author, is to preach exemplary narratives leading to liberation, the highest end of life. Most of the narratives are traditional, borrowed from early Jain sources, although a few of them have been composed by the author himself. Generally, the narratives are written in Prakrit prose, interspersed with stray verses in Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. They are composed in simple lucid style, free from composition of words arranged in compounds and unnecessary verbosity. The work belongs to the category of 'dharma-katha', comprising the tales related to the worship and eulogy to God Jina, service to monks and offering them alms, upliftment of Jain religion and various popular tales of laymen who did their utmost for the elevation of Jain 'dharma' and 'sangha'. It is also endowed with social and cultural material in between the narrative. It is stated that when the Sabari lore was accepted by someone or offered to others, the Vidyadharas celebrated the feast in front of the great statue of Rishabhadeva. The charms against the snake-poison has been referred to. In order to remove the effect of poison, first of all the forehead of the patient was struck, a string was revolved in his left nostril and his naval was rubbed with ashes. In archery (dhanurveda), the typical positions of a bowman engaged in discharging arrows are mentioned. In order to get a son, people worshipped the goddess Katyayani by offering her their own flesh. In music (gandharva), various sounds, their origin, the divisions of musical notes and regulated rise and fall of sounds through the musical scale is mentioned. A number of Prakrit verses describing the nature of prostitutes are quoted. Reference has been made to alchemy (dhatuvada and rasavada) by which, employing herbs and medicines, copper was transformed into gold. For Dhatuvada reference has been made to the Jonipahuda, an important Prakrit work on the science of prognostication. In the manner of Kautilya's Arthashastra a king has been instructed to be always watchful of his surroundings. Sea voyage has been described. Due to high tide ships were wrecked causing immense loss to life and property. The affluence of rich merchant Shalibhadra of Rajagriha has been described. He used the precious blankets for the purpose of cleaning feet. The study of the Kathakosha is useful for comprehending the development of new Indo-Aryan languages. The work has been edited by Jinanivaya Muni and published in the Singhi Jain Series (Bombay, 1949).

KATHASARITSAGARA (Sanskrit), one of the two Sanskrit adaptations of the Brihatkatha of Gunadhya, prepared in Kashmir, was compiled by Somadeva between 1063 and 1082. Just a few decades ago Kshemendra had prepared his compendium Brihatkathamajari of the same work but most likely Somadeva had not seen or consulted it. But his Kathasaritsagara is immensely valuable to us, not only for its great literary qualities, but for preserving the richest treasure of popular tales.

Somadeva lived during the reign of Kalasa, King of Kashmir, which was marked by intrigue, bloodshed and suffering. The aborigines frequently raided and devastated the kingdom. Kalhana has also given a realistic account of the anarchy of this period, which gets reflected into the underworld of Somadeva's narrative—full of murders and bloodshed and rogues, thieves and harlots. There are vivid pictures of the acute misery caused by war or famine, revealing his minute observation and originality.

The Kathasaritsagara is rightly called the 'Ocean of the streams of stories'. It is a sea in which hundreds of rivers of stories have fallen. Somadeva has incorporated, beautifully in the frame of the central story of Naravahanadatta, as many as 350 popular tales.

Like Kshemendra's work, the Kathasaritsagara is also divided into eight chapters called 'lambaka' or 'lambhaka'. He claims to have strictly adhered to the original work of Gunadhya, but it appears that some of the stories have been added by Somadeva himself. The versions of Kshemendra and Somadeva considerably agree with each other, in comparison to the third version, viz. The Brihatkatha-shloka-sangraha, written by Budhasvamin of Nepal. The desire to combine the various independent cycles of popular tales such as those of Mrigankadatta, Muktaphalaketu, Vikramaditya, etc, persisted in the Kashmirian version of the Brihatkatha. The fables of the Panchatantra are also present in the Kathasaritsagara. In spite of the aberrations, Somadeva's work is marked by greater coherence and desire to preserve the effects of the frame story. Being a consummate story-teller, he is rightly praised for his superior quality of vivid narration.

Putting together the various cycles of the popular tales with their vast range was not an easy task in itself. Somadeva has accomplished this task in his own way. Not encumbered by the desire to cut short the narrative in order to be brief, he moves slowly but majestically, delighting in interludes. The main story is often overrun by the subsidiary stories. Sometimes the stories in different versions occur twice or even thrice in different places in his massive work. Clearly, like Budhasvamin, he was not as concerned with the tale of Naravahanadatta as with the colourful whoops of interesting stories, episodes and fables, interwoven into his work. In this respect, Somadeva had a better sense of anticipation of the possibility of the development of the frame story of the Brihatkatha, which is basically somewhat tiring. The hero of the main story wins one woman after another, and as they are destined for him, the difficulties coming in the way to the union or reunion are not very significant. The introductory stories of Udayana, his faithful minister Yaugandharayana and his two wives—Vasavadatta and Padmavati, which are the sources of the plots of a number of Sanskrit dramas, are definitely more interesting than the stories of the hero.

There is hardly any class of stories not to be found in the Kathasaritsagara. The stories that do not stand in internal relationship with the central narrative can be classified into several groups. There are fictions about the meeting of heavenly damsels, of interference by gods and demons in the affairs of men. More interesting are the tales of magic—of wizards and witches, of money-seekers and wealth-diggers, transformation of men into animals, magic locks and keys, etc. In still more colourful admixtures, we find the novelistic stories—the stories of boatmen facing shipwreck, of wonderful palaces under the bottom of the seas, of adventurous travels on the earth, of romance and suffering, where love is aroused through dreams and portraits, of thieves, scoundrels and fools. Besides the witty anecdotes, there are mythological or epical stories also. It is a work of larger and more varied appeal, containing a gallery of sketches from life. The characters of middle class Indian society are painted vividly and realistically, evincing a wide and intimate experience of human life and sense of humour and robust common sense. Somadeva's understanding of human nature is authentic and delineation of emotions very sympathetic. At places, he is able to make the narrative pregnant with pathos. The story of Pururavas and Urvashi, for example, is told in a very touching way.

Somadeva's achievement lies in combining the best tenets of classical Sanskrit poetry with all the excellences of popular tales, and in infusing the massive collection of stories, acquired traditionally, with life and vitality. He picks up most appealing portraits from the contemporary life. There is the story of Shurasena, a Kshatriya in royal service, who could not return to his wife for long as he had to obey the summons of his master and was detained. She awaits his promised return, becoming sick everyday of unfulfilled longing. At last, Shurasena gets the long-awaited permission to return home. He hastens over the desert on his swift camel. There came on him the dread hot season in lion-shape, with blazing sun for mouth and fiery rays for mane. At last he arrives, only to discover that he has been too late. He then saw his wife lying dead in all her finery, like a creeper in full bloom, uprooted by the wind. Seeing her, he held her in his arms struck dumb with sorrow. Overpowered as he was with grief, his breath straightaway departed with lamentations.

We find the life in medieval India mirrored in the Kathasaritsagara. It is steeped in superstitions and beliefs in miracles and sorcery, but there are graceful shadows of kindness. "This world would be nothing but a dreary wilderness", says Somadeva, "if the gracious people were not born here to help their fellowmen, like the wayside trees providing shelter in torturous heat." In his outlook towards women, Somadeva is naturally bound by the morality of the middle ages. There are cynical stories heaping contempt on the women, recounted by him but also implied reverence for chaste woman. A king has a white elephant with the miraculous power of flying in the sky. It gets hurt and falls down. A divine voice announces that the elephant will be cured when touched by a chaste woman. Then the king discovers to his horror that not one among his eighty thousand wives is capable of rendering the assistance. To add to his grief, all the ladies of the city come and touch the animal for no result. Ultimately, one poor woman was found, who was perfectly pious and chaste and the moment she touched the animal, it stood in the form of a human being. The king, outraged by the dishonesty of the womenfolk, marries the sister of that chaste lady, with the expectation that she will never deceive him; and for precaution, he shuts her inside a palace in a lonely island. But what to talk of the ways of the women, he is ultimately deceived by her as well (XXXVI. 9-90). There are also stories of honest and faithful wives. We meet here the wise and pious Devasmita who assures the youngmen wanting to seduce her away, to meet them at a fixed place just to let them go away with a stigma on their faces. There are stories of procuresses and the filth they inflict upon the society, but there are witty stories of wise and pious ladies who save their honour and get rid of them.

Somadeva rises above the mentality of the society of the age in his sympathetic portrayal of love of youngsters, in many a tale in his work.

Although there have been a number of attempts to preserve the lost work of Gunadhya in Sanskrit, none of them comes up to the mark as the Kathasaritsagara does. Winternitz says: "The Kathasaritsagara of Somadeva has the greatest importance for the history of Indian literature also on account of the fact that in it there are several stories which have been worked upon by several other poets, of course, not only on the basis of Somadeva's work, but also on that of Gunadhya or on that of some older recension of the Brihatkatha, not available to us elsewhere so nicely as in Somadeva. The work is of the highest importance for the history of the World Literature too, inasmuch as not a few stories that we find in Somadeva, any that are still older and perhaps have had their source in the Brihatkatha, are the most popular and most familiar ones in the West... Lastly, we must not forget to mention the extent to which our knowledge of Indian culture is based on the Kathasaritsagara, of Somadeva... We learn from this work much about Indian religions and know about the position of women in ancient India. We get from Somadeva's work abundant amount of information also about the caste system, about ethnographical conditions, about art, artists and artisans, about court-life, about gambling, about drinking booths and other things about the actual life of Indian people."

The most authentic edition of the text was prepared by Durgaprasad and published by the Nirnaya Sagar Press, Bombay (1889); and the complete English Translation is by C.H. Tawney, first published in the Bibliotheca India in 2 Vols (Calcutta, 1880-1884) and then with notes by N.M. Penzer, in 10 Vols (London, 1924-1928).

KATHAUPANISHAD (Sanskrit) or Kathaka-upanishad (Katha) belongs to the Taittiriya school of the Yajurveda. The story of Nachiketas and Yama around which the teachings of the Katha are woven, originally occurs in the Taittiriya-ubrahmana. The source of the story is traced back to the hymn of the Rigveda. The Katha consists of the two chapters each of which has three 'valis' or sections. The entire second chapter appears to be a later addition.

A pious Brahmana Vajashravasa had a son, by name

KATHAVATTHU

Nachiketas. Once he performed a sacrifice and gave away all that he possessed. When he was giving as presents (dakshina) to the priests a few old and feeble cows, Nachiketas felt disturbed and enquired to whom he was going to be presented. When he insisted in his query, his father said in rage, "Unto Yama I give thee." Nachiketas went to the abode of Yama and waited there without food for three days and nights. Yama, on his return, offered Nachiketas three boons in recompense for the discomfort caused to him. Nachiketas asked for the happy meeting with his father as the first boon. It was granted immediately. Nachiketas, then, requested Yama to instruct him the knowledge of fire. The third request of Nachiketas was one for enlightenment on the question of life after death. Instead of granting the third boon, Yama offered several alternatives, viz., sovereignty over vast domains of earth, life extending one hundred years, charming women, plenty of gold, sons and grandsons. But Nachiketas remained unmoved. Yama, then, describes two different paths and one leading to the good and the other to the pleasant. The self can be realised only through spiritual contemplation. Finally the great question is answered. The self is eternal and death does not annihilate it. Yama tells Nachiketas of the two selves lodged in the secret place of heart enjoying the fruit of deeds. Yama, then tells the parable of the chariot: "know the self as the lord of the chariot, the body as the chariot, the intellect as the charioteer and the mind as the reins. The senses are the horses and the objects of senses are the paths. He who has understanding for the driver of the chariot and controls the rein of his mind, reaches the end of the journey, that supreme abode of the all-pervading." The order of progression to the Supreme Self is then described: "Beyond the senses are the objects and beyond the objects is the mind; beyond the mind is the understanding, beyond the understanding is the great self; beyond the great self is the unmanifest; beyond the unmanifest is the spirit and beyond the spirit there is nothing. That is the end." Finally the method of yoga is prescribed for spiritual attainment: "The wise man should restrain speech in mind; the latter he should restrain in the understanding self. The understanding he should restrain in the great self. That he should restrain in the tranquil self (1.3)." The second chapter discusses mainly how the self can be realised, the first section states that the individual self is one with the universal self. Failure to comprehend the essential unity of being is the cause of rebirth. The second section describes the individual self which is both immanent and transcendent. The third section describes how one can comprehend one's self. The self transcends the ordinary means of apprehension. It can be realised through yoga and for that faith in his existence is an indispensable condition.

The Katha expounds in detail the Upanishadic theory of an immortal soul which survives after the death of the body. There are two selves, the individual self and the Universal Self. While describing the Universal Self of Brahman, the Katha mixes up negative and positive characteristics of it. The fundamental principle of the Katha is that the universe is one and there is no difference within it or without it. Self is perceived not by logical reason but by spiritual contemplation. The first quality for self-realisation is introversion. The second stage is abstinence. The next stage is the path of self-realisation. "Arise", says the Katha, "awake and learn from those who are better than ye, for the path of realisation is as hard to tread as the edge of a razor." Important categories of the later Samkhya philosophy like mind and intellect, the 'mahat', the 'avyakta' and the 'purusha' are described in the Katha. There are passages in the Katha which give us the rudiments of the practice of the yoga doctrine as later formulated. The Katha is one of the chief sources from which the Bhagavadgita later freely borrows.

The Katha aims at envisaging the highest philosophical truth in a poetic manner. It is surcharged with lofty ideas about the immortality of the soul.

KATHAVATTHU (Pali) is an important Theravada Buddhist text. It is generally considered to be the fifth book of the Abhidhammapitaka. However, sometimes it is also said to be the third of the seven books of Abhidhamma. The literal meaning of the phrase 'kathavatthu' is 'subject of discourse' but in the light of its text the name has been translated as 'Points of Controversy'.

The Kathavatthu is a Buddhist book of debate on matters of theology, philosophy, cosmology and so on. This book is ascribed to Moggaliputta Tissa Thera who, according to tradition, compiled it in the Third Council at Pataliputra, convened by King Ashoka (3rd cent. B.C.), against the polemical or controversial points of the schismatic monks or schools. The Kathavatthu represents an age when repeated schism disturbed the original unity of the Sangha and gave rise to manifold controversies and debate and thus presents a significant development in the domain of Buddhist thought and philosophy.

It is interesting to note that the Kathavatthu does not mention the various schismatic sects whose views it discusses but Buddhaghosa (5th cent. A.D.) in his commentary on the Kathavatthu clearly mentions the sects by name.

KATHEYADALU HUDUGI-KATHOPAKATHAN

The Kathavatthu in its present form and as commented on by Buddhaghosa contains twenty-three sections; each of the sections deals with eight to twelve questions and answers refuting the diverse false views of the heretical groups. Some of the interesting questions dealt with in the Kathavatthu are as follows:

1. Do the absolute sense and personality (puggala) exist?
2. Does everything exist?
3. Can an Arhat fall away from Arhatship?
4. Can one as a 'worldling' be free from sensuous greed and ill will?
5. Are the ten powers of the Buddha also shared by his disciples?
6. Is it correct to say that the Buddha lived in the world of human beings?

All these problems are presented and discussed in the form of a formalised debate. This elaborate and formal debating contributed to the development of Indian and particularly Buddhist logic.

The Kathavatthu is an important work 'for any reconstruction of the history of early Buddhism especially for understanding the figurative transition from the earlier historical forms to the later developed systems'.

The Kathavatthu has been critically edited by A.C. Taylor on the basis of many important paper and palm-leaf manuscripts. It has been translated into English by S.Z. Aung and Mrs. Rhys Davids under the title of Points of Controversy.

KATHEYADALU HUDUGI (Kannada), Yashwant Chittal's fourth collection of short stories published in 1980 is as impressive an achievement in the post-modernist style as his third collection Aata (1969) is in the modernist vein. Of its eight stories half the number continues in the modernist vein. It is only the remaining four 'Katheyadalu hudugi', 'Katheyalli bandata manegoo bandu kada thattida', 'Trayodasha purana' and 'Mukhamukhi' which are in the new mode. While the modernist stories are imagistic and impersonal, taut and terse, the later stories are more relaxed and more in the narrative vein and are more easily accessible to the common reader. Three of them are told by a narrator who is himself the writer and these stories are as much about the art of literary creation as about their actual subjects. Chittal has extended his range and grasp in these stories so as to embrace contemporary socio-economic realities.

'Katheyadalu hudugi' describes a child's death in a society such as ours, stricken with a sense of alienation, and the distortion that results when the father himself becomes the narrator of the tragic incident. The only right step is the adoption of an orphan child, a symbolic act of love which can redeem society. 'Trayodasha purana' depicts a divided and sick society which allows an innocent kid to be victimised for being born in a particular community and for speaking a particular language. 'Katheyalli bandata manegoo bandu kada thattida', perhaps the finest story in the collection, creates the character of a dynamic Harijan working-class revolutionary who takes on the dimensions of a symbolic figure alerting us at all times to be wary of the manouvres of the exploiting classes. In 'Mukhamukhi', the same experience is seen from different angles resulting in a multiplicity of levels and perspectives on life. For example, the destruction of a note, arranging an elopement, is seen to be susceptible to diametrically opposite interpretations at different encounters with the characters involved.

Katheyadalu hudugi is one of the outstanding collections of short stories in the language and received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983.

KATHOPAKATHAN (Bengali), which means 'Conversations', is a text book written in order "to facilitate the acquiring of the Bengalee Language" by Europeans. The work is ascribed to William Carey. One of the earliest books written for the College of Fort William, Kathopakathan is bilingual with the Bengali text printed on the left hand pages and the English translation on the right hand side. Carey probably did the English translation and also wrote the dialogues between an Englishman and his servants. The rest of the book was written by some Munshi whose help Carey acknowledges in his Introduction. Kathopakathan was first printed at Serampore in 1801. After the second edition in 1806 it was combined with Carey's Bengali Grammar in 1818.

Kathopakathan contains thirty-one dialogues between people of different sections and strata of society whose normal life and traditional occupation are presented in these conversations. Curiously, the language behaviour of this heterogeneous group is also diverse. The dialogues of the women, faithful and realistic as they are, contain idioms and words, which only the uneducated village women normally use. These conversations are, moreover, carried out in either friendly or disagreeable situations and the language of the quarrels often verges on the vulgar. The conversations of the English gentleman, showing his method of hiring servants, giving out orders to them and his desire to learn Bengali, have a preponderance of Persian words in them. In the dialogues where the participants are only native speakers, the proportion of 'tatsama' words are greater in gentleman's speech, while people of the labouring classes use more of 'tadbhava' words. Also, depending on the topic of conversation where land, cultivation, produce and rent etc. are being discussed or business matters such as credit being transacted, a greater amount of Persian and Arabic terms are used.

Kathopakathan presents a lively and vivid picture of the middle and lower classes and as such carries valuable information about the social condition of the early nineteenth century Bengal. Although primarily intended for training civilians, the book undoubtedly goes beyond its pedagogical purpose. The different classes of people whose manners, customs and habits are represented, consist of brahmans, merchants, labourers, fishermen and village women. To Carey goes the credit of taking into cognizance the different classes or occupational dialects and relating them to the social status of the speakers. That at an early stage of Bengali prose Carey was able to recognize the importance of the spoken varieties of the language shows that he was much ahead of his time. His colloquialism was taken up much later by Bengali playwrights and novelists in their dialogues.

KATIRESAN CHETTIAR (Tamil; b. 1881, d. 1953) was an eminent Tamil scholar and commentator on ancient classics. He had his early education in the traditional school in his native village Mahipalanpatti and improved his scholarship by his own independent studies. He developed a taste for classical literature in Tamil and Sanskrit, especially the bhakti literature. He started his career as a propagator of Shaivite Tamil literature under the auspices of different associations and Shaivite mutts. Later on, at the age of 53 he became a lecturer in Tamil in the Annamalai University where he worked for 12 years. Katiresan was honoured with the titles like 'Panditamani' (1925), 'Mahamahopadhyaya' (1942), 'Muthuperumpulavar', etc. in recognition of his services to Tamil literature and Shaivism.

Panditamani has written elaborate commentaries on Sangam classics like Purananooru, Ainkurunuru, Patirupattu, etc. However, his commentary on the first 170 verses of Tiruvakam, the famous Shaivite devotional work of the 9th century, gave him fame and name. This book, Katirmani vilakkam, was published in 1947. He also translated Kautilya's Arthashastra, and the play, Mrichchhakatika, into Tamil.

Katiresan belongs to the order of the traditional Tamil pandits; perhaps he was the last in that lineage. His commentary on Tiruvakam earned him the title of Shaiva Siddhanta Vithahar, which means the greatest exponent of Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy. He was one of the expositors of classical and religious literature who could hold the audience spellbound for hours together. He was also a brilliant conversationalist. Those who were close to him say that he had a peculiar talent for making the conversation interesting with a sprinkling of apt quotations and episodes from classical Tamil literature. Katiresan's critical essays on different aspects of Tamil literature have an air of freshness in approach and novelty in expression.

KATTABOMMAN KATHAI (Tamil), a Telugu chieftain who called himself a nayak, flourished in the 18th century. He and his brother, Kumaraswamy, better known as Gomaiturai, have become legendary in the Tamil land. In fact, even during their lifetime, a poem was composed about an incident in his life; many ballads appear to have been sung immediately after their execution by the British. Ballads in different genres continue to appear. There are critics who doubt the patriotism and other qualities of this popular hero and his equally brave brother; but the extent of his popularity and its gritty continuance over centuries must have had some solid basis of unusual qualities and outstanding achievements. Against the evanescence of popular images which we see all through history, the constancy of popular acclaim being accorded to Kattabomman appears to have a message of significance.

The story of this popular hero is told in 'kummi' form in a work called Kattabomman kummi, containing 1560 verses. There are other ballads on him written in the last 200 years. A recent ballad written by a folk song writer had a rousing reception for a certain time. A shorter work called Kattabommu kootu has been recently published. This folk play is popular in the Tinnevely district.

Kattabomman was born in 1760. In memory of his grandfather, Panchalan, he built a fort which he called Panchalakkottai in a hamlet in the Tinnevely district which came to be known as Panchalakurichi. Early in his career he began to earn the animus of the East India Company officials. The anger of the Company found the ablest executioner in Jackson, the Company's military representative at Ramanathapuram. The overt start of the trouble was when our hero declined to pay tribute to the nawab's representatives. As the nawab had to pay tribute to the Company, the Company got into the act and through deceit took him prisoner. He escaped but his commander-in-chief was caught, tortured and sent to Fort St. George in fetters. He created a good impression on the governor who released him, sent for Kattabomman and reasoned with him but failed to prevail over him. He, however, magnanimously allowed the rebel chieftain to return home. On return he continued to defy the whites. A struggle ensued with heavy losses on both the sides. Kattabomman sought shelter under the Tondaiman of Pudukkottai who treacherously betrayed him to the British. Kattabomman and his brave commander were hanged by the vengeful Company officials. Gomaiturai continued to defy the whites, entrenching himself in a new fort which he built but ultimately he too was captured and hanged. The valiant Marudu brothers of Sivaganga who had given him shelter were also hanged. The hangings haunted the collective mind of the Tamil country folk whose deep anguish poured out in the form of ballads in simple Tamil, often embellished with vivid descriptions and spirited dialogue. Stage plays, radio and TV shows and films continue to be produced on this hero.

KATTALE-BELAKU (Kannada), is a three-act play, perhaps the best of Adya Rangacharya's middle career. The play was printed in Nadedu banda dari in 1958 and saw a second edition in 1974. It is included in Hosa samvedaneyana natakagalu (Plays of new sensibility). In Adya Rangacharya's creative career, there is a huge barren middle period when he wrote patchwork for college boys. Kattale-belaku marks the termination of this period, triumphantly reasserting his creative genius. The audience returns with a vague feeling of having gone through a single undefinable art experience without knowing how to sum it up, what the 'message' is, how the plot shaped itself, what the plot itself is or amounts to; except that since it is a social profile it might have had a social message. They come away with a feeling of exhilaration, of having witnessed social events close to their own life, contrasted human profiles held together by wit, humour and downright outrageous gaffs and guffaws and some brilliant epigrams, but find themselves unable to pin down any message. The only message possible is 'Be a man', whatever that means.

Summing up the plot or commenting on the characters of Kattale-belaku does violence to the consummate artistry of the play. The play has a complex unity and it is cruel to abstract its plot or story. It has none. The following is an attempt to outline the general scheme of the play and bring out its contrasted profiles. The schema may be defined as the counter balancing of four groups of characters who come together on the same plot of ground. Some are non-observers; some mal-observers; some trying to escape observation of their suffering; and a playwright unwilling to write plays with his general conviction that life is not worth writing about. The writer, in one sense, is the meanest of the lot, because many epic, dramatic, tragic events are happening all around him in the darkness of a moonlit night and he does not see them and without nourishing mean intentions of course. So much is happening in life, so many changes, so much suffering, and yet the writer, because he is not a success in money-making, withdraws into himself and refuses to write even when a professional play producer and his manager are eager to get him to write a new play for their production.

In the first Act the producer and the manager try to persuade the well-known modernist playwright to give them a classical epic play on ancient kings and gods because, they assure him, they know the taste of their audience and the ability of their troupe. The playwright refuses to oblige on the ground that such an audience is poor in culture and taste, that the days have changed and that his art too valuable to be wasted on such an audience. Neither money nor his past failures persuade him to write a puranic play with opportunities for song and dance. It is outmoded. At the same time high classical tragedy is being enacted in the darkness around his house. A young man who had his wife ravished has murdered the ravisher and is now hiding in the bushes near his house. A policeman who has received an anonymous complaint of the possibility of the murder comes in hot pursuit and the youth hides in the dark nook inside the playwright's house itself without his knowledge. His father, a country bumpkin, has come with an elder in fear of the possible mishap but is browbeaten and cold shouldered by the all-wise elder who is eager to have a bit of tobacco. An officious citizen who has got a copy of the anonymous letter shuffles in to accuse the policeman of ignoring his duties and reports of a gurgling noise he heard in the bushes. He suspects that two bodies throttled to death are lying under a tree. Two youths who have heard rumours of the murder in the compound are drawn there by curiosity. Confused by conflicting versions of what happened the dutiful policeman gets into a verbal duel with the playwright and is coldly asked to get lost. All along, the murderer is hiding inside his house.

In the second Act, the producer tries to persuade the playwright to write a historical play at least. He refuses on the ground that Indian history is full of mean fratricidal or immoral episodes. Meanwhile, high tragic episode is shaping itself in surrounding gloom. A young woman married to a rich but old and sick millionaire has an affair with the driver. She insistently suggests the driver to murder her husband. The driver feels that their affair is safe with the master alive. In a fit of loyalty he returns to the car in which his master is resting and finds him dead. His death due to heart failure leads to mutual recriminations between the adulterous lovers, each accusing the other of murder. A busybody citizen accuses the policeman of neglect of duty in not investigating the 'murder', but a doctor assures him that it is a case of heart failure. This time the playwright coldly dismisses the policeman, unaware of the death of the millionaire and the high tragedy of the hatred between the adulterous pair. This dramatic episode can be compared with any historical event but the frustrated writer is completely ignorant of it.

KATTIMANI BASAVARAJA-KATUWAL, HARIBHAKTA

The third Act begins with the producer's attempt to persuade the playwright to write on present-day social themes at least. But here, the writer objects to the choice of interesting episodes and popular modes which make the social themes unreal; for instance, the victory of the faithful wife at the end of a social play in commercial theatre. He avers, "Our plays and your plays are different". At the same time, in the darkness around flit a newly married couple turned out by the landlord for not paying the rent. They contemplate suicide, rest on the doorstep of the playwright and, alarmed by the arrival of the policeman, vanish into his house without his knowledge. The playwright finally succeeds in dismissing the producer, the policeman and the busybody 'citizen'. When his back is turned, out of his house emerge the murderer, the car driver, the millionaire's wife, and impecunious couple and vanish into the darkness. He is totally unaware of the tragic figures fit for epic and history in his preoccupation with art.

S.M.P.

KATTIMANI BASAVARAJA (Kannada; b. 1919) is one of the most rationalistic and revolutionary writers Karnataka has seen in recent years. His father, born in a family of agriculturists, turned a soldier in the armed forces.

Kattimani is an unusual blend of paradoxes. These traits that are so characteristic of the sons of the soil are perhaps a gift from his parents. His life and writings are an admixture of apparent contradictions: ruggedness, vigour, a frank and forthright attitude that almost borders on cruelty, kindness, generosity, stubbornness, a spirit of challenge, and a simplicity—all combine to lend a uniqueness to his life and writing.

Kattimani's home environment was one of struggle and poverty. Yet his love for literary studies was kindled both at home and at school. He was a voracious reader even during his school days. His mother influenced him greatly. Kuvempu influenced his writings. The economic and social inequalities in life posed a challenge to the young writer and inspired him to revolt against establishment and tradition.

Kattimani gave up studies after his High School course. He had to earn his livelihood when he was still in his teens. He took to journalism and was on the staff of several newspapers. He also took to the wearing of khadi. He participated in the freedom movement and went to jail. Karavan (1944-1945), his short story collection, is a living expression of the agony and atrocities of life experienced by the writer. He wrote these stories while he was in prison. He gave up journalism and went back to Malamaridi. He settled down in Dharwar in 1964. An ardent socialist, he was nominated to the Legislative Council in 1968.

Kattimani is essentially a novelist. Jwalamukhiya mele (On the volcano), a novel published in 1951, received the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1968. He was inspired by Lenin and the Russian Revolution in his younger days and his own life has been a saga of struggle. But out of this struggle have emerged works of outstanding literary merit. He has written 33 novels, 9 short story collections, one play and a few miscellaneous works. All his works expose the hypocrisy of society and social inequities. Kattimani has waged a relentless war against social injustices. Swatantradedege (1946) was his first novel. In this very first novel Kattimani created a trend by which he was to be appreciated. Madi madidavaru (1950) and Jwalamukhiya mele (1951) are two powerful novels projecting the essential spirit of nationalism. Jaratari jagadguru, Beediyalli biddavalu (1953), and Mannu matthu hennu (1953), Khanavaliya neela (1953) present various facets of exploitation and seek to expose the exploiters.

Kattimani was the President of the 52nd Kannada Sahitya Sammelana held at Belgaum.

KATUWAL, HARIBHAKTA (Nepali; b. 1935, d. 1980), a top-ranking Nepali writer of lyrical poems, was born at Bogibill village in the district of Dibrugarh in Assam. He studied in Kanoi College, Dibrugarh and in Digboi College. He then worked as a public health inspector and later opted to work as a teacher. He started his literary career by contributing a number of articles to Assamese magazines. He served also on the Editorial Board of the Radali brought out by the Asom Sahitya Sabha. He was really one of the forerunners of the modern Nepali literary writing in Assam. He spent much of his time and energy in founding and editing several Nepali literary magazines like Mukti (1958), and Himalaya (1963).

Haribhakta Katuwal's works include the following: Samjhana (Remembrances, 1959), Bhitri manche bolna khojcha (The inner man speak, 1959), Aitihāsik katha-sangraha (Stories historical, co-authored, 1963), Sudha (Partial epic, 1964), Purva kiran (Eastern rays, edited, 1964), Yo jindagi Khai ke jindagi! (1972), Spashtikaran (Clarifications) and Ma mareko chhaina (I am still alive). Badanam ye mera ankhaharu (Ill-reputed, my eyes), published posthumously, contains poems and lyrics.

Sudha 'khandakavya' (partial epic) is to be regarded as his first major literary effort. The poet wrote in the Preface: "About fifteen lakh Nepalis live in Assam. No Nepali literary work has as yet depicted Nepali life as lived in Assam. Here I have made a small beginning". Set against the backdrop of the beautiful Sunakurung in Shillong (then in Assam), the epic relates the story of the struggle of Sudha, a helpless daughter of a widowed mother and a prey to the guile of men of property. At the end, inspired by the Bishops Falls of Sunakurung, she casts away the defeatism of bringing her life to an end and gathers courage to valiantly face the world. It is a universal theme of struggle against evil concretised in Nepali life as lived in Assam.

Yo jindagi khai ke jindagi is by far the most successful and popular of his works. It is a collection of sixty-one poems. A poet of the romantic tradition, he is nevertheless a close observer of the state of things in the society. Here he has shed the heavy didacticism of his earlier works and has struck a balance between didacticism and romantic flight.

As a lyricist he is supreme, his reputation equalling only that of Agam Singh Giri, the other virtuoso in the art. And Katuwal, like Giri, also died young at the age of forty-five.

KAUL, HARIKRISHNA (Kashmiri; b. 1934) is a Kashmiri and Hindi short story writer and playwright. He was born in Srinagar. His first Hindi short story was 'Bhaiya' (Brother, 1950). His earlier stories indicate the influence of Krishan Chander, Rajender Singh Bedi and Saadat Hasan 'Manto'. He joined Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Allahabad (1951) and Young Writers' Association, the Junior wing of Progressive Writers' Association, in 1953. He worked as a translator in Jammu and Kashmir Legislative Assembly (1955), and as a clerk in Public Works Department (1955-58 and 1960-61). After doing his M.A. (Hindi) in 1960, he joined a college as a teacher and has been working in that capacity since then. He worked on 'The Technique in the Stories of Renu' and on 'Realism in Post-Independence Hindi Short Story' in Jawaharlal Nehru University (1978-81) for his M. Phil. and Ph. D. degrees respectively. His first collection of Hindi short stories, Is hammam mein (1967), received the Central Ministry of Education award in 1971. It highlights the contradiction, bordering almost on the absurd, that is inherent in the lower middle class. In order to bring himself out of isolation he switched over to Kashmiri, the people's language, and wrote 'Taph' (Sunshine) which, alongwith his other stories, is included in Pata laran parbath (The chasing hill, 1972). The collection made a mark on the modern Kashmiri short story. In the stories of this collection, Kaul exploits his sense of the ridiculous by portraying his characters in unusual combinations of themes and situations. He got the Cultural Academy Award in 1975 for his Kashmiri stories. His other Hindi stories included in the anthologies Tokri bhar dhup (A basketful of sunshine, 1976), which also received the Central Ministry of Education Award in 1977, and Arthi (The funeral, 1981) give expression to our social alienation due to rampant political shallowness and cleavage between generations.

His characters struggle to the extent of looking ridiculous. Kaul's commitment to Marxism is firm. Among his stage plays, Natak kariv band (Stop the drama, 1976), which has a dig at the authoritarianism, was staged in Delhi and Bombay in Hindi Garhwali and Sindhi translations. Notable among his popular radio and television plays are 'Yeli vatan khur chu yivan' (The entangled roads, 1975), broadcast in All India Radio's National Programme, and 'Dastar' (The turban) which has been telecast more than a dozen times. He translated Motilal Kemmu's play, Ishay (The shadow, 1977), into Hindi for the Cultural Academy.

KAUL, JAYALAL (Kashmiri; b. 1900, d. 1986) was an eminent writer and critic. Born in a Kashmiri brahman family, he took his M.A. in English from the University of Allahabad in 1922, and the law degree the next year. For a while he practised as a lawyer in Srinagar but shortly after he joined the teaching profession, retiring as Principal of his alma mater, Sri Pratap College, Srinagar, in 1956. Between 1958-60 he was Advisor to the Radio Kashmir for Kashmiri Programmes, and Secretary, Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages during 1963-66. He was a member of the Executive Board and General Council, Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, during 1958-67, and had been a member of the Selection Board, Bharatiya Jnanpith since 1973. In 1960, he visited the USSR as a member of the delegation of Indian writers. The Jammu and Kashmir State Academy awarded him a Fellowship in 1973.

Besides Kashmiri and English, he knew Hindi, Sanskrit, Urdu and Persian.

As the Chief Editor of the Pratap, the Sri Pratap College magazine, which was the only forum for writing in Kashmiri in the late twenties and the early thirties, he introduced several significant features like 'Folklore' and 'Essays on Kashmiri language and literature'. During the mid-thirties he caused many an eye-brow raise when he added a whole section in Kashmiri. Since the language did not have a script of its own, and neither the Perso-Arabic nor the Devanagari scripts could cover important sounds in the language without causing serious ambiguities, Kaul devised some new signs for phonemes to supplement the Perso-Arabic script. When the country attained independence, the Jammu and Kashmir Government appointed a Committee to devise a script for Kashmiri, and he played a significant role in the completion of the assignment. Practically all books printed in Kashmiri appear in this script now.

Till almost the mid-thirties, the compositions in Kashmiri poetry with a few exceptions either lay scattered haphazardly in manuscript form or were known only orally to a certain type of professionals. Very little was available in print. Kaul was one of those earliest scholars who collected these scattered gems, collated various texts and presented a choice selection in Roman transliteration with English translations. (Kashmiri lyrics: Rine misray, 1945). The introduction to this book is the first authoritative survey of poetry in Kashmiri from the fourteenth century onwards.

Like several other students of poetry, he endeavoured to give his personal exposition of the odes of Ghalib in English in his work entitled Interpretations of Ghalib. It has been placed among the best English renderings of Ghalib because of the aesthetic sensibility of the writer as also his style and diction.

In Studies in Kashmiri (1968), Kaul presents his assessment of some literary figures of the past and the present, literary movements since the mid-forties and the achievements of Kashmiri writers in different forms. This book is the first attempt at evaluating in depth some prominent litterateurs. Forms surveyed range from lullabies to 'masnavi', 'vatsun', 'nazm' and 'ghazal', novel, short story and plays.

The fruit of his studies in the 'vakhs' of Lal Ded has been presented in three books. In Lal Ded, (Jammu and Kashmir, State Academy, 1961), written in collaboration with Nandlal Kaul 'Talib', we find 135 vakhs or verse-sayings along with their translation in Urdu and also a valuable introduction. The vakhs have for the first time been arranged in an order suggesting the gradual progress of the poetess in the yogic practice. Lal Ded (Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1973) is a critical study of the life, times and work of the mystic poetess together with the English translation of her 138 vakhs. It is a research work of a very high merit: the vakhs have been chosen after painstaking scrutiny and many ambiguities have been cleared. The translation is lucid and enjoyable. It conveys not only the thought of the poetess, but also the mode of her feelings and the nuances of her expression.

Mottos on the Sundial (1977) is a collection of the writer's articles in English published separately from time to time. They vary in theme from his 'Auto-obituary' to pedagogics on the one hand, and A.E. Housman to contemporary trends in Indian writing on the other. Bestrewn with nuances suited to the theme, the style is engaging, lucid and precise. They display a fine sense of humour and the reader enjoys the studies.

KAUL, NANDLAL (Kashmiri; b. 1870, d. 1940) was born in a middle class Kashmiri pandit family. He was educated in the traditional way and knew, besides his mother tongue, Sanskrit, Persian, Hindi and Urdu. As revealed in his dramas, he had a wide knowledge of Hindi lore including epics, puranas and shastras. After completing his education, he joined the State Revenue Department and retired as 'Patwari'. (a junior revenue official).

Nandlal Kaul (also known as Nandlal 'Mandlo') is remembered for his drama, Satich kahvat, which he wrote in 1929 and published in 1935. In the thirties, this drama enjoyed great popularity and was staged repeatedly in Srinagar. Its first performance was arranged on the stage of Raghunath Mandir. The play is based on the well-known story of Harishchandra and his devoted wife Taramati. The dialogues are Sanskritized, and the sentences give the impression of literal translation of high Hindi.

In addition to Satich kahvat Kaul wrote some other plays also, which include Ramanraj (The period of Rama's rule), Paz pativarta (Truly devoted wife) and Dayi lol. (The love of God), but none of these dramas attracted attention of the people to that extent. Even the titles of these plays are not known to the students and scholars of Kashmiri literature now. It will not be out of place to remark here that the Hindu lore constituted the source of inspiration to our author. Whatever he wrote was based on a theme which owed its origin to the Hindu lore.

In technique, Kaul not only followed the tradition of Sanskrit drama, but also imitated the one adopted by the 'Parsi Theatre'. His rhythmic dialogues and songs inserted in the body of his plays make us believe that there was something of a poet in him.

As regards his language, Kaul mainly borrowed from Sanskrit. In the history of Kashmiri literature, Nandlal Kaul will always be remembered for reviving the tradition of drama after a lapse of almost six centuries.

KAUL, ZINDA 'MASTERJI' (Kashmiri; b. 1884, d. 1966) was born in a Kashmiri brahman family in Srinagar. He received his early education in Persian in a 'maktab' (school) where he was regarded as a precocious child. He had to suspend his studies to earn for his family. Later, he completed his schooling and worked as a teacher which earned him the endearing appellation 'Master' or 'Master-ji' from his pupils, friends and admirers. Revolving against the colonial propensities of the British Principal of his school, he shifted alongwith some other colleagues to another institution associated with Annie Besant, where he developed interest in theosophy. The school was later taken over by the State Government along with the staff. Intelligence, affection and patience made him the idol of his pupils. Side by side, he passed his B.A. privately and perfected his hold over Sanskrit, Persian, Urdu, Hindi and English. It is an irony that the college authorities in Lahore refused him admission into the Bachelor of Teaching course, a man ideally suited for teaching. His services were transferred to the State Department of Archaeology and Research and finally, because of his patience and mastery over the languages, to the Translation Bureau in the Publicity Department.

Kaul had turned out his maiden verses when he was only nine and continued to write fitfully. It was an age when intellectuals fought shy of writing in their own mother tongue, Kashmiri, and wrote in Persian, Urdu or Hindi. 'Saabit' was his nom de plume in Persian and Urdu, and Josh Malihabadi has remarked that his verse in Diwan-i-Saabit provides a treat for the eye and the ear. His Hindi verse published as Pushpa-patra in 1914 was dedicated to S.E. Fotedar. He also composed verses in English.

This period of Zinda Kaul's life was devoted to introspection and study. In Persian, Hafiz and Rumi were among his favourite poets, and in Sanskrit he studied, besides others, the Shaivacharyas Utpaldeva and Abhinavagupta. His study of English writers was not very extensive, but it appears that he followed the advice of Ruskin, and whatever he read, he read well. In his own mother tongue, he studied, among others, Parmanand (1791-1879), the apostle of devotional poetry.

Parmanand was the preceptor of Lakshman Kaul, through whom he influenced his son, Zinda Kaul. Parmanand composed 'bhajans', songs, narratives, etc. in Kashmiri, but his work lay scattered with different people in different towns and villages. Kaul retrieved an important portion of Parmanand's works, compared and collated various manuscripts and brought out the first printed edition of his poetry, including the narratives, Radha-svayamvar, Sudama-charitra and Shiva-lagan, in 1941. The completion of this labour of love and devotion pleased Zinda Kaul immensely.

Zinda Kaul's close acquaintance with Parmanand's poetry was fairly old, but this intimate study for the purpose of a printed edition and translation of the verses into English, probably stirred him profoundly and convinced him that his mother tongue was not only the most appropriate medium for expression of his ideas, feelings and impressions, but also resourceful enough for the purpose. By this time, the poets like Mahjur and Abdul Ahad 'Azad' made their presence felt, and they revealed the beauty and the vitality inherent in the language. In the poem 'Panani kath' Kaul says, 'The Kashmiris are to be congratulated. They had lost their tongue but have now found it with great effort'.

Under the impact of these and other influences, Kaul persisted in writing in Kashmiri. His poems appeared in local newspapers during the forties. In a few years, the first volume of his Kashmiri poems numbering 13, entitled Sumran (Rosary as a token of love) was published (1951), and the second volume comprising 18 poems appeared a few months later in the same year. He kept away half a dozen poems considering them not of general interest, but these also appeared later. Each verse or stanza is accompanied with an English translation by the poet himself. Sumran won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956.

Of the 37 poems in Sumran, two were dropped in the Lalla rukh edition of 1955. This is a small output, but even then, Zinda Kaul is regarded as a poet. The poet had varied experiences of life at different times—penury, neglect, ill-health, death of his son and later of his wife and some close friends, affection of his admirers, appreciation of his scholarship and poetic talent, and even adulation. But he never strayed from the course he had started on; a profound mystic, he never lost his faith in God or the Ultimate Truth which he equated with love: 'I know no God apart from Thee, Great Love' (Hymn to love/'Lola dasvas prarthana') or, 'God can be approached through His creation and to see God's wonderful work is verily to worship God' (Spring/Sonnet) or 'For supposing we withdraw, can His love let us go? The eternal bond (between the human soul and God) is not so fragile' (Token of love/'Premuk nishana').

It is not that he inherited it as a blind faith. 'Vadihe manush', 'Prashn', 'Stray thoughts' (ghazal), etc. clearly indicate how he passed through his moods of doubts, misgivings, questionings and heart-searching when he was brought to the verge of hypochondriac tears, but he withstood the tornado and emerged unscathed with conviction.

There is a perfect harmony of feeling and thought, rhythm and diction in his work. The poet speaks of his experiences out of the depth of his heart and his expression is suited to the role of a sage speaking from profound depths. There is, however, no assumption of the role of a self-righteous saint or a stentorian prophet. Kaul is always human, humble and different. He is sincere and loving, and his expression is superb.

Words from Sanskrit and Persian origin are harmoniously blended with current Kashmiri in his diction. Kaul eschewed imitative forms, cast new stanza-moulds and gave new rhyme-patterns to Kashmiri verse. His verse-forms include couplets, stanzas of 4, 5, 6 and 8 lines, ghazals and quatrains. The length of stanzas varies in a poem reflecting a mood of exaltation.

As a man of deep faith and profound culture, Zinda Kaul was gentle, simple and affectionate. He was a Theosophist, a Buddhist, a Vedantin and a Shaivite rolled into one. To him, man was the handiwork of God irrespective of religion, language, culture or complexion. And he accepted even misfortune as a gift of God.

KAUMUDI MAHOTSAVA (Hindi) is a play written by the well-known playwright Ramkumar Varma in 1948, and was first published in 1949. Written originally for the All India Radio, it was first broadcast from Delhi on the 9th October, 1948. It was later staged with appropriate changes by the Hindi Parishad, Allahabad University, on the occasion of its convocation on the 17th December 1951.

The central theme of the play is the struggle that raged between Chandragupta, the Emperor of Magadha, and his Prime Minister, Chanakya, on the issue of celebrating the 'Kaumudi mahotsava' (The moonlight festival). This episode finds mention in Vishakhadatta's Sanskrit drama titled Mudrarakshasa (5th century, A.D.), in D.L. Roy's Bengali play, Chandragupta, as also in Jaishankar Prasad's Hindi play of the same name. The author seeks to propound that all these great authors have not done justice to the character of the great emperor, and their characterisation is not in keeping with his greatness. While adopting the original plot, Varma's portrayal of Chandragupta is commensurate with the profound dignity of the great ruler. He deals with both the characters with profound seriousness. His portrayal is backed by his deep study of the subject, but he does not allow it to interfere with, or in anyway, cause injury to the dramatic features of his work. The play has a tempo, although its essential drawback is the lack of action, being essentially meant for the audio-medium. Another weakness that draw one's attention is that its diction is too terse at places. Even so, on account of the ingenuous way the drama proceeds apace to its climax and the naturalness with which the dramatic situations manage to keep up the reader's curiosity, it succeeds in leaving the desired effect on the reader's minds. Though in the end Chandragupta himself forbids the holding of the Kaumudi mahotsava, his action is backed by his conviction and in doing so, he certainly does not act as an automaton. This climax is also an evidence of the keenness of Chanakya's perception and his sharp intelligence. Dramatic situations do leave the spectator stunned, but they also have an essential credibility.

In the resurgence of Hindi drama, this play has an important place. Ramkumar Varma is supposed to be the pioneer of Hindi one-Act play. Kaumudi mahotsava is indeed a long one-Act play and it goes to prove that all the Hindi's playwrights, who eventually took to writing of stage plays, had adopted the genre of audio-play to begin with. In this long journey from audio-play to stage play, Kaumudi mahotsava holds an important position.

KAUR (COUR) AJEET (Punjabi; b. 1934) was born in Lahore and had had her early education there. After the partition, she came to Delhi and completed her education with M.A. in Economics and B.Ed. She then took up journalism and edited two directories of trade. For twenty-two years now she has been editing the Rupee Trade.

But if she has been an economist or a journalist by profession, she seems to have been a writer both by choice and inclination. And she has made a mark as a short-story writer. In fact, she is one of the very best in the language. Her well-known works in the genre are Gulbano, Malik di maut, Butshikan, Faltu aurat, Saviyan, Chirian and Maut Ali Babe di. Her stories have been translated into many Indian languages and also broadcast and telecast over the years.

She received many honours and awards from the Government and literary institutions. The Punjab Government honoured her for the collection of short stories, Gulbano in 1962. The same year Punjabi Sahitya Samikhya Board chose her as the Shiromani Sahitkar of the year. In 1979 she was honoured by the Punjabi Arts Council and in 1983 by the Punjabi Academy, Delhi, as one of the nine distinguished writers living in Delhi and in 1984 she received both the international IAPX Award and the Baba Balwant Award.

She writes in a racy and fluent style and her insight into the human situation is penetrating. She has enriched the language with her valuable creative work.

KAUSHIK, VISHVAMBHARNATH SHARMA (Hindi; b. 1891, d. 1945) was a skilful novelist and story-writer in the tradition of Premchand. His stories are mostly about the social and family life, especially the evils of child marriage and the tradition of purdah (veil) and dowry. Social reform was the objective of his writing stories, which reflect the softer sensibilities of the human mind. He was an artist skilled in depicting the psychological states of the characters. 'Rakshabandhan' and 'Tai' are his famous stories which were published in the Sarasvati in 1913 and 1920 respectively.

Kaushik was born in a Gaud brahmin family of Ambala Cantonment. He was adopted by his uncle who was at Kanpur. He studied upto the Matriculation standard. His literary urge found expression, like Premchand's, first in the Urdu language. He used to write under the pseudonym of Ragib. Receiving inspiration from Acharya Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, he began to write stories in Hindi in 1911. Ma (1929) and Sangharsh (1949) are his famous works of fiction and Galpa mandir (1919), Bhikharini (1919), Chitrashala (1924), Manimala (1909), Paris ki nartaki (1946), Kallol (1933) and Prempratima are collections of his short stories. He also wrote two plays: Atyachar ka parinam (1921) and Hindu vidhava. He used to write every month in the monthly,

KAUSHITAKI UPANISHAD-KAUTILYA

Chand, a series named 'Dubeju ki chithi', which were much discussed and liked on account of their wit and humour. For some time, he edited the monthly Prabha. He also translated a Bengali novel and a few short stories into Hindi.

R.N.S.

KAUSHITAKI UPANISHAD (Sanskrit) or Kaushitakibrahmanopanishad belongs to the Shankhyayana recension shakha of the Rigveda. Only the Brahmana (30 chapters), the Aranyaka (15 chapters) and the Upanishad (4 chapters) are available in this shakha. In some manuscripts of the Kaushitakiaranyaka, the Kaushitaki upanishad is found inserted (3-6 chapters). Probably the Kaushitaki upanishad was added as an independent treatise to the completed Aranyaka. The Kaushitaki upanishad does not form part of the Kaushitakibrahmana. The name Kaushitakibrahmanopanishad may be accounted for on the ground that the Aranyaka of which it formed a part could be reckoned as part of the Brahman literature of the Rigveda.

This Upanishad is pre-Buddhistic and may belong like other ancient prose Upanishads to 800-700 B.C. It exists in two texts. It was commented upon by Shankarānanda (c. 1400).

The first dialogue, in the first Chapter, between Chitra Gargyayani and Aruni, contains the speculation on the fate of the soul after death. There are two different paths for the departing soul: 'pitri-yana', the path of the fathers and 'deva-yana', the path of the gods. Those who proceed by the path of the fathers return back to the world to be born again and again after the exhaustion of the fruit of their good works. Those who proceed by the path of the gods reach the world of Brahman. But the world of Brahman is not the final goal. The final goal of the departing souls is their identification with Brahman or the Universal Soul. The second Chapter contains the teachings of the four teachers, Kaushitaki, Paingya, Pratrādāna and Shushka Bhṛingara. Both Kaushitaki and Paingya hold that the breathing spirit (Prana) is Brahman, the creator Prana is the source of everything as Brahman is. The one special feature of this Chapter is that some religious customs like daily worship of the sun for the removal of sin, adoration of the new moon for prosperity and the father and son ceremony for transmission of the tradition have been mixed up with metaphysical discussions. The discussion regarding the breathing spirit as the source of every thing, introduced in the second Chapter, is further advanced in the third Chapter, in course of a dialogue between Pratrādāna and Indra. The breathing spirit is the intelligent self (prajnatman). The intelligent self is supreme. The last dialogue between Gargya Balaki and Ajatashatru, the king of Kashi, in the fourth Chapter contains a progressive definition of Brahman. In the end Ajatashatru explains the nature of Brahman to Balaki by illustrating stages of the deep sleep and that of waking. The breathing spirit united with the intelligent self is only the covering of something else, that is the highest self. All other selves ultimately unite with this highest self.

The Kaushitaki-upanishad, like other ancient upanishads, is not a systematic treatise. It is a blend of philosophical speculations and poetic visions. Metaphysical discussions proceed naturally from the physical point. The most important physical characteristic of a living being is breath which is described here as the breathing spirit.

The correlation between knowing and being is established and the breathing spirit emerges as the intelligent self (prajnatman). But the intelligent self is not the true self. The true self is one that knows. 'Mind is not what one should desire to understand, one should know the thinker'. The same result is also obtained by another process, that is, by understanding the stages of the deep sleep and that of waking. It all boils down to this that individual soul is the true soul. But it is not so. The true soul is the Universal Soul. Only that is the real (satya). 'All this whatever there is, all this you are'.

The ancient Upanishads in prose were pioneers in developing their own prose style: living, vigorous and searching. Even though repetitive at places, it retains its vigour. Material splendours of the mythical world of Brahman have been strikingly described in the first Chapter. Even then it remains an ordinary piece of poetry, but the descriptions of the two beloveds, one 'Manasi' (the desired she) and the other her counterpart 'Chakshusi' (the seen she) both waving the world by taking flowers, is itself a fine piece of poetry.

KAUTILYA (Sanskrit). To Kautilya or Chanakya is ascribed the authorship of the famous Arthashastra and also the collection of didactic verses called Chanakya-shataka. He was the friend, adviser and prime minister of Chandragupta Maurya. As given by the Sanskrit lexicographer, Kautilya is known by several other names: Vatsyayana Mallanaga, Kutila, Chanakatmajaw, Dramila, Pakshilaswamin, Vishnugupta and Angula. It appears that his proper name was Vishnugupta. Being the son of the sage Chanaka, he was called Chanakya and on account of his diplomatic crookedness, or curliness of the hair (Ashtadhyayi, III. 1.23) he was nick-named Kautilya. Some also called him Kautalya which may be derived from his gotra 'Kutala'. The authorship of the Arthashastra is attributed to Kautilya on the basis of external and internal evidences. His identity with the preceptor of Chandragupta Maurya is still a moot point; more scholars are inclined to accept this but some ascribe a later date to him. Apart from the controversy as to whether Kautilya, the preceptor of Chandragupta Maurya, is the author of the extant Arthashastra or not, it is well established that Kautilya alias Chanakya was a historical personality, that he was instrumental in the overthrowing of the Nandas and establishing the Maurya empire, and that he belonged to the 3rd century B.C. His character is well depicted in the Mudrarakshasa, a drama by Vishakhadatta. He was a great politician, a shrewd and ruthless administrator but at the same time humane and sympathetic to the downtrodden. All these traits of character are common with those of the author of the extant Arthashastra, which are revealed by a careful study of the text. This personality of Kautilya is referred to in the Bhagavatapurana (II. 1.11.12), Vishnupurana (XXIV, 6-7) and also in Kama-daka's Nitisara.

Kautilya is held to be an Imperialist of olden days, as he propounded that the first task should be to achieve economic and political stability and cultural life would then be sound by itself.

KAVATHEKAR, DATTATREYA RAGHUNATH (Marathi; b. 1902, d. 1978) was a novelist and short story writer. He retired from the Indian Air Force after having worked there for 25 years. He has some 22 publications to his credit most of which are novels. His novels are usually set against contemporary social background and are usually didactic in approach, propagating conservation of traditional values and virtues. Characters are stereotypes and the situations are melodramatic with a strong sentimental appeal.

Some of his well-known novels are Vikhandhe prem (1935), Udalelya bhavana (1937), Gulabachya pakalya (1937), Nadninad (1939), Chandanyatil savalya (1940), Manda (1943), Apna dav (1941), Reshmachya gathi (1942), Abhalachi savli (1945), Ruperi kada (1959), Ujedavil andhar (1976). Of these Apna dav, Abhalachi savli and Ruperi kada have run into more than 3 editions. The anthology of his short stories is entitled Kavthekaran-chya goshti. Though he does not enjoy very high literary ranking, his contribution to the popularisation of novel is significant.

KAVI (Sanskrit). In Sanskrit poetics (alamkarashastra) the place of a 'kavi' (poet) is regarded as the highest among all living beings. To be born as a man is by itself a rare fortune; to be a learned man is rarer still; but to be born as a poet with the gifts of intuition (darshana) and expression (varnana) is the rarest of all attainments. Combination of these two faculties, darshana and varnana, is the sine qua non of poetic success, as Bhatta Tauta says: 'darshanand varnañach chapi rudha loke kavishrutih'. 'Pratibha' or poetic intuition combined with the power of expression is thus the essential ingredient of poetic art. But pratibha should be re-inforced by 'vyutpatiti' or versatility in various arts and science and other ancillary disciplines (bahujnata) together with a wealth of direct worldly experiences on the one hand and 'abhyasa' or constant practice in the art of poetic composition, preferably under the guidance of a genuine poet or an acute connoisseur of poetry (kavyajna) on the other. Of these pratibha is regarded as the seed (bija) out of which poesy sprouts forth. As Vamana said: 'kavitvabijam pratibhanam' (Kavyalamkara-sutra). Without pratibha mere vyutpati and abhyasa are insufficient for the origin of genuine poetry and they make a composition ridiculous (upahasaniya) in the eyes of true connoisseurs (sahridaya). This pratibha is an intellectual-cum-spiritual faculty which far excels all other intellectual and psychological faculties like 'smriti', 'mati' and 'prajna', that can comprehend objects past, present and future respectively. Pratibha comprehends and at the same time transcends all of them and above all plays a creative role as well giving rise to new combinations of matter and form that are rare in the material universe. It is due to this creative role of pratibha that the poet is designated as 'prajapati' or creator. The poet qua creator (srashtri) far surpasses God, the Creator because the former is completely free in his creative activity without any external hindrance or limitation, like the cosmic laws of 'karman' and causality that characterise the creation of the latter. Thus a poet's creation is superior to God's, and is not a mere copy of the latter. This view of writers of Sanskrit poetics regarding the nature of poetic art and the role of a poet is just contrary to Plato's conception of the nature of poetry as imitation (mimesis) far removed from the original prototype which it professes to imitate. According to the eminent Indian writers of poetics, a poet is far superior to philosophers, scientists and chroniclers who may have the gift of prajna or scientific intuition, but lack the basic gift of pratibha or creative intuition having as its indissoluble counterpart, the rare gift of expression (varnana), by virtue of which the inmost insights and visions become embodied in beautiful forms in the shape of words embellished with figures of speech and other decorative principles, like 'guna', 'riti', 'vakrokti', 'auchitya', etc. The pratibha of a poet is called 'karayitri', as it leads to the creation or making of poetry. This pratibha may have various grades through which it shines forth, and this gradation or comparative excellence (taratamya) in the nature of pratibha is the cause of gradation of poetic specimens too. Vamana divides the poets into two broad classes—'arochakins' and 'satrinabhyavaharins'. The former are averse to the poetic creations of other fellow-poets and depend solely on their unaided powers for their respective creations, whereas the latter imitate and adapt the compositions of famous poets of old and lay hands on whatever they find suitable in the composition of earlier authors without discrimination. There are poets who borrow the thoughts and expressions of others. These plagiarists are stigmatised as 'chaura kavis' by Banabhatta in his Harshacharita. Bana ridicules these so-called poets lacking the gift of creative imagination in a verse of the Harshacharita (1.6). It is better not to be a poet at all than be a bad poet, says Bhamaha in his Kavyalamkara (I. 12). Bad poetry is but another name for living death (kukavita hi sochchhvasam maranam). Rajashekara, in his Kavyamimamsa (Chap. IV) classifies poets under two broad divisions, viz., 'shastra-kavi' and 'kavya-kavi', according to academic learning which predominates over the emotional element, which is a mark of genuine poesy, or vice versa. The former again are divided into three sub-classes, according to the degree of preponderance of scholasticism. Rajashekara enumerates eight subdivisions of the latter, which he designates as 'rachana-kavi', 'shabdakavi', 'artha-kavi', 'alamkara-kavi', 'ukti-kavi', 'rasa-kavi', 'marga-kavi' and 'shastrartha-kavi'. Combination of the characteristic features of all these eight divisions enters into the formation of a 'maha-kavi' (sarvagunayogi mahakavih). Ten stages for an aspirant after poetic fame are also mentioned by Rajashekara. A perfectly creative poet is averse to the ideas and expression of other poets—old and new (ayoni), whereas the rest depend upon the works of other poets from which they borrow words and ideas, with occasional variations. They are called 'anyachchhayayonis'. Great poets (mahakavis), as Rajashekara states, are by nature blind to everything amenable to the perception of other human beings, but with regard to objects and ideas that never come within the range of any creature on earth, they are endowed with divine intuition (divya-drishah) that penetrates into the very core of things.

KAVI, PITAMBARA (Assamese) was a poet of Kamarupa who lived in the town of Kamata. He was possibly a senior contemporary of Shankaradeva (1449-1569). This is evident from a reference to Pitambara when Shankaradeva asked Narayana Thakur, a man of Kamarupa, to name some influential persons of that region who could work as proselytisers. Narayana Thakur named three such persons, one of whom was Pitambara Kavi, who had already rendered the Bhagavata-purana, Book X, into verse. Shankaradeva then asked him to recite some verses of Pitambara. Narayana recited a portion of Pitambara's work wherein Rukmini, the princes of Kundinnagar, was eagerly waiting for Krishna.

It is apparent that Pitambara had established himself as a poet when Shankaradeva entered the kingdom of Kamarupa sometime about the middle of the sixteenth century. Khan Choudhury Amantullah Ahmad (Kochbiharer itihās) and Sashibhusan Dasgupta (Descriptive Catalogue of Bengali Manuscripts) consider Pitambara Kavi to be identical with the great scholar, Pitambar Siddhantavagisha of the Cooch Behar court. According to a chronicle of the Koch kings (Gandharvanarayanar vanshavalī), the two scholars, Pitambara Siddhantavagisha and Purushottama Vidyavagisha, were in the court of Gauda and were brought to Kamarupa by Shukladhvaja or Silaraya. After his return from Gauda he had the Kamakhya temple rebuilt in 1565. So Pitambara Siddhantavagisha came to Kamarupa some time between 1564 and 1574. But the poet Pitambara composed his kavya Usha parinaya in Kamatapura in 1533. It is, therefore, quite clear that the poet is thus distinct from the smṛiti scholar. That he was a Sanskrit scholar is evident from his elegant translation and adaptation of the puranas. Pitambara was a man of Kamarupa living in Kamatapura and he composed some of his poetical works at the instance of Prince Samarsimha of Cooch Behar.

Pitambara's earliest work, Usha-parinaya kavya, was completed on the fifth day of Vaishakha of the year 1533. There is no mention of Bishwasimha Naranarayana or Silaraya in it, and it can be presumed that the poet did not receive royal patronage till that time. The story of Vanasura's prowess, his fight with the Yadavas, the fight between Krishna and Hara, the amorousness of Usha, her elopement with Aniruddha, the marriage of Usha (Bana's daughter) and Aniruddha (Pradyumna's son)—all these have been incorporated in the Kavya on the model of Harivamsha. Pitambara's innovation lies in the inclusion of the character of Usha's nurse, Kokila. There are fine touches of lyricism and sensuousness here and there. Pitambara rendered the Bhagavata-purana, Book I and Book X into verse. Book I is preserved in the State Library of Cooch Behar. No date of composition of Book X is mentioned. It is stated in the colophon that the book was composed as desired by Kumar Samarsimha (Shukladhvaja) of Kamatanagar. According to E. Gait, Naranarayana ascended the throne in about 1540. Khan Bahadur Amanatulla Ahmed places it about 1533. Hence 1533 can be taken as the upper limit in determining the date of composition of Pitambara's Book X. As for the lower limit it cannot go beyond about 1546, when Shankaradeva heard some of the verses of the same recited by Narayana Thakur. There are sensuous touches in Pitambara's rendering. This book is more an adaptation than a translation. The poet has narrated the episodes from the Bhagavata-purana in a pleasing manner. Pitambara also wrote Nala-Damayanti and the pathetic episode of Nala and Damayanti has been skilfully presented. The full text of this book is not available in Assam. Pitambara composed his Markandeya-purana (Chandi-akhya) at the instance of Kumar Samarsimha. The date of the beginning of the composition is given as 1620 (vide two manuscripts preserved in the State Library of Cooch Behar), but this date appears to be improbable in view of the fact that Shukladhvaja died in 1571. The poet has told in 'simple and direct language' the story of goddess Chandi and her victory over the demons. He has made an open translation of killing of demons by Chandi in it. This work is a rare specimen of Shakta literature during this period.

KAVI-SAMAYA (Sanskrit). The expression kavi-samaya (poetic convention) has come to be included in the accepted technical repertoire of Sanskrit poetics. It refers to the various conventions in matters of descriptions, characterisation, introduction of poetic figures, portrayal of geographical and other characteristics of particular landscapes that came to be accepted by poets in general and thus became the stock-in-trade in respect of execution of the poet's craft. These features were later on collected from the available works of celebrated poets of old and systematically treated in later alamkara treatises in minute details. As S.K. De observes, 'These decadent treatises, therefore, offer such adventitious aids for ready-made poetry, as may—to take a particular point—be afforded, for instance, by a modern rhyming dictionary or works of similar nature, (Sanskrit Poetics, Vol. II'. Treatment of such poetic convention (kavi-samaya) can be met with in Keshava Mishra's Alamkara-shekhara in Kavya-kalpalata-vritti of Arisimha and Amarachandra as also in Deveshvara's Kavi-kalpalata, the most exhaustive, however, being that found in Rajashekhara's Kavyamimamsa (Chaps. XIV-XVI).

Rajashekhara first defines kavi-samaya as 'ashastriyam-alaukikam cha parampararayatam yamarthamupani badhnanti kavayha sa kavisamayah'. Thus, those usages and modes of description, characterisation, etc., though not in agreement with the dicta laid down in shastras or with our wordly experience (loka), that are traditionally accepted by generations of poets without any murmur against their apparent inconsistencies, for the sake of artistic effect, are looked upon as kavi-samaya. Vamana, in the introductory portion of his Vritti on Kavyalamkarasutra (Vol. 1), employs the term kavya-samaya to denote the accepted norms of poets in respect of grammar, metrics and gender in particular. But the term kavi-samaya has a much wider significance in the later history of Sanskrit poetics. Rajashekhara observes that great intellects of antiquity by virtue of their wide learning in the vast Vedic lore with its thousands of recensions together with the ancillary sciences, direct experience acquired by travels in distant regions and islands, tried to describe what they had seen and conceived according to their own light. But in the succeeding ages, when the intellectual and spiritual powers were on the wane, men of lesser calibre, lacking the wealth of learning as also the varied experience of their ancient predecessors, had to depend on the testimony of the latter, which in their eyes came to appear as sacrosanct and invariable, even though the nature of things had much changed due to the passage of time as also due to local variations in tastes and manners, and they draw upon such second-hand information culled from the compositions of the authors of earlier ages for descriptions in their own works, without heeding the changes that had crept in during the intervening period. This led to the emergence of a body of information in various fields viz., loka, shastra, nyaya, agama, kala etc., that were freely utilised by the later generations, and this came to be known as kavi-samaya. According to Rajashekhara, some of these poetic conventions were genuine and valid and their origin could be traced to the earlier authors, while some were spurious and apocryphal, being surreptitiously introduced by clever minds for achieving their own selfish ends: 'tatrakashcid advatvenavasthitah kavisamavenartha kashcit parasparopakramartham svarthaya dhurtaih pravarttitah'. Rajashekhara classifies kavi-samaya under three broad heads, viz., svargya pertaining to heaven and its denizens, bhauma relating to this world of mortals, and pataliya—having reference to the nether region and its dwellers. But of these three classes he assigns the greatest importance to the conventions relating to this middle region inhabited by human beings. These again can be arranged under four heads, viz., jati (genus), guna (quality), kriya (action) and dravya (substance or individual), according to the nature of the object to be described by the poet. The conventional or stylized mode of description can again proceed along three different paths according to Rajashekhara, viz., asatah nibandhanam (description of things that are non est), satah anibandhanam (non-description of things that really exist), and lastly, niyama (restriction or selective description). Rajashekhara has illustrated all these three modes in respect of introduction of poetic conventions—be they of the nature of jati, guna, kriya or dravya, on the basis of data collected from the writings of celebrated poets of yore. As instances of the first category he refers to the description of lotuses blooming in rivers, swans in lakes and ponds, and of gold and precious gems in any and every hill. Of the second category—want of malati blossoms in spring-time, of flowers and fruits in sandalwood trees and of fruits in Ashoka plants are cited as examples. As regards the mode of selective description reference might be made to the poetic convention sanctioning the mountain Malaya alone as being the soil where sandalwood trees can grow, and Bhurja trees growing on the Himalayas alone. All these are poetic conventions in respect of dravya. Similar conventions are noticeable with reference to the remaining categories as well, viz., jati, guna and kriya. The prevalent custom of poets with regard to the description of fame (yashas) and laughter (hasa) as white, of vice as black, of love and anger as crimson are very common instances of kavi-samaya. In the sixteenth Chapter of Kavya-mimamsa, the conventions with reference to svarga and patala too are dealt with. Rajashekhar concludes his treatment with the following verse: 'so'yam kavinam samayah kavye supta iva sthitah/ as sampratam ihasmabhir-yathabuddhi vibodhitah'.

Later authors like Hemachandra, Keshava Mishra, Vishvanatha and others most depended upon Rajashekhar's extensive analysis for their treatment of the topic kavi-samaya. Inconsistencies, whether in the sphere of loka, agama, kala or nyaya (loka-virodha, agama-virodha, kala-virodha and agama-virodha) should not be looked upon as poetic blemishes if they have their origin in time-honoured poetic conventions. As Rajashekhar observes: nanvesha doshah/ kathamkaram punar up-anibhanarhab ityacharyah/ kavimarganugrahi katham esha doshah-iti yayavariyah. This has been echoed by Vishvanatha in his Sahitya-darpana (vii-22): kavinam samaye khyate gunah khyati—viruddhata, where he has collected some of the well-known instances of kavi-samaya in three mnemonic verses in sragdhara metre that are treasured in the memory of every student of Sanskrit poetics beginning with:

malinyam vyomni pape yashasi dhalalata varnyate
hasa-kirtt-yoh—(loc. cit., vii 23-25)

Excessive dependence on such hand-books on the part of a poet in making turned the craft of the poet into a mechanical art dominated by stylised modes of description and diction, thus depriving later classical Sanskrit poetry of the freshness of vision and expression varying according to the individual peculiarities of poets.

KAVI-SHIKSHA (Sanskrit) i.e., the education of a poet, is a term used in Sanskrit poetics. Though it is a common saying that a poet is born and not made, it has to be admitted that without proper training and guidance under competent poet-critics (kavyajna-shiksha) the inherent poetic gifts remain dormant and cannot attain to the desired fruition. But even instructions cannot make one a poet if he is lacking in the gift of innate genius and imaginative intuition. Abhinavagupta clearly states that not all poets are Valmiki, Vyasa, Kalidasa or Bhattenduraja. So they must have to rise to the height of 'mahakavi' by a gradual process of careful training and constant practice.

In ancient India, a separate discipline was brought into being known as kavi-shiksha, the aim of which was to lay down the methods to be followed by a poet in making for successful composition of different species of creative writing like 'muktaka', 'sanghata', 'mahaprabandha'—of which 'katha', 'akhyayika', 'khandakatha', 'mahakavya', 'rupaka', and 'uparupaka', etc., are so many specimens. The aspirant must first practise the art of composing muktakas (single verse) and other varieties of the anibaddha (unconnected) type, and having achieved mastery in that genre should proceed to the composition of poetic production of some length (nibaddha or connected working). An aspiring poet should have to apply himself to the acquisition or mastery of various branches of arts and crafts and scientific disciplines and philosophical systems, like grammar, lexicography, logic, etc., which has to be combined with a wide knowledge of the world at large, the infinite varieties of flora and fauna, the manners and customs of different races inhabiting the earth, the topography of the different regions, all of which contribute to the enrichment and perfection of his poetic art. As Bhamaha proclaims: na sa shabdo na tad vachyam na sa vidya na sa kala/jayate yanna kavyangam aho bharo mahan kaveh// (Kavyalamkara, V. 4). Vamana in his Kavyalamkarasutra enumerates some of the important branches of learning that must be scrupulously studied by a poet, viz., Shabsasmriti (grammar), abhidhana-kosha (lexicon), chhandovichiti (metrics), kalas (the various branches of art, 64 in number), kama-shastra (erotics), and danda-niti (polity). Without a thorough knowledge of grammar the poet is liable to commit grammatical solecisms at every step and it is for this reason that grammar has been given the pride of the place among the kavyangas or ancillary disciplines conducive to perfection of poetic art. Bhamaha and Vamana devote an entire section of their respective treatises towards consideration of grammatical topics. The knowledge of the Kalashastras, like music, dance, painting, etc., is an indispensable necessity for the making of a poet as is evinced by the works of great poets, like Kalidasa, Bana, Bhavabhuti, and others. In addition to these major disciplines there are also some important miscellaneous factors that aid the making of a poet, which Vamana collectively designates as 'prakirana', of which 'lakshya-jnatva', 'abhyoga', 'vridha-seva', 'avekshana', 'pratibhana' and 'avadhana' are some of the specimens (Vamana's Kavyalamkarasutra, I.3.11-20). Rajashekhar, in his Kavyamimamsa similarly observes that 'kavya-vidya' comprises principally 'namadhatu-parayana' (grammar), 'abhidhana-kosha' (lexicon), 'chhandovichiti' (prosody) and 'alamkara-tantra' (poetics) to which have to be further added the subsidiary branches of learning (pavidyas) in the shape of sixty-four kalas, which were exhaustively treated by Dandin in one of his lost treatises, viz., Kalaparichchheda, and has been hinted at in his Kavyadarsha. Deficiency in any of these ancillary disciplines leads to various poetic blemishes, like 'chyutasanskriti', 'yatibhramsha', 'nyaya-virodha', 'kala-virodha', etc., that mar the beauty of a poetic work and turns it in to an object of ridicule in the eyes of true connoisseurs. 'Vridha-seva' is an important auxiliary factor in respect of proper development of innate poetic gifts. It refers to the constant attendance upon those who are superior in both theoretical and practical knowledge of the poet's craft as in the case of flawless acquisition of all other disciplines, like grammar, philosophy, etc. Secluded place, the concluding part of night, especially the small hours before the outbreak of dawn are prescribed as conducive to mental concentration (avadhana) on the part of a poet, without which it is not possible for him to probe deep into the nature of things which he intends to depict. Rajashekhara, in his Kavyamimamsa, refers to such factors as 'kavisannidhi' (acquaintance of reputed poets), 'desha-vartha' (knowledge of various lands), 'vidagdha-vada' (discourse with the learned), 'loka-yatra' (thorough knowledge of the manners and customs of different races and peoples) and 'vidvad-goshthi' (participation in discussions in learned assemblies) and 'puratana-kavi-nibandha' as 'kavyamatarah', i.e., the very mother of poesy. Besides, sound health (svasthya), keen memory (smriti-dardhya), shedding off moodiness (anirveda) also are of great help for the development of poetic faculty. He also prescribes purity of speech (vak-shaucha), of mind (manah-shaucha) as also of body (kavya-shaucha), i.e., cleanliness in dress, etc., as the mark of a true poet. The poet should have the knowledge of several languages—Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha, and even Bhuta-bhasha, for all forms of dialect have their place in poetic compositions according to variations of character, locality and things to be depicted. Kshemendra in his Kavikanthabharana (I.3-4) mentions five stages through which one aspiring to be a poet has to proceed thus:

tatra kaveh kavityapith shiksha praptagirah kaveh/chamatkritshcha shikshaptau guna-doshodgatistatha/
pashchat parichaya-prapthi

Without initiation into the intricacies of poetic art with the guidance and instruction of an expert in the art, it is deemed well-nigh impossible for one to be recognised as a finished poet and master of his craft. Rajashekhara in his Kavyamimamsa (Chapter XI-XIII) minutely deals with the various ways in which words and ideas of other poets can be adapted by aspiring poets, some of which, however, should be avoided by all means. Thoughts and expressions are divided into four distinct categories, viz., 'pratibimbakalpa', 'alekhyaprakhyā', 'yulyadehi-tulya', and 'para-purapravesha-sadrishā' on the basis of their varying degree of resemblance with their original prototypes in a descending order. And Rajashekhara echoes the verdict of Anandavardhana in disparaging the mode of adaptation known as pratibimbakalpa that lacks in the genuine spark of poetic imagination. By pursuing meticulously these prescriptions as laid down in such manuals as Kshemendra's Kavi-kanthabharana, Rajashekhara's Kavyamimamsa, Hemachandra's Kavyanushasana, as also the fragmentary studies relating to the training of poets in various alamkara-treatises of a later age, it was comparatively easy for a novice to gradually attain the maturity and earn undying fame in the world of letters. Besides the above-mentioned texts the names of such works as Alamkaraachintamani, Kavyakalpalata, Kavikalpalata, Gangadasa's Kavi-shiksha, and also the treatises of Jayamangala and Vinayachandra bearing the same title, deserve mention as testifying to the wide vogue that this particular discipline acquired, when genuine poesy of a Vyasa, a Valmiki and a Kalidasa gradually declined. The wide prevalence of this discipline of Kavi-shiksha gradually led, when rigidly followed, to the decline of spontaneity and emergence of artificiality in poetic art that is so much noticeable in later classical Sanskrit literature.

KAVIKARNAPURA (Sanskrit; b. 1524), Paramananda; Sen, the third son of Shivananda Sen, is well-known in Sanskrit literature under the name and style of Kavikarnapura. How the name Kavikarnapura became famous is told in Krishnadas Kaviraj's Chaitanya-charitamritam. As described in it Shivanand Sen met Chaitanya Mahaprabhu who was then residing in Nilachala. During the course of meeting Chaitanya Mahaprabhu wished Paramananda to read a Sanskrit verse. By the Prabhu's grace, Paramananda read a Sanskrit verse: Shrivasaoh kuvalayakshamanor mahendra manidama/Vriandavana Ramaninama Mandanatha Khilam Harirjayati.

Having heard such a verse of eminence which mentioned the earring, Chaitanya Mahaprabhu honoured Paramananda Das with the name of Kavikarnapura. Besides this, Krishnadas Kaviraj refers to Kavikarnapura as Puridasa. However, the original name Paramananda Dasa was given by his father.

Kavikarnapur mentions the name of his preceptor Shrinatha in his work Anandavindavanchampu as well as the name of his elder brothers, Chaitanyadasa and Ramadasa. He was a staunch Vaishnava follower of Bengal from a Vaidya family.

Kavikarnapura was born at Kanchanapalli (Kanchanpada) in Nadiya district of Bengal a few years before the death of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu. He writes in his drama entitled Chaitanya-chandrodaya that it was composed in 1543, when he was only nineteen. Accordingly it is clear that he flourished during the 16th century.

Kavikarnapura wrote several Sanskrit Vaishnava works including a biography of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu in verse and a drama bearing the same theme. The works of Kavikarnapura are: Alamkarakautubha (on rhetoric), Chaitanyachandrodaya (a drama), Chaitanayac-

KAVILE PATTU (Malayalam), first published in 1966, is a collection of thirty-three poems written by Edassery Govindan Nair which won the Sahitya Akademy Award in 1969.

Most of the poems in this collection reveal the vigour of his poetry. The title poem is a narration of a folk myth. The only son of a mother sacrifices himself to appease the Mother Goddess's thirst for human blood. On hearing this the real mother rushes to the Mother Goddess, not to complain of the loss of her only precious possession but to ascertain that her son had not trembled in fear while submitting himself for the ultimate sacrifice. From that day, the poet feels, the Mother becomes a victim of suffering for the sake of her 'children'. This poem is a good example of how a folk myth can be used to project deep-rooted universal human sentiments. It is interesting to note here that two mothers—one terrestrial and the other celestial—meet at a critical juncture and the human emotions triumph over the superhuman principle. The atmosphere of a folk narration is throughout maintained in this poem by employing perceivable natural imageries and by resorting to repetitious words and phrases.

In another poem called 'Svarnadanam' (Donation of gold) the poet depicts a woman offering her jewels to the cause of the nation and comments: "What if the Indian woman is unadorned? Better than being adorned by the Chinese hands tomorrow".

M. Leelavathy, a well-known critic summarizes Edasseri's outlook: "Edasseri's philosophy is a blending of the sympathy towards oppressed and the unsympathetic attitude of 'no pardon' towards the oppressors". According to her, most of Edasseri's narrative poems are based on ordinary incidents of his familiar surroundings, embellished with poetic ornamentations.

In 'Ambadiyilekku vintum' (Once again to Ambadi), another poem included in the collection, the poet's nostalgia about the foregone past is interpreted against the gopika's eternal yearning for their lover, Krishna. Daruka who is driving his chariot towards Ambadi is the symbol of our life's quest for contentment. Life is not a journey through smooth surfaces. Daruka says:

It pleases me to push these chariot wheels through paths uneven

What taste have the snacks of life, if they are not salted with tears?

And the gopikas submit their prayer to their protector in the following manner:

Gather all our garments along with our inner lights,
Hang them around yourself smilingly,
While we remain with closed eyes in blissful shyness.
Cover us, O' kind-hearted
With the music of your flute

In the poem 'Bimbisarante itayan' (The shepherd of Bimbisara) another universal truth is revealed through the thin frame of a historical incident. The shepherd is driving a herd of goats to the 'yajnashala' for sacrifice. He is only doing his 'dharma'. Among the goats a tiny one limps, unable to keep pace with its mother. Buddha comes to the scene and carries the lame goat and comes to the place of sacrifice. His proclamation that 'that which cannot be given should not be taken away' resounds in the place. The poet's intention was not merely to recreate the episode. The whole poem is written in the words of the shepherd in a candid manner. This gives a depth to the message of the poem.

Edasseri's poems have a freshness about them. He never allows his poems to appear as old and outmoded. This is why he is often referred to as 'the poet of vigour'. The poems of this collection substantiate this truth.

KAVIRAJ, GOPINATH (Sanskrit; b. 1887, d. 1976) was born in a respectable middle class family of East Bengal (Now Bangladesh). His childhood passed mostly through uncertainty and illness. His family surname was Bagchi but as his grandfather was a well-known Ayurvedic physician, the Bagchis came to be called kavirajas (meaning ayurvedic physician) though the practice of Ayurveda was not their family calling any more.

A year after the Entrance Examination which he passed with credit from Dhaka, Gopinath decided to go out to a distant and dry climate for higher studies mainly to avoid bouts of malaria which had laid him low both in spirit and health. He chose Jaipur Rajasthan where he got shelter in the house of the Dewan as a private tutor. Four years after that he passed his B.A. examinations with first class first.

After Jaipur, Varanasi became not only the place of his studies and work but also the nucleus of his life-long spiritual quest. He had heard and known about the excellent work done by Dr. Arthur Venice, the Principal of the Government Sanskrit College and this was an additional incentive for his choice of Varanasi. He at once established an intimate rapport with the eminent British scholar and joined his post-graduate course of study. In 1913 he passed his M.A. (Sanskrit) as first in the first class of the Allahabad University, securing record marks in his special papers. Attractive offers of jobs began to come from various sources, but at the instance of his mentor, Dr. Venice, he decided to accept the librarianship of the College Library since then known as Saraswati Bhavan. He worked in this position for ten years from 1914 to 1924. During this period all publications of the Saraswati Bhavan bore the unmistakable stamp of his astounding scholarship. In 1924 he became the principal of the College, and after 13 years in 1937 when he was about 50 he retired voluntarily to go into 'Vanaprastha' in the true Indian fashion. In the mean time he received initiation from Swami Vishuddhananda, well-known Tantric and Yogi. Thereafter life revealed to him as a mingled web of diverse experience. He declined the offer of Vice-Chancellorship when the Sanskrit College was converted into a University. He never ran after fame or honour, but both came to him in ample measure. The Government of India gave him the title Mahamahopadhyaya in 1934. He also received the coronation medal of the Government in 1937. Three Universities—Calcutta University, Allahabad University, and Banaras Hindu University conferred their honorary D. Litt on him. He received a Certificate of Honour from the President of India in 1959 and subsequently the fellowship of Burdwan University, Asiatic Society of Bengal and of Bombay. Other honours that came to him were; Padmabibhushan (1964) and the title of Sahitya Vachaspati from the Government of Uttar Pradesh (1965), and Deshikottama from Visva Bharati (1976). He also received the Sahitya Akademy Award for his Tantric vanmaya men shakta drishti in 1964. The range of his scholarship was almost limitless and whether it was literature or tantra, philosophy or religion in its different forms and denominations, he wrote on them always with rare insight and understanding. He mastered more than a dozen languages and wrote in Bengali, Hindi, English and Sanskrit with equal aplomb and efficiency. As a researcher he could be the best model for any aspiring scholar, but in his comprehension and in his ability to conjure up a total vision of life through reading, he was unique. And above all he was an ideal teacher. Till the end of his life his residence was an academy of arts and innumerable scholars came to meet the Acharya who had gradually grown into an institution, and seek his guidance and direction in their academic and spiritual efforts.

But what actually distinguished Gopinath from other scholars was his constant endeavour to realize the truths learnt from books in his own life and to find the living embodiments of these truths in the lives of the saints and savants of his time. In 1948 writing to a friend he said: "I have read hundreds of books, but have I been able to learn what is worth learning? Have I learnt to be indifferent to both sorrow and joy? ... Where is for me that lesson of love after which there is no need for any other knowledge? My heart only makes the petty look important and forgets what is really big and worthwhile."

M.M. Gopinath Kaviraj edited a good number of Sanskrit texts. His greatest achievement is the series: The Yoga-Tantra Granthamala published by the Sampurnananda Sanskrit Vishvavidyalaya, Varanasi. Among his numerous original writings the following deserve special mention: Shri Shri Bisuddhanandaprasanga, Bharatiya sadhanar dhara, Tantriksadhana, Aspects of Indian Thought, Shrikrishna prasanga, etc. Kaviraja's writings on the biographies of saints and teachers, though religious and philosophical in content, have the flavour of good literature.

KAVIRAJA (Sanskrit). This is obviously a title of honour generally given to the best of poets and specially to a poet who is able to felicitously compose in six or more languages. Consequently many kavirajas are known in literature and inscriptions. However, the poet who became famous by this title was the one patronized by King Kamadeva (1182-1197) of Jayantipur in the North Canara. His name, according to K.B. Pathak, was Madhavabhata. He was the author of two kavyas, Raghavapandaviya and Parijataharana. In the former he refers to himself as 'Kaviraja' and 'Kavirajasuri'. In fact, in the Raghavapandaviya the author places himself at par with Subandhu and Bana in composing poems with divergent meanings in his compositions (vakroktimargh-nipuna) and asserts that there is no fourth poet so proficient in this style.

The Raghavapandaviya written at the instance of King Vira Kamadeva, is the earliest available poem narrating two stories through the same word-collection. In thirteen Cantos it simultaneously deals with the stories of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and hence the appropriateness of the title. For the same reason it was called also 'dvisandhana' or 'dvyashraya' kavya. Sanskrit language with its fecundity of expressions is best suited for conveying more than one meaning. Kaviraja definitely claims our attention as the earliest known writer who exploited the richness of Sanskrit words for a whole composition, every verse having two meanings. Kaviraja's style although artificial made a deep impression on later Sanskrit poets, many of whom, with reasonable success composed works conveying many stories and ideas. In fact, these grew to such a number that they came to form a genre by themselves.

The Parijataharana, written at the instance of Kirti Narayana, a minister of a Kadamba ruler, is a mahakavya in ten Cantos on the Bhagavata—episode of the removal of Parijata tree by Krishna from Indra's garden.

KAVIRAJA CHAKRAVARTI (Assamese) was the court poet of the Ahom kings Rudra Simha (1696-1714) and Shiva Simha (1714-1744). His real name was Ramanarayana. His other names were Dvijabara, Kaviraja Vipra and Kaviraja Dvijabara. In Bhaswati Kaviraja Chakravarti says that he is the scion of Shrimanta Daka Chakravarti. Under the royal patronage of Rudra Simha and his son Shiva Simha, Kaviraja Chakravarti composed in adaptation Gitagovinda Krishnajanma khanda, Brahmavaivarta-purana, Shankhachudabadha kavya and Shakuntala. He also composed some songs (Gitar puthi). Kaviraja Chakravarti's Assamese rendering of the Gitagovinda closely follows the original of Jayadeva and the book is profusely illustrated. Shankhachudabadha kavya is also illustrated. In it there are a few illustrations depicting the court of King Rudra Simha. The metrical Brahmavaivarta purana gives a faithful rendering of all the important episodes of Krishna's early life. His Krishnajanma khanda which is a faithful translation of the Sanskrit version (Prakriti khanda) deals with the episode of Shankhachuda and Tulasi.

His prose rendering of Bhaswati, a book of astrology, is an abridged adaptation of the Sanskrit Surya siddhanta.

J.N.G

KAVIRAJAMARGA (Kannada) is the first extant work in Kannada. This work on poetics was written in the age of Amoghavarsha Nripatunga (814-879) of the Rashtrakuta dynasty. Though based on the Sanskrit work of poetics, Kavyadarsha of Dandi, it is significant because of what it tells us about the Kannada land, the language, the people and the preceding literature.

There is difference of opinion among scholars about the authorship of this work. At the end of every Chapter are found the words, 'Kavirajamarga approved by Nripatungadeva' and so there is room for the view that the author was Nripatunga himself. But the words 'Srivijayaprabhutamanidam tanagagisidom Kavishwaram' and 'Srivijayaprabhutamanidam Kaikolvudi malkeyam', found in the work, lend support to the view that a poet, Srivijaya by name, was the author. There is another interpretation that the work, composed by the poet Srivijaya, was revised by a court poet Kavishwara so as to secure the approval of Nripatunga. It has also been argued that Kavishwara was Srivijaya and that Srivijaya was Nripatunga himself. But most scholars accept the view that Srivijaya was the author, and that he was not Nripatunga.

Some stanzas in the first Chapter, not strictly relevant to the subject of the work, give valuable information about the Kannada land, the people, the literature and the culture of the day. The Kannada land extended from the Godavari in the north to the Kaveri in the south. The central part, the cream of the land, was bounded by Puligere (now called Lakshmiswara), Kopana, Kisuvolal (now known as Pattadakallu) and Onkunda (in Belgaum district). The people could use language with a sense of appropriateness and could correctly grasp and assess the words of others. They were intelligent. Even when they had not mastered the language with conscious effort they could compose poems because of their innate gift.

Numerous references in the poem show that by the time it was composed there was a considerable body of literature in Kannada. A form called 'gadyakathe', which had a sprinkling of verse and had innumerable advantages, was in vogue and several poets had already employed it with success. Two verse forms, 'chattana' and 'bedende', had long been in use. A happy stringing of 'kandas' and 'vrittis' formed a bedende; a predominance of kandas with a lovely interweaving of the native metres, 'akkara', 'choupadi', 'geetike' and 'tripadi', was known as chattana. The first was meant to be read, the second to be sung. 'Pagarana' was a form used for humour, meant to be enacted.

Kannada literature had already seen several major writers who could provide the material and the illustrations for a work on poetics like Kavirajamarga. Vimalodaya, Nagarjuna, Jayabandhu and Durvinita are among the important prose writers mentioned here, and Srivijaya, Kavishwara, Pandita, Chandra and Lokapala are among the important poets. That the author of this work on poetics himself showers praise on them referring to them as 'chirantacharyarkal', 'purvacharyar', 'purana kavigal' and 'kavi vrishabhar' shows that they were writers of exceptional achievements. But not a single work of these masters has survived, and we are ignorant of even the titles of their works. Apart from Srivijaya and Durvinita, these writers have only been subjects of speculation. Durvinita was a ruler (600 A.D.) of the Ganga dynasty. Srivijaya composed, according to the recently found 'Vardhamana purana', a mahapurana, Raghuvamsha, in addition to Kavirajamarga; this was probably the Jain version of the story of Rama. The stanzas relating to the story of Rama quoted in Kavirajamarga were probably taken from this work. One or two writers who came after Kavirajamarga had been composed said that a certain Srivijaya wrote Chandraprabha Purana; scholars have concluded that this must have been the author of Kavirajamarga.

Kavirajamarga itself is a work on poetics. Its three Chapters comprise 536 stanzas. About 45 stanzas are a Kannada rendering of Bhamaha's Kavyalankara and 230 stanzas of Dandi's Kavyadarsha. The rest are original. But the poet has not blindly followed Dandi and Bhamaha. He has shown discrimination in applying their exposition to Kannada. The exposition of flaw and flawlessness, his view on mixing Sanskrit and Kannada, choice of appropriate passages to illustrate flaws, absence of clarity and the combination of sounds, the argument that these would not count as defects in a 'pagarana', the justification of the practice of Kannada poets who drop 'yati' and employ 'khandaprasa'—all these the poet presents persuasively. Although he has by and large followed the Sanskrit writers on poetics, his independent judgement asserts itself in his reference to 'shantirasa' and the addition of 'dhvani' as a figure of speech. The simple exposition in the work acquires charm by the happy use of similes like 'as the eye cannot see the collyrium applied to it', 'like adding drops of buttermilk to boiling milk', and 'like imposing a crippling burden on a child'.

The author of Kavirajamarga suggests that, when the language has reached a transitional stage, when the old laws conflict with the new usage and language is developing in different forms, it is necessary to place before everyone standard forms of poetry and language. His object in composing this work is to indicate the 'kaviraja marga', that is, the royal road of poets. He declares that to the studious poet, his work will be both a mirror and a torch. When we view the work in the context of the age, an age when Kannada was preparing for a giant leap, these words strike us, not as mere boast, but as the statement of an important fact.

KAVIRAVA, MOHANSINHA (Rajasthani; b. 1899, d. 1964), was born in Mewar at a village named Bassi. His grandfather, Kavirava Bakhtawar was a well-known poet of Rajasthan. Kavirava Mohansinha was equally efficient in composing poems in Dingala as well as Brajabbasha. He was also good at translation and rendered the dohas of Bihari and padas of Surdas and Rasakhan into simple Rajasthani in an attractive style. His own language of poetry is mature and self-restrained, which he uses with skill conveying shades of feeling and thought. His poems are well written, interesting and capable of creating the desired impression. His miscellaneous writings in verse run into dozens. Some of them are Pratap-jas chandrodaya, Bhupal bhushan, Kumbh-Kirtiprakash, Karunayash-kalanidhi, Vyanganth-prakash, kundaliya shataka, Niti shataka, Mohan satsai, Mrigaya bavani, Maharana charitamrita, Raja Bahara, Raguvansha charita, Manapachchisi, Vanika Bahattari, Prapanch-pachchisi, Jayamala pachchisi, Ramdas pachchisi, Vircharita satsai, Bhupal pachchisi, Durga Bavani and Vinaya-path.

In his Vircharita satsai, he composed duhas in praise of national heroes, such as Maharana Pratap, Durgadas, Shivaji, Guru Govind Singh, Maharaja Ranjit Singh and others. He also edited the great Indian epic, Prithviraj raso, by Chandra Varadai which was published by Sahitya Sansthan, Udaipur, in 1955. He had a good command over the language and possessed a rich vocabulary.

KAVISHEKHAR (Bengali) is a title which was taken by many Vaishnava poets of medieval Bengal. Among them two are very famous. One of them wrote poems under three names, Kavishekhar, Kaviranjana and Vidyapati. In his early life he served the Sultans of the Husain Shahi dynasty of Bengal, who ruled between 1493 and 1538. He mentions the names of Husain Shah, Nusrat Shah and Ghiyasuddin Muhmud Shah in his poems. He was popularly known as chhota (junior) Vidyapati.

The other Kavishekhar also wrote poems under three names, Kavishekhar, Shekhar and Rajashekhar. His real name was Daivakinandan Sinha. He was the son of Chaturbhuj and Hirabati. He wrote many books, viz., Gopaler kirtana-amrita, Gopinathavijaya nataka, Gopala vijaya kavya and Dandatmika padavali of which only the last two have survived. This Kavishekhar was a great poet. He wrote in both Brajabuli and Bengali. His Brajabuli poems are better than those he wrote in Bengali. Some of them have been wrongly ascribed to Vidyapati, the Maithili poet.

It is a curious coincidence that both the Kavishekhar were the disciples of Raghunandan of Shrikhandia. The second belonged to a later date than the first. This is proved by his use of Portuguese words.

KAVITA KE NAYE PRATIMAN (Hindi), first published in 1968, is a significant work in modern literary criticism by Namvar Singh. The work was chosen for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1971. Namvar Singh is, perhaps, the most controversial critic today, but he is always distinct or notable for his sharp perceptions and judgement. He is one of the few critics who have closely and critically analysed Hindi poetry and poetic criticism of the last two decades. In the first part of this book, Namvar Singh raises questions relating to the concrete understanding of poetry and its aesthetics. He agrees with Vijaydev Narayan Sahi, who feels that to appreciate and to judge new poetry, one does not need standards of new poetry, but new standards of poetry. Criticism here is a common pursuit for Namvar Singh who has transformed academic discussion into a relevant, sharp, creative dialogue.

Namvar Singh accepts that Muktibodh is the central figure in Kavita ke naye pratiman. He rejects the approach of emotional aestheticism (rasavad) to literary criticism and also the prejudices of the Hindi romantics. The second part of the book is more or less a practical criticism in which Namvar Singh concerns himself with the most genuine issues of poetic texture and structure as the poetic language, imagery, irony, tension, obscurity, authenticity or honesty. Namvar Singh has used the standards of new criticism or pure formalism at length. He strongly feels that 'vulgar sociology' is no alternative to formalist criticism. Namvar Singh's interpretation of the essentials of contemporary Hindi poetry is revealing and exciting. In the end, he has critically discussed the content, form and structure of Andhere mein, an important long poem by Muktibodh. This essay is a noteworthy example of Namvar Singh's critical sensibility and sharp judgement. His interpretation of Muktibodh's vision and fantasy is convincing and thoughtful. Kavita ke naye pratiman is a major work in criticism in the sense that it explores the possibilities of contemporary poetry and poetics.

KAVITTA (Hindi). Though the word 'kavitta' is used for any verse of any metre, yet in prosody it is used for the following four metres: 'manasharana' (manahana), 'jalaharana', 'rupaghanaksari' and 'devaghanaksari', — the varieties of muktaka chhandas, i.e., the metres though with fixed letters in each foot, yet usually almost free from a fixed set of 'guru' (long) and 'laghu' (short) vowels.

Manaharana (manahara) kavitta, consisting of four feet, has 31 letters in each foot with pauses usually at every 8th, 16th, 24th and 31st letters. Though no rule is fixed for any order of long and short vowels in all the four feet, yet the last letter should be long in each foot.

Jalaharana kavitta has 4 feet, 32 letters in each foot with pauses usually at 8th, 16th, 25th and 32nd letters, the last two letters should be short, and in case the last letter is long, it is recited as short.

Rupaghanaksari has 4 feet, 32 letters in each foot with a pause usually at 3rd, 6th, 9th and 16th letters (total 16 letters), and then at 25th and 32nd letters (total 16 letters). The last letter in each foot should be short.

Devaghanaksari has 4 feet, 33 letters in each foot with a pause usually at 8th, 24th and 25th letters. The last three letters should be short.

KAVITVA TATVA VICHARAMU (Telugu) is a critique on poetry by C.R. Reddy, a renowned man of letters and an eminent critic. We know from the writer's foreword to the work that it was written around 1907. This contains a detailed discussion on the poetic qualities of ancient Telugu 'prabandhas' concentrating on Kalapurnodaya and Prabhavati Pradyumana of Pingali Surana. This was brought out during the period when Telugu mind was coming under the western influence in making a comparative assessment or analysis of literary works.

This critical work is divided into three Chapters. The first deals with the good and the bad in ancient poetry, imagination, peculiarity of rhetoric, the balance of the various components, the speciality of choosing the subject and other things. The second deals with the characteristics of a prabandha with Vasu charitra as example, the story and other things. The third deals with the complex plot of Kalapurnodaya and the wonderful texture of the work, the poetic genius of Pingali Surana together with the drawback of the poet, namely, the excessive criticism in his works under study as against the background of the epic work by such poets as Nannaya.

Writing a foreword to this work, Malladi Suryanarayana Sastry says, "It is an ideal critique which brings out the good and bad of a work, the second best, highlights only the good, but it is meant to point out only the bad, and worst of all is to twist good to bad or vice versa." He further says that the level of the criticism of a work depends on the psychology of the critic. He points out that Reddy belongs to the best category of critics not only because his critique falls into a category that follows the novel and unbiased type of criticism.

Reddy described Pingali Surana as a poetic gymnast of a rare and complex excellence. Perhaps from those Himalayan heights the poetic trinity, Nannaya, Tikkana and Errapragada, struck him as mere translators, not as original and creative writers. If only Reddy took into consideration the aim of their poetic efforts, or appreciated the genius as brought out in their original composition, he would not have made such a sweeping statement. Reddy found a different and sober Pingali Surana in Prabhavati Pradyumana who concentrated on storytelling, discarding the rhetorical flourishes and poetic gymnastics of the Kalapurnodaya. But the critic was not as sympathetic or understanding when he commented that Palnati Veeracharitra might not have been written by Srinatha as it was of an inferior quality.

One must accept what he considered to be unwarranted in the use of rhetoric by the prabandha poets and what went against the grain of the kavya itself.

In the 53rd page of the book, Reddy was once again biased. Speaking of Pingali Surana as the one who wrote during the prabandha days, he said Surana barely avoided falling into the literary quagmire of prabandhas and thus imputed meanness to prabandhas. From this we can understand that Reddy was misled by such blind imitations of prabandhas as merely imitated the flashy tinsel flourish of the prabandhas without going into the spirit of the original compositions.

Regarding the subject of a composition, pure imaginary stories are considered artificial gems, original composition a raw diamond, but a good story thrown into the imaginative crucible of a poet emerges as a finished and cut diamond. Ramaraja Bhushana wanted to belong to the third and the best category in the Vasu charitra. But Reddy must have felt that if he admitted Vasu charitra into that category, he would be doing injustice to Surana. So he wrote in page 53 that it was Surana's greatness to have escaped the fall into the prabandha style. If only

KAVIYA HINGALAJADANA-KAVIYA KARANIDANA

Reddy had borne in mind the fact that historical compositions are predominantly didactic and pleasure is secondary with them, while with the prabandha the reverse is true, he could have avoided his hasty and unfair comments on the Mahabharata and other works merely to cry up Kalapurnodaya.

But he criticised the artificial 'Srirama stotram' (Praise of Srirama) by Manikandhara in the 2nd Canto to Kalapurnodaya, and commented that stanza number 172 in the 6th Canto of the same work stood as an example of verbal jugglery and senseless scholarship. He further spoke of Kalavathi's lack of love for her father, and Pradyumna's similarity to prabandha's heroes and other such things which were extremely improper and did not redound to the glory of the poet.

In an attempt to look down on the erotic effusion in prabandhas, he said in page 84 that our prabandha poets would strip a woman naked to bring out her beauty when the western writer would sing of her virtues. Yet this is a biased, hasty and unfair comment.

Nevertheless, it has to be accepted that Reddy has done a great service to the Telugu literature in making a critical study of its poetry and poets, starting with Nannaya and coming upto Surana, balancing them against western literary standards and values. It is an undisputed fact that he was deeply impressed by the English language and standards and wanted to import all the good traditions from English. This is clearly seen in his work Kavitva tatva vicharamu.

KAVIYA HINGALAJADANA (Rajasthani; b. 1861 d. 1948) was born at Sevapura village in Jaipur State in a Kaviya family of the Charana clan. It is said that his father Jayarama gave him a Sarasvati mantra when he was only five years old which helped him in sharpening his memory.

Hingalajadana composed a number of poetic works out of which a few are available. Being inspired by Indra Kunvar Bai, he composed a long poem, Mehai mahima in 1931 in praise of goddess Mehai. It has gained its own place in various poetic forms of Rajasthani literature. Mrigaya mrigendra is his other poetic work in which he narrates the hunting scene of a lion by Thakur Shersimha of Kuchamana (Marwad). Besides this, several works like Pratyaya payodhara or Pratyaya sargasara, Chhanda divakara, Lalgraha shataka, Mataji ra kavitta, Durga bahattari and hundreds of poems like kavitta, chhanda, chappaya, duha (doha), soratha and dingala gita (songs) are available. He was a disciple of Suryamall Misana and followed in his footsteps. Suryamall Misana was a great Rajasthani poet of the 19th century who composed a number of heroic songs though no war or battle was fought during his life time. He composed such poems only to preserve the heroic traditions of the Rajput warriors.

Being a staunch devotee of goddess Karanimata, he composed a number of songs in her praise. His poem, 'Ai amba jayati jagadamba Bhagavati', composed in shikharani metre and Durga bahattari have been highly appreciated by scholars.

Hingala jadana and his wife did not get kind treatment from their sons. Being enraged at their misdemeanour he wrote 'Visahara' songs (reviling dingalagita) under the title 'Gita kaputa ro' (A song of an unworthy son).

The language of his poems is quite lucid.

KAVIYA KARANIDANA (Rajasthani; b. 1693, d. 1783) was an eminent scholar, a good poet, an ingenious politician, a brave hero and a loyal servant of his patron, Abhayasimha of Jodhpur. According to the Bahibhats of the Charan clan, he was born in a Dongari village of Amer State (Jaipur) which had been granted in jagir to one of his ancestors, Kaviya Dungarsi by Mirza Raja Maansimha. Kaviraj Syamaldas in his Vir vindoa has mentioned Sulavada village of Mewar as his birth place whereas according to Colonal Todd he was born in or near Kannaui (Uttar Pradesh).

His father, Vijayarama, was also a good poet and a man of repute. Karanidana was a born genius. He started composing poems when he was quite young. After getting blessings from a saint, he left his village and reached Amer where he learnt Sanskrit and Prakrit.

He visited Shahapur, Udayapur and Jodhapur, and attracted their rulers with his genius. Ummaidsimha, the Raja of Shahapur honoured him with 'Lakha pasava' (one hundred thousand rupees). Maharaja Sangramsimha of Mewar was so much pleased with his 'dingalagitas' that he framed them and worshipped them, and bestowed on him a grant of 'Lakha pasava'. He spent a great part of his life in Jodhapur under the patronage of Maharaja Abhayasimha. The Maharaja liked him a great deal for his political foresight and valour and honoured him with a grant of a jagir of Alavasa village.

He took active part in the battles fought by Maharaja Abhayasimha. After taking part in the battles of Ahmedabad he composed Surajprakash in 1730 and Vidad shinagar in 1731. The latter is said to be the abridged version of Surajprakash in 'paddhari' metre, having 135 verses. In Surajprakash, he gives us a detailed history of the rulers of Marwad right from the beginning and upto Jaichandra, and thereafter a brief account of each of the various rulers of Marwad from Siha to the birth of Abhayasimha. His account of Abhayasimha's reign, and particularly of his fight with and his victory over Sarbuland Khan, the dismissed Governor of Gujarat, is very detailed. The work ends with the defeat and retreat of Sarbuland Khan from Gujarat. The subject of Vidad shinagar also tallies with Surajprakash. Maharaja was so pleased to hear this poem that he declared Karanidana an unsolicited court poet, donated him the village Alavasa in jagir, and also an elephant. He also composed Jatirasa, Abhaya bhushan and a number of dingalagitas.

After the death of Maharaja Abhayasimha Maharaja, Bakhatsimha ascended the throne. As he was not happy with Karanidana from the very beginning he confiscated his jagir village. Karanidana went to Kishangarh and lived there for the rest of his life. Maharaja Bahadursimha of Kishangarh also honoured him with a jagir of a village Kaibaniya.

He had full command over the Rajasthani language and also had good knowledge of Arabic and Persian, besides a few Indian languages. His main aim behind the composition of poetic works in Rajasthani was only to serve and develop his mother tongue. He composed poems in other Indian languages also. He had a vast knowledge of various subjects like science of rhetorics, rasa, poetics, history, music, medical science, astronomy, and astrology.

KAVIYA, RAMANATH (Rajasthani; b. 1801, d.1879) was born in a Kaviya family of the Charana class in Chokha-ka-basa village. He was the second son of Jnanji, a man of heroic qualities. Ramanath left his home in search of his brother, Shivrath, who had fled his home leaving his mother in profound grief. Ramanath located his brother in the court of Maharaja Balvantsimha of Tijara (Alwar). The Maharaja was attracted by his court etiquette and scholastic virtues and made him his court poet. He also awarded Ramanath 'lakhapasava' (a hundred thousand rupees) and an elephant, and then permitted him to take his brother home.

Maharaja Vinayasimha, who ascended the throne after getting Balvantsimha murdered, confiscated the jagir village belonging to Ramanath, who thereupon staged a 'dharna' (satyagraha) along with 101 Charana poets in Alwar, threatening that all these poets would drive daggers into their naked breasts one by one and die. All the well-wishers of the Maharaja among whom were Thakur Hanumanthsimha of Thana, his elder brother, Rani Rupmati, his wife and Ammujan, his minister tried their best to persuade the Maharaja to restore the jagir village to Ramanath but the Maharaja did not give in. It is said that Ramanath then composed a 'chadai' poem in praise of goddess Ambika and recited it along with his fellow Charana poets, worshipping and invoking intervention of the goddess, and as a result the palace began to quake. The Maharaja, fearing the wrath of the goddess, accepted the request of Ramanath and awarded him another village, Satavat, instead of Shihali.

Ramanath was a man of character. He was skilful, brave, and foresighted in misfortune which befell him after the death of the young Maharaja. He was a staunch devotee of goddess Karanimata, the family deity of his clan. He started composing stray poems at the age of 15 in 1823. His effective poems are those which he composed during his imprisonment.

In one of his long poems, Draupadi ke sorathe (The soratha couplets of Draupadi), Ramanath has expressed his deep feelings. It is a prayer to Krishna. It is also known as Draupadi vinaya or Karuna bahottari, containing 72 couplets in all. It was edited and published by Kanahaiyalal Sahal in 1953. He also composed Virvar Pabuji Rathora soratha (The Soratha couplets of a great hero Pabuji Rathor), the legendary folk-god of Rajasthan. Certain stray 'dingalagita' (songs) and verses in praise of his patrons, eminent poets, and a few reviling poems for those who betrayed or tortured him are also available. He wrote a few 'marsiyas' and 'elegies' also. The elegy composed on the death of Suryamall Misana is a deeply touching poem.

KAVIYO ALLUJI (Rajasthani; b.1463 d.1563). Out of nearly fifteen Charan poets of eminence, who were held in high esteem for their devotion to God, Alluji stands apart. He was the only son of his father, Hemaraja, resident of the village Sinala. Rupasimha, son of Prithviraja, the Chief of Amber, donated a village named Jasarana (district Nagaur) to the poet. In this very village Alluji died in the year 1563. A memorial to him was raised on the spot where he died which is known as 'Alluji Bapaji ri samadhi'. Tradition has it that he attained the age of full 100 years, which suggests that he was born in or about the year 1463. Nabhadas, in his Bhaktamala, Kaviraj Bhairavada of Bikaner in his Charanotpatti mimamsa martand, Ramadas Maharaja in his Bhaktamala, Asiyachrana Bakhatram and many others have highly praised Alluji for his devotion to God. An unknown medieval poet, while describing the mastery over metres by seven poets of eminence, has mentioned Alluji as having mastery over hexametre (chappaya kavitta). The tradition also invests him with mastery over this metre. These hexametres form the main base of his popularity. 85 of the chappayas (six line metres) have been traced out so far from various sources, along with about four 'dingalagitas' (songs). A thorough search of his works is urgently needed for a critical edition and eventual publication. His writings may be broadly divided into two major sections: the first section, pertaining to his devotion to Vishnu, includes 'Ashtanga yoga' (8 components of yoga), 'Yoga sadhana' (practice of yoga), 'Nirguna Brahma' (the supreme soul devoid of all attributes), 'Bhagavan-nama' (the name of God), eulogies of the glorious deeds of Rama, Krishna and Jambhoji, the innovator and first preceptor of the Vishnoi sect, along with other miscellaneous devotional songs. A gita (song) composed by him in praise of Handi Bhadanganath is also very popular. The second section consists of historical and heroic gitas and kavittas commemorating events and persons, the latter being fewer in number than the former. Persons who had the honour of figuring in his works included Hida Surajmal and Rava Maladeva of Jodhpur. An elegy in memoriam was also composed by him on the death of Maladeva. He lays great stress on the importance of remembering God. According to him the value of all renunciation, righteousness, yoga with its eight components, love, devotion, knowledge received from the preceptor, and enlightenment of one's mind, lies in the remembrance of God's name which is the only means of setting the soul free. Just as the peacocks and frogs feel immense pleasure when the dark clouds of 'Savan' and 'Bhadon' shower rains, so do the people experience the joy by remembering God's name. The simplicity of his language, the sincerity of his feelings, the guileless and ineffable devotion to God and the easy communicability of his kavittas have put Alluji on a lofty pedestal in the hearts of the masses.

KAVYA (Sanskrit). From the standpoint of the authors of Sanskrit poetics, verbal compositions (vanmaya) are classified under two broad heads. viz., 'shastra' and 'kavya' (science and poetry), the former including within its fold everything that is not looked upon as poetry proper by true connoisseurs. Thus, philosophy, logic history, politics, chronological accounts etc., are all comprised within shastras. Shastras have their origin in 'prajna' or scientific intuition, whereas kavyas are the outcome of 'pratibha', or imaginative and artistic intuition. This has also been powerfully asserted by Bhatta Tauta, the teacher of the great Abhinavagupta.

The origin of kavya in imaginative intuition has been stressed by almost all 'alankarikas' of note, like Bhamaha, Dandin, Yamana, Anandavardhana and their followers, though 'vyutpatti' and 'abhyasa', too, are recognised auxiliary causal factors of poetic art. Panditaraja Jagannatha is the most uncompromising of all literary critics regarding the role of pratibha as the sole proximate cause of poetry. Thus, kavya is the work of a poet (kavi-karma kavyamahuh), who has the power to create new ideas, new characters, new situations and can express them through the verbal medium that deviates from the day-to-day expressions of laymen that have no charm. Thus, 'darshana' (intuition) and 'varnana' (expression) are the two essential ingredients of poetry.

Though shastra and kavya thus differ in their origin and aim, the former aiming at intuition of ultimate truths in particular fields (agamastattva darshinah-Bhamaha) and the latter aiming principally at the realisation of beauty and aesthetic emotions, still they can combine and reinforce each other's appeal and effectiveness. For example, shastras can become charming if they incorporate the principles of expression applicable to poetry proper to the desirable extent. So also kavyas can be enriched by the judicious utilisation and embodiment of the truths and ideas propagated in the various philosophical and scientific disciplines. The proportion which has to be observed in respect of bringing about this happy fusion of shastra and kavya in their respective spheres, can be determined by the innate genius of the poet and philosopher or scientist as the case may be. Transgression of this optimum proportion can only render a scientific or philosophical treatise bereft of its rigour, seriousness and precision, whereas a poetic composition would become dry and ponderous and burdened with difficult and abstruse concepts if the shastric element gains the upper hand.

There are divergent views regarding the definition of kavya held by ancient Indian literary critics. But there is no difference of opinion on the issue that 'shabda' and 'artha', words and meanings, or form and content in their widest connotations, constitute the body of poetry. As Anandavardhana says: "Shabdārtha-sharīram tavat kavyam." But the theorists differ as to their respective priority. Some, like Bhamaha, consider both of them as equally important (Shabdārtahau sahītau kavyam). Others again look upon the meaning or content as of greater importance in comparison to the form of poetry, as is evident from the well-known saying: 'Bharaverarthagauravam'. Some, on the other hand, like Dandin and Jagannatha, lay greater emphasis on the verbal or formal aspect (shabda) as distinct from the inner content or meaning (artha) of poetry. As Panditaraja has formulated: 'ramaniyarthapratipadakah shabdah kavyam' (poetry is a linguistic composition which brings a charming idea into expression). But how do shabda and artha in poetic art differ from their counterparts as employed in other fields? On this also there is no unanimity among the theorists. Some regard 'rasa', or the emotional element that lends charm to poetic expression, and the meaning conveyed thereby as the only constituent of poetry. Others again declare such elements as 'guna', 'alankara' and absence of defects (dosha) as the constituents that make for the excellence of poetry. 'Riti' or diction like Vaidarbhi, Gaudi, Panchali, etc., based upon 'shabdagunas' and 'artha-gunas' are regarded by some as the very quintessence of poetry. Similarly 'dhvani' or suggestion according to Anandavardhana is looked upon as the very soul of poetic art without which shabda and artha, however embellished with other elements, cannot be lifted to the status of true poetry. Kuntaka, again, regards 'vakrokti' (obliqueness or uncommon turn of expression) as the distinctive mark of poetry. Thus, various systems or schools came into existence reflecting their distinctive views on the nature of poetry. Of these the rasa school of Bharata, the guna-cum-riti school of Dandin and Vamana, alankara school of Bhamaha, dhvani school of Anandavardhana and Abhinavagupta, Vakrotki school of Kuntaka deserve special mention, and Sanskrit literary criticism has been immeasurably enriched by their valuable and subtle contributions and findings from their survey of poetic art from different viewpoints and according to varying tastes and philosophical and artistic affiliations. Later treatises like Mammata's Kavyaprakasha and Vishvanatha's Sahityadarpana tried to bring about a synthesis and order out of these rival theories of poetry though they are mostly unanimous in proclaiming the supermacy of Dhavanikara (i.e. Anandavardhana) among all the literary critics, as having laid down for good the norms to be scrupulously followed by the succeeding generations of poets and critics.

Kavyas can be classified from diverse viewpoints. First of all, they can be classified according to the form in which they are expressed, viz., 'gadya' (prose), and 'padya' (verse) as also a combination of these two (mishra). Secondly, language can also form the basis of classification according as they are composed in Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha or Deshabhasha. Thirdly, they can also be brought under two broad divisions, viz., 'drishya' and 'shravya', according as they are meant for representation (abhineya) on the stage or for mere recital appealing only to the ear (shravya). The former have again been subdivided into two groups, viz., 'rupaka' with its ten species like 'nataka', 'prakarana', etc. and 'uparupaka', eighteen in number beginning with 'natika'. The shravya-kavyas comprise 'mahakavya', 'sargabandha', 'katha', 'akhyayika', 'champu', etc. All these again can be brought under two categories, viz., 'anibddha' or detached poems like 'muktaka', 'gatha', etc., and 'nibaddha', compositions of some length like 'khandakavya', 'mahakavya', etc. Vamana in his Kavyalankarasutravritti accords to 'dasha rupaka' the highest place among all forms of poetic art and looks upon 'katha', 'akhyayika', etc. as but variations and adaptations in much simpler form of dasha rupaka as their prototype, since without representation of some sort, be it physical or mental, the message of a poetic art cannot be truly grasped by the readers. It is for this reason that dramatic art has a universal appeal, which other forms of poetry do not have. At the same time it is the most difficult and complicated of the various art-forms comprising as it does within its scope histrionics, music, dance, recitation, employment of different dialects according to variations of characters, etc., that are conspicuous by their absence in other forms.

As in Greece, so also in India there have been vigorous onslaughts against the nature and function of poetry. There have been enemies of poetry who have tried to decry it on grounds that are strikingly similar to the charges levelled against poetry by Plato in his Dialogues and Republic. Poetry, according to them, is obscene and immoral (asabhya), it is false (asatya), and as such it should be banned. Rajashekhara in his Kavyamimamsa (Chap. VI) records some of the strictures against poetry and finally dismisses them as being based on a total misconception as to the nature and aim of poetic art. But truth and falsehood, morality and immorality in poetry must be judged by standards different from those that are found to be employed in other disciplines or in our day-to-day pragmatic activities.

In India, poetic art was looked upon as but just another way of attaining the realisation of the ultimate truth, and kavya-yoga was as valid a path leading to that ultimate goal as jnana-yoga, karma-yoga and bhakti-yoga as also vag-yoga of the grammarians like Bhartrihari. This has been unambiguously proclaimed in a verse attributed Abhinavagupta to Bhattanayaka, the author of the lost Hridayadarpana.

Vagdhenur dugdha etam hi rasam yad hala-trishnaya tena nasya samah sa svad duhyate yogibhir hi yah

Similarly Vishvanatha, too, declares: 'punyavantah praminvanti yogivad rasa-santatim' (Sahityadarpana).

KAVYADARSHA (Sanskrit) Next to Bhamaha's Kavyalamkara, Dandin's Kavyadarsha is the most ancient and authoritative available work on poetics in Sanskrit. The earliest commentator, Ratnashri from Sri Lanka, calls it Kavyalakshana, while Abhinavagupta refers to it as Kavyalamkara. Bhamaha and Dandin seem to be following two different schools—the eastern and the South Indian and they differ in their views on several points. Both of them refer to two schools of poets, the Vaidarbha (of Maharashtra, which became popular in the South) and the Gauda (of Bengal, popular in the East); the former preferred sweetness while the latter strength.

Kavyadarsha is a treatise written in 'anushtubh' verses and divided in three Chapters dealing chiefly with: 1. diction, 2. figures of speech based on sense and 3. figures of speech based on words, and poetic blemishes.

Dandin rejected the threefold division of 'gunas' advocated by Bhamaha and accepted all the ten given by Bharata. In the best style, the Vaidarbha marga or riti (poetic diction), all the ten gunas are well balanced: 1. 'shlesha' (well-knittedness helping in the general flow of the verse), 2. 'prasada' (lucidity and clarity), 3. 'samata' (evenness or homogeneity of structure), 4. 'madhurya' (elegance or sweetness which avoids coarseness or ruggedness), 5. 'sukumarata' (avoidance of harsh sounds), 6. 'arthavyakti' (lucidity and self-sufficiency in meaning or explicitness of sense), 7. 'udaratva' (exaltation in content), 8. 'ojas' (force or strength through the use of long compounds), 9. 'kanti' (grace and politeness) and 10. 'samadhi' (metaphoric and figurative expression).

Dandin is critical of the Gauda style and calls it the reverse of the Vaidarbha. The Gaudas cultivate ojas or strength in verse as well as in prose and prefer long compounds, brilliance and exaggeration.

Regarding the literary forms Dandin gives a detailed definition of the epic ('sargabandha' or 'mahakavya') listing eighteen topics for detailed description, viz., cities, oceans, mountains, seasons (spring, summer, rains, autumn, winter, etc.), the moon-rise, the sun-rise, sports or play in the garden or in water, drinking, lovemaking, frustration, wedding, the rise of a prince, political debate, embassy, expedition, war and the victory of the hero. The list is only illustrative, not compulsory. The epic should be divided into Cantos neither too long nor too short. The story must be properly developed for giving scope for the aesthetic experience. The metres should be pleasing and changed from Canto to Canto; the concluding verses of each Canto must be in different metres. The mahakavya may begin with a benediction, a prayer or the story proper directly. The drama is just mentioned but not discussed in detail. Pure literature is divided into poetry, prose and 'champu' containing verse and prose. From the point of view of the language, literature can be divided into Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha. Minor poems consist of 'muktakas' (stray, independent verses), 'kulakas' (groups of up to five verses), 'kosha' (single verses by different authors) and 'sanghata' (similar verses by the same author). Prose works are generally divided into 'akhyayika' and 'katha'. Dandin refers to this division (prominently given by Bhamaha) and says that there is no validity for distinguishing between the two, since they can be considered to be of the same class only with different names.

Both Dandin and Bhamaha start with the notion of embellishment of word and sense. Though he stresses the gunas Dandin is also sympathetic towards the Alamkara School. He defines 'alamkara' as that which lends beauty to poetry; this would include even gunas or poetic excellences of diction. The normal poetic figures of speech are dealt with under two headings: those pertaining to 'shabda' (sound) and those pertaining to 'artha' (sense). He deals with thirty-five figures of sense (arthalamkaras), many of them with subdivisions.

Following Bharata, Dandin mentions ten doshas or blemishes of literary composition but he defines them differently. He regards them as positive defects and not simply as absence of excellence.

Dandin defines the body of poetry as a series of words characterized by an agreeable sense. Among the causes of poetry he includes poetic genius (pratibha), learning and practice.

Regarding aesthetic experience Dandin holds the view that the 'sthayibhavas' like love and grief when developed in an intensive form become the corresponding 'rasa' such as 'shringara' and 'karuna' respectively. This is similar to Bhatta Lollata's view.

KAVYAHETU (Sanskrit). Most of the authorities on Sanskrit poetics lay down that three factors, viz., talent (pratibha or shakti), culture or learning (shruta or vyutpatti) and exercise or practice (abhyasa or abhiyoga) are essential to the creation of poetry (naisargiki cha pratibha shrutam cha bahu nirmalam/amandashchabhiyogo' syah karanam kavyasampadah—Kavyadarsha of Dandin, I. 103; vide also: Rudrata, I. 14; Vagabhata, I.3, etc). Vamana and Mammata mention observation of nature and study of the life and conduct of the people (lokavritta) as auxiliary to learning (shaktirnipunata lokashastrakavyadyavekshanat lokasya sthavrajangamatmakalokavrittasya — Kavyaprakasha of Mammata, I.3).

It is to be noted here that when Dandin puts equal emphasis on the three causes of poetry (kavyahetus) as stated above, his contemporary, Bhamaha, accepts talent at the main cause and learning and practice as supplementaries (kavyam tu jayate jatu kasyachit pratibhavatah... shabdabhidhaye vijnaya kritva tadvidupasanam/vilokyanya-nibandhamshcha karyah kavyakriyadarah — Kavyalamkara, I.5,10). Vamana seems to have supported, in this respect, the view of Bhamaha, when he says that talent (pratibha) is the seed (bija) of poetry without which poetry cannot be accomplished (Kavitabijam pratibhanam, yasmad vina kavyam na nishpadyate—Kavyalamkarasutravritti, I.3,16).

Some other writers, e.g., Vagbhata, Rajashekhara and Panditaraja Jagannatha, differ from the above view and hold that talent alone is the cause of good poetry whereas learning and exercise only help to refine the talent (sa kevalam kavyahetuh iti yayavariyah—Kavyamimamsa of Rajashekhara; karanam kavigata kevala pratibha—Rasagangadhara of Panditaraja Jagannatha).

Authorities on poetics dwell at length on pratibha. Their definitions and analyses may be summed up in the following manner: Pratibha is the natural or inborn power whereby the poet sees the subjects of his poem as steeped in beauty and gives his readers in apt language a vivid picture of the beauty he has seen. Abhinavagupta describes pratibha as 'a kind of insight that enables a writer to create unique objects' and adds that 'shakti is pratibha (genius) which enables one to present the theme (of a poetic composition) in a novel way' (pratibha apurvavastuni-manakshama prajna, shaktih pratibhanam varna-niyavastuvishayanutanollekhanashalitvam — Abhinavagupta in Lochana on Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka). Pratibha can also be defined as a mental faculty which presents fresh flashes of ideas (prajna navanavon-meshashalini pratibha mata).

To explain learning or culture (vyutpatti), the authorities have presented long lists of science and arts a poet is required to know. They include for example, the Vedas, grammar, prosody, lexicography, itihasa (the Ramayana and the Mahabharata), erotics, polity, logic, etc. (vide Kavyamimamsa of Rajashekhara, II and Kavyalamkarasutravritti of Vamana, I.3). Abhyasa is defined as continuous exercise under the guidance of some senior poets and critics (kavyam kartum vicharayitum cha ye jananti tadupadeshena karane yojane cha paunahpunyena pravrittih—Kavyaprakasha of Mammata, I.3 vritti).

KAVYALAMKARASAMGRAHA (Sanskrit) or Kavyalankarasamgraha, composed during the years 779-823, is a work on Sanskrit poetics by Udbhata.

It is a compendium of 'alamkaras' (figures of speech) and brevity is its foremost aim. Udbhata's idea of alamkara was so comprehensive that it could include suggested ideas (pratiyanamanavastu) under figures, like euphemism (paryayokta) and personification (samasokti), suggested figures like the simile (upama) in figures based on comparison like metaphor (rupaka), parallelism (drishtanata), etc., and 'rasa-bhavas' under 'rasavat', 'preyasvat', and their variations like semblances (abhasa), rise (udaya), commingling (shabalata) and abatement (prashama) under 'urjasvin' and 'samahita'.

The aesthetic thought of Udbhata was all of a piece, and its accent was on alamkara as the essence of poetry. Though he was well aware of suggested thoughts, figures and feeling-tones involved in poetry, he took up the position that they all contributed in their own way to the over-all beauty (alamkara) of sound (shabda) and sense (artha). Qualities (gunas), again, served the same purpose by enhancing the beauty of the diction (sanghatana) palpably by the judicious use of compounds (samahasas.) Hence, if Udbhata is hailed as the doyen of old poetics, it is because he recognises the only aesthetic norm of alamkara or beauty as underlying all other factors, like 'guna', 'rasa', 'riti' and 'dhvani' which revolve around the axis of sound and sense. So understood, his Kavyalamkarasamgraha becomes, so to say, the peak of Indian aesthetic thought which developed for ten centuries from Bharata's Natyashastra onwards and at the same time, divested of extra-poetic considerations, like grammar, logic, semantics and histrionics.

Udbhata's idea of paronomasia (shlesha) as a basic aesthetic principle underlying several figurative turns is as novel as it is refreshingly original.

The first clear statement of nine rasa or poetic sentiments including tranquility (shanta) is to be found only in this work.

Similarly recognition of 'punaruktavadabhasa' or seeming reiteration as an alamkara is Udbhata's own finding.

Further, Udbhata is the first to indicate the unique beauty involved in mixed indistinguishable alamkaras (i.e., sankara distinct from samśrishti or distinguishable ones.) For the first time, he classifies them under four heads leading to doubt, permeating the whole sentence, permeating a part of the sentence and involving the relation of the governor and the governed.

In a word, the Kavyalamkarasamgraha gives a new aesthetic dimension to the seemingly mechanical scheme of figures of speech by openly recognising the role of suggestion (avagamana) in quite a few of them, and propounding the concept of 'kavya vrittis' or alliterative collocations like the sweet (upanagarika), the flowery (nagarika) and the simple (gramya). He also highlighted for the first time that beauty contributed to figures by suggested shades of other figures.

KAVYANAYIKA (Oriya) is the first major collection of poems by the celebrated Oriya poet, Radhamohan Gadanayaka (b.1911). By 1945, the year in which it was published, Gadanayaka had already been writing poetry for about a decade. Kavyanayika (The muse of poetry) contains 62 poems written between 1935 and 1945. Its publication was preceded by that of Kalidasa (1940), a poetic drama on the life of the great Sanskrit poet Kalidasa. Kavyanayika is divided into three sections: 'jaitri' (The song of victory), 'praktani' (The ancient song) and 'arghya' (Offering), the first two containing 50 and 11 poems respectively. The third section has one long poem made up of several short pieces.

Gadanayaka's poetry is essentially lyrical and Kavyanayika is the earliest and by far the most successful expression of his lyricism. The poems contained in the first and third sections of the collection are songs, sonnets and odes composed in a wide variety of metres. The very first poem with the line 'Kavi hebapaim basana mora' strikes the key-note of Gadanayaka's romantic imagination. It is a loud proclamation of the essential freedom of that imagination. By the grace of his poetic muse the poet would sing his songs about nature and man. But he is also conscious of the fickleness of his muse. The title of the first section of the collection is very apt in view of the fact that all the poems contained therein celebrate the beauty of nature and of the mind of man, and also their glory. The poems like 'Mati', 'Kaniaraphula', 'Asadha megha', and 'Ghasaphula' describe natural phenomena more in terms of their inward beauty than outward. As the poet says in 'Apathagami', his aim is to find all that lies hidden in the heart of things. What he discovers is a kind of moral beauty pervading the whole universe. Tolerance, self-sacrifice and love are some of the values which he finds nature to symbolise. These, the poet would say, are what make a plant or a flower or a moonlit night beautiful. His poems about men, 'Kavisurya', 'Jayadeva', 'Pallikavi', etc. similarly constitute a paean to the beauty and dignity of the human mind. 'Sajana sajanigo' is a celebration of instinctive life, of its energy and vitality and, of course, beauty. Another important poem is 'Matira manisa' which is a fervent plea for the rejection of machine civilisation that destroys all human values.

The poems contained in the second section of Kavyanayika deal with certain mythological characters like Radha, Lalita, Bibhishana, Ahaya, Pingala, etc. Most are in the form of monologues. The dramatic rendering of moods, attitudes and feelings is highly effective. Thirty-two songs make up the long poem that constitutes the third section. These are an attempt at exploring the mystery of God and his creation, closely resembling Tagore's Gitanjali in respect of their lyrical fervour and mysticism. All questions about the ironies and paradoxes of life raised in the course of the poem are resolved when the poet surrenders himself to God.

Kavyanayika contained some of Gadanayaka's best and most representative works in the lyrical vein. They bear ample testimony to his masterly use of lines of varied length and intricate stanza patterns, to the simplicity and spontaneity of his expression and above all to his fine sense of music. Few Oriya poets have used the classical metres as competently and artistically as Gadanayaka.

KAVYANUSHASANA (Sanskrit). There are two works in Sanskrit poetics of the same name. One is written by the versatile and celebrated Jaina acharya Hemachandra Suri (1088-1173) and the other by Vagbhata II, also a Jaina and son of Nemikumara. If this Nemikumara is the same as is referred to in the colophon of a manuscript of Hemachandra's Trishashti-shalaka-purasha-charitra, who appears to have flourished in 1239, Vagbhata II can safely be placed in the later half of the 13th century. This is further supported by the fact that he does not quote from any author who can be placed later than the 12th century. Vagbhata refers to the Rishabhadevacharita, an epic and the Chhandonushasana, a work on metrics, as his works, but neither seems to have survived the onslaught of time.

Both the works are written in sutra style accompanied by commentaries by their respective authors. But compared to the work by Hemachandra, that by Vagbhata is a work smaller in size and narrower in scope and range. The Kavyanushasana of Vagbhata is divided into five Chapters. In the first Chapter he deals with the definition of 'kavya' and its division into 'gadya', 'padya' and 'mishra'. He also brings out the difference between 'mahakavya', 'katha', 'champu' and 'mishra-kavya' including ten 'rupakas'. The second Chapter deals with the 'doshas' (blemishes) relating to 'pada' (word), 'vakya' (sentence) and 'artha' (meaning), and also ten 'gunas' (qualities) as mentioned by Dandin and Vamana. In fact, Vagbhata recognizes only three gunas, viz., 'madhurya', 'ojas' and 'prasada' and three 'ritis' (styles): Gaudiya, Vaidarbhi and Panchali. The third and fourth Chapters deal respectively with sixty-three 'arthalamkaras' and six 'shabdalamkaras'. In the last Chapter he deals with nine rasas and the types of heroes and heroines (nayaka-nayika). He mentions the doshas pertaining to rasa also.

The only difference between the two works is in respect of the number of arthalamkaras recognised by them. Hemachandra recognizes only twenty-nine, whereas Vagbhata recognizes sixty-three of them.

The Kavyanushasana of Hemachandra consists of 208 sutras divided into eight Chapters of which first six containing a total of 143 sutras define the nature of poetry and explore its source, relationship between word and its meaning etc., (Ch.1); rasa, 'rasabhasa' 'bhava' 'bhavabhasa' and classification of poetry (Ch.2); doshas (Ch.3.); gunas: madhurya, ojas and prasada (Ch. 4); shabdalamkaras (Ch.5) and arthalamkaras (Ch.6) and thus almost exhaust the entire field of poetics proper according to Mammata. The remaining sixty-five sutras and two Chapters respectively deal with nayaka-nayika bheda and eight avasthas of nayika, etc., and the classification of poetic compositions.

Hemachandra has written a gloss (vritti) called Alamkarachudamani and a commentary (tika) called Viveka on the vritti. The vritti and the tika together contain 1364 illustrations and quote about 268 authorities. He also cites about fifty authors and from eighty-one works. It is not surprising that his laborious work did not find any commentator to comment upon it. His excessive reliance on outside authorities and sources has produced a work which may be encyclopaedic in its range and a mine of information for the purposes of the history of poetics till his time, but this is achieved by paying too dear a price in terms of originality.

Though differing a little from Mammata in some respects, and particularly with regard to the importance of alamkaras for truly poetic composition, Hemachandra's concept of poetry is practically the same as that of Anandavardhana, Abhinavagupta and Mammata, and there is hardly anything in it which may be termed as his own. It is true that he apparently ascribes the source of poetry exclusively to 'pratibha' but if we remember that according to him pratibha needs to be refined by proficiency (vyutpatti) and study (abhyasa), his concept as to the source of poetry becomes identical with that of Mammata. His definition of poetry differs little from that of Mammata since he also subscribes to the latter's view that a good poem may emerge even without alamkaras. He justifies the reduction of arthalamkaras to twenty-nine from Mammata's sixty-one on the ground that they are based on minor and unimportant distinctions. Besides, he has not only omitted, following Mammata, the arthalamkaras with a touch of rasa and bhava, like 'rasavat', 'preyas', 'urjasvin' and 'samahita' but has also excluded altogether some others from his consideration like 'parikara', 'yathasmkhyā' 'bhavika', 'udatta', 'ashisha' and 'pratyanika'. In his anxiety to reduce the number of arthalamkaras he had defined some of them so widely that they include within their scope other well-known alamkaras as well. 'Tulyayogita' falls under 'dipaka' as defined by Hemachandra, 'paryaya' under 'paravritti', 'prativastupama' and 'drishanta' under 'nidarshana'. This shows that where Hemachandra tried to make a bold departure from the accepted tradition, his ingenuity failed him. This does not mean, however, that Hemachandra's Kavyanushasana is without merit. Its worth as a good text book lies in the model of his writing which is simple and lucid and clear; in the two commentaries written in a graded manner so as to enable a student to gradually master the intricacies of the subject in the convenience it provides by including the dramaturgy within its scope, in the authentic quotations which he collects under relevant topics so as to facilitate the taking of an integral view of its development through various stages. That last merit becomes more significant when it is remembered that many of them relate to authors whose works are now lost to us.

H.J.Z.

KAVYAPRAKASHA (Sanskrit) is one of the important works of poetics in Sanskrit. A Kashmirian named Mammata (11th century) was the author. Some commentators are of the opinion that there was also a coadjutor named Alata (or Alaka or Allata), who probably wrote parts of Chapters VII and X. As the title indicates this work throws light (prakasha) on poetry (kavya) and its various elements. The work is divided into ten chapters (ullasas).

and the contents chapter-wise are as follows. I. Purpose, cause and definition of poetry and sub-divisions of poetry into three types, viz., (i) 'Uttama', i.e. the best, which is also called 'dhvani' i.e. a composition, where a suggested meaning predominates; (ii) 'Madhyama', i.e. mediocre, which is also called 'gunibhutavyangya-kavya' where there is a suggested meaning without predominance and (iii) 'Avara', i.e. inferior, where there is no suggested meaning, and which is endowed only with figures of sound and sense. II. Classification of meaning into three varieties, viz., 'vachya' (primary), 'lakshya' (secondary) and 'vyan-gya' (suggested). These meanings are supposed to be conveyed by three different functions or potentialities of words, viz., 'abhidha', 'lakshana' and 'vyanjana'. There is also a reference to a fourth function called 'tatparyavritti', which is supposed to belong to a whole sentence for conveying the total meaning of the various words constituting the sentence. III. While the primary and secondary senses are conveyed only by words, the suggested sense may be conveyed also by the various types of meanings. The third Chapter discusses the varieties of the suggested sense conveyed by the primary sense. IV. Classification of dhvani and a thorough treatment of 'rasa' (i.e. sentiment on 'aesthetic experience'). Here the author explains what is precisely called rasa, and analyses the process through which the 'aesthetic experience' is realized by the reader of a literary work or a spectator of a drama. V Classification of the gunibhutavyangya-kavya into eight varieties followed by a masterly refutation of those theorists who were opposed to the recognition of the suggested sense as a type of meaning. VI. A brief treatment of the 'avara' or 'chitra' type of kavya, containing either figures of sound or figures of sense. VII. Treatment of 'doshas' or poetic blemishes. VIII. Treatment of 'gunas' or poetic qualities. As against ten qualities of Bharata or Dandin and twenty qualities of Vamana, only three qualities are recognized by the author of the Kavyaprakasha. IX. Treatment of figures of sound, vrittis, (manners), ritis (styles), shlesha (puras) and pictorial arrangement of letters in a verse. X. Treatment of sixty-one 'arthalamkaras' (figures of sense) and their sub-varieties. In fact the Kavyaprakasha contains the treatment of all the topics of a standard Sanskrit work on poetics except dramaturgy.

The Kavyaprakasha does not contain any original theory, but it has been composed for defending the doctrine of dhvani (suggestive poetry), propounded by Anandavardhana in Kashmir in c. A.D. 850, with arguments to dislodge adverse criticisms heaped up against the same in course of the preceding two centuries. For instance, in the fifth chapter of the Kavyaprakasha, concepts of Mimamsa epistemology are duly analysed to show that there should not be any objection to the recognition of vyanjana (suggestive potentiality) as an additional function of words and meanings. To cite a particular case, Mahimabhatta, the author of the Vyakti- viveka, who claims that what is called a suggested sense is only an inferred idea, has been duly refuted by Mammata to establish that suggestion and inference are not identical.

The Kavyaprakasha consists of a number of 'karikas' (couplets), which are also sometimes found in broken form, and hence referred to as 'sutras' (brief aphoristic statements), and a vritti (running prose commentary on the karikas) which includes verses quoted from earlier literature for illustration.

The Kavyaprakasha is a terse book, bearing the stamp of the vast erudition of the author. Writing of a commentary on this work was a prestigious endeavour. Consequently amongst all the technical works in Sanskrit, the Kavyaprakasha has the largest number of commentaries, and the number is more than seven hundred. One of the commentators, Maheshvara, says that commentaries on Kavyaprakasha have been composed in every house, yet it remained as difficult as before. (Kavyaprakashasaya krita grihe grihe tika tathapyesha tathaiva durgamah).

The important commentaries on the Kavyaprakasha are: The Sanketa of Ruyya or Ruchaka (12th century); the Kavyadarsha of Someshvara (12th century); the Kavyaprakashaviveka of Shridhara (13th century), Kavyaprakashadipika of Chandidasa (14th century); the Visharika of Paramananda Chakravarti (15th century); the Sampradaya-prakashim of Shrividya Chakravarti (14th century); the Adarsha of Maheshvara (17th century); the Rasaprakasha of Shrikrishna Sharman and the Balabodhini of Vamanacharya Jhalkikar (19th century). The Kavyapradipa of Govinda Thakkura (15th century) is a vritti on only the karikas of the Kavyaprakasha. This work has been commented upon by Vaidyanatha Tatsat (17th century) and Nagesha Bhatta (17th century).

The first printed edition of the Kavyaprakasha with a new commentary by Natherram appeared in Calcutta in 1829.

KAVYAPRAYOJANA (Sanskrit). It has been recognized by the authorities on Sanskrit dramaturgy and poetics since very early times that the purpose of poetry (drama, i.e. 'natya' is also a variety of poetry, called 'drishyakavya') which is an art, is to impart delight or aesthetic pleasure. Bharata in his Natyashastra declares that the drama will create pleasure among the people (vinodakaranam loke natyametadbhavishayati—I. 120).

It is true that writers like Bhamaha have enumerated attainment of four aims of life (i.e. four purusharthas), accomplishments in arts, pleasure, fame, etc., as the purposes of poetry (dharmarthakamamoksheshu vaichakshanyam kalasu cha/pritim karoti kirtim cha sadhukavyanishevanam—Kavyalamkara, I. 2), but the aesthetic pleasure has always been accepted as the supreme end. The position is further clarified by Abhinavagupta, with reference to the above statement of Bhamaha, that among all the purposes, pleasure is the main (Lochana on Anandavardhana's Dhavnyaloka; vide also Sarasvatikanthabharana of Bhoja; I.2; Kavyalamkarasut-ravritti of Vamana, I. 1.5., etc). Mammata mentions six purpose of poetry, viz., fame, wealth, knowledge of the ways of the world, removal of evils, aesthetic pleasure of the highest order and sweet counsel like that of a beloved wife (Kavyaprakasha, I.2). It is interesting to note that some of the results of poetry are derived by the poet himself while the others are enjoyed by the reader. But Mammata is quite aware of the fact that the creation of aesthetic pleasure is the supreme purpose of a kavya (sakalapravyojanamaulibhutam samanantarameva rasasvadanasadubhutam vigalitavedyantaramanandam—Vritti on Kavyaprakasha, I.2) though he emphasizes the point that pleasure created by a good poem would influence the life through indirect instruction, e.g., Ramadivat privaritavyam, na Ravanadivat. Some poets have also called poetry a dose of honey to induce people to take bitter medicine, i.e., instructions on a particular science or even on the renunciation of the world and attainment of emancipation (vide Bhamaha, V.3). Bhattikavya was composed with a view to teaching Panini's grammar. Ashvaghosha, the famous Buddhist poet (1st century A.D.) states that his purpose of writing poems is to make it sweet so that the bitter medicine may become palatable (yanmokshat kritamanyadatra he maya tat kavyadharmat kritam patum tiktamivaushadham madhuyutam hridyam katham syaditi—Saundarananda, XVIII.63)

KAVYATIRTHA, AGHORECHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1872, d. 1943). Born in Mallikpore, a village in the district of Jessore, now in Bangladesh, Aghorechandra Bhattacharya began his early education at home. Then he joined the village school. When he left school he applied himself to learning Sanskrit language and literature. He passed the Kavyatirtha Examination in Sanskrit literature from the Bengal Sanskrit Association, Calcutta.

He then joined Oriental Seminary in Calcutta as a Head Pandit in Sanskrit. After retirement from that School he joined another High School named Dakshata Vidyaniketan at his native place. He was still teaching in that school when he died.

He began his literary career as a writer of jattras. He soon became the most popular jatra-writer of Bengal. His plays abound in songs such as solo, duet, chorus, humorous songs, songs of Viveka, ballet songs etc.

KAYASTHA, DURGAVARA-KAYASTHA, KESHAVDAS RADE

Characters are mostly stock characters. Dialogues are both in verse and prose. They are verbose, grandiloquent and lengthy as was the use and wont.

His first play, Kalki avatar gitabhinoy (1898), was staged by the Boukunda Jatra Party. He composed mythological, devotional and historical plays and plays based on traditional stories. All his plays were staged by the renowned jatra parties of Bengal.

The following are his mythological and devotional jatra-plays: Magadha-vijay or Madhav-lila (1903); Data karna gitabhinay (1904); Harishchandra (1914); Ananta-chaturdashi-vrata (a play of nine rasas, 1916); Adrishta (1921); Kuruparinam (1921); Subal sanbad (1921); Chandraketu (1922); Chitrangada (1923); Taranir juddha or Sarama (1923); Nahus-uddhar (1925); Shishupal-badh (1925); Mahamilan (1925); Saptarathi (1926); Shambarasur-badh (1927); Nal-Damayanti (1927); Mahagaurab gitabhinay (1927); Shetashwamedh (1929); Shaktishel (1931); Mahalakshmi (1932); Prahlad-charitra (1935); Nader Nimai (1935); Shripadapadma (1936); Anuddhwajer Harishadhana (1936); Bhaktabir (1937); Ravan-badh (1937); Jaydeb (1937); Shri Vrindaban (1938); Lakshabali, Banadevi, Sindhu-badh, Ranachandi, Shrivatsa, Samudramanthan, Karamochan or Kamsa-badh, Behula and Shriradha-Mathura-milan.

Satma (1921) and Narmada are based on traditional stories. Historical plays of Aghorechandra are Mewar-kumari (1923) and Dhatri Panna (1935). These are based on the annals of Mewar.

KAYASTHA, DURGAVARA (Assamese), the writer of Giti Ramayana gives no indication about his identity. Durgavara Kayastha, the poet of Manasa-gita, however, introduces himself as the son of Shri Kayastha Chandradhara. He seems to have been patronised by Bahubala Sikdar, a devotee of Manasa (Padmadeukar), who as a Patra along with Bhimabala Patra marched at the head of fifty-two thousand Koch soldiers under Shukladhvaja alias Silaray against the Ahoms in 1662. Durgavara of Manasa-gita eulogises king Bishwa Sinha (1515-1540), his forty-eight consorts and eighteen princely sons. He also mentions Nilachala, the hilly village on which Kamakhya is enshrined. Even though within the two poems there is no indication whatsoever that the two Durgavaras are one and the same person, an identity of the two is also possible for both the narratives are in the same form, being the aggregate of narrative lyrics associated with a cult known as 'panchali' (a form common to western Assam and Bengal). Durgavara seems to have been a leader (oja) of choral singers known as Oja pali (an oja and a group consisting of pali or musical supporters to him).

The Manasa songs of Durgavara Kayastha take up the Manasa-Chandradhara saga where his perhaps senior contemporary, Mankar, ends, viz., after a description of creation and the union of Hara and Gauri. Chandradhara, an ardent devotee of Shiva, refuses to pay obeisance to the serpent deity, Manasa, even though the latter is Shiva's daughter born of no goddess but of a lotus stock. Manasa sees to the death of the seven sons of Chandradhara, including the youngest, Lakhindar, whose chaste wife, Beula, floats down the sea on a rafter with his corpse and pleasing the gods with her dance, obtains back not only the life of her own husband but of her brothers-in-law too. Durgavara is an effective story-teller producing well-developed situations and distinct characters. His god-defying Chandradhara is depicted with much sympathy while the apocryphal deity, Manasa, fights with him relentlessly but a losing battle. The songs are tuned to ragas like Patamanjari, Bhatiyali, Ramgiri, Suhai, etc. This poem as also the Giti Ramayana unluckily has come down to us in a fragmentary form.

KAYASTHA, KESHAVDAS RADE (Gujarati). No information is available about the date of birth and death of Kavi Keshavadas Kayastha who composed a poem called Krishnakrida in medieval Gujarati in 1535. Depending on certain references made by the poet about his caste, father, native place, etc., in the Krishnalila poem, it can be said that he belonged to the Valam Kayastha caste. He lived in a town near Junagadh and his father's name was Rade (probably Hridayram, Radavram or Rajdev). During the Solanki period, 'Banas' and 'Nagirs' used to be the ministers in the states. They also included some Kayasthas. It is possible that one such Kayastha family had settled down at Prabhaspatan near Junagadh. Looking at his work it can be said that he was well-versed in Sanskrit.

Krishnakrida is the only available work by the poet. Based on the 'Dashamaskandh' of the Bhagavata, it has 3041 stanzas, divided into 40 Cantos. Of these, 107 are Sanskrit shlokas, and 2934 stanzas are written in Gujarati. In this work he has described Krishna's 'lila' at all the three places, namely, Vraj, Mathura and Dwaraka. Keshavadas has got given the word-to-word translation of the original Bhagavata, but keeping intact the story elements of the original Bhagavata, he has narrated the various incidents independently and in his own manner in various 'deshibandhas' that could be sung easily. Depending on the incident, he has also incorporated the Sanskrit shlokas, or the original Bhagavata as well as the Sanskrit shlokas composed by him. Explaining the purpose of this technique, Keshavadas says that gold, when studded with gems, looks more beautiful, and so he has studded the gold of the Prakrit language with the gems of Sanskrit. He further says that he has included 96 shlokas in the poem, but the available version has 108 shlokas.

KAZHINJA, KALAM-KAZI NAZRUL ISLAM

The Sanskrit Dashamaskandh has 100 chapters, with 49 chapters in the first and 51 in the second part. Keshavdas has given in his work 20 cantos in the first and 20 cantos in the second, making a total of 40 Cantos. Thus, he has naturally eliminated some less important portions of the original story. At the same time he has added some cantos at certain places. The poet narrates his story maintaining the flow and preserving the basic structure of the original story. He uses the 'deshis' that can be sung in accordance with the incidents. In the narration of the story, he generally accepts the regular use of 'purvachaya' and 'chaupai'. Occasionally, he also uses metres like 'adaya', 'chhapaya', 'bhujang', 'prayat', 'soratha', 'narach', 'vastuchhand', 'saviya', 'hanumant', 'dingli', 'arya', 'gatha', and 'pawada chal'. The 13th canto, barring the last line, is written entirely in 'shardul-vikritdit metre'. After placing the titles like 'git' and 'dhol', he includes the compositions that can be sung; and in the beginning of these compositions, he uses ragas like 'dhanashri', 'maruni', 'megh', 'deshakh', 'ashavari', 'har-narayan', 'gaudi malhar', 'maru', 'kedar', 'shri', 'sorath', 'dhaval malhar', 'maru', 'kadar', 'shri', 'sorath', 'dhaval dhanashri', 'sameri', etc. At the end of the poem, he gives 'pushpika' which looks like being in Sanskrit, or in Gujarati mixed with Sanskrit. As a Gujarati form of 'akhyana' dealing with the Krishna story, his work has made a noteworthy contribution to the medieval Gujarati literature.

KAZHINJA, KALAM (Malayalam). Freedom fighter, journalist and author, K.P. Kesava Menon (1886-1978) records in his Kazhinja kalam (The past) his past experiences in diverse fields thereby providing valuable lessons to anyone interested in the welfare of the society of the country. His words are so charged with the spirit of service that the reader is easily convinced of the sincerity of his purpose.

Kesava Menon's is a personality of myriad colours. Yet his life, as depicted in this autobiography, is far from self-glorification. He presents himself as one of the teeming millions whether as a schoolboy in Palghat or Calicut or as lawyer or as one engaged in public life fighting against odds. He participated in the Home Rule Movement and was an activist in the Civil Disobedience Movement. He was imprisoned in 1921. On his being released what he witnessed was the untold misery resulting from the Malabar Mutiny. He initiated relief work on a massive scale with a view to restoring peace and spreading the Gandhian ideals of communal harmony and national unity.

Thus the picture that emerges from a perusal of the work is that of a broad-minded, persevering man always alive to situations involving human rights, freedom and justice and always willing to pursue righteous courses. It is difficult for a political figure like him to write about his own part in public life without casting aspersions on or levelling allegations against his contemporaries. But he for one never does that and always prefers to be dispassionate and impartial. He blames none and sees virtue in all, but cannot tolerate dereliction of duty on anybody's part.

Kazhinja Kaalam is only one of the numerous books written by him. It won for its author the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1958.

KAZI NAZRUL ISLAM (Bengali; b. 1889, d. 1976), son of Ahmed Kazi, was an eminent poet. At the age of nine he lost his father and had to earn his bread on a monthly salary of one rupee. He went to Mathru High School in Burdwan where he came in close contact with his teacher Kumudranjan Mullik, who was a poet. Later he studied in Ranigunj Siarshole High School where Sailajananda Mukherjee who later became famous as a novelist, was his classmate. Around 1916 he found it financially impossible to continue with his study; so he gave up study and joined the Army in 1917 and soon he became a Quarter Master Habildar in the Bengal Battalion. When the Bengal Battalion was disbanded he left the army and took to writing. As a writer he made his debut with Baunduler atmakatha (The autobiography of a vagabond) published in Saugat in 1919. A year later the Muslim Bharat published his first novel, Badhanhara. In 1920 he met Muzaffar Ahmed, the Communist leader and Barin Ghose, the legendary fighter for freedom. With the publication in 1922 of his famous poem 'Bidrohi' (The rebel), he sprang to fame overnight. From then on he came to be known as the rebel poet. He stood against all kinds of oppression: political and social. "Be a rebel like Bhrgu," he exhorted, "and God will pay you salutations." "I am the arch rebel", he declared, "tried of wars/I shall be quiet only on the day when the wailing of the oppressed will not rend the sky/when the tyrant's sword will not be unsheathed in the gory field of battle." He attacked bigotry of all kinds, and superstitious meanness prevailing in both Hindu and Muslim societies. He assailed the religion that separated man from man and preached a radicalism that united them. There was an exuberance in Nazrul which could even glorify poverty: "Oh, poverty, thou hast made me great and given me the honour of Christ,/the beauty of the crown of thorns".

Nazrul was a prolific writer. Besides his numerous poems he wrote plays, stories, essays and novels. But his greatest contribution to literature were his songs and lyrics. He wrote about four thousands songs on different themes. His book of Muslim devotional songs, Zulfikkar (1932), his priceless collection of ghazals, Choker chatak (1929), his devotional songs on the Hindu goddess, Kali,

KECHE, MADHUKAR–KEDARNATH SINGH

Kalikirtan, Ranga jaba (1963), and the collection of the forceful patriotic songs, Sarbahara (1926) deserve special mention. Even in his songs he went against the convention. He embellished the Islamic lore with allusions from Indian mythology and took absolute freedom in the use of words and phrases. The songs he wrote in praise of Hindu deities are considered some of the best devotional songs sung in Bengali. His prose may appear to be too loud, unrestrained and volcanic but his songs certainly are of a great quality. Nazrul engaged himself in multifarious activities. He edited Dhumketu (1922), Laghal (1924) and Navayug (1940),—all progressive journals of his time. He also acted in the films like 'Dhruva', 'Aleya' and 'Dhup-chhaya'. Nazrul was one of the pioneers whose works marked a departure from the 'Tagorian mode' and was closely associated with the 'Kallol' literary group of the thirties. In 1942 he suddenly lost his speech and memory. He never regained them before he died in Dacca. The available list of his writings contains: Byathar dan (story, 1922); Agnibina (poetry, 1922), Yugabani (essay, 1922), Dolanchanpa (poetry, 1923), Rajbandir Jabanbandi (1923), Bish banshi (poetry, 1924) Bhangar gan (poetry, 1924), Chhayana (poetry, 1924), Puber hawa (poetry) Samyabadi (poetry, 1925), Chittanama (poetry, 1925), Rikter bedan (1925), Sarbahara (poetry, 1926), Phanimansa (1927), Sindhu hillol (poetry, 1928), Bandhanhara (novel, 1927), Jinjur (poetry, 1928), Sanchita (poetry, 1928), Chokher chatak (a collection of gazals, 1930), Pralay sikha (poetry, 1930), Mrityusudha (novel, 1930), Diwan-i-hafiz (1930), Jhilimili (play, 1930), Chandrabinu (songs, 1930), Sursaki (songs, 1930), Kuhelika (novel, 1931), Zulfikar (songs, 1932), Bangagiti (songs, 1932), Kabye amora (tran. poetry, 1933), Gulbagicha (songs, 1933), Surlipi (1934), Nirjhar (poetry, 1938), Natun chhanda (poetry, 1945), Shesh saugat (poetry, 1958), Madhumala (play, 1959), Dhumketu (essay, 1960), Rangajaba (Hindu devotional songs, 1963).

KECHE, MADHUKAR (Marathi; b. 1932) is a well-known modern poet and an essayist.

Brought up in a religious atmosphere Keché started writing poetry at an early age. His poetry is mainly religious and is highly devotional. It reflects various shades and moods of devotional feelings. Though Tambe, an exuberant romantist, is his favourite poet, Keché's poetry is not exuberant. As the poet himself says, it is rather influenced by earlier saint-poets like Tukaram, and later, Pant, the poets or scholar-poets of the pre-modern period.

He usually uses the old verse or 'abhanga' as Mardhekar did but unlike him Keché did not give it a new content. His poetry has a simple beauty and charm of its own.

Keché has handled a variety of other genres like novel, biography, travelogue, character-sketches and literary essay. But he is better known as a humorous essayist. His humour is satirical and mischievous. He has a style of his own with a regional flavour.

His poetry is compiled in three anthologies: Dindj geli pudhe, Punvecha themb, and Asvancha theva. His other works include Maya manjula, Dr. Punjab-revanche charitra, Gadge maharajanche charitra (biographies); Motijyachya poti, Rachana (novels); Mazi kahin gayen, Ek bhatakanti (travelogues); Vande vandanam, Ek ghodachuk, Zoplela gav, Awar angana, Palkhichya sangi, (humorous essays); Chehre mohre, Vegle kutumb, (character sketches); Vishnu Krishna Chiplunkar (criticism) and some translations.

KEDARABHATTA (Sanskrit), son of Pabbeka or Pavveka or Pabyeka, is the author of Vṛttaratnakara, the most popular work on Sanskrit prosody. Commentators, like Mallinatha, accepted him as an authority on 'chhandashastra' and strictly followed his definitions of the metres. The reason for this popularity of his work is hinted at by Kedarabhata himself when he says that his work fully provides the definitions of the metres with their usages. Exact time of Kedarabhata is not certain, but he must have flourished earlier than the twelfth century. The tradition which describes him as one of the nine gems of Vikramaditya has no value.

Kedarabhata applied the principle of the trisyllabic 'ganas' (groups) initiated by Pingala to describe the syllabic metres and used the 'matras' (moras) to describe the matra-vrittas like arya. He is also brief in his treatment. Kedarabhata deals with one hundred and thirty-six metres in his Vṛttaratnakara and this indicates his mastery over the science of metrics. The best edition of Kedarabhata's Vṛttaratnakara along with an excellent commentary by Ramachandra Kavibharati, was prepared by Shilaskandha Mahasthavira of Sri Lanka and published in the Kavyamala series (Nirnaya Sagar, Bombay, 1908).

KEDARNATH SINGH (Hindi; b. 1934). A noted Hindi poet of the new trend, Kedarnath Singh was born in a peasant family. He did his B.A. in 1954 and M.A. in 1956

KEER, DHANANJAYA VITHAL-KEITH, ARTHUR BERRIEDALE

from Udaya Pratap College, Benaras. He received his Ph.D. degree for his research work Adhunik Hindi kavita mein bimbavidhan (Imagery in modern Hindi poetry) in 1964. Earlier his M.A. dissertation was titled Kalpna aur chhayavad (Allahabad, 1957). After teaching in some colleges at Benaras and Gorakhpur (1962), he worked as Principal in a College at Gorakhpur for about 10 years. Since 1976, he has been an Associate Professor in the School of Indian Languages, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi. To begin with he wrote short stories, too, but confined himself to poetry in the main since 1950.

He is one of the seven poets of Tisra saptak (1959) edited by 'Agyaya', and his first collection of poems was Abhi, bilkul abhi (Now, just now, 1960). With these works he distinguished himself as a poet of new and fresh images. He is inclined towards lyricism and is not a poet given to descriptions. In his use of language and craft he is quite economical and very often conveys his experiences through images and symbols while at times his images themselves become symbols. Some critics do not appreciate his so-called formalism.

But in his later poems he does not give as much importance to imagery. A sensitive observer of the multi-dimensional relationship between man and nature, he evinces a healthy romantic attitude to it. His second collection of poems Zamin pak rahi hai (The earth is ripening, 1980) has been well received by critics. He received the much coveted 'Kumaran Asan' (Kerala) award for this work. In it he shows broad human sympathies and depicts human sufferings in the language that is marked by clarity. Poems like 'Roti' (bread), 'Tamatar bechanewali' (The tomato selling woman), 'Bail' (Bull) deserve special mention. He has edited an Anthology of Hindi Poetry after 1960 for the Sahitya Akademi and has translated into Hindi several poems by Brecht, Baudelaire and Rilke.

KEER, DHANANJAYA VITHAL (Marathi; b. 1913, d. 1984) was a biographer, scholar and sociologist-historian. He did his matriculation in 1935 and left for Bombay, where from 1938 onwards till his retirement, he worked with the Education Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation. He devoted himself to writing biographies of Babasaheb Ambedkar in English and Marathi. His English biography of Ambedkar was published in 1954 and had four editions till 1981. He wrote the biography of Vir Savarkar in 1950. He received Honorary Doctorate from Shivaji University in 1980. He was also honoured with 'Padma Bhushan'. He won Maharashtra State Award and Acharya Atre Foundation Award for his works. His biographies are marked by the meticulous details and the writer's zeal for the conventional and objective treatment. He was, however, not a hero-worshipper.

His other works include: Lokmanya Tilak, Rajarshi Shahu Maharaj, Mahatma Jyotiba Phule, Teen mahan Saraswat, Mahatma Phule samagra vangmaya, Yani itihashghadarila, Shri Namdeva charitra, Kavya ani karya.

KEITH, ARTHUR BERRIEDALE (Sanskrit; b. 1879, d. 1944), the celebrated Sanskrit scholar and constitutional lawyer, was born at Edinburgh. He was one of the four gifted sons of Alan Davidson Keith.

After an early education at the Royal High School, Edinburgh, he graduated from the Edinburgh University in 1897 with first class honours in classics and won the Guthrie Fellowship in 1899. He had also won scholarships endowed by Dunlop (Edinburgh, 1896), Ferguson (Glasgow, 1897) and Boden (Oxford, 1898).

Entering Balliol College, Oxford, as a scholar, Keith was placed in the first class in Classical Moderations (Literae Humaniores, Sanskrit and Pali).

He out-distanced all his competitors in the Home I.C.S. Examination in 1901 and broke all previous records by more than a thousand marks.

In 1907-8 he was acting as deputy to the Boden Professor of Sanskrit at Oxford, and in 1914 he was appointed Regius Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology at the University of Edinburgh.

Keith's most notable contributions to Indology were prominently in the field of Vedic studies and historico-critical studies in belles-lettres. His publications in the former category include edition with masterly introductions of the Aitareya-Aranyaka (Oxford, 1909), Sankhayana-aranyaka (1908), The Veda of the Black Yajus School which is a translation of the Taitiriyasamhita (Harvard Oriental Series, Vols. 18 and 19, 1914), and the Rigveda Brahmanas (i.e. Aitareya and Kaushitaki translated into English in a masterly manner in two large volumes, Harvard Oriental Series, 1920). Two more equally sumptuous volumes in the same series (Vols. 31 and 32) entitled The Religion and Philosophy of the Veda and Upanishads (1925) may be regarded as rounding off of Keith's voluminous studies in the Vedic field, as a result of which large tracts of ancient Indian religious literature and culture which had not been even fully surveyed by that time were made accessible to all Indologists in dependable translation. Even in 1912 he had collaborated with Prof. A.A. Macdonell at Oxford to bring out the two volumes of Vedic Index, which are even today indispensable as reference books.

Keith, who had collaborated earlier with Winternitz in bringing out the second volume (1905) of the Catalogue of Sanskrit Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, now took up the less recondite but more far-reaching task of compiling authoritative and competent manuals on schools of Indian philosophy. His works Samkhya System (1918), Indian Logic and Atomism, (1921), on Nyaya-Vaisheshika and Buddhist Philosophy (1923) are full of critical insight and independent judgement though they are only handbooks.

In two substantial volumes, viz., Sanskrit Drama (Oxford, 1924) and A History of Sanskrit Literature (Oxford, 1928), Keith surveyed with full documentation and critical appreciation, the history of the Sanskrit Drama and that of classical Sanskrit literature respectively. At the same time he was engaged in completing the India Office Library Catalogues of Sanskrit and Prakrit MSS which is indeed a monumental work comprising a survey of innumerable works under diverse heads in various scripts. It was completed in a surprisingly short period and published in two parts in 1935.

He was hailed as a prodigy at Oxford and he became the leading authority on Constitutional Law. His greatest book in this field, Responsible Government in the Dominions, first appeared in 1909 and was further revised and expanded in 1912 in three volumes and once again revised for reprint in 1928. Keith expounded brilliantly the constitutional development of India in his book, A Constitutional History of India, 1900-1935 (1930).

Keith had no children. He died in Edinburgh. He had won the degrees of D.C.D. (Oxford, 1911), D. Litt. (Edin. 1914) and honorary LL.D. (Leeds, 1936), and was elected Fellow of the British Academy in 1935.

KELAVU, NENAPUGALU (Kannada) is a book containing the reminiscences of Navaratna Rama Rao (1879-1960), a man of exceptionally refined temperament, who held high offices in the Civil Service of the erstwhile Mysore State. He entered service in the early years of this century. The book recreates the princely state of those days (Mysore was fortunate in its ruler), and we see both the administrative machinery at work and those in charge of it, from the highest (the Diwan) down to the clerks and the village accountant. It is a society not very distant from us in time which has completely disappeared and the recreation is fascinating. We see the exceptionally able and devoted workers, the average government servant and also the corrupt and the inefficient; we see the close link between the ruler and his immediate officers on the one side, and the subjects on the other, which brought a human touch to administration. The book is also a brilliant gallery of portraits. There are episodes, some of them moving and some comic, which could well suggest fine short stories. The writer's own personality reveals itself charmingly; it is the personality of a man with a wide range of interests, alive alike to the claims of the head and the heart. He is also gifted with a fine sense of humour. The language itself is lively, limpid and flexible. It is, thus, one of the most delightful and rewarding books of reminiscences in the language.

KELKAR, ASHOK R. (Marathi; b. 1929) is a well-known linguist and critic. Schooled at Pune, he received his first and second degrees in English from Bombay (1950) and Poona (1953) Universities respectively. Later, he did his Ph.D. in Linguistics (1958) at the Cornell University (U.S.A.) under the guidance of Charles F. Hockett, with a thesis on 'Phonology and Morphology of Marathi'. On return, he worked for some years (1958-62) as a Professor of Linguistics in the Agra University, joined the Deccan College, Poona soon after and is now working there as a Professor of Applied Linguistics in the Centre of Advanced Study in Linguistics. He has been participating in national as well as international seminars and conferences, and lecturing in several Universities and other organizations in India and abroad ever since 1965. He is associated in various capacities with a number of learned societies, such as Linguistic Society of India of which he was the President in 1980, Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore, Comité International Permanent des Linguistes, Leiden (Netherlands), and journals such as Indian Linguistics which he edited (1973-75), Journal of Child Language, Cambridge, (U.K.), and Advisory Boards of Universities, projects and literary societies. He was awarded National Fellowship for the year 1976-78 by the University Grants Commission.

Kelkar has to his credit over 50 articles published in English, Marathi and Hindi periodicals, concerning the proceedings of seminars in India and abroad on subjects like linguistics, language teaching, philosophy of art and language, and literature, besides numerous reviews of books and articles in encyclopaedias and works of reference. Besides his doctoral thesis, Kelkar produced four books: Studies in Hindi-Urdu: Introduction and Word Phonology (Pune, 1968), Marathi bhashecha arthika samsara (Aurangabad, 1977), Prachina Bharatiya sahitya mimamsa (Pune, 1979), Prolegomena to an Understanding of Semiosis and Culture (Mysore, 1980).

As a linguist and a critic, Kelkar advocates the study of a language as language, as much as psychology, philosophy, sociology and history, as substantial help for a better understanding of literature.

KELKAR, D.K. (Marathi; b. 1895) was born at Miraj. He was a teacher in a high school at Sholapur and Panchgani. He joined the Ramnarain Ruia College, Bombay, right at the time of its establishment. One of his literary contributions is Kavyalochan (1931). This has been a text book volume on poetry till this date and an authoritative work on the 'essence of poetry'.

Sanskritisangam, Vadalivare, and Marathi sahityache sinhavalekan are his notable works.

Rich language, clarity and logical thinking are the characteristic features of his literary works.

KELKAR, DIWAKAR KRISHNA (Marathi; b. 1902, d. 1973). Born at Gumtakkal in the district of Gulbarga, he was educated in Bombay. He was an advocate by profession. He is known as a pioneer of Marathi psychological short story. His first collection of short stories entitled Samadhi ani itar goshti was published in 1927. His other works include Kishoriche hridaya (fiction, 1934), Tod hi mal (play, 1934), Rupagarvita ani saha goshti (short stories, 1941), Vidya ani yaruni (fiction, 1944).

KELKAR, NARASINHA CHINTAMAN (Marathi; b. 1872, d. 1947) was a dramatist, novelist, short story writer, poet, biographer, critic, historian, writer on philosophical and political themes and various other subjects. He was a close associate of Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak and had the privilege of being the Chief Editor of the Kesari after his mentor's death.

It is rightly said of him that he was not an individual but an institution. He occupied a unique, patriarchal place in Maharastrian cultural, political and literary life spreading over three decades. In fact, he was an inevitable part of the social ethos of Maharashtra, a father figure. One wonders how he could find time in the midst of his various activities to produce literature on a fabulous scale. There is no branch of literature on which he has not dwelt for some time or the other. It is not for nothing that he came to be popularly known as 'Sahitya samrat' (Emperor among litterateurs).

In spite of his apparently incredible output, Kelkar was not particularly successful in the field of poetry, novel and short story. His forte was obviously his belles lettres on various topics and themes. They were in their own right remarkable for their inimitable content. His works include: Plays: Sarojini (1901), Tohi mich ani hahi mich alias Navardevachi jodgoli (1898), Chandragupta (1913), Totayache band (1913), Krishnarajuna yuddha (1915), Amatya Madhav (1915), Vir Vidamban (1919), Sant Bhanudas (1919), Pattichi nivad, Jangal mein mangal (incomplete), Adnyatvas (scenario), Shivajicha bandivas ani sutaka. Novels: Andharvad (1928—published again in 1958 when Kelkar's son K.N. Kelkar wrote the last couple of chapters to complete the novel), Navalpurcha santhanik (1934), Balidan (1937), Kokancha por (1942), Kavala ani Dhapi, Jagachi rit (1943), Pramila navamahila (incomplete; published in Sahyadri, 1949), Diwan (incomplete). Short stories: Moujeche char prahar (1931), Kusha vishi ani itar goshti (1950). Poetry: Kavyopahar (1927), Padyaguchha (1936). Autobiographical writings: Gata-

KELU NAYAR, VIDWAN (Malayalam; b. 1899, d. 1929). Author of several musical plays, Kelu Nayar was educated as a Sanskrit scholar. He learnt Sanskrit as an inmate of a residential Sanskrit school at Kanjangad in North Kerala prior to his serving in the army in the First World War from which service he resigned to continue his studies under the famous Sanskrit scholar and teacher, Punnasseri Nilakanta Sharma. He also took part in the national movement. He participated in humanitarian activities and acted in Kathakali performances and in his own musicals. Those were years in which musicals were popular in Kerala partly due to the activities of Tamil musical companies and also because of distinguished poets like K.C. Kesava Pillai of Trivandrum who had contributed to this genre. Kelu Nayar's musical plays were Lankadahanam (The burning of Lanka), Pakkanarcharitam (The story of Pakkanar), Padukapattabhishekam (The coronation of the wooden sandals), Srikrishnalila (The sports of Krishna), Kabirdasacharitam (The story of Kabirdasa) and Vivekodayam (The dawn of discrimination).

KEMMU, MOTILAL (Kashmiri; b. 1933) playwright, graduated from the Kashmir University in 1953 and joined Baroda University for specialisation in drama production. Kemmu worked for sometime in Census Department and in the Office of the Custodian General as well. He is presently designated as Deputy Secretary, Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy. Kemmu has done a lot for the revival of the Kashmiri folk-theatre. He has not only produced stage plays but also acted in operas like Bombur yanburzal (1953) and worked as a dancer in ballets like Shiva tandava (1956), 'Himal nagrey' and other 'Kathak' dances. Kemmu directed Adhe adhure (Hindi), Havas (Kashmiri), Qaziji (Hindi) and other plays in and outside the State of Jammu and Kashmir under the auspices of the Kashmir Bhagat Theatre. He was awarded a prize for the best direction in 1960 for his drama Qaziji by the State Cultural Academy. His stage play Havas based on a folk-tale recorded in Arabian Nights, won him laurels from the people for its script and direction. He has also sponsored various theatres of the valley, and thus, helped in the revival of the folk-dances like 'Damali', 'Shikargah' and 'Darza paether'. Kemmu wrote commentaries on different aspects of folk-theatre of Kashmir, which served as text books for the students of this art. Kemmu started his career by writing plays in Hindi. Tin sangat ekanki (1966) is a collection of three one-act plays in Hindi that won him the Jammu and Kashmir Academy award in 1968. Trunov (1969) in Kashmiri is a collection of three one-act plays. Written in 'bhand paether' form, they were staged by many clubs in the valley. The collection includes 'Manzily nika' (The baby of the cradle), a socio-political satire recreated and redrafted afterwards in Natak truch. The collection is also valuable for its forward wherein the author discusses in detail various aspects of folk tradition and analyses the evolution of theatre. Trunov won the State Academy award in 1971. Tshay (The ghost, 1972), is a three-act play written in folk form, based on the historical tragedy of King Lalitaditya (695-73), who is said to have perished in Aryanaka (Afghanistan) during his campaigns. The plot of the drama very often satirizes the supernatural powers that we associate with men at the helm of affairs. The approach of the writer in this play is tragic, not befitting his type as we see him in Trunov and 'Manzily nika'. Another of his collections, Lal bo drayas lolare (1972) won the first prize for its script in 1970 from the Cultural Academy. It is a successful social satire depicting the gimmicks applied for gaining recognition. Having a lucid style and an awareness of intricate problems of social injustice, Kemmu has built up public opinion in favour of the development of stage. He received the Sahitya Akademi award of 1982 for his collection of one-act plays, Natak truch.

KEMPUNARAYANA (Kannada) was a Kannada prose writer. A Hoysala Brahmin by caste, he was a scholar in the court of Krishnaraja Wodeyar III (1794-1868) of Mysore. His real name was Narayanasharma, but he is known as Kempunarayana. He is the author of Mudra-manjusha which he completed in 1823. The work is important as a harbinger of modern Kannada prose. It is the story of Chanakya who was insulted by the Nandas and who had his revenge by exterminating them and installing Chandragupta Maurya as the king of Magadha. Though his work is not a translation of Vishakhadatta's Mudrarakshasa, it still owes much to the Sanskrit work. Kempunarayana modified the story considerably. In his descriptions, he is influenced by Bana, and to some extent by Bhartrihari. He can tell a story in an interesting manner. His prose is a curious medley of old and modern Kannada, of formal Sanskrit words and familiar Kannada words; the different elements have not been harmonised. The work is significant as representing a stage when Kannada prose was striving to cross the border from the medieval age to the modern.

KENI, CHANDRAKANT SHANTARAM (Konkani; b. 1834) is an eminent short story writer and journalist. He is editor of a Konkani monthly, Kulagara, and a Marathi daily, Rashtrammat. He started his literary activity in fifties and brought out his first collection of modern short stories entitled Dhartari azum jietali, (The earth was still alive, 1964), the first of its kind in Konkani. His earlier stories are collected in Ashada panvali (Asadha rains, 1973) and later stories in Alamim (Mushrooms, 1975). Fulamcho hat (1972) and Eklo eksuro, (1973) are his novels. He has also to his credit a collection of anecdotes entitled Tare tarechim sanvagam (A variety of characters, 1973).

He has translated short stories from different Indian languages into Konkani. He is connected intimately with the literary movement in Konkani. He also writes with equal ease in Marathi and Hindi, and knows Gujarati, English and Portuguese.

His journalistic writings are mainly topical and local, while his short stories are experimental. He made various experiments with the technique of short story and has brought into Konkani some modern styles and techniques which have not always been welcomed by critics, though widely discussed. Some of his writings have secured a place in the text books. A striking contrast exists in his journalistic writings which always advocate morality and human values, and in his short stories which do not accept any inhibitions in their themes or styles. Many of his earlier stories are abstract, but the influence of abstractism has evidently diminished in his recent writings. Surprisingly, in some of his later short stories, which are yet to appear in book form, he appears to give more importance to the theme, a course distinct from that of his earlier publications.

Chandrakant Keni was the President of 11th session of All India Konkani Sahitya Parishad, held in Mangalore in 1976. He is the Chairman of Gomantaka Rashtrabhasha Vidyapith, Goa.

KENOPANISHAD (Sanskrit), an Upanishad of the Samaveda, gets its name from the first word of the first verse, 'kena' (by whom). The name of its 'shakha' (recension) is Talavaraka a Jaiminiya, this is why it is also called Talavaraka Upanishad or Jaiminiya Brahmana Upanishad. Two commentaries of Shankaracharya on this Upanishad are available in print now; they are Pada-bhashya and Vakya bhashya. According to Shankaracharya, the Upanishad begins from the 9th chapter of the Jaiminiya Brahmana, whereas Brunell, on the basis of the MSS found by him, holds that it begins with the 10th section of the 4th chapter.

The Kenopanishad is a small book of only four parts (khandas) and its main themes are the nature of Brahman and the knowledge of the self. This knowledge of the Supreme Self is the summum bonum of a man's life which ultimately leads to moksha (emancipation, i.e. freedom from the cycle of births and deaths and the consequent sufferings). To impart this knowledge effectively this Upanishad presents its basic ideas in the form of dialogues between the preceptor and the disciple in its first two parts. The third part presents the Deva-Yaksha Samvada in the dialogues between the Devas and Yaksha. The fourth part deals with the method of meditation on Brahman and the fruits of such meditation.

This Upanishad lays particular emphasis on karma (action) without expectation of fruits and annihilation of earthly desire as also a positive desire for emancipation. The knowledge of the self is the only knowledge that matters and it is through this knowledge that one can attain Brahman. Such an aspirant can attain power to discard 'avidya' (nescience) and rise above joy and sorrow with the help of his true preceptor who is well-versed in the Vedas and is centred in Brahman. This supreme Brahman is unborn, unchanging, immortal, all blissful and all pervading, and the life's mission can only be to attain this Brahman.

The verses in this Upanishad are marked by fine poetic nuances even though they are designed to project a philosophical truth as realized by the sages. The poetry of the Upanishads has an uncanny power to move and the use of different figures of speech and metrical forms cannot but impress even a non-initiated. The dialogues are also presented in an effective way and the language used is one of persuasion and not of imposition. The English translation of this Upanishad is available in Eight Upanishads by Swami Gambhirananda and the Principal Upanishads by Swami Sivananda.

KERALA BHASHA SAHITYA CHARITRAM (Malayalam). R. Narayana Panicker is well-known as a prolific writer with an enormous number of books belonging to diverse genres of literature, both original and translations, to his credit. But his fame rests chiefly on two works, the first the Kerala bhasha sahitya charitram in seven volumes published in 1929, 1941, 1944, 1947, 1947 and 1951 respectively, and the other the Nava yuga bhasha nighantu (1954).

Kerala bhasha sahitya charitram is a history of Malayalam language and literature, for which the author had to work for more than two decades. Only one book of the kind, viz. P. Govinda Pillai's Bhasha sahitya charitram (1889), had been published before that but today it is more of historical than literary value. So Panicker's volumes were hailed as a welcome gift by most students of Malayalam at that time.

The book surveys the entire gamut of Malayalam literature from the very beginning down to the 50's of the 20th century. The first two volumes, prepared with more care, have been adjudged more authentic and reliable than the remaining ones which, under pressure from his publisher, he had to get ready rather in haste. Even otherwise these latter volumes are not entirely free from blemishes such as bias, disorderly arrangement, unscientific treatment, lack of proportion, etc. Yet together they present a gigantic work running into 3000-odd pages. But more up-to-date and better got-up books have been published since then, thereby reducing the usefulness of the work. However, even now those who are engaged in research work find it a source of information. In view of this and also of the fact that it was a self-imposed task accomplished singlehandedly, the book was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1955.

KERALA SAHITYA CHARITRAM (Malayalam), the best known and the most voluminous of the prose contributions of Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, is his magnum opus, which presents a comprehensive history of literature of Kerala right from its beginning down to the middle of the 20th century, excluding the works of the authors who were alive at the time of its composition. It is a work that bears the stamp of his profound scholarship, wide sympathies, critical evaluation, indefatigable industry and invincible will. Into its making have gone the author's unremitting labours for over twelve years in addition to the pains taken during the previous three decades for the collection of the material hidden away in dark recesses all over Kerala and even outside. It is the glorious realisation of a life's dream announced as early as 1915 but accomplished as late as 1949, just three days before he breathed his last. With its 3000-odd pages in five volumes (excluding index), the University of Kerala, which bought its copyright from the author's son, took more than five years to bring it out (first edition 1955).

One of the distinctive features of the book is that unlike others of its kind, it deals not only with the Malayalam but also the Sanskrit and the Tamil works written by Keralites. In fact, of the 64 chapters 10 are exclusively devoted to Sanskrit authors and works. Another feature is that even the most obscure writers are not ignored. On the contrary they receive their due share of attention and speak to the reader through quotations, of which there is plenty. Anonymous works are also exhaustively treated; short songs, proverbs, riddles and such other minor items which form the primitive elements of literature have not been omitted either. Equally remarkable is the style adopted by the author as to suit the gravity of the topic or writer in question. In view of these characteristics, the Kerala sahitya charitram has become a must in all libraries catering to researchers and writers in Malayalam.

The book, however, cannot be said to be free from all blemishes. Some minor ones, pointed out by reviewers soon after its publication, are such as he himself would have thankfully acknowledged and easily corrected had he lived a few years more; others, not of course so trivial, such as wrong assumptions and the conclusions based on them lend themselves to a diversity of views. In spite of all this, it will continue to be a monumental work for years to come.

K.S.N.

KERALAPANINIYAM (Malayalam) is a book on Malayalam grammar written by A.R. Rajaraja Varma, the first edition of which came out in 1895. Its treatment of the subject was in the form of 'sutra' (aphorism), 'vritti' (exposition) and 'bhashya' (critique), a clear imitation of the Paninian technique. The text is divided into four 'kandas'-(chapters) viz. 'Shiksha' (phonology), 'parinishtha' (morphology), 'akamksha' (syntax) and 'nirukta' (etymology). It 1917 a revised edition was released. This new edition was not merely the result of a revision of the original text but a new creation. The entire planning and execution were changed by the author for bringing out the new edition. Instead of sutra vritti and bhashya of the original, the new edition followed the system of 'karika' (rule in verse and 'vyakhya' (explanation). Even in the division of chapters, the author introduced innovations. Thus the revised text contains the following chapters: Introduction, euphonic changes, noun morphology, verb morphology, attributes, indeclinables, syntax and the origin of words.

Keralapaniniyam not only eclipsed all previous Malayalam grammars produced by foreigners as well as natives but also remained the only dependable text book for pedagogical purpose for years to come. Even now it is considered to be the only standard Malayalam grammar, a unique distinction for a technical work on language.

The major features of this linguistic work can be summarised as follows: (1) The work is exhaustive dealing with all aspects of Malayalam language. Herman Gundert's grammar (1868), though fairly exhaustive, does not contain either theoretical discussions or historical explanations. George Mathan's grammar (1869) is theoretically sound but is too short to be called exhaustive; (2) It was in this grammar, for the first time, that a comprehensive theory of the origin of Malayalam language was mooted. Varma convincingly disproves the theory, held by several ancient and contemporary scholars, which attributed the evolution of Malayalam to Sanskrit source. He was of the opinion that one of the spoken varieties of Tamil, which was the pre-Malayalam lingua-franca in the West Coast evolved as the Malayalam language, undergoing certain linguistic processes. According to him, these processes are six: (i) nasalization by which the plosive following the homorganic nasal gets assimilated to the former. (ii) palatalization by which the dentals following front vowels are palatalized, (iii) contraction of vowels by which the final 'ai' of Tamil changes into 'a' in Malayalam and the final 'u' of Tamil, in certain cases, becomes the central mid unrounded vowel in Malayalam, (iv) dropping of the prominal termination by which the gender-number markers of Tamil finite verbs in agreement with their respective subjects in sentences get deleted in Malayalam and (v) retention of some archaic features in Malayalam which had become obsolete in Tamil; (3) He was the first grammarian to assign the phonemic status to the central mid unrounded vowel in Malayalam exemplifying its distributional contrast with other vowels; (4) He has also recognised the alveolar plosive and nasal as basic sounds of Malayalam; (5) Varma's description of Malayalam cases is unique. He points out that Malayalam case system cannot be explained in the same model as that of Sanskrit declensional pattern, as has been done in earlier grammars. Suggesting new names for Malayalam cases, he proposes a new system for the treatment of the same; (6) when earlier grammarians including Robert Caldwell (A Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian or South Indian Family of Languages, 1856) argued that adjectives do not form a separate word-class in Dravidian languages, Varma sets up a distinct word-class, attributes, for Malayalam; (7) After a lengthy discussion in which he disputes the claim of Caldwell, Varma argues that the word-final 'an' of Malayalam nouns is a neuter gender suffix; (8) His classification of Malayalam auxiliaries as aspectual, temporal and completive speaks highly of his close observation of the genius of the language.

Soon after the publication of the revised version of Keralapaniniyam, it was hailed by the scholars as an outstanding work on Malayalam language. One of the reasons for the revision of the earlier version of the grammar seems to be the publication of a series of critical articles on the first edition of the work by another noted scholar and linguist, M. Sengiri Prabhu (author of Vyakaranamitram, 1904). These articles were published in the issues of Bhashaposhini (1898-1899). For several years the revised version was unquestionably the most authoritative Malayalam grammar. Of late, however, some traditional scholars as well as some young scholars trained in Modern Linguistics have started questioning the validity of many statements contained in the book. Two critical works have come out recently explicating the inadequacies of the rules and explanations in the Keralapaniniyam. They are C.V. Vasudeva Bhattathiri's Keralapaniniyattilute (1972) and C.L. Antony's Keralapaniniyabhashyam (1973). In spite of all this criticism no other work has been produced until now to replace Varma's sixty-four-year old Malayalam grammar.

KERALAVARMA, C.R. (Malayalam; b. 1913, d. 1981), better known by his pen-name Vikraman, was an essayist, humorist, and novelist. He took his M.A. in English literature and taught in schools and colleges. His last assignment was as Professor in the St. Aloysius College at Mangalore. There are several books to his credit all of which were enlivened by a touch of humour. Humour was in fact, his hallmark. The best-known of his works is Neyyunni-muppinnu (Grandfather Neyyunni, 1967) which tells the story of a rather eccentric old man and his hilarious ways and the reactions of the youngster who came into his world. His other novels are Nannavillenzo? (So you won't in:prove? 1967), Vayyaveli (You asked for it, 1970). Vikraman's delightful essays have been collected in volumes. Some of his works in this genre are Onakkalam (The Onam festival, 1958), Onnam class (First class, 1960); Kani kanssunneram. (On looking at the kani, 1964); Bhangi (Beauty). He did also some theorising on what humour is and the result was his work Chiri (Laughter) 1956. There are also two collections of one-act plays by him. These are Nalu ekankangal (Four one-act plays Kottayam, 1964) and Maveliyum makkalum (Maveli and his children).

KERALAVARMA KOTTAYAM-KERALAVARMA TAMPURAN, KOTTAYATTU

K.R.P.

KERALAVARMA, KOTTAYAM (Malayalam; b. 1645, d. 1696) is better known as Virakeralavarma. A historical poem in Malayalam under the title Putuvatapptu informs us that he was the son of queen Umadevi of Puravazhinadu in Northern Kottayam (in Malabar). The poem also refers to the travels in his early age and his marriage with Tanavati, the daughter of a Muslim ruler, Mayyattura. It was during the course of his journey that he came to Attingal where he met Umayamma Rani of Venad. At the request of the queen, Keralavarma settled in Venad in 1956. He was formally adopted into the Venad royal family and conferred the title of "Prince of Hiranyasimhanallur (Eraniel)". He defeated a notorious Muslim marauder called Mukilan who was a Mughal Sirdar. Keralavarma thereafter assisted the Rani in managing the affairs of the state. He has immortalised himself as a bold social reformer. His policies, however, caused deep resentment among the local nobles and a conspiracy was hatched against him. In 1696 he was assassinated by the conspirators within the precincts of his own palace.

He is also remembered as a great poet standing at the feet of Lord Padmanabha. He translated Valmiki's Ramayana into Malayalam. The work, which is better known as Keralavarmamayana, extends upto the end of Sundarakanda. Other Malayalam songs attributed to his authorship are Patalamayana, Banayuddham, Vairagyachandrodayam, Mokshadayakaprakaranam, Mokshasiddhiprakaranam, and Bhishmopadesham, almost all of which are published. His Padastuti is a prayer in Malayalam while his Padmanabhakirtanam and Ragamalika are stotras in Sanskrit.

After Thunchat Ezhuttacchan, it was Keralavarma who composed poems in the kilipattu style enriching Malayalam and releasing the language from the firm hold of Sanskrit.

N.P.U.

KERALAVARMA, PANTALATTU (Malayalam; b. 1879, d. 1918) who belongs to the royal family of Pantalam, was born as the son of Perincheri Vishnu Nambudiri and Ashvati Tirunal Tanvangi Tampuratti. The members of the royal house at that time were accomplished scholars and poets. At the age of twelve Keralavarma could compose Sanskrit poems and he started an assembly of like-minded youngsters to promote their talents in composition. Composing impromptu verses was a fad for these youngsters. Before attaining the age of twenty Keralavarma mastered Sanskrit, both in its general and technical forms. It was in his twenty-sixth year that he established Kavanakaumudi (1905), a fortnightly publication exclusively devoted to the promotion of poetry. Financially the venture was a failure, though it contributed much to the propagation of poetry in Kerala as a whole. Almost all writers and poets became his friends because of this unique publication. He married the sister of Kunjirishna Menon of Otuvil house with whom he became friendly because of his literary venture.

Keralavarma shifted his residence from Pantalam to Trivandrum in 1914 consequent on his appointment as Malayalam Pandit in a Government English High School there. By that time he had already been sanctioned an annual gratuity by Srimulam Tirunal Maharaja of Travancore. The Maharaja of Cochin conferred on him the prestigious title 'Kavitalaka'. Through the pages of his magazine he has published about a hundred poems on a variety of subjects. Critics have showered praise for his ingenuity in playing with words. His poems are remarkable for their felicity and emotional appeal.

His major work, Rugmangadacharitam (1913) is a mahakavya in Malayalam and can easily compare with Magha's Shishupalavadha in Sanskrit. Other important works of Keralavarma are Shumbhanishumbhavadham, Bhujangasandesham, Vanchishashtakam, Bhagirathi (boat song), Marttandadevodayam, Suktimala, Kathakaumudi, Vijayodayam (ottan tullal), Shabrimalayatra, Shrimulaprakashika, Bhamadutavakyam (play), Mudrarakshasam (play) and Karandhamopakhyanam (kilippattu). Along with other poets he has composed about fifteen poems. Besides he has written numerous stanzas dealing with contemporary features like local administration experiences at courts and government official, red-tapism, procedures, etc. with an undercurrent of humour.

His period marked a renaissance of poetry in Malayalam and he gave a new impetus to upcoming writers.

KERALAVARMA TAMPURAN, KOTTAYATTU (Malayalam; b. 1853, d. 1907) was born under the asterism of Anilam and hence he is called Anilam Tirunal. He was born as the son of Kunjulakshmi Amma Tampuratti and Cherusseri Nambudiri of Kitanjur. His mother was a princess of the Kottayam royal family of North Malabar. She belonged to a house whose members left their original home in Kottayam following the incursion of Tipu Sultan and came to a place called Vazhappalli in Changanasseri Taluk of the old Travancore State. This family settled there establishing a house called Kottayattu

KERALAVARMA VALIYA KOIL TAMPURAN

Matham. It is here that Keralavarma was born. He did not have to live here for long since in 1893 he became the seniormost in the family thereby becoming the chieftain of the royal house. Naturally he shifted to the family house in North Malabar. Soon the family at Vazhappalli became extinct.

Keralavarma was a poet of natural poetic talent. He has composed three works. His Dutavakyam belongs to the genre of 'attakkatha', a story for kathakali performance. Ravivarmacharitham is a 'tullal' song of the variety of 'shitankan tullal' dealing with a historical theme, while his Tulabharavarnanam describes coronation ceremony in detail

N.P.U.

KERALAVARMA VALIYA KOIL TAMPURAN (Malayalam; b. 1845, d. 1914) was born at Changanacherry in Kottayam district as the second son of his parents. After being initiated into the rudiments of Malayalam and Sanskrit, he was taken at the age of ten to Trivandrum. Here he had the rest of his entirely non-formal education under a galaxy of renowned Sanskrit scholars such as his uncle Rajaraja Varma and Ilathoor Ramaswami Sastrigal. He learnt English first from his uncle and then from Bearing, the court physician to the then Maharaja of Travancore. But his superb mastery of the language has been attributed to his own indefatigable industry and his intimate contact with the European visitors to the state capital. He also acquired sufficient proficiency in Hindustani and Tamil and had a smattering of Telugu and Marathi. Among his other interests may be mentioned music, athletics, sports, riding, hunting and wrestling.

At the age of 14, Keralavarma married Lakshmi Bai, the senior princess of the Travancore royal family at the time and thereafter came to be known as Valiya Koil Tampuran. The ruler, Ayilyam Tirunal Maharaja, not only welcomed the new relative but also did bestow on him many a favour, finding in him a youth, who, though already a prodigy, was full of further promise. The ruler conferred on him first the membership (1867) and then the chairmanship (1868) of the Book Committee constituted for the purpose of improving instruction in the Malayalam schools. This committee was constituted for the first time in the state just two years before. He enjoyed the Chairmanship for a long time, but was not destined to be in the good books of the ruler for long. In 1885 he was charged with treason and imprisoned. Only when the Maharaja died and his successor, Vishakhom Tirunal, ascended the throne in 1880 was Keralavarma released.

Keralavarma's life was packed with literary activities and scholarly pursuits, whether he lived in prison or outside. Distinguished as a painstaking student, a matchless Sanskrit scholar, an unrivalled patron of learning, an exemplary teacher, he was the promoter of the rhyme known as 'dvitiyakshara prasa'. He was also an excellent poet both in Sanskrit and in Malayalam, a translator from both in Sanskrit and in Malayalam, a translator from both Sanskrit and English and a pioneer prose-writer in Malayalam. He was also a member of the first committee set up for legislative purposes in Travancore. Further, he was actively associated with the Vidyavinodini, a monthly started by C.P.Achuta Menon in 1890, the Malayala manorama, a daily started by Kandattil Varghese Mappila in the same year, the Bhasha Poshini Sabha, established two years later and the Vidyavinodini, another journal. Again when the Sanskrit College was started in Trivandrum in 1890, he was put in charge of its administration and supervision.

Valia Koil Tampuran's poetical contributions number over fifty, of which thirty are in Sanskrit. Kshamapana-sahasra (1878-80), Yama-pranama-shataka (1880) and Shri-Vishakha-vijaya (after 1880)—all in Sanskrit, are outstanding by any standard. Of the Malayalam works six are 'attakkathas', Manipravaala shakuntalam (1882), Amarukashatakam (1883) and Anyapadeshatakam (1902) are translations from Sanskrit. Broadly speaking, all three, particularly the first, were trend-setters in the sense that they led to a spate of translations from the classical language. One of his best original poetical contributions, if not the very best, is Mayura sandesha (1864), in which he describes himself as sending, while under house arrest at Harippad, a peacock as messenger to his wife who is staying away from him at Trivandrum. Though it is cast in the classic mould of Kalidasa's Meghaduta, its matchless craftsmanship, realistic descriptions, imaginative flights and above all the expression of personal sorrow make the work a perennial source of joy to the readers of Malayalam. Earlier compositions of the kind being later discoveries, it was also the first in its genre in Malayalam at the time of its publication. Daivayogam, another poetical work written at the instance of his famous nephew and disciple, A.R. Rajaraja Varma, is remarkable because it does not employ the author's favourite rhyme in it. Perhaps more significant is Keralavarma's contribution to the development of Malayalam prose, of which there was practically nothing when he was appointed Chairman of the Book Committee mentioned above. Readers 1, 2 and 3, Sanmarga samgraham (1868), Vijnana manjari (1868), Sanmarga vivaranam and a few textbooks dealing with subjects other than language were his first, yet memorable works in prose; they were meant for use in schools. Mahacharita samgraham (1895), a greater work, is a collection of 107 biographical sketches, of which 40 are his own contribution, five those of Visakhom Tirunal and the rest those of other members of the committee. His Akbar (1894), a full-length novel, is a translation from the Dutch original through English. In addition to all this, he promoted prose writing in every possible way. As a matter of fact, a general charge against him is that he indiscriminately encouraged all prose-writers by introducing and reviewing their works in a most generous manner. But we should remember that without his encouragement at that initial stage, Malayalam literature, especially its prose, would not have developed to what it is today, a medium challenging comparison with that of any other Indian language. He is, therefore, legitimately regarded as the father of modern Malayalam prose.

In his lifetime, Karalavarma enjoyed unusual popularity and commanded unprecedented authority as the champion of Malayalam literature. In 1883 he became a Fellow of the Madras University and in 1895 the C.S.I. title was conferred on him.

K.S.N.

KESAUJI, GODARO (Rajasthani; b. 1573, d. 1679) was a resident of the village Madiyo near Nokha town in Bikaner. In his boyhood he developed a spirit of detachment and enrolled himself as a disciple of Vilhoji by donning the robe of an ascetic. Vilhoji was a great poet and social reformer in the hierarchy of pupils of Jambhoji the founder of 'Vishnoi sampradaya'. Kesauji completed his work, Katha Mrighalekh ki, in Bikaner on the 14th day of the bright half of Chaitra in the year 1679. He had gained wisdom from his vast experience and knowledge. He was an accomplished saint of the highest order, an expert at singing and a widely travelled spiritual man. Almost all his writings can be set to music in various ragas and raginis. His composite works are Katha bal-lila, Katha Udai Atali ki, Katha Sainsai Jokhani ki, Katha Medatai ki, Katha Chittaur ki, Katha Iskandar ki, Katha Jati Talav ki, Katha Loha Pangal ki, Katha Vigatavali, Pahalad kirat, Katha Bhimva Dushasani, Katha Surgarohini, Katha Bahasovani and Mrighalekh ki. His miscellaneous writings include Sakhi, Harajas, Kavitta, Savaiya, Chandrayana, Duha (Doha), Stuti avtar ki and Das avtar ka chhand. All these works appear in manuscripts. The Sakhi contains description of spiritual subjects, but two of them also contain observed events in which the Vishnois gave up their lives in defence of their cherished ideals. One of them being the cutting of 'Khejadi' trees and the other the unjustified tax levied by the rulers. It is interesting to note that cutting of green trees is prohibited in the Vishnoi sampradaya and it forms an integral part of their 29 tenets. Whenever these principles were violated, the Vishnois did not lag behind in sacrificing their lives. There are many such examples, and these Sakhis stand witness to them. In the rest of the miscellaneous writings a variety of subjects has been covered.

Humility, matching action with one's word, importance of God's name, the greatness of 'guru', God and spiritual devotion, the futility of worldly relations, the old age, etc. are the main topics covered in them. These writings, more especially the Duhas (dohas), contain the grief of the contemporary society living in the desert land, the lack of proper manners and morals in them and their ostentatious nature and ignorance. The poet has sometimes expressed his slight resentment at these, and pity and sorrow over others.

The first eight out of the aforesaid fourteen works contain emotional description of various events and incidents relating to the life of Jambhoji. In its totality this material is also important from the point of view of contemporary history and social behaviour. The katha Bhimva Dushasani describes how Dushasan was killed by Bhima when he insulted Draupadi. The Katha Surgarohini tells the story of the Pandavas ascending the heaven when the great war had ended. The Katha Bahasovani describes the Svarnayajna (Golden sacrifice) performed by the Pandavas or the deliverance of the spirit of their father Pandu from the hell where he lived. All these three stories are related to the Mahabharata. In Katha Vigatavali the story of Vishnu's incarnation as Narasimha is described. It is notable that the poet has herein given some suggestions for refinement of speech wherever demanded by the occasion. By citing examples of the correct and the incorrect speech, he has tried to encourage people to speak correctly. A similar attempt was made by his teacher Vilhoji in his Sacha akhari vigatavali. Kesauji occupied a unique place in Rajasthani literature in this respect also. The well-known story of Prahalad and the favour shown to him by Vishnu finds place in Pahalad kirat. The poet has advanced some new concepts in this work in several contexts. This may not only be taken as the best composite work of the poem, but also as one occupying a place of pride among the medieval Rajasthani composite writings based on the Puranic legends on account of its depth of feelings, aesthetic sense, easy communicability and use of folk-language. The book contains 506 verses which can be set to music in various main and subsidiary ragas. In Katha Mrighlekh ki the poet purports to emphasise that whosoever puts anybody to trouble unnecessarily, has to undergo greater trouble than that experienced by his victim. One should, therefore, desist from doing wrong to others. The writings of Kesauji are a must for persons desiring to know about the contemporary society of the desert land and the culture of its masses. The poet had a perceptive knowledge of the society of his times. These tales cover a vast field. Almost every section and profession of the society has been depicted in a beautiful and realistic way, so much so that considerable knowledge about domestic animals like camels, bullocks and a variety of cows has been given. The descriptions relating to women and also those suggested or meant as such are more interesting and attractive. In the same manner, the routine of life and the behaviour of the Jogis of the Nath sect, their thoughts and practices for achieving perfection are described. This material regarding the Nath sect and the Jogis is rarely found in other contemporary Rajasthani literature. The dialogues are of the highest quality and are dramatic in nature. His moral sayings are often suggestive in nature, and produce instant impact. His language is as simple as the spoken language of the common man. He has adopted for his writings all such metres as were prevalent in those days. His own person and his creations occupy a unique place in Rajasthani literature.

KESHAV CHAITANYA (Marathi; b.1524, d.1571), was a Marathi Saint-poet belonging to 'Chaitanya' sect. Krishnadas Bairagi (1690-1780) in his biography in verse 'Chaitanya Leela' mentions some of the books composed by Keshav Chaitanya namely Bhaktiprakash, Vaikunthapada, Vasanamaya Doha, Geeta Bhagwat Sar and Paramartha Vichar. Except for a few verses his works are not easily available. Marathi saint-poet Tukaram refers to a book called Geeta Bhagwat which is possibly Keshav Chaitanya's Geeta Bhagwat Sar.

The real name of Keshav Chaitanya was Vishwanath Nrasinha Rajarshi. He was born in Punawadi, a village in Pune district. He had an opportunity to meet the pioneer of the Chaitanya cult, Raghav Chaitanya (1460-1560), after which he joined the Chaitanya cult. He went on a pilgrimage to Kashi along with his Guru. On his return he settled down in Ottur, a village in Pune district and was known as the second great seer of the Chaitanya cult. He declared Babaji (1551-1650) as his heir, who later on became known as Tukaram's 'Guru'.

KESAVA DEV, P. (Malayalam; b. 1905) is a novelist, short story writer, playwright and one-time political activist. Kesava Dev was born in a Nair family in Parur as the son of Kartyayani Amma and Appu Pillai. He was originally Kesava Pillai which name he changed into Kesava Dev when he was an Aryasamajist worker. Dev had a variegated political and literary life. He was associated for a number of years with the Communist Party in Kerala and with the left-wing and trade union politics. Later he moved away from the Party and became its critic with the same force and determination that he had shown as its worker. He wrote literature both as a party worker and as an outside critic. Dev who once worked as an Aryasamajist later publicly burnt the Ramayana and organised feasts where beef was served as a ritual. For the best part of his life he was a rebel against some thing or the other and for that matter a rebel to be reckoned with.

Dev has been one of the powerful leaders of the literary renaissance that was brought about around 1930 in Malayalam literature, especially in the areas of the novel, short story and drama. New socialistic ideas and exposure to contemporary European literature led to the emergence of a realistic and aggressive literary pattern. Compelling socio-economic problems demanded the attention of the writer which he gave in crusader's spirit. There was also a corresponding widening of the area of readership. This in its turn led to a stark, simple and popular style.

Kesava Dev began during this period as a writer of short stories. He then moved on to writing novels and dramas besides pieces in literary criticism. By now Dev has published more than twenty-five volumes in each of the spheres of the novel and the short story and a slightly fewer number of plays. He has also published his autobiography characteristically titled Etirppu (Revolt). In 1964 his novel Ayalkkar (Neighbours; 1963) was given the Sahitya Akademi Award.

Ayalkkar is the story of the decline of an aristocratic Nair family pictured against the panoramic background of fast-changing social conditions and power equations. The chief of the family is drawn in heroic proportions and events involving a communal riot lead to his imprisonment and to the decline of the family.

In his novel Otayilninnu. (From the gutter, 1942) Kesava Dev narrates the story of Pappu, a rickshaw-puller with a sense of sturdy independence and full of fighting spirit. He finds a purpose in his life after his rickshaw by mistake one day knocks down a young girl Lakshmi by name. Pappu picks the girl up and from that day becomes her patron and protector. He becomes a member of the girl's family consisting of herself and her mother. He helps the extremely poor mother and daughter and sends the girl to school. In the years that follow his health breaks down, but he works with passion to finance the girl's education and to make her happy. He is also aware of a change that has come over the girl's feelings towards him. While scoring successes at school and keeping company with her rich classmates, she is ashamed of her rickshaw-pulling benefactor. But he does not mind. He is the happiest person when a rich well-meaning young man belonging to the city offers to marry the girl. This young man has already admonished the girl for her wrong attitude towards Pappu for whom she has now great warmth and affection. After the girl's marriage Pappu is asked to move into his 'daughter's new home. But he refuses. Though sick and lonely, he is happy that she is happy and that is all he wants.

KESAVA MENON K.P.-KESAVA PILLAI, K.C.

This novel, like some of his other works, is indicative of the halo which Kesava Dev constructs around the head of the working class. Dev has doubtless brought out the poverty, the degradation and misery of the working class and the exploitation they have been subjected to. In the process he has created the picture of the strong, sturdy independent individual, proud to the point of arrogance, but basically kind and large-hearted. The central figure of Ayalkkar too is such a character except that he is the head of an aristocratic family. Dev has used much of himself to create such characters. Through his works Dev has made a distinct contribution to the literature that sped up the betterment of the conditions of the working class. To his period of estrangement with the Communist Party belongs the play Nanippokkamunistakum (Beware, I will become a Communist now, 1953). Dev has a sharp and expressive style.

FURTHER WORKS. Eturppu (Revolt, Parts I & II, 1960, 1965); Bhrintalayam (A mad-house, 1963); Terenjedutta Kathakal (selected short-stories Pt. II, Kottayam, 1965; Pt. I, Kottayam, 1969), Kesava Devinte natakangal (The plays of Kesava Dev Kottayam, 1967), Swapnanm (Dream, Kottayam, 1967), Adhikaram (Power, Kottayam, 1968)

K.R.P.

KESAVA MENON, K.P. (Malayalam; b. 1886, d. 1978) was a celebrated freedom fighter, politician, diplomat, editor and author. His father was Prince Bhimachchan of Palghat royal family and mother, Minakshi Netyaramma. He was born at Tarur, Palghat. His career was an eventful one and has left an indelible mark on the life of Kerala in several spheres. He was a Barrister and practised at Calicut from 1915. During that period he was a leader of the Home Rule Movement. He was Secretary of the Kerala Pradesh Congress Committee in 1921. He was imprisoned in the same year for his participation in the Non-Co-operation Movement. He founded the newspaper Matribhumi in 1923 and was its editor. He proceeded to Malaya in 1927 and practised law there. During the Second World War he was associated with Netaji Subhashchandra Bose in the Indian Independence Movement. He was a Minister in Netaji's Cabinet. He was imprisoned by the Japanese after he resigned from the Cabinet. In 1948 he returned to Calicut and took up the editorship of the Matribhumi. In 1951 he became Indian High Commissioner in Ceylon. Later, he resigned his post and returned to Calicut and was again editor of the Matribhumi in 1952. He continued in that capacity till he died. He was working President of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi from 1957 to 1960. He was also the Akademi's first Fellow.

Menon was a prolific writer and has several volumes to his credit. His writing career started in 1915 and continued till his death though he lost his eyesight in 1958.

He made distinguished contributions to the fields of biography, autobiography, travelogue, history, political writings and essays in ethics. His earliest writings were political tracts, biographies of great men and travelogues. These works were Bharatamaha janassabha (Indian National Congress), 1916, Lokamanya Balagangadhara Tilakan (1917) and Mahatma Gandhi, (1920). During this period he also wrote a travelogue which is quite well-known. This is Bilattivishesham (News about England, 1916).

Menon's most significant works were however to be written in his later years. In 1968-1969 he published a biography of Mahatma Gandhi entitled Rashtrapitavu (Father of the Nation) in two volumes. He received a best book award for this from the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. Navabharatashilpikal (Makers of New India) is a biographical work in two parts published in 1963 and 1966. Jawaharlal Nehru, another biography, was published in 1966. Yesudevan published in 1971 is a life of Christ. In 1957 he published Kazhinja kalam (The old days), an autobiography for which he received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1958.

Kesava Menon has always been interested in the pursuit of a moral ideal. We find him thus writing didactic works right from his early days. Thus jivitachintakal (Thoughts on life) appeared in 1953 from Kozhikkode. Twenty-two moral essays formed the contents. Prabhata-dipam (The light in the morning, 1960) and Vijayattilekku (Towards victory, 1963) followed.

As an editor, Menon used to write a column every Monday. These were collected together into four volumes entitled Nam munnottu (We move forward).

When K.P. Kesava Menon died at the ripe old age of 92 the loss to public life and literature was keenly felt. He was a person noted for his compassion, sensitivity, moral values and uprightness. He left behind a rich legacy.

KESAVA PILLAI, K.C. (Malayalam; b. 1868, d. 1913) was born in Parur near Quilon as the second son of his parents. He started learning Malayalam and Sanskrit at the age of five. But his formal education came to an end when he was 15. His informal education continued indefinitely and he acquired, with the help of gurus and by his own perseverance, profound knowledge of Sanskrit and a practical command of English. He was equally interested in music and composed in later life, not only a musical drama but also a large number of songs to be sung in classical ragas. For this, he earned the title 'Sarasa-gayakakavimani' (the jewel among sweet-singing poets) from Keralavarma Valia Koil Tampuran, the doyen and patron of the literary world of the period in Kerala. Having worked as a teacher for 14 years from 1888 onwards he shifted to Trivandrum in 1902 when he was appointed tutor to the son of Maharajah Srimulam Tirunal. He spent the rest of his life there.

Whether as a translator or as an original writer, Kesava Pillai was a typical representative of the age in which he lived and an early inaugurator of the age of the renaissance that followed. His multi-faceted personality also accorded well with the transitional spirit of the times. He was a mythologist by education, a moralist by circumstances, and a reformist by choice and all his outpourings illustrate one trait or another of his complex individuality.

Kesava Pillai's literary output is by no means small. There are forty works in all, including three attakkathas, seven collections of musical compositions, eighteen poems and songs including four major translations, two collections of shorter poems, four dramas, four commentaries and two story books. All his poems have an ease and grace, clearness and fluency seldom found in a poet of his erudition.

Of all his original poetical works, Asanna marana chinta shatakam is easily the best and the most memorable. Written in one of the longest Sanskrit metres Shardulavikridita, each line having 19 syllables, it is a nostalgic retrospection of a middle-class householder of Kerala, who, having enjoyed a prosperous youth and middle age is bedridden owing to the afflictions of old age. The dying man recalls many a thing or person with a tenderness and pathos that is sure to produce an echo in the reader's heart. There is also an incidental, yet quite relevant aside on death. It has to be remembered in this connection that the poem is the finest fruit of his frequent participation in the literary contest involving extempore versification then in vogue.

Kesava Pillai's last and most ambitious work is a mahakavya named Keshaviyam (1913), a significant title referring to the content and the author. The theme is the puranic story of 'Syamantaka' in which Kesava, i.e. Lord Krishna, is the hero. Keshava Pillai had two well defined motives for attempting the poem: to exemplify his contention that sense is more vital than sound and to demonstrate that there is nothing sacrosanct about the rules governing the composition of the mahakavya genre. Though he cannot be said to have fully succeeded in achieving either, his outlook was indisputably forward looking as later literary developments in Malayalam show.

KESAVAN NAIR, KUTTIPPURATHU (Malayalam; b. 1882, d. 1959) was a celebrated Malayalam poet. He was first a school master and later a lecturer in Malayalam in the Maharaja's College at Ernakulam. As a poet he belonged to what was known as the 'Vallattol School' which derived its name from the distinguished poet Vallattol Narayana Menon. Kesavan Nair was related to Vallattol by marriage. Kesavan Nair's poetry was distinguished by a love of the countryside and its natural excellence. The poet felt a personal relationship with the vegetables he cultivated in his yard and the flower plants he grew in his garden. When a fruit appeared on his pumpkin creeper he celebrated the event as if a son were born to him. Kesavan Nair's poetry gets the aura of gentle nature mysticism from his kinship with Nature. His line "nattinpuram nanmakalal prasiddham" (the countryside is rich in its blessings) is oft-repeated.

Kesavan Nair was a prolific poet. His published works are: Kavyopaharam (An offering of poetry, 1930), Navopaharam (A new offering, 1936); Shrimati (1938); Prapancham (The universe, 1946), Onam kazhinju innu (Onam is over, 1957), and Subhashitangal (Wise sayings, 1959).

Besides these he also translated the Pratimanataka of Bhasa and published it from Cheruturutti in 1948.

KESHAVDAS (Hindi; b. 1561, d. 1623), was a court poet, patronized by the king of Orchha, Maharaja Inderjit Singh and Virdev Singh, eminent warriors of Bundelkhand. He was God-fearing but romantic by nature. He possessed a versatile personality. His authentic and available works are Ratanbhavani (1583), Rasikpriya (1591), Nakhshikh (1600), Barahmasa (1600), Ramchandrika (1600), Kavipriya (1601), Chhandmala (1602), Virsinghdev charitra (1607), Vijanan gita (1610) and Jahangiryash chandrika (1612). There are two main dimensions of Keshav's poetry. He was an eminent scholar of poetics. He commands an outstanding historic importance as a pioneer of Hindi poetics and is known as the founder of Hindi poetics. He is also known as the founder of Hindi 'Riti kavya'. He co-ordinated the traditional principles of Sanskrit poetics with traditions in Hindi literature till his time. Thus, he created a poetics in Hindi for the benefit of readers and budding poets alike. Keshavdas was a unique scholar and a poet who had deep insight, comprehensive knowledge and originality. He also possessed the genius of a historian. In his works entitled Ratan bhavani, Virsinghdev charitra and Jahangiryash chandrika, we find references to many historical facts which have not been mentioned by the contemporary historians.

The desire to impress readers with his scholarship lends disproportionate importance to his craftsmanship at the cost of sentiments. So far as the poetic forms are concerned, Keshavdas excelled himself as a narrative poet of Ramchandrika and a symbolical writer of an allegory Vijnan gita. Allegorical and symbolical poetry are his original contribution to Hindi literature. As a narrative poet Keshavdas is different from the traditional narrative poets in Hindi. He attached more importance to dramatic element and the beauty of dialogues in it. Beauty of nature held little charm for him. He believed more in glamour than in sentiment. He was fond of the beauty of the figures of speech. He was a lover of pun. Being a court poet, he was more cautious about the glamour and its impact on the audience. He expressed himself in Brajbhasha. His poetic diction was very much grammatical and flawless. He was the first poet who used Brajboli in its adequate and refined form. Because of the background of Bundelkhand, the poet also used a few words and usages of the Bundeli dialect in his expression. Keshavdas has mainly used the Sanskrit metres because of his vast study of Sanskrit poetics. The frequent use of Sanskrit vocabulary made his language a bit too stiff and ornamental. Keshavdas was a poet of historic importance in medieval Hindi literature.

KESHIRAJA (Kannada; 1260) is the author of Shabdamanidarpanam. It is learnt from his book that he was the son of Mallikarjuna, whose work Suktisudharanava is the earliest anthology of old Kannada poetry wherein the poems were compiled in accordance with the eighteen kinds of descriptions (Astadashavarnanas) dealt with in epic poetry. Keshiraja also mentions the name of Sumanobana as his maternal grand-father. Though the name of Sumanobana is quoted very often by the Kannada poets, till today nothing is known about his works. As regards Mallikarjuna, he had the patronage of Someshwara, the Hoysala king who ruled between 1233 and 1254. Suktisudharnava was prepared by Mallikarajuna to enlighten his patron. As per the facts available at present, Keshiraja too seems to have been in a good position either in the court of Someshwara or his successor Narasimha III (1254-1292). Keshiraja mentions at the end of his grammar that he wrote a few works, viz, Cholapalakacharitam, Chitramala, Subhadraharanam, Prabodhadhachandram, and Kiratam. None of these works has been discovered so far. The scholars have made attempts to trace some of the poems belonging to Cholapalakacharitam scattered here and there quoted as examples. Even the subjects too are matter of guess. But nothing can be said with certainty about these unknown works. There is a controversy among scholars about the caste of Keshiraja due to the different kind of interpretations of the materials available. However, it is generally accepted that he was a Jain.

Keshiraja's Shabdamanidarpanam is a monumental work in the field of Kannada grammar. Though Nagavarma II had already written Karnataka bhasabhushana and Shabdasmriti earlier than Keshiraja, none of them was exhaustive. Keshiraja had several advantages over the others. He belonged to a family of scholars. The old Kannada period had come to an end yielding place to medieval Kannada. There were a number of works written by leading poets in Kannada. Though he did not mention clearly the name of any grammarian, it is evident that he followed Nagavarma's Shabdasmriti very closely, both in writing his sutras and in giving examples. Similarly, the recent studies of this unique work in Kannada have revealed that Keshiraja was very much indebted to Katantra grammar in Sanskrit. However, one has to admit that he did not follow the earlier works on grammar blindly. There is ample evidence to show that he had the inclination to observe the characteristic features of the Kannada language whenever the occasion permitted him.

The work Shabdamanidarpanam is divided into eight chapters, viz., euphonic combination (sandhi), nouns (name), compound works (samasa), secondary nominal bases (taddita), verbs (akhyata), verbal roots, (dhatu), corrupted works (apabhramsa) and indeclinables (avyayas). The so-called first chapter includes the introduction as well as the account of alphabet. As regards the method followed by him, a few points have to be borne in mind. Keshiraja gives the definition (sutra) in 'kanda padya' just as Nagavarma II in his Shabdasmriti. Then there is an explanation in prose known as Vritti. To substantiate the grammatical point, he quotes examples from several Kannada works. The scholars are again divided in their opinion about the authorship of vritti as we come across different readings. But Keshiraja clearly states in one of the sutras that he has been obliged to write an explanation in prose for each definition since the sutra will not be comprehensive due to its limitation. However, this particular stanza, which is doubted by a few, is in fact there in all the manuscripts. Hence, the authorship of prose explanation is undeniable. It is true that there are variations which can be accounted to the scribes mostly. Two manuscripts of Shabdamanidarpanam are available where the vrittis are written separately by others. The name of one of these is known as Linganaradhya and the other's name is not yet known. While undertaking to write his explanatory notes in prose, Linganaradhya says clearly that he felt the vritti written by Keshiraja was incomplete. This serves as an external evidence to prove that Keshiraja was the author of Vritti. As said before, Shadbamanidarpanam is the sole authoritative work on grammar in Kannada. Hence, it was mostly used by the students in those days who too might have played their part in adding marginal notes while studying the work. In due course, such marginal notes could have been copied as parts of the text by the scribes leading obviously to variations. Even the examples quoted by Keshiraja are not uniformly the same in different texts. In some, the stanzas are said to be complete as found in Nagavarma II. A large number of texts are found to have the relevant portion of a stanza only. Therefore, it is apt to infer that Keshiraja might have confined himself to the relevant portion of a stanza to stress the grammatical point referred to unlike Nagavarma II, who is obliged to quote a stanza in full since his work Kavyavalokana deals with poetics where Shabdasmriti is a chapter. As D.L. Narasimhachar has pointed out in his learned Preface to his edition of Shabdamanidarpanam these problems cannot be settled until and unless a critical edition or Shabdamanidarpanam is published.

Keshiraja was a born grammarian. He substantiates with copious examples whatever he states in his definition. Even these examples are so selective that one can understand his refined taste and poetic insight. He richly deserves the name of a poet which is admitted by himself as 'Kavi Keshavahom' (I, the poet Keshava). If his literary works were available, this aspect would have come to light more impressively. Though his grammar is mainly prescriptive in approach his observations about the wrong usages of old Kannada have enhanced its value as a descriptive grammar of the medieval Kannada. The modern linguists have made a special study of his grammar from his point of view, the results of which are really enlightening. Some of his descriptions and explanations of the grammatical points even resemble the modern concept of Linguistics. His grammar is thus applicable even today. Finally, it may be said that it is not only a grammar of old Kannada but also a golden treasury of rich quotations culled out from the various works of Kannada poets. The following tribute paid by Burnett to Shabdamanidarpanam upholds Keshiraja's eminence among the grammarians of the sister languages.

"The great and real merit of the Shabdamanidarpanam is that it bases the rules on independent research and the usage of writers of repute; in this way, it is far ahead of the Tamil and Telugu treatises, which are much occupied with vain scholastic disputations."

KESOBASA (Marathi) is also known as Kesirajabasa, Kesava Pandit, Kesavaraj Suri, Kesavacharya and Kesirajamuni. He flourished in the latter half of the 13th century.

A Mahanubhava author, Kesobasa was one of the chief disciples of Nagadevacharya. He was honoured as a learned scholar in the cult. He left his wife in order to enter the Mahanubhava cult. He took interest in the religious discussions. Kesobasa wanted to render the master's sermons into Sanskrit verse, but as the Mahanubhavas eschewed Sanskrit, Nagadeva prevented him from undertaking this work.

Kesobasa was well-versed in the philosophy of Mahanubhava cult and Chakradharaswami's teachings. He compiled two books Sutrapatha and Drishtantapatha with the permission of the Acharya, in order to systematise the Mahanubhava philosophy. These books were highly admired by the members of the cult. The task was completed during 1280-1286.

Sutrapatha consists of Sri Chakradhara's 'Vachanas' and is divided into eleven chapters. Kesobasa compiled all the philosophic vachanas of Sarvajana from Mahimbhat's Lilacharitra and prepared tri-fold Sutrapatha: lakshana (definitions), achara (behaviour) and vichara (thinking). These sutras are set in order. Of these, 782 are edited by Kesobasa, 240 by Parashuram, 218 by Rameshvara and 15 by others. The motivation behind bringing out the compilation was to educate the followers. Accordingly, it acquired the status of a book to be read every day (Nityapatha).

After editing Sutrapatha, Kesobasa prepared the Drishtantapatha. He chose 114 'drishtantas' or parables out of the sayings, sermons and parables of his master Chakradhara, delivered by him from time to time in order to explain his philosophy. He wrote explanatory notes on each drishtanta, and thus, prepared the book. This was done in 1285. The teachings were thus made simple for the laymen to understand. The drishtantas have become attractive due to story element included in them, but the stories have been used as an instrument of philosophic discourse only. He also prepared the 'Lapamik' (subject-wise index) for the Drishtantapatha.

Apart from this editorial work, Murtiprakasha, Avasthabhita Gita and Ratnamala are independent works to his credit. Murtiprakasha, written in 1289, consists of description of Chakradhara's figure. While describing different limbs of the Swami, the poet follows the descriptive pattern of the Mahanubhava philosophy. The poetry ends with the narration of an emotional episode depicting the pathetic state of Nagadevachrya after the final departure of Chakradhara.

A prose book, Gudhe, explaining the teachings of Nagadevacharya was also written by Kesobasa.

KETAKADAS KSHEMANANDA (Bengali) was one of the most popular writers of the Manasamangala poems, which eulogise Manasa. He was born in Selimabad Pargana (near the border the Hughli and Burdwan Districts of West Bengal). His father was Shankar Mandal.

The date of Kshemananda's work can be fixed with some certainty. Bara Khan, who ruled Selimabad Pargana, lived at least upto 1634-35, which is the date of a deed of gift written during his rule. Shortly after, he was killed in a battle and the poet left Selimabad. Bharmalla, a Zemindar, who founded the Tarakeshwar temple in the seventeenth century, gave shelter to the family of the poet. It seems the poet received Manasa's order sometime in 1638-39. So, he completed the poem shortly after that date.

Kshemananda is the name of the poet, 'Ketakadasa' is an adjective which means, 'servant of Manasa'.

Kshemananda's poem is lucid. The poet has painted all the characters, especially Behula, quite ably. Behula's ordeals bring tears to the eyes of the readers.

Kshemananda Manasamangala became popular not only in West Bengal, but also in other areas of Bengal.

KETKAR, S.V. (Marathi; b. 1884, d. 1937) was the first encyclopaedist in Marathi, and an eminent sociologist, historian, novelist and thinker. Originally hailing from Konkan, he matriculated from Amaravati and was admitted to Wilson College, Bombay. Though teachers called him 'an encyclopaedia', he did not complete his education in that college. He sold his ancestral house and joined the Cornell University in the USA in 1906. There he did his M.A. and Ph.D. in 1911. His thesis was on The History of Caste in India Vol. I (1909) wherein he determines the date of Munusmriti, and its Vol. II (1911) was called An essay on Hinduism, its formation and future. Later An essay on Economics: Hindu Law and the Methods and Principle of the historical study thereof, was published in 1917. From 1913 he was the Professor of Economics, Science of Administration and Universal Jurisprudence in Calcutta University. In 1914 he suggested the idea of linguistic states, in a pamphlet published in Madras. On 8 July 1916 he registered Maharashtra Jnankosh Mandal Limited, a company for a Marathi encyclopaedia. For this purpose he started a research magazine called Vidya sevak, which published only articles and novels. Working single-handed, he published 23 volumes of the Marathi Encyclopaedia from 1921 to 1929. The work has introductory volumes from first to the fifth. Beginning from 1915, he spent fourteen years in research and writing these volumes. In 1927, he wrote a book, Majhebara varshan-chekarya (My work for twelve years). He even planned to translate his Encyclopaedia into Gujarati and Hindi, but did not succeed beyond one volume.

In 1926, Ketkar wrote his first novel Gondavanatil Priyamvada, and in 1930 the second novel Brahmanakanya Till his last novel Vichakshana in 1937, he wrote seven novels. His novels contain radical ideas about social reform. His other books include a work on literary criticism, Maharashtriyanchem kavyaparikshan (1928) and Nisshastranche Rajkaran (Politics of the unarmed, 1928). His work Prachin Maharashtra satvahan parva (1935) is not considered by historians as very authentic.

He won many literary laurels. In 1926, he presided over Sharadopasak Sammelan, and in 1931, he presided over the Maharashtra Sahitya Sammelan, Hyderabad session. He married in 1920 a German scholar of Jewish descent whom he converted by vedic rites and renamed her Shilavati. They had no children, but they adopted two orphans.

KETLANK KAVYO (Gujarati) is a compilation of poems by Nanalal, the foremost lyricist of modern Gujarati. Taking into consideration the poet's rich and varied lyrical contribution, his poetical work Ketlank Kavyo (Parts, I, II and III) is remarkable for the artistic beauty attained by him. Part II of Ketlank kavyo is the best of these three collections.

Some of his lyrical poems are composed in rhythmic prose, which is his own innovation. He has called it 'Dolanshaili'. The lyrical poems 'Yauvana' and 'Saubhagyavati' composed in dolanshaili excel in elegance and charm. The poet here portrays Indian womanhood in an idealistic form. He is most romantic in these two poems. He can paint the pictures of beauty with words. Similarly, the image of his 'Gurudev' is brought out with brilliance in 'Gurudev'. 'Namo Namah!' There is a cluster of his poems dealing with the pen-pictures of his devoted wife, Manekba, whom he considers the real source of his inspiration. In the poem 'Sanskritinun Pushpa', he has idealised his spouse. To him she is the symbol of Aryan culture. If any Gujarati poet has consistently written most about the love of and for the devoted wife with rare sincerity and true emotion, the poet is none other than Nanalal.

Most of his lyrics deal with nature and love, sometimes both mingled with each other. The elements of nature and human emotions, particularly the emotion of love, are interwoven intrinsically in his poetry. In 'Sarovar', he compares the quiet lake with his simple and innocent beloved wife. His idea of 'Punailagna' (Remarriage) is the enthusiastic celebration of the marriage anniversary. He has religiously written at least one lovepoem with his wife at the centre, on each marriage anniversary.

His philosophy of history and life is conveyed in 'Girnarne charane' (At the footsteps of the mount Girnar). His philosophy of death and relation of the soul (Atma) to Super-Soul (Paramatma) is ably expressed in 'Shravani amas'. 'Brahma diksha' and 'Dharma rajana parshada viday'. The poet has established an intimate rapport with death, without any feeling of fear or terror.

The poet is equally at home in the metrical composition, the rhythmic prose as well as songs, including the ones patterned on the folk-songs of Saurashtra, where he had passed his childhood days. In 'Virni viday', he brings out the spirit of chivalry and valour of Saurashtra. Taking a simple line of a folk-song, he can create on its pattern a symbolic nature-poem like 'Jhina jhina meh'. He has given a pastoral poem like 'Dhau'. The hidden beauty of nature in Gujarat is exquisitely shown by the poet. 'Sarasno shabda' is one such piece which reveals the charm of nature experienced by the poet. The poet's intense desire for realisation of God is expressed in 'Harinan darshan'. The deep religiosity of the poet is felt in many other poems also. This religiosity and the ethical idealism pervade all his works. His poem 'Stutinun ashtak' has the coveted Upanishadic effect. 'Mabkarje bala' utilizes the symbol of a Yogi (Ascetic) with dexterity. In the poems of Nanalal, nature, love, devotion, meditation, higher vision, beauty, truth and bliss are interlaced, and the resultant mixture gleams with beauty.

The language of the poet is sometimes very ornate. But even then, it has its charm and grandeur. Verbosity is his weakness, the weakness of a genius. With powerful imagination, he can create a lyrical piece charged with intensity of emotion. He has profusely contributed to the genre of poetry, and naturally all his poems are not of the same quality. But the best in him is not below the level of the best in Gujarati poetry. His nom-de-plume 'Prembhakti' suggests the poet's own inclination towards love and devotion, the two central themes of his poetic works. There was such an overwhelming impact of Nanalal's poetry on his contemporaries that one of the major poets of his times, Kanta, wrote on him an epithet, 'the full moon arisen in the firmament of Gujarat'.

I.R.D.

KHABARDAR, ARDESHAR FARAMJI, 'ADAL' (Gujarati; b. 1881, d. 1953) was born in Daman in a respectable family. He was essentially a poet, having started writing poetry from his adolescent days. He started writing in the style of Kavi Dalpatram, the Father of modern Gujarati poetry, but later, established his identity by developing his own style. He had left Bombay in 1908 and returned in 1938, where he lived till his death.

Apart from poetry and literature in general, he was also deeply interested in music, religion, astrology, psychology, Ayurvedic medicines, cricket, etc. In 1952, he even mentioned having witnessed a miracle. He had made a deep study of Zoroastrianism and cultural traditions of the Parsees, and the English language and literature. He wrote Asho Zarattushtrani gatharo par navo prakash (New light on legends of Zoroaster, 1949, in Gujarati), Zoroaster, the first Prophet of the World (1950, in English). He published The Silken Tassal (1918), a collection of poem in English. He also has to his credit two collections of his English poems: Leaf and Flower and The Rest-house of Spirit. With the exception of Gujarati kavitanī rachanakala (1941), a collection of the Thakkar Vasanti Madhavji Lectures delivered in 1939, a metaphorical and sentimental play, Manuraj, written in the style of the Faust, most of his works are collections of poems: Kavyarasika (1901), Vilasika (1905), Prakshika (1908), Bharatno tankar (1919), Prabhatno tapasvi ane Kukkutadiksha (1920), Sandeshika (1925), Kalika (1926), Bhajanika (1928), Rasachandrika (1929), Darshanika (1931), Rasachandrika-parts 1-2 combined (1941), Shriji Transhahro garbo (1942), Nandanika (1944), Gandhi Bapuno pavado (1948) and Kirtanika (1953).

In the words of the veteran scholar and critic of Gujarat, Anandshankar Dhruv, he was the poet with literary inspiration. Love for the country and for God is the most characteristic sentiment that prevails in his poetry. He has the ability to express his thoughts in a pleasant style. He also experimented with metres and thereby made a significant contribution to Gujarati 'pingal'. Under the pseudo names, 'Valkalaram', 'Motalal', 'Sheshadri' etc., he wrote parodies, successfully imitated the styles of the poetic dictions of the veterans like Akho, Balwantrai Thakore, Nanalal, Ramnarayan, V. Pathak and others. These parodies, too, are his noteworthy contribution. An opponent of the 'dolanshaili', or the poetic diction based on rhythmic rendering, he used the same style in his parodies on the poet Nanalal. The predominant sentiment in Khabardar's poetry is that of peace born of a philosophical outlook. While expressing his devotion to God, he tends to become didactic at times.

KHADAK ANI PANI-KHADILKAR, KRISHNAJI PRABHAKAR

However, his patriotic poems expressing his love for Gujarat and India, are still remembered because of their intense sentiment and rich poetic quality. He provides an example of how literary interest can be creatively beneficial. He became popular particularly among the Parsee poets for editing and publishing the poems of Baheramji Malabari, under the title Malabarinan Kavyaratno (Poetical gems of Malabari. 1917).

KHADAK ANI PANI (Marathi) is a collection of articles on literary criticism (published in 1960) written by Gangadhar Gadgil, the well-known short story writer and economist. A second edition was published in 1966, in which his articles 'Language and Literature' and 'pornography in Literature' were also included. The original work has three parts: 'Tattvacharcha' (Philosophical discussions), 'Navasahitya: Darshan ani samarthan (New Literature: Thought and justification), 'Rasagrahana' (enjoying and appreciating literature). The last part contains articles on Mardhekar and Madgulkar, on a poetic work each by P.S. Rege and Indira Sant, an article each on S.N. Pendse and Anant Kanekar, and one article on Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya's literary work.

In the introduction to this book, Gadgil writes "This is a collection of my occasional literary critical articles. They were motivated by the question, 'Why do I write?'.... I was influenced by the writings of Coleridge, Collingwood, Richards, Eliot, Susan Langer and Mardhekar ... People think that my literary stand is the same as Mardhekar's. I do justify him always, yet this work will show how I differ from him ... In the second part there is a crusader's zeal and some people will feel it belligerent. But those writers who matter do create controversies ... the third part has appreciations of writings after 1946 ... One of the articles is a radio talk on my experiments in the short story."

Gangadhar Gadgil stands for the autonomy and freedom of literature. He is averse to any extra-literary pressure guiding literature, be it political or ethical. He has a scientific view of the changing patterns of man-woman relationship and the constantly re-constructed relationships between the individual and the social set-up. He has a deep love for aesthetic values and a very fine sense of the poetic and sensitive understanding of the tragic, comic and problematic situations in literary creations. He has an independent and strong standpoint and he tolerates no nonsense of the mediocre or sentimental writing. He is a strong advocate of modernism and vehemently refutes the orthodox and prejudiced critics.

KHADANGA, SITADEVI, (Oriya; b. 1902) is a dramatist and a novelist. Born in an orthodox brahmin family of the village Asika in district Ganjam, she had no formal education. Married to Banchhanidhi Khadanga, a school teacher, she has written a number of dramas like Sahodar, (Brother), Nari (Women), Poshyaputra (Adopted son), Naisthika (An orthodox), Prachin panthi (Old-fashioned), Kshudhara pida (The pain of hunger), Matrihina (Motherless). These are all social dramas and were written and staged in various places of Ganjam during nineteen fifties. She has established a stage of her own called 'Harihar natya Mandir'. Moreover, she was the founder of Krishna Singh Sahitya Parishad at Asika. Then she diverted her attention to novels. Poshyaputra (Adopted son, 1948) was originally written in dramatic form and staged in Asika, subsequently rewritten as a novel. It is based on different problems of society. Agraja (Elder brother) is a social novel in which turmoil of party politics is depicted. It contains twenty-seven chapters. Pratyabartan (Return, 1969) is also based on the rural life of Orissa. The language and the style of these novels are stereotype. One can mark the influence of Fakirmohan on these novels. Mo jiban smriti (Memory of my life, 1976) gives an autobiographical note on the writer and is also included in the collected works.

KHADILKAR, KRISHNAJI PRABHAKAR (Marathi: b. 1872. d. 1948) was a dramatist and journalist. He graduated from the Deccan College, Poona in 1892, and before he turned to law, he wrote a very poignant historical tragedy Sawai Madhavrao hyancha mrityu (1893). He cast the young Sawai Madhavrao Peshwa in the shape of Hamlet and the villain of the piece represented Iago. Then appeared Kanchangadchi Mohana, a serious play with the then current patriotic overtones. But strangely enough, his pursuit of drama ceased, when Lokmanya Tilak appointed him on the editorial staff of the Kesari. In 1907, his famous Kichaka-vadha was written and produced, and banned afterwards by the British Government which sensed its undoubted underlying political motivation. The audience, too, had sensed correctly that Kichaka was cast in the image of Lord Curzon and Bhima, who challenged him, was none other but Tilak. All his plays convey the political atmosphere of the time. With the declaration of the World War I, Khadilkar started a long series of war articles in Chitramaya jagat, a nationalist magazine of repute, and his running commentary on the war, as it progressed from year to year, was widely read and acclaimed. After the death of Tilak, Khadilkar resigned from the Kesari and became the editor of the Lokamanya, a Marathi daily.

In the preceding decade Khadilkar had already written his Bhaubandki (1902), a famous historical drama in the allegorical tradition of Kichaka vadha. All these previous plays were composed in vigorous prose. Then appeared the 'Sangit' (musical) Manapman (1910), Vidyaharana (1913), Swayamvara (1916) and Draupadi (1920), which firmly established his reputation as the most popular dramatist of his time. This decade is known as the 'Golden Age' of the Marathi drama, an age which combined the extraordinary talents of the dramatist Khadilkar and the actor Bal Gandharva.

Thenceforth Khadilkar acknowledged Mahatma Gandhi as his leader-mentor and started editing his own daily Nawa kal (1925). In his later plays like Menaka (1926) and Savitri (1933), Gandhian precepts find their echoes. In 1927 and in 1929, he was imprisoned twice on charges of sedition. It is said that an editorial in Kesari written by Khadilkar was responsible for Lokmanya Tilak's imprisonment.

Before Khadilkar thoughtfully retired from politics and play-writing, he had long back presided over the Natya Sammelan (1907), Sangit Parishad (1921) and Sahitya Sammelan (1933). His last twelve years were dedicated to 'tapascharya' (quiet meditation) and saw the publication of his philosophic discourses on Rudra, Purushasukta, Aitereya and Ishavasya Upanishads, Omkar and Trisuparna.

KHAHRI, KAIM KARMAMCHYO, KAIM UARMANCHYO (Konkani), by Lakshmanrao Sardesai, is a collection of autobiographical essays which throw light on him and the Goa of his young days. Though, by and large, the book is an apologia provita sua, it paints a picture of Goa of the early twenties. Autobiography is a difficult form of literature since it is so closely related to life and what may be called 'truth'. It is not always easy to be frank and truthful, and much more difficult to make writing about oneself interesting. Autobiography is a mirror and there is a strong temptation to make up one's face a bit before seeing it. Lakshmanrao Sardesai is not immune from this human failing. But the essays are primarily 'khabris', that is chats, and have the pleasant and intimate flavour of a heart to heart talk with the reader. Lakshmanrao says: "What I saw during my whole life, and what I noted is not little. I saw thousands of persons. I experienced their anger, their desires, their jealousies, their hopes and aspirations. I have seen all the aspects of nature—sea, sky and land. All this I have stored in my mind's sky. Instead of adding to it, I am at present of the opinion that I should digest it, assimilate it, turn it into a part of my own being, and through this strange process, create something novel." The author looks at himself and at others. At times he closes his eyes to the external world and looks within himself, delves deep into his own past and judges himself. The reader unwittingly takes interest in this introspection of the author. The following essays belong to the autobiographical category: 'Old age', 'My eyes', 'Operation'. A bunch of bananas', 'My second wife'. 'My name', 'I am a fakir'.

The following essays belong to the second category: 'Old names'. 'The village teacher', 'Litigations'. 'Toady tapper'. 'The Goan goldsmith'. 'The temple priest', 'Fotito and Ramgo' and 'Crabs'. Many a time, however, the autobiographical element creeps into the essays of the second category, perhaps, to show the great truth that all great writing is ultimately autobiographical.

KHAJURIA, NARENDER (Dogri; b. 1933, d. 1970) was the youngest brother of Vishvanath Khajuria and Ramnath Shastri, two renowned Dogri authors. He was born in Jammu and after completing his Matriculation, joined the Education Department as a Primary School Teacher. He was posted at village Chowki Jandrod in Ramnagar Tehsil, about 108 kilometres away from Jammu. It was here that he came in close contact with the simple people of the hills. A keen observer of men and matters, he observed closely the customs and manners of the hill people, their problems and style of living. He also imbibed their manner of speech and enriched his own diction and vocabulary. As a matter of fact, his stay at Chowki Jandrod proved to be very useful for him and shaped his ideas and language and provided him with rich material for many of his literary creations.

Kole diyan likran was Narender's first collection of short stories. Though his range was limited and he did not seem particularly to be aware of the importance of the locale in his stories, he brought in them a freshness of outlook and firsthand knowledge of the people and the problems he was writing about. 'Din bar' and 'Ki phull bani angare' are two of the powerful short stories of this collection. He wrote stories and one-act plays for children, entitled Rochak kahaniyan and Us bhag jagnae ale an respectively, and the latter won the first State Cultural Academy award for Dogri in 1962.

Narender wrote Shano, a novel, around 1960. The theme of the novel is similar to that of his earlier short story 'Din bar,' and his leading character Shano is one of the best drawn female characters in Dogri, fiction. It provided a real peep into the life of the hill people, their strifes and struggles, their whims and superstitions and their strengths and weaknesses. Its language, its humour and satire are also its positive features, though in the end, Narender presented a facile view of life in this novel.

Narender Khajuria's most important contribution to Dogri is his third collection of short stories entitled Nilā ambar kale badal. It contains fifteen stories. In range and sweep, in the portrayal of their characters, in their forceful language and pithy style, in the presentation of a life-view full of turns and twists, these stories are a big advance over most of the stories of Kole diyan likran. 'Kastu da kala tittar', 'Saddro dai', 'Apna apna dharam', 'Inami Kahani', 'Sach jehra trame de patte par nain lakhua' and 'Ik pattar patjhar da' are some of the best short stories of Narender Khajuria. This collection won for him posthumously the Sahitya Akademi award for 1970.

Narender Khajuria also wrote a full-length stage play Dhaundiyan kandhan. The play depicts, in a humorous style, the crumbling feudal system. It was meant to be played with only one set. Though quite successful on the stage with some slap-stick comedy, its effect has been diluted by Narender's over-emphasis on the verbal repartee.

Narender Khajuria wrote a number of one-act plays and radio-plays which were broadcast over Jammu Radio. He also translated Saratchandra Chatterji's Bengali novel Datta in collaboration with Jitender Sharma, and Gorky's Mother in collaboration with Chanchal Sharma, B.P. Sathe and Dharamchand 'Prashant'.

Narender joined the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Cultural and Language in 1964 as editor of the Shiraza (Hindi), and continued to work in that capacity till his death. He also wrote a play in Hindi, Rasta, kante aur hath and a collection of short stories Raste mein, besides a number of articles and the story of the only film in Dogri 'Gallan hoyian bitiyen.' He also edited some Special Numbers of Shiraza (Dogri).

Narender was a prolific writer with a sense of humour and satire. Few writers can match the verbal beauty of his prose and his complete control over Dogri. He had also written a number of poems in Dogri which were published after his death.

KHAJURIA, VISHVANATH (Dogri; b. 1906) was born in the village Mariaghar in district Udhampur, Jammu and he studied up to B.A. in the Prince of Wales College, Jammu before taking up the career of a school teacher. While still at school and college, he started taking interest in literary get-togethers, composing verses and participating in dramatic activities. When he was posted to the hill town of Ramnagar in 1933, he started a Dramatic Club which put up shows of dramas in the 'Parsi Theatre' tradition. But he soon realised the near futility of such performances for the semi-literate and illiterate people living in a backward area enmeshed in the evils of superstition and untouchability, exploitation and venereal diseases. Influenced by the ideology of 'Arya Samaj', he thought of a programme of social reform by presenting to the people their problems in their own language. That is how the first play in Dogri Achhut came to be written by him. It was staged by school boys under his direction, and proved to be a hit. But it disturbed the peace of the local high-caste Hindus, who contrived to excommunicate him. The one-act play portrays effectively the miserable plight of Harijans of the hills, exploited by the feudal society, and suffering from sexually transmitted diseases. This play, along with four others, all dealing with some social problem, was published in a collection entitled Nilakanth in 1980.

Vishvanath Khajuria is, however, better known for his essays in idiomatic Dogri. These are immensely readable, interesting and bring out the beauty of the Dogri language at its best. There are two collections of these essays, namely Saptak (1960-) and Duggar da jivan darshan (1967), the latter capturing the flow of the cultural life of the Duggar, and the former in the nature of reflections on life with a psychological approach. These books contain some of the best specimens of the personal essay in Dogri. Duggar da jivan darshan was awarded a prize by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Language in 1968.

Besides being the first playwright in Dogri, Vishvanath Khajuria has the distinction of being the author of the first autobiography in Dogri, published in 1985, it is called Pagadandiyan. He has also turned out some excellent translations commissioned by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages. These are from Saratchandra Chatterji's Bengali novel Pather davi. Rajinder Singh Bedi's Urdu novel Ek chadar maili si, Phanishwarnath Renu's Hindi novel Maila anchal and Mirza Hadi Ruswa's Urdu classic Umara-o-Jan-Ada. He played a key role in reviving the Dogri folkdance 'Phummani' which was presented at the All India Youth Conference, Baroda. All World Youth Conference, Delhi (1968) and the Republic Day Celebrations. He deservedly got the credit for his labours. His other contributions include a musical feature Satunjen di samhal (dealing with the 1857 struggle for Independence), and a play on Dogra folkhero, Bawa Jitto. He is a prolific writer and a regular contributor to Dogri journals. His contribution to Dogri literature has been significant on all accounts.

KHAMBA THOIBI SHEIRENG (Manipuri) is one of the first epics in modern Manipuri by Hijam Anganghal Singh, an eminent poet, novelist, essayist and dramatist. Though it was published posthumously in 1964, it had been completed in 1940. In theme and style the poem is indebted to a popular ballad which minstrels or bards used to sing for nights together extending to more than thirty days to complete the story. The present book, though only an abridgement contains forty three chapters and about thirty nine thousand lines. The whole poem is written only in one metre called 'pena saisak'. In this particular metre there are 77 syllable in a line.

The poem deals with the love of Khamba and Thoibi.

KHAMOSH KRERI-KHANAR BACHAN

Thoibi the only daughter of the crown prince Chingkhuba of Moirang falls in love with Khamba, an orphan whose father had once been a courtier and sacrificed his life to save a friend. Nongban, the rival lover supported by Thoibi's father wants to get Thoibi by any means. He with the support of Chingkhuba, seeks to defeat Khamba in all items of competitions in games and sports. As he fails to do so he plans to kill Khamba in collusion with Chingkhuba. Here again he fails. The tussle between Khamba and Nongban goes on. At last both of them are asked to kill a dangerous man-eater. The man-eater kills Nongban and Khamba kills the beast. Khamba gets Thoibi as a prize but both of them die soon after as a sequel to Khamba's love pranks on Thoibi.

Though indebted to a great extent to the popular ballad the poet shows some originality in the form of presentation and characterisation. The author is very much influenced by the Vaishnavite philosophy. The poem is significant and important because it deals with a very popular story which remained confined to the oral tradition for ages.

KHAMOSH KRERI (Kashmiri; b. 1912, d. 1973) was the pen-name of Syed Abdul Jabbar Shah Bukhari, born at Kreri Pattan in a traditionally learned family. His father Syed Mohammad Shah Bukhari was a scholar of repute in Arabic and Persian, besides being a calligrapher of excellence. Abdul Jabbar had his early schooling at a local Maktab and at St. Joseph's High School, Baramula. On the advice of a saint, his father arranged for his religious education. Young Abdul studied Persian and Arabic under Mufti Syed Inayatullah Shah Bukhari of Kreri. As he grew up, he practised the profession of 'Peer Muridi'. He had a close relation with Mohammad Din Fauq (1877-1945), the versatile Kashmiri scholar, historian, journalist and poet. Their correspondence is likely to throw light on many literary and historical events of our time. In 1937, Syed Abdul Jabbar's teacher Mufti Syed Inayatullah passed away, and the young Abdul Jabbar was so moved that he composed an elegy in Persian and read it out at a grief-stricken gathering. From now on he adopted 'khamosh' (i.e., silent) as his pen name. It was the beginning of the emergence of a genuine poet who wrote with equal command in Persian, Urdu and Kashmiri.

Khamosh Kreri's 'Na't' (eulogies) in praise of prophet Mohammad and 'Manaqibs' in praise of Kashmiri saints were published under the titles, Hadiga-i-Na't, Majmua-i-Na't, and Gulzari Na't, besides his Iraais-i-Kashmir (Fairs and festivals of Kashmir). Two booklets entitled 'Poshi Bondi' have also been brought out on his behalf by Kawaja Mohd Amin of Bul-bul Lanker Rainawari. His other poetical works in manuscript form, Rauza-i-Na't, Shajratul Murad, Sailabnamu, Shahar Aashob, Qasaid and Ghazals, are yet to see the light of the day. His Na'ts and Manaqibs reveal his deep devotion to the prophet and his love to Kashmiri saints. In these works he uses appropriate metaphors and similes to suit his plain and simple style.

So far as his quatrains in Kashmiri are concerned we are solely to depend on his Bayazi-i-Khamosh (1968). It contains 357 quatrains composed in three rhyme schemes, thus dividing the book in three sections. The quatrain (rubai) as genre has come to the Kashmiri language through Persian from Arabic. Khamosh Kreri uses a simple and lucid diction with classical flavour. His contemporaries and eminent Kashmiri poets like Syed Mubarak Shah Fitrat and Gh. Rasool Nazki have highly appreciated his poetic talents. He is certainly one of the few quatrain writers who have successfully and refreshingly enriched the treasure of Kashmiri poetry.

Khamosh Kreri has his own refreshing style, using artistically common idioms, and exploring new metaphors to suit his poetic utterances. Being a poet of human love and beauty, he could not bear the sight of injustice and social unevenness and extinction of human values.

KHANAR BACHAN (Bengali) are popular Bengali verses on different topics. A large number of these verses deal with agriculture, i.e. the duties of a peasant in different seasons and the influence of weather on the production of different crops. Another group of verses deal with popular superstitions, i.e. how, according to the popular belief, different omens determine the fortune of men. Here are some examples of these verses:

'Ashadh kaden namke'
'Shravan kaden dhanke'.
Bhadra kaden shishke'.
'Ashvin kaden kise'.

Which means if there is good rainfall in the month of Ashadha (June-July) it yields a small quantity of crops (because the peasant is not generally ready at that time). If there is good rainfall in the month of Shravana paddy is produced (in large quantity). If there is good rainfall in the month of Bhadra (After a drought in Ashadha and Shravana), only the tip (of the paddy-plant) is produced (i.e. the crop is unsatisfactory). If there is good rainfall in the month of Ashvina (after a drought in the earlier three months), what should it be? (It is completely useless as far as the production of paddy is concerned and it causes flood).

'Ore byeta chashar po'
'Sharater sheshe sarshe ro'.

(O the son of the cultivator, my lad, sow the seeds of mustard towards the end of autumn.)

KHANDAKAVYA—MAITHILI—MALAYALAM

'Yadi dyakho makunda copa'.
'ek pao na barao bapa'.

If you see an adult whose moustache and beard have not grown, do not proceed a single step (because it is a bad omen).

'Hanchi tiktiki badha'.
'Je na mane se gadha'.

He who ignores obstacles like the sneezing of a man or a lizard (these are bad omens) is an ass.

According to a tradition, these verses were composed by Khana, the legendary lady astrologer. It is said that she was wedded to Mihira, the son of Varaha, the court astronomer of king Vikramaditya of Ujjain. When the fame of Khana surpassed that of Varaha, the jealous father-in-law cut the tongue of Khana.

But this story cannot be true. According to it, Mihira was the son of Varaha. But Varahamihira is the name of a single person. He was a famous astronomer. According to the older tradition, he was the court astronomer of Vikramaditya. There is no evidence of the historicity of Khana. It is also impossible to believe that the Bengali verses ascribed to Khana were composed by a lady who lived in Ujjain at the time of Vikramaditya. These verses are creations of unknown rural poets of Bengal and they belong to Bengali folk-literature. Dineshchandra Sen believed that they were composed some time earlier than the thirteenth century. But it is difficult to agree with him. The language of these verses is quite modern and they can not be more than two hundred years old.

KHANDAKAVYA (Maithili), is much influenced by Sanskrit khandakavyas. But there has been an extension in its meaning as in that of mahakavya—it is loosely used for much of what ought to be properly called prabandhakavya. It is, however, more popular than the mahakavya perhaps because it is easier to plan and execute. The one quality that is essential in it is the presence of a story—not as long and elaborate as that of the mahakavya, and not presented necessarily in different notes. A few features of the mahakavya alone are sufficient for it. In general it can be described as a long narrative poem, with partial features of the mahakavya.

There are no khandakavyas of the ancient or medieval periods extant. The earliest works which could be called khandakavyas were written in the beginning of the twentieth century as translations and adaptations of Sanskrit works such as, Laladasa's Shambhuvinoda, Ganeshakhanda (1909-1911), and several Vratkathas; Gunavantalaladasa's Gajagrahodhdhara (1914), Sukanyopakhya, Gauriparinayaprabandha (1921) and some vratkathas; Gangadhara Mishra's Naradamoha (1919), Satyavratopakhya (1921), Sukanyopakhya (1921) and Sudamacharita (1935), Anupa Mishra's Naradavivaha; and Damodaralaladasa's Shakuntalopakhya and Savitisatyavanopakhya. Of these works Gangadhara Mishra's khandakavyas are the best.

Khandakavyas, properly speaking, were written later though they were translations such as of Ritusamhara, Meghaduta, Yakshasamagamakavya and Bhartriharinirveda.

Superior to these and in a sense even original were the attempts of Raghunandavadasa such as Virbalaka, Upendranatha Jha Vyas's Sannyasi and Chedi Jha's Koili duti.

Recently some good khandakavyas have been written. These are able to introduce modern themes in the khandakavyas—such as Mathuravanda Choudhari's Krishaka (1946), and the great work of Upendranatha Jha Vyas called Patan (1969). Patan symbolises the fall from political power of people who suffer from conceit and pride.

More valuable are the contributions of Kedarnatha Labh, Labh first translated Poddar Ramavatara's Hindi khandakavya called Ashokaputra. Then came his Lakhima Rani (1960) and Bharati (1964). In both these works he has shown commendable command over his material, and their rhythmic march is superb. In both these khandakavyas the poet has portrayed ideals of Maithili womanhood. Undoubtedly, Lakhima Rani is the greater work in conception, structure, rhythm and diction.

Gangesha Gunjan's Hama: ekata mithya parichaya is not a khandakavya. It shows that today the khandakavya tends to merge in the long poem. A thought-provoking, seriously introspective poem is gradually finding favour with the modern writer in place of a khandakavya.

J.M.

KHANDAKAVYA (Malayalam) is a comparatively short poem, as opposed to the mahakavya which is characterised by length, rigid form and stipulated structure. Its hallmark is brevity. Its brief scope necessitates the distilling and concentration of content. The role of suggestion and the play of imagination become compulsive. The khandakavya's pace is swift; it is surcharged with emotion, is essentially dramatic in the orchestration of moods and thoughts and also in the resolution of conflict.

The khandakavya in Malayalam surfaced during the second half of the 19th century as a reaction to the prevailing neo-classical trend for the mahakavya written in emulation of Sanskrit classics. Its faint precursor may be identified in the erotic effusions of the Venmani school. But it got a real start with the impact of western poetry.

KHANDAKAVYA-MARATHI

A.R. Rajaraja Varma's Malayavilasam, K.C. Kesava Pillai's Asanna marana chinta shatakam, V.C. Balakrishna Panicker's Vishvarupam, etc. are its earliest examples. The birth of the khandakavya proper is to be traced to Kumaran Asan's 'Vina puvu' (1908), his first major work. The fallen flower of the poem is a symbol of beauty and love of life blasted in its prime by callous Fate. The idea is objectified by a dramatic evocation of the conflict and its Upanishadic resolution. Here is a succinct striving towards a goal, an ideal—that of Truth and Beauty, which is demonstrably dramatic and assures unity of form and content. Asan manipulates the form's diverse possibilities in his major works. Vallattol and Ulloor amplified the form further through their inimitable khandakavyas. Vallattol's Sahitya manjari contains excellent pieces like 'Bandhanasthanaya Aniruddhan', 'Shishyanum makam', 'Kochu Sita', 'Bharata strikal tan bhavashuddhi', etc. Among Ulloor's major khandakavyas, 'Karnabhushanam', 'Pingala', 'Bhaktidipika', etc. are significant. After them the genre lost its pre-eminence owing to the debut of the lyric proper. But with necessary changes to suit the changing taste, khandakavya still flourishes.

Khandakavya is different from the narrative poems in English. It is really a blended form, with elements drawn from Sanskrit, English and the native ballad literature. Perhaps it belongs entirely to Malayalam and it is an illustration of the capacity of the language to harmonise and integrate diverse strains.

KHANDAKAVYA (Marathi) as a form of expression was fairly popular in Sanskrit, but it certainly was not rated at par with an epic. The salient features, or some peculiar characteristics which set it apart, were also not clearly mentioned anywhere. In Sahityadarpana, Vishvanatha defines khandakavya as "Poetic narration of a story in a consistent form neatly divided into 'sargas'." It is said to be a long poem but with less than eight sargas, concentrating on one particular aspect of an epic. According to him Kalidasa's Meghaduta is the best example of khandakavya. Since there are no discriminating features strictly defined, even the critics in Sanskrit literature have classified Meghaduta and Chaurpanchashika as khandakavyas carrying a message. But the number of sargas and other characteristics do not have any scientific base and they remain within the form of broad outlines only.

The khandakavyas in Marathi, therefore, have come through the studies of and inspiration from English literature. Krishnashastri Chiplunkar was the first exponent of this form in Marathi. He translated Meghaduta which was brought out in the year 1865. Some other Sanskrit translations followed, but the real source of inspiration remained in English literature, the study of which considerably influenced the literary outlook of the Maharashtrians. In 1867, Bajaba Ramchandra Pradhan wrote Daivaseni based on Scott's Lady of the Lake. In 1869, M. M. Kunte wrote the first independent historical khandakavya in Marathi entitled Raja Shivaji (First three parts published in 1869 and remaining three in 1871). Marathi khandakavya has been classified under two periods, the first from 1865 to 1905 and the second from 1906 to 1950. Even in the modern times khandakavya is not too uncommon.

Khandakavya narrates a story, and so it has to have artistic arrangements of events and dramatic appeal. Most important, however, is the sincerity of emotion. The poetic craft of the poet, the poetic appeal of the story, lively characterization, effective use of nature as a background and lucidity of expression are the things equally important for a khandakavya. The poet writing khandakavya does not enjoy the luxury of elaborate descriptions. He cannot decorate his khandakavya with the help of the external elements. He is expected to tell the truth of life in this form of poetic composition. The inherent play of emotion, however, has to be multifaceted, both ornamental and gripping. The modern critics, therefore, have defined khandakavya as 'a poetic narration of a story focusing on a particular aspect of life charged with objectivity and intensity. It lacks the characteristic grandeur of a 'mahakavya' (epic) as it confines itself only to a part of it'.

The compositions in Sanskrit bearing resemblance to the khandakavya dealt chiefly with mythological themes. Religious feelings were at the centre. Here the deities were made central characters and restraint became obligatory on the part of the poet. But in modern khandakavyas this tendency is absent. The period from 1920 onwards marks the deviation from mythological themes, and the common man next door becomes the theme. Even the characters in mythology are being reinterpreted from a new point of view. The poets enjoy the liberty of expression and treatment. Sectarianism of all kinds has lost its sharpness. Humanitarianism based on logical thinking is highlighted. Freedom of a poet is upheld. Modern khandakavya portrays reality, new values of life and suffocating social surroundings. Women's life, rural life, social problems and other socially relevant subjects have acquired special significance. Accordingly there is variety of subjects in modern khandakavya. Even as a form, there is a lot of change in construction. In modern khandakavya, we find application of 'jativritta', and also lyrics. Forms of sonnets are sometimes used throughout the poem.

Many have based their compositions on the model of Meghaduta and some have composed parodies, and thus, contributed to the development of the khandakavya. Now there is a broad variety of the khandakavyas such as elegaic, rural as also those which deal with psychoanalysis having no formal story line.

Modern poets have composed some khandakavyas on mythological themes, i.e. S.M. Paranjape's Ahilyajar (1926), Kavi Vinayak's Mohanantar (1905), V.V. Bhide's Raghaviya parivah (1908), Sadhudas's Vanavihar (1914) and Ranavihar (1916), V.K. Nerurkar's Radha Krishna rahasya (1918), N.W. Tilak's Christayana (1921), Tiwari's Radha-Madhava (1926), and V.G. Sathe's Sanjivanharana are a few of the renowned khandakavyas. In these, superhuman attributes of the characters have been taken for granted for expressing and generating overwhelming devotion, but practical propriety was overlooked. Similes and metaphors are liberally used. There is no conscientious effort of bringing out any new dimension to the traditional story through interpretation. All the eleven chapters of N.W. Tilak's Christayana bear ample testimony of expression of different 'rasas', autobiographical details, philosophical thought and commentary on life, etc. Sathe's khandakavya depicts B.G. Tilak's patriotism. But no khandakavya has been successful in bringing out any of the profound eternal truths of human life.

Khandakavyas based on historical themes are in larger number than those based on the mythological themes. They are better in terms of literary merit also. Ganeshshastri Lele's Krishnakumari (1874), G.V. Kankar's Srimanta Narayanrav Peshve yancha vadha (1878), Vasudeoshastri Khare's Yashvantray mahakavya (1888), Savarkar's Kamala (1923) and Gomantak (1924) are significant contributions. Tiwari has written historical khandakavyas but none of them could really make any impact, even though they are better executed. Kankar has modelled his Narayanravacha vadha on Scott's style of poetic narration.

Yashvantray is a combination of English and Indian scholarship and the element of suspense in it reigns supreme, crowded by dramatic events. Savarkar in his poetry looks forward to the future and tries to shape the history. Gomantak argues in favour of 'purification'.

After 1930 the number of historical khandakavyas was on the decline and the khandakavyas with social themes came up in a large number. Girish's Abhagi Kamal (1923) and Ambarai (1928) speak of the indifference and unhappiness in women's lives. Abhagi Kamal is an independent khandakavya with its forceful aesthetic appeal and excellent blending of rasas, and its portrayal of intense emotional episodes gave new prestige and popularity to Marathi khandakavya. Ambarai shows how a man, who has weakness for drinks and drugs, goes back to farming and reconstructs himself. His principle is quality farming and less of trade. Based on Abhagi Kamal, more khandakavyas followed. Garibachi Gosht (1931), Bhikar-in (1934), Ughada Gupit (1933), Sharayu (1939) and Vasudha (1957) have been amongst the lot. Shashimohan by Y.M. Pathak (1929) is social in its theme, but off-beat in its message. It depicts a heroic fight put up by a brave young man in the defence of a beautiful damsel to free her from the clutches of a bloke blinded by lust. Madhavrao Patwardhan's Virahataranga (1926) propagates freedom of marriage. According to some critics, in greatness Virahatarang is comparable only to Meghaduta. Sudharak (1928) exposes the hypocrisy prevalent in the society and paints a picture of an ideal society. The language used suits satirical poetry. His Nakulalankar (1939) exposes the malpractices in the field of literature. In Tutalele duve (1938), he brings out the intense pain of heartbreak through sonnets. Poet Yashvant, through Bandishala (1932), points his finger at the nonchalance of the society towards juvenile delinquency and also the plight of a prisoner set free; but then, as the focus shifts from the evils of widowhood to juvenile delinquency, no solid impact is felt. The style of the poem, however, is racy and effective. Poet Anil's two khandakavyas, Bhagnanamurti (1940) and Nirvasit Chini Mulas (1943), speak of the dire consequences of world wars, accentuating imperialism. Bhagnanamurti reveals its concern at the general negligence towards Indian heritage in arts and culture. For social khandakavyas the popular subjects are destitutes, widows, heartbreaks, hand to mouth existence of middle-class, addiction to vices, etc. Marathi romantic khandakavyas are a class by themselves. Lembhe's Suratarangini (1882), later included in Lembhe yanchi kavita (1924), which has love as its central theme, can be called a pioneering experiment in romantic khandakavyas. Kirtikar's Indira (1884), Chandrashekhar's Kay ho chatkar (1932), Rendalkar's Mohini (1913), Girish's Kala (1926), Manmohan's Collegian (1929), Yashvant's Jaymangala (1931), S.V. Jogekar's Hridayharini (1931), V.G. Maydeo's Sudha (1940), V.M. Kulkarni's Visarjan (1943) are a few other romantic khandakavyas having love as their central theme. Virahataranga of Madhavrao Patwardhan also belongs to the same category. Kay ho chatkar is noted for its beautiful description of the life in the countryside, and nobility of love. Jaymangala is marked for experiment in composition and also for its remarkable contents delineating the love's triumph over the lost battle. Yashvant has emerged successful in bringing out the strength of divine love. Some other khandakavyas depict noble sentiments of love lost. According to Todmal, there are some 300 khandakavyas in Marathi of which very few can, strictly speaking, be called khandakavyas. K.B. Nikumb's Mrigavarta (1970) can be cited as one of the examples of modern khandakavyas.

KHANDAKAVYA (Nepali). Vishvanatha in his Sahityadarpana defines a 'khandakavya' as a minor epic, complete in itself, worthy to be accepted as a part of a 'mahakavya' (epic) and having in it some of the essential attributes or qualities of a mahakavya. A khandakavya does not present a comprehensive view of life and the world but deals with an episode and a certain experience born of it. This description sufficiently covers all the Nepali khandakavyas written in the traditional manner but not the modern ones which form a separate class.

The beginning of the writing of the khandakavya in Nepali has been traced to Basant Sharma's Shrikrishna-charitra (1827) which based itself on popular tales about Krishna, current among the common people rather than on the Mahabharata and the Bhagvata-purana. His use of the Sanskrit metres is his pioneering contribution and the great purity of his diction is his achievement. The next important khandakavya that we come across is Bhaktamala (1853) by Bhanubhakta Acharya. It is a devotional work expressing repentance for life's time lost in the pursuance of worldly gains and pleasures. Pikaduta (1917) by Motiram Bhatta falls in the genre of Indian 'dutamavya' and makes a 'pika' (a cuckoo) the carrier of his feelings of love. There have been khandakavyas by other poets too during this period and also other khandakavyas by the aforesaid three poets. But the above mentioned ones are outstanding. In a way we can say that these together paved the way for the real coming of a host of Nepali khandakavyas. The following ones are certainly among the best of the lot.

Rituvichar (1916) by Lekhnath Poudyal (1884-1965) emulates Kalidasa's Ritusamhara but with a great difference. He describes the six seasons by turn with unerring observations and consummate skill. The whole gamut of environmental nature of the Himalayan zone inhabited by the Nepalis comes alive in the description. Delving deeper into the structures of all similes and metaphors one may find the Advaitic oneness.

Different are the forms, lines and hues of every flower;
The light of beauty in them is one and the same.

Rituvichar comprises six vichars (sections) each one uniformly containing one hundred and one stanzas of impeccable structure composed in the 'anushtubh' metre. Lekhnath's other two khandakavyas are Satya-Kali samvad and Buddhi-vinod.

Ago ra pani (Fire and water) by Balakrishna Sama (1902-1981) still further extended the definition of khandakavyas in Nepali. Apart from his use of free verse mixed at times with Vedic metres, this work of his strikes as a complete novelty in that it is supremely discursive and intellectual. The work presented as a prolonged outburst of a suffering soul recounts human history which is made out to be a long struggle between the 'fire' element and the 'water' element on this earth.

Love was water in the corner of the eye,
Anger was fire around its pupil.

Afire might was supreme,
God was born.
In the palace of the victorious plunderer
Heaven was born.
In the shackles of the vanquished and ruled Hell was born.

The final redemption lies in the reconciliation of the two warring elements. Discursiveness predominates, yet there is no dearth of poetry in the work. Here in it poetry is encapsulated in ideas presented in blazing images borne in strings of deceptively simple discourses.

Lakshmiprasad Deokota (1909-1959) wrote in 1946 Ravana-Jatayu-yuddha the most powerful of his four khandakavyas. Ravana is made to signify heroism, Sita beauty and Jatayu resistance against heroism that has gone astray. The work (written in 1964) was significant at two levels: psychic and political, the latter being relevant to our time. His other khandakavyas are: Kunjini (1942), Basanti (1952), Luni (1964) and Mhendu (1964).

Siddhicharan Shreshtha (b. 1912) in his Urvashi (1960) relates the episode of Arjun's rejection of Urvashi. The poet identifies himself with Urvashi and urges her to be above success and failure.

Agam Singh Giri (1928-1971) wrote his Yuddha ra yoddha (War and warriors, 1970) grieving over the ignominious condition of his Nepali compatriots and prompting them to find inspiration from their glorious past. Nepalis, a martial nation, feel humiliated for having to fight battles not their own. As for its literary excellence what strikes the readers most and draws them in is the harmonious balance that is maintained throughout the work between discursiveness and aestheticism. Other important khandakavyas that he wrote are: Yad (1955) and Aansu.

The latest breed of Nepali khandakavyas is modernistic. Mahan Koirala's (b. 1926) Suryadan (Gift of the sun) and Lek (Mountainous region, 1968) and Ishvar Ballav's (b. 1937) Euta saharoko kinarama (On the outskirts of a city) are instances in point. Their poetry represents celebration of life in its various aspects.

KHANDKAVYA (Sanskrit). Sanskrit rhetoricians have divided all kinds of literary compositions (kavyas) into two main heads: 1) 'shravya' (that which can be heard, recited or studied), and 2) 'drishya' (that which can be seen or represented on the stage). As regards its outward form, the 'shravya' may be verse (padya), prose (gadya) or mixture of both 'champu,' a metrical compositions. Padya shravya-kavyas, again, fall under two heads—(1) mahakavya (court-epic or literary epic) such as Raghuvamasa, Kumarasambhava, etc. and ii) khandakavya (lyrical composition) such as Meghaduta, Ritusamhara, etc.

The Sanskrit khandakavya may be divided, according to its subject, into two kinds—the religious and the erotic. The numerous extant 'stotras' are the instances of the religious type of khandakavya. The erotic type which is more popular may be said to commence with the poems of Kalidasa. The name of Kalidasa stands high in the realm of Sanskrit lyrical poetry, and his Meghaduta is the first production of classical lyrical poetry. It ranks highest among Kalidasa's poems for richness or content, brevity of expression, and power for eliciting sentiment. The fact that the celebrated commentator Mallinatha has written his commentary only on this among the short poems and that there exist not less than fifty commentaries on the work is an index to its popularity. The Meghaduta, also sometimes called Meghasandesha, inspired a lot of 'duta-kavyas' not only in Sanskrit but also in other Indian languages.

Writers on rhetoric have defined a khandakavya as 'kavyasya ekadeshanusari' viz. 'resembling a mahakavya in some of its features'.

In all lyrical poems dealing with love, Nature plays a very important part. As a matter of fact, these two prominent characteristics, Nature and Love, are very often blended together in these short pieces of literature with great felicity and grace. Here nature and man have found a more charming expression than in any other branch of literature. Of nature the poet's favourite description is of mountains, plants and the animal world; the lotus and the lily, the chataka, the kokila, the chakora and the chakravaka, all are inseparably connected with human life and love in its different phases.

Among other specimens of khandakavya or lyrical compositions other than the Meghaduta, mention may be made of 1) the Ritusamhara by the same poet which is a poetical description, in six cantos, of the six seasons of the Indian year, 2) the Ghatakarpara, ascribed to Kalidasa, a small work of twenty-two stanzas, 3) the Chaurapan-chashika, in fifty stanzas, describing various amorous situations, written by Bilhana, 4) the Shringarashataka, one of the trilogy said to have been composed by Bhartrihari, 5) the Shringaratilaka, which is sometimes attributed to Kalidasa, 6) the Amarushataka of Amaru, a lyrical poem in one hundred stanzas, 7) the Suryashataka of Mayura, in praise of the Sun, 8) the Gitagovinda, the famous dramatic lyric of Jayadeva and 9) the Pavanaduta of Dhoyi.

B.N.H.

KHANDEKAR, VISHNU SAKHARAM (Marathi; b. 1869, d. 1976) received his primary education at Sangli.

Though he was an intelligent student, he took greater interest in games and dramatic performances. In the company of playmates, he used to put up mythological plays. He was a voracious reader of fiction and plays. His social conscience was awakened by the misery brought in by the prevailing child marriages, turning his attention to the social satire reflected in the humorous writings of Shripad Krishna Kolhatkar. He lost his father in 1911. He passed his Matriculation in 1913. He then joined Fergusson College for higher education. Ram Ganesh Gadkari was the foremost of that period. Khandekar was taken in by his spell for a short time. He was adopted by his uncle, who owned some lands in Konkan and Ganesh Atmaram Khandekar took a new name of Vishnu Sakharam Khandekar. He had allowed adoption in the hope of getting financial help to complete his education, but he was deluded.

Khandekar could have started practice as a lawyer, but the example of Agarkar, who had devoted his life to social service, prompted him away from the profession. He decided to work in the field of education and started an English school at Shirode in 1920. He built up the school encountering many difficulties and turned it into a centre of progressive, national ideas. He was inspired to write short stories and novels by the beautiful nature surrounding the coast. He was moved by the poverty and mute suffering of the coastal people. It was here that he contracted a bad type of malaria which caused him a great suffering. He spent nearly twenty years of his youthful life in this part of the country, listening to the faint ripples of the strong national movements like the 'Home Rule', the 'Jalianwala Bagh' episode and the 'Champaran Satyagrah'. In response to these movements, his friends started a weekly called Vainateya of which he became the co-editor. His early writings in the nature of social satires were published in the Udyan and the Navayug. He wrote personal essays while he was at Shirode. He evolved a new genre of parables and published them in the Navayug and the Ratnakar. His parable was a combination of a short-story and a prose-poem. His first parable called 'Chhota dagad' (Small stone) appeared in 1927. His first novel Hridayachi chank (Call of the heart) was written in 1930, at the request of his friend Kulkarni, who owned the Karnatak Press. Kanchan mrig (Golden deer) followed in 1931. These novels depicted idealism, sympathy for the poor and the urge for social justice. The style was distinctly imaginative and lucid reminding one of the imaginative flights of Gadkari and the wit of Kolhatkar. Novels flowed from his pen in a steady stream. Ulka and Doan Dhurva (both 1934), the latter depicting the life of factory workers. Hirva chafa (1938) tried to imitate the craftsmanship of the novelist N.S. Phadake. Phandhare dhag (1939) brought out the disillusionment of the World War II. Doan mane was in the same vain. Khandekar started writing for films in 1936 and brought his film stories in the form of novels, Rikama devar, Sukhacha shodh and others. Pahile prem (1940) and Jalalela mohor (1944) were the experiments in narrative technique. Kraunchavadh (1972) was a characteristic Khandekar novel showing the contrast between renunciation and indulgence, intellect and emotion. Ashru (1953) analysed the display of traditional values. Yayati (1959) won him the state government award, the Sahitya Akademi Award (1960), and the Jnanpith Award (1974). The novel is a reinterpretation of the Yayati legend and seeks to explore the range of carnal pleasures which have been multiplied by science and brought them within the easy reach of the common man as never before in history. Amritvel (1967) was his last completed novel.

Khandekar held sway over Marathi fiction for a long time. His rich, imaginative style, his love of traditional values, his idealism and his genuine desire to foster social awareness endeared him to countless readers, not only in Marathi but also in other languages like Kannada, Gujarati, Malayalam, Hindi, Sindhi and Bengali in which his novels were largely translated.

His contribution has been equally significant as a short story writer and personal essayist. Many of his stories present the contrasting worlds of the rich and the poor. He published thirtyone collections of short stories.

His interest in ideas and social problems with a meditative bent of mind made him an ideal personal essayist. The form gave him the freedom that his musing fancy needed. He could publish eleven collections of personal essays. His critical writing was also considerable. He was interested not in critical principles, but in the appreciation of the performance of other writers. His prefaces provided fine critical surveys of literary forms. His critical essays are published in fifteen volumes. Eighteen film-scripts, six collections of allegorical stories, one play, some translations and poems also stand to his credit.

Khandekar became the President of the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan in 1941 and also presided over a number of literary conferences. He was nominated a Fellow of Sahitya Akademi and the title 'Padma Bhushan' was conferred on him.

KHANDERIA, MANOJ VRAJLAL (Gujarati; b. 1943), a poet, was born in Junagadh. He obtained primary education at Dhoraji, Veraval and Junagadh, and secondary education at Morbi, Rajkot, Jamnagar and Junagadh. He passed S.S.C. Examination in 1961, and obtained B.Sc. degree from Bahauddin College, Junagadh. Thereafter, he passed L.L.B. Examination in 1967 from Law College, Jamnagar. Since 1968, he has been practising as a lawyer at Junagadh.

His anthologies include Achanak (1970) and Atkal

(1979). His poetic compositions which have enriched the form of Gujarati ghazal and songs, aptly manifest both conformity to tradition and experiment. In the perspective of emotion, diction and expression, some of his compositions, following this pattern, have enriched Gujarati poetry. Many of his vers libre compositions have evoked deep interest among a number of scholars. The place occupied by Manoj Khanderia in the field of modern Gujarati poetry is prominent. His anthology Achanak was awarded a prize by the Government of Gujarat.

KHANOLKAR, C.T. (Marathi; b. 1930, d. 1976) was a renowned Marathi poet, story writer, novelist and dramatist of post-Independence generation.

He was born at Bagalanchi Rai village, district Ratnagiri in Konkan and educated at village Kuddal, Sawantwadi and Bombay. He picked up small jobs at Bombay station of All India Radio and Bombay University; between 1959 and 1965 Later, he devoted himself to writing only.

Khanolkar was a versatile writer and handled all forms of literature with equal distinction; but he was basically a poet; and it is his poetic personality that colours all his literary work,

Written under the pseudonym 'Arati Prabhu', his poetry immediately attracted attention; and his first collection of poems Jogava; raised him to the status of a rising new star on Marathi literary horizon. His poetry makes fullest use of word-meanings and sounds to bring out the emotional content of experience. It is in his poetry that Khanolkar reveals himself most. There is an undefinable tragic element that runs through all his writing, but in poetry it has a deeper shade. Living in an obscure village, he led a life of utter poverty, humiliation and heavy family responsibility under which he felt crushed and suffocated; his tragic sense even then, does not seem to be related only to the external, but is something inner, or in-built in his psyche. He is an artist with fine sensitivity and an inquisitive mind trying to explore the meaning of life.

It was his novel, Ratra kali ghagar kali (1963), that revealed new dimension of his creative power and shot him into fame. A simple story woven with mystic, symbolic language, it creates a magical surrealistic world. There the characters become archetypal, their emotions elemental and primitive. Soon other novels Ajgar (1965), and Kondura (1966); Trishanku (1968); Ganuraya ani chani (1970) followed, which underline the same qualities in his novels and short stories and depict the regional life in Konkan. The nature, and the entire living world, human and non-human, harmoniously merge together and present a vertical cross-section of that life. But this 'slice of life' is multi-dimensional. It is not merely a domestic or social life. It depicts man's inner strife between the divine and the brutal in him, man-woman relationship with its equally dark and bright sides, his eternal struggle with destiny and his struggle with the cruel universe. His stories collected in Sanai (1964) and Rakhi pakhna (1961) have a haunting dreamy quality and they depict the same struggle.

Whatever form Khanolkar touched, he gave it a new orientation. In drama, too, he left his mark. His play Ek shunya Bajirao (1966) was an entirely new experiment, and so is Avadhya (1972). It sheds a new light on the concept of stage and audience-participation.

Not directly influenced by any western ideology or art expressions, Khanolkar expresses many facets of the new consciousness of modern man. He is one of those artists whose mind is difficult to probe or understand. Therefore, he is difficult to be labelled, though he has been claimed as an existentialist, a logical positivist, or an absurdist.

In the brief span of a decade and a half of literary career Khanolkar's output seems to be prodigious— three short story collections, with dozens of those unpublished or uncollected, about a dozen other miscellaneous writings, children's songs and literary essays. The songs have been compiled in Gopal Gani (1966), essays in Wara wahe prunazuna and Deepmal (1974), one-act plays in Kawala (1977). In addition, he has to his credit the translated plays, Hayavadan (1973) and Ajab nayaya Warlulacha (1974).

Khanolkar, thus, dominated the Marathi literary scene during the sixties till mid-seventies. He won state literary awards. In 1964, he got 6-month study grant from the writers centre, 2 years scholarship for research in the folk play, Dashavatara from the National Centre for Performing Arts, Bombay (1972-1974). His last play Kalay tasmainmah was adjudged the best radio-play of the year 1972 by AIR and was translated into all the regional languages.

The voluminous writings that were discovered after his sudden death, indicate the profound interest in this outstanding author.

He has edited several literary magazines. He is the father of the Marathi vangmaya kosha scheme. He has

He leads now a peaceful and retired life in his home, 'Shivneri', at Bombay.

KHAR WAHAB (Kashmiri; b. 1842, d. 1912) was the son of Haty Khar (Poet). 'Haty' is an abbreviated Kashmiri form of 'Hatfi', meaning a voice from heaven (Akashvani). Qadir Khar, the elder brother of Wahab, was also a poet. Wahab was a disciple of a well-known saint of his times, Amad Sahib Machama, and a contemporary of a distinguished mystic poet, Shamas Faqir (1843-1904). He was well built and tall. His verses were printed by Nur Muhammad (1905-1965) in the form of pamphlets. He had a wide circle of followers, who generally preserved his verses by oral tradition. He was very fond of music. He lies buried near his residential house at Khrew Shar in the lap of beautiful Vasturvan. His grave was later fenced with traditional 'lattice' work by one of his followers Khwaja Ismail Kochey of Barsu.

Wahab was so proud of his contentment that he refused to accept the gift of three hundred rupees and a stallion offered by Raja Amar Singh.

Obscure mystic and subjective mood prevails over the poetry of Wahab, and his attempts cannot be termed as artistically successful with the exception of a few poems. His poems often lack verbal felicity and suffer from faulty prosody. His allegorical narrative poem 'Totu' (parrot) is popular because of its folk-song style. Parmanand, his contemporary, admits Wahab's spiritual supremacy thus: 'I expected that Wahab would listen to my plaint and heal up my wounds from within. Whatever is bestowed is bestowed. No less no more than destined or ordained'.

This is a very moving account of his own life as a

Dalit, unsentimental, arousing compassion, but not self-pity. It is clinical and shocking, an eye-opener to the so-called upper castes. A studious field worker, he turned his experiences amongst the lowly and the uprooted, the scum of the society, into remarkably searing and soul-searching pieces of fiction. He is a follower of B.R. Ambedkar and has written valuable books on various aspects of his active social work. His work Asprushyancha mukti sangram also received an award. His characters are true to life, and his satire is full of wit mellowed with sympathy. He edited Prabuddha Bharata, a weekly founded by B.R. Ambedkar. His social work amongst scheduled castes, ex-criminals and nomadic tribes, landless labourers, neo-Buddhists and slum areas covers a period of four decades.

His published collections of poems and lyrics are Sagar maza pran, Svar julata gita tute, Kachecha chandra, Sakhi shejarin, Mala uttar havaya, Eka gharat hoti, Papa sanga Kunache.

His songs and lyrics have a haunting quality as they centre around the tender feelings of love and separation. the pathos of the uncontrollable circumstances. His ghazals are also popular. He has written for children, too.

KHARE, VASUDEVSHASTRI (Marathi; b. 1858, d. 1924) received his education at Satara and Pune, and spent his life at Miraj as a teacher. In 1892, he wrote his first work Nana Phadanavisache charitra (The life of Nana Phadanavis). He did research for five years on the historical papers of Malo Daphtar. He started a magazine, Aitihasik leksh-sangrah, historical papers, in 1897, to publish select historical letters; but he could not get a sufficient number of subscribers. He continued his research work for 28 years. Up to 1924, twelve volumes of these historical papers were published. Historian Rajwade paid him an appropriate tribute: "Persons having so much information are not born every day, and again, in any one nation".

He drew an average pay of Rs. 30 to Rs. 40 per month all his life. He was not financially helped by anyone either, so long as he was alive. He spent seven to eight hundred rupees from his own pocket for having certain historical letters copied out. Besides these volumes, he wrote the following books: Historical Essays: Ichalkarenji sansthencha itihis, Miraj-prakaran, Hyderallivaril tisri svari, Adhi-karyoga, Harivanshachi Bakhar; Plays: Gunotkarsha (Received award in Rajaram College Competition), Taramandal, Krishna-kanchan, Chitravanchana, Shivasambhava, Ugramangal, Desh-kantak.

Shivasambhava is purely a historical novel. The gap between the publication of his first and the second play is thirty years. The rest of his plays are imaginary. V.S. Khandekar wrote that these plays did not make any mark. He also wrote two long poems 'Samudra' and 'Yashvantrao'. The second poem was an epic of 1726 verses, and it depicted the condition of the Hindus between 1735 to 1757.

KHARI BOLI (Hindi). The word Khariboli has historically conditioned two distinct but inter-related meanings (a) a regionally marked dialect of Hindi and (b) a regionally unmarked koine of South Asia. In the first sense, it is like any one of the dialects of western Hindi—a branch of the inner central group of the Indo-Aryan family. In the second sense, it is a language par excellence which, besides high Hindi, covers in its range regional Hindustani, regional Dakhani, inter-regional and inter-state medium of communication. It is interesting to note how Khariboli, as a regional dialect, outgrew itself in the form of a great non-regional dialect lingua franca, and how as a term it has largely come to mean something synonymous with the cultivated variety of Hindi. It is also no less interesting to see how Khariboli got accepted as a medium for prose-writing and poetry-creation specially when the literary scene was dominated by Brajbhasha, a language which during Bhakti movement, brought not only religion but also verbal art to the level of common life.

The word Khariboli was used for the first time by Lallulal in the introduction of his book Premasagar, and later, within two years by Sadal Mishra in his book Nasiktopakhyana. This word was also used by James Gilchrist of the Fort William College of Calcutta, who motivated Lallulal and Sadal Mishra for writing in Hindi prose. Both these writers of Hindi have characterized Khariboli as a language variety which is consciously created by avoiding and rejecting Perso-Arabic elements. However, we find in literature an interesting discussion on the nature and meaning of 'Khari'. There is one group of scholars who consider it to be a mis-spelt form of a word 'Khari' (pure, clear, genuine, real), and thus, characterise Khariboli as 'the true genuine language', or 'the coin of the true mint'. To this group belong scholars like Kellog, Platts, Sudhakar Dwivedi. According to Dwivedi, we find in the speech behaviour of the members of Hindi speech community a fair variation and alternation between 'r' and 'r̥' and hence, a possibility for the use of 'Khari' for 'Khari'. Scholars like Bailey, Chandrabali Pandey, ksitikantha Mishra, etc. have rejected the idea of r̥/r alternation hypothesis. According to them, the word 'Khari' denotes 'current' and 'established', and Khariboli stands for that variety of language which was at that time being currently used by the common people of the north in an established way.

KHARI BOLI-URDU

There is yet another group of scholars who, after accepting the meaning of 'Khari' as 'erect, upright, steep, standing', hold the view that this dialect had come to acquire a name for 'standing', because it was an upcoming Indian speech par excellence for conversation, while the earlier prestigiously known dialects, Braj bhasha, Awadhi and the rest, were then 'fallen languages', (Pari boli). To this group belong Sunitikumar Chatterji, Baburam Saxena, Dharendra Verma, Kaftaprasad Guru, Krishnadutt Vajpeyi, etc., who hold the view that only in the context of the fallen state of Braj bhasha one can reveal the significance of the word Khariboli. The hypothesis that the word (Khari) was coined as counter to the fallen (Pari) state of Braj bhasha, gets vitiated by the fact that the form of language which Lallulal employs for his writing Premsaagar and which he identifies as being written in Khariboli, is colourfully mixed with the characteristic elements of Braj bhasha. How is it that Lallulal talks about leaving out Persian words and expressions from his language, but is totally silent about Braj bhasha?

In fact, Khari boli was given its name counter to the word 'Rekhta' which means 'fallen, diffused or mixed'. The word was also in use for a literary form of a language (Zaban-e-rekhta). Apart from Urdu poets like Mir, Sauda, Ghalib, etc., Hindi saint poets like Kabir, Paltudas, Tulsidas had also written verses under the caption Rekhta. The fact indicates that this word was in use in Hindi literature along with Urdu. According to Bailey, in the medieval period, Hindavi was the usual name for the language in general, while Rekhta was the name identified for its literary (poetic) form. It is this Rekhta which got transformed into Khariboli by Lallulal under the influence of Gilchrist, by substituting Indo-Aryan lexicons and expressions wherever a writer in Rekhta would have opted for the Persian ones. This connection between Rekhta and Khariboli has been shown in the works of Steingass, Bailey, M.H. Azad, Shyamsunder Das, Zograf and Ravindranath Srivastava.

The story of Khariboli becoming a medium for poetic creation is equally interesting. Whenever an established literary idiom fails to absorb the current life and its values, it begins to be felt as a loathed weight. For example, Braj bhasha was considered by medieval poets as a medium for the voice of 'Bhakti' tuned to mass culture and mass participation. But with the traditional overlay, it became a conventional language of the Riti period restricted to reflect the standardized attitudes of the court periods. To shake off the 'dead' elements of a culture is not an easy task, especially when it has an aura of historicity and colouring of traditional values. The Bharatendu period in modern Hindi literature faced this conflict and resolved that the emerging new literary language, Khariboli, be promoted as a medium for prose writing, but poetry be continued to be written in and through the tradition-bound idiom, i.e. Braj bhasha. The weight of this traditional glory was so heavy that even Bharatendu Harishchandra, the great architect of the modern sensibility and the celebrated innovator of a style of literary relevance, preferred Braj to Khariboli as a language suited to poetry. Even Grierson, who championed the cause of vernaculars of India, replied to Babu Ayodhyaprasad Khatri on his publishing Khari boli ka padya (in two volumes) informing that so much labour and money had been spent on an impossible task (Khari boli ka andolan). It was pointed out by George Abhram Grierson that the morphological base of most of the khariboli verbs has long vowels which sound harsh in texture and unmusical in configuration.

It is to be stressed that no language can be labelled aesthetic or unaesthetic. It is in fact the language use and exploitation of its resources which make verbal expressions rhythmic or non-rhythmic. The Khariboli soon discovered its own poetic texture and rhythmic modes of expression, first in the verse of Shridhar Pathak, but what it did in its initial phase was that it led its writers and readers from extravagance of romance to the stark facts of socio-cultural and political realities of the time. This new wave got standardised by the disciplined hand of Mahavirprasad Dwivedi. But it was left to the 'Chhayavada Period' in general and to Sumitranandan Pant in particular to give it a poise of expression unparalleled in the history of its growth. It is during this period that Khariboli, as a medium of expression, got reverberated with the voice of national awakening, cultural renaissance, and heightened passion for the liberated mind. It should also be remembered that during the national agitation for India's freedom, apart from being the language of the masses, it was considered a symbol for nationalistic aspiration. At present, it enjoys the status of the official language of the Union of India and state official language of all the Hindi speaking States. The name Khariboli has been almost totally replaced by the word 'Hindi'.

KHARI BOLI (Urdu). Khari Boli is the popular name of the dialect spoken in the Upper Ganga-Yamuna Doab and the western Rohelkhand area of Uttar Pradesh, comprising (A) Doab districts: Ghaziabad, Meerut, Muzaffar Nagar, Saharanpur, parts of Dehradun and Bulandshahar districts, and (B) districts East of Ganga: Bijnor, Rampur, Moradabad.

It has two distinct forms: one prevalent in the districts of Upper Doab and Delhi, which, in the opinion of Ramvilas Sharma, is a sub-dialect of Haryanavi and the other spoken in the three districts East of Ganga. This form of Khari, also known as 'Rohelkhandi', is closer to standard Urdu/Hindi.

Its name Khari was first employed by Gilchrist in Hindi Story Teller (1803), who equated Khari with

KHARI BOLI-URDU

'Hindustani'. His Munshi, Lalluji Lal, popularised it in his famous work Premasagār (1805) and wrote in its preface that he had written the book in the 'Khari' boli of Delhi and Agra'. It is interesting to note that people residing in the areas surrounding Delhi called the language of the city as Khari, instead of their own. It shows that the standard Urdu/Hindi so much differed from the dialect.

The name Khari (standing) does not seem to have any relation with 'Khari' (Pure, standard), as suggested by Abdul Haq, because the same dialect is known in certain parts of Rajasthan as 'Thār Boli' (Thār = Khadi = standing). Actually the name Khadi carries some linguistic overtones in contrast to the other major dialect of the region, i.e. Braj Bhasha. Khari prefers (ā) in most of its nominal and verbal endings, like Haryanavi, in contrast to Braj Bhasha, which is a (o) based dialect.

Khadi	Braj
aayaa	aayo	came meraa	Mero	mine
ghoraa	ghoro	horse
acchaa	accho	good

This gives Khari a special tone as compared to Braj Bhasha. This has been called by Chandradhar Sharma Guleri (Purāni Hindi) as a 'Pari Boli' (flat dialect), which, in his opinion, the Muslim foreigners made 'standing' (Khari) in order to suit their social and military needs, Sunitikumar Chatterji also concurs with this opinion (Indo-Aryan and Hind).

A study of other names used for this dialect in Urdu gives an insight to its special structure, which is, on the one hand different from the 'hard' Punjabi, and on the other from the milder Braj. Amir Khusrau (1254-1325) first located it as the language of Delhi and its environment" (Nuh Sephar). It was early known as Dehlavi, Hindavi, and later on as Gujri (in Gujarat) and Dakhani or Dakani in the south. Rahul Sanskritayan calls it 'Kuravi' with reference to ancient Kuru Desh. It has also been known as 'Zaban-e-Hindustan' (Sabras) and 'Hindustani' (Farishta and Abdul Hameed) with reference to the name of the country as 'Hindustan'. It is not correct to assume that this name was first given to the language by the Europeans. Grierson, at a very late stage, coined the new term 'Vernacular Hindustani' for the dialect to discriminate it from the literary Hindustani (Urdu/Hindi). This, however, could not get currency against Khari Boli.

Khari Boli first developed into literature in the form of Urdu, in Deccan. Its earliest poetic specimen was written by Fakhar Din Nizāmi, under the title of Masnavi Kadam Rau Padam Rau, between 1421 and 1435. It contains all the linguistic features that were prevalent in the times of Amir Khusrau 'in and around Delhi'. During the next two centuries there is a continuity of this language in Deccan as is evident from hundreds of MSS., most important of them having been edited and published during the last seven decades. The specimens of the language preserved in these works of literature (poetry and prose both) form the basis of Modern Urdu. A recent attempt (Cf Amrit Rai's A House Divided, 1984) to bring it into the general stream of Hindi language is as futile as to count Kabir, Tulsi and Surdas as poets of Urdu.

No doubt Khari Boli is the basis of both Urdu and Hindi. There is also a claim of the Hindi scholars that specimens of Khari Boli Hindi are found much earlier than Lalluji Lal and Sadal Mishra. But these are no match to the specimens of Khari available in the form and script of Urdu. Actually Khari Boli Hindi's continuous history does not go beyond 1800.

There is however, not a hundred per cent correspondence between Khari Boli and Modern Urdu/Hindi, either on phonological or morphological levels. Whatever correspondence it had with Dakhani Urdu has gradually diminished, as we come to the modern period. For example, Urdu never adopted Khari's two retroflex phonemes 'n' and 'l'. The are very common in Haryanavi and the Doab Khari, crossing Ganga even to the district of Bijnor. Modern Hindi too shuns 'l', although under the influence of Sanskrit it has adopted 'n' to a certain extent.

Khari	Urdu/Hindi
Khaana	Khaana	food
paani	paani	water
maanus	maanas	man
bijli	bijli	electricity
daal	daal	pulse (grain)

It also gives preference to 'd' over 'r'

gaadi	gaari	vehicle
padhai	parhai	reading

In vowels, Khadi has a preference for 'e' to 'ai' and 'o' to 'au'

Khari pair	per	foot
main	men	l
maila	mela	dirty
daur	dor	race
aur	or	and

The overgemination of consonants in Khari is also not acceptable to the standard Urdu and Hindi. This is mostly under the influence of Braj. In this respect Urdu/Hindi strikes a fine balance between gemination and non-gemination:

Urdu/Hindi	Khari	Braj	Meaning
chakki	chakki	chaaki	grinder
badal	baaddal	baadar	cloud
naak	nakk	naak	nose
baaja	bajja	baaja	musical instrument

KHARI BOLI-URDU

In Old Urdu (Dakhani), there are more geminated consonants than in Modern Urdu.

Another special feature of Khari is shortening of vowels, i.e. replacement of long vowels by the comparable short vowels. Dakhani Urdu specializes in this feature also.

Urdu/Hindi	Khari	Dakhani	Meaning
aasman	asmaan	asman	sky
aadmi	admi	admi	man
chaadar	chaddar	chaddar	sheet

Loss of aspirates and aspiration is a regular feature of Khari and Dakhani both. It has been modified in standard Urdu and Hindi, although in colloquial language this feature still continues even in cities, e.g.

kaan	kahaan	where
vaan	vahaan	there
yaan	yahaan	here
haat	haath	hand

On morphological level some of the differences between Khari and Standard Urdu/Hindi are very notable. Besides '-o' suffix for making plurals, Khari also employs '-an', such as ghoran (horses), khetan (fields), motaran (motor-cars), which is a regular feature of Dakhani Urdu.

Some of the pronouns also differ. Khari employs: muj (for mujh), mahaare (for hamaara), mahaara (for mera), tam (along with tum), tuj (for tujh), thaara (along with tera), thaara (along with tumhara), vin (along with un).

As far as verbs are concerned, the differences could be very well shown in the following chart:

Urdu/Hindi	Khari	Meaning
chalta	chalay	moving
chalega	chalayga	will go ho	hove	be
hota	hotta	became

The jats of Meerut district have also a 'y' element in their past-tense verbal formation, as is commonly found in Haryanavi and Dakhani Urdu.

Urdu/Hindi	Khari	Dakhani	Meaning
Maara	maarya	maarya	struck
bola	bolya	bolya	said
chala	chalya	chalya	walked

The second form of Khari Boli is spoken in the districts East of Ganga, comprising Bijnor, Moradabad, Rampur. This is called 'Rohelkhand' with reference to the Afghans of Rohella tribe who settled here and controlled its destiny in the nineteenth century. The dialect of this area is closest to the standard Urdu. The Khari of these districts has been variously described as Roheli or Rohelkhandi. In many linguistic features it corresponds to the 'Dialect of the upper Doab', but discards many features of Haryanavi, which have been given above, especially the absence of retroflex phoneme 'n' and overgemination in consonants. As has been said above, it is closest to standard Urdu/Hindi.

While fixing the identity of Khari Boli and drawing its geographical boundaries, note should be taken that no systematic survey of the dialect has been made as yet. Grierson's method of acquiring some specimens through the 'tehsildars' and 'patwaris' of the area and sketching their grammars on the scanty and casual data is neither thorough nor scientific. It is because of this that the controversy about the historical position of Khari is still on. Scholars of Hindi language are mostly unaware of the enormous linguistic corpus available in Urdu script in the form of Khari Boli. Nor has it come to light as to when Grierson published his volumes of great Linguistic Survey of India. Delhi, as the capital city, was the radiating point for all the linguistic influences that accumulated in it from 13th to 17th centuries for about 150 years. Agra (a city amidst Braj Mandal) intervened. The language of Gwalior (Gwahari), according to the great linguist and lexicographer Khan-e-Arzu (d. 1756), became the langue par excellence of the preceding century. This was another name for Braj Bhasha, although Gwalior is not completely covered by Braj Bhasha. The grammatical element of Haryanavi in Dakhani Urdu is another problem in the identification of Khari Boli. This led to the Hindi scholar Ramvilas Sharma to declare that Khari was a sub-dialect of Haryanavi. Again the repeated statement about Khari—"the dialect of Delhi and Meerut" made by many scholars, opens up a new debate about the language of Delhi in the Delhi Sultanate period. Amir Khusrau was careful to call it "the language of Delhi and its environment." Now Delhi is (and perhaps has been) a meeting ground of several dialects derived from Saurseni Apabhramsha (Grierson's western Hindi). Towards north-east across Yamuna lies the Khari of Meerut. Immediately to its West is Haryanavi and forty miles to the South commences the area of Braj Bhasha. The royal city of Delhi received a heavy dose of Punjabi also which led the Urdu scholar Mahmud Sherani ('Punjab men Urdu', Preface) and T. Graham Bailey to trace the beginning of Urdu from Lahore, where Muslims had established themselves about 150 years earlier before descending on the city of Delhi in 1193.

In the opinion of the present writer, the identity of Khari Boli could be established from the Apabhramasha period. Its oldest name on record is "Zaban-e-Delhi and its environment", as listed by Amir Khusrau in his masnavi Nuh Sephar along with other ten principal languages of India, distinguishing it on the one hand from

KHASAKKINTE ITIHASAM

Lahauri (Punjabi) and on the other from 'Audh' (Awadhi). From early times it was heavily influenced by Haryanavi, eastern Punjabi, and later on, by Braj Bhasha in order to assume the standard form of Urdu/Hindi.

KHASAKKINTE ITIHASAM(Malayalam) or the Epic of Khasak, is a controversial novel by O.V. Vijayan but according to some it is the most significant novel that heralded a new era in Malayalam fiction. It has won the Otakkuzhal Award (instituted by Mahakavi G. Sankara Kurup) and the Sahitya Pravartaka Award for the best work of fiction. That it has been the most controversial novel of the last decade is attested by the fact that it has been widely discussed and written about. For a modern novel it has received more than its fair share of critical attention not only in contemporary literary magazines but also in literary histories written during the last decade. It defies any attempt at classification, but is often referred to as a fictional exemplification of existentialist philosophy, though the author stoutly denies this in the preface to the second edition (1973). He says: "Khasakkinte itihasham" is not a philosophy of life. Now I do not even have the insolence I had when I wrote it. If it is not a philosophy of life, then what is its story? Story, it is not. Sometimes I get lost in something as the wind does in the crown of palm trees. This is an attempt to copy that (experience)." Of the characters in the novel the author seems to have the softest corner of his heart for Kunjamina, a Muslim girl in her early teens whose adoration of the hero, Ravi, is one of the touching episodes in the novel. The author makes a special plea to the reader, in the same preface, not to forget her but to persuade her to marry the hero.

As the novel opens we meet the hero, Ravi, who has just got down from a bus, after a long journey. The place is Kumankav, adjoining the village, Khasak. He has come to take charge of a 'one-man school' in Khasak. At the end of the novel we meet him again at the same spot, waiting for the bus to take him out of Khasak, though it is certain that he would die there, being bitten by a cobra that turned up from under a clod of earth that he had upturned casually. This casualness of events seems to run through his entire experience of life. The novel is an account of Ravi's life in Khasak. His journey to destination nowhere begins with an incestuous relationship with his stepmother when his loving father was on his sick bed in the next room. He has been an exceptionally brilliant student of Physics in the final Honours class with prospects of going to Princeton for advanced research. But he leaves the hostel the day previous to his examination. His driftings take him to Benares where he spends his days with lepers, to the inns at Prayag, to the Quaker Centre in Madhya Pradesh and then to the Ashram of Bodhananda. There he sleeps with a yogini and leaves early in the morning with the yogini's ochre saree, instead of his own clothes, wound round him. Childhood memories keep recurring as he walks to Khasak guided by a wayside porter. With the help of Sivaraman Nair the school gets started and Ravi settles down to teach his assorted bunch of pupils, hastily herded into the makeshift classroom. The episodic narration now takes on the legend of the origins of the Khasaks, a Moslem community, who form the bulk of the village population along with the Ezhavas and other caste groups. The petty rivalries and squabbles of the rural peasantry, their loves and hates, their superstitions and prejudices provide grist to the Khasak gossip mill. The making and breaking of human relationships as between Allappicca Mollakka and Nizam Ali, the emergence of the Khasak version of a prophet in the reappearance of Nizam Ali 'possessing' the soul of Syed Miyan Sheikh, the mythical founder of Khasak, the ravaging of the village by the fierce outbreak of small-pox and similar episodes are interspersed with exquisite and sensitively drawn vignettes of the life of Ravi with his adorable school kids. Lighter moments are provided in this otherwise serious novel by the drinking and black magic sessions. The main action centres round the school which does not make any progress; nor does Ravi take any special interest in its development. Ravi's exit from Khasak is speeded up with the arrival of his college-mate Padma who has returned from Princeton. She tries to wean him away from Khasak but fails. From their rendezvous Ravi gets back to Khasak, resigns his job and quits the scene only to embrace death rather casually. Is Ravi's predicament typical of the human situation? Is he in search of an identity? It is true that he finds himself in an inner world of his own where sin and virtue have lost all conventional meaning? If he is engaged in a meaningful pursuit why is there no restraint on his instinctive urges? Apart from his teaching, the only actions in which he seems to be interested are love-making and drinking. He sets out on his pursuit from the bed of his stepmother; he enters Khasak leaving the bed of the yogini. In Khasak, Pathumma, Kesi, Maimuna, Ketachi and Padma share his bed. Kuppu Achchan, Pujari and Madhavan Nair keep him company in his country liquor sessions. He makes no attempt to establish any meaningful relationship with any of the rural folk. Even Kunjamina and Appukkili, two of the most memorable characters, touch only the fringe of his consciousness. He did not live, but just existed in Khasak. Life bereft of purpose and morality becomes meaningless; the distinction between life and death vanishes. At this point he leaves Khasak and awaits the arrival of the bus, a symbol of the journey of life. There he turns the clod of earth from under which the hooded snake strikes him as he looks on with tenderness. Unquestionable, he meets with a pre-ordained end. "Ravi looked on with curiosity the spreading of the hood of the snake; its fangs went deep into his feet in love; it struck again and again.....He lay waiting for the bus." The novel ends thus. It does not make any difference whether he lies, stands or walks—lying suits his philosophy better as there is no scope for meaningful action in his scheme of things.

The style of the novel has a charm of its own. The crisp dialogues in the Tamilized Malayalam dialect of the local Muslims and the dexterous employment of exquisite images drawn from folklore and nature, lend it at once an aura of mystery and realism.

KHATRI, DEVAKINANDAN (Hindi; b.1861, d.1913) was one of the pioneers of suspense thrillers in Hindi, who hit with a bang the field of the novel with almost an unknown genre and turned it into the most popular form. Devakinandan Khatri's ancestors hailed from Lahore and his father, Ishwardas, shifted to Kashi when Lahore was in the grip of near-total anarchy in the post-Ranjit Singh era. Devakinandan was born in Muzaffarpur, his mother's parental home. He spent his childhood there and was initiated into Urdu-Persian education. He, later, shifted to Kashi and got himself some grounding in Hindi and Sanskrit. For a while he looked after his ancestral business in Tikari State and came in contact with the princely home of Kashi. It was through the grace of the king of Kashi that he obtained forest contracts in Chakia and Naugarh. A stint in these vast, mysterious forests along with their dilapidated buildings, nearly demolished forts, old caves and other ruins and hillocks stirred up his imagination and he took to writing suspense thrillers, detective novels and the like.

He undertook the writing of these novels merely for entertaining his readers. He had no pretensions and no misgivings about the literary quality of his work. He just wanted to entertain and thrill his readers and keep them spellbound to the zigzag, yet gripping course of his plot, to keep them on their toes and glued to his novels. And he succeeded tremendously in doing that. His popularity graph rose with such speed that it compelled many a social reformer of the age to spend sleepless nights for the simple reason that Khatri they thought was corrupting the youth. Their infatuation with the world of illusion of Chandrakanta and Chandrakanta santati was so complete that they lost all sense of balance.

Devakinandan Khatri is the pioneer of the class of novels termed as 'Tilismi—Aiyari' in Hindi. His popular appeal during the early period of Hindi novel (last quarter of the nineteenth century) was so irresistible and immense that thousands and thousands of Hindi-speaking people, who got education just in Urdu with an eye on job opportunities, were forced to learn Hindi just to be able to read his Chandrakanta and Chandrakanta santati in the original. His contribution to literary novel may be very scant, but his contribution to the cause of Hindi language is reckoned as very significant.

Devakinandan Khatri's works are weak in the portrayal of emotional experience of any sort and he does not care to provide a psychological background to the action of his characters, who are extroverts through and through, just striving honestly and with all their might to accomplish the task allotted by their masters. They enter into very interesting strategic duals with their adversaries with efforts to prove their one-upmanship, and go to any length for achieving their ends. It is the clever manipulation of the ups and downs of these strategic clashes, and unrestricted flights of imagination in organising them with uncertainty always hovering over the head of each one of them, that keeps the reader guessing about the future course of events, the final outcome, and this is what sustains their interest throughout.

Chandrakanta (1888-1891), Chandrakanta santati (1894-1905), Narendramohini (1893), Virendra vir or katorabhar khoon (1895), Kusum kumari (1899), Naulakha har (1899), Kajar ki kothri (1902), Anuthi begum (1905), Bhutnath (1907-12 incomplete), Gupta godana (1906), are amongst his major novels.

Devakinandan Khatri was an atheist by choice, a happy-go-lucky man by temperament, generous at heart and fond of fine things of life because of his resourcefulness. After his death, he left a trail that lit the literary path for quite some time.

Ma.C

KHATRI, DURGAPRASAD (Hindi; b.1895). Son of the celebrated Hindi novelist and pioneer of suspense thrillers, Devakinandan Khatri, Durgaprasad almost stepped into his father's shoes to complete his father's incomplete novel titled Bhutnath as if to pay off the paternal debt. Having grown in the shadow of a stalwart father, who was also a pioneer in his field, Durgaprasad did not acquire as much renown as was, perhaps, due to him. Although he could not break off from the trend set by his father, Durgaprasad Khatri did definitely show a greater awareness of his social environment, of the problems facing the country and of the national pressures that worked all around against our betterment and salvation. Although he retained his father's technique of interweaving and interlacing incidents and episodes into a gripping story, yet he did give it a much wider base and a more comprehensive framework. What is remarkable in his novels is the ray of nationalist light emerging out of the darkness of insignificant and unwieldy network of incidents. We find him a step ahead of his contemporaries inasmuch as we find his characters also in a different category from those of his father's—they seem to have some sort of a personality of their own, they are not mere automatons, just to do their bit in furthering the storyline. His characters clearly belong to two categories—the first being the foreign usurpers and their Indian agents bound together in the furtherance of their dishonest interests consisting of the British and Indian officials, native princes, 'Rai Bahadurs' and 'Khan Bahadurs', Indian spies working for their British masters, etc. To the second category belong the Indian revolutionaries, the rebels and outlaws working for ridding not only India but the whole of Asian continent of the cruel clutches of foreign invaders and exploiting traders. Some of them look like the precursors of Rangbhumi's rebel character, Virpal Singh, who is more mature, more refined and more real. Durgaprasad Khatri firmly believed that we Indians can throw our enemy out with the help of the weapon which led them to conquer us—the might of scientific inventions. Some of his leading characters are, therefore, inventors. In his later novels, we do find portrayals of contemporary society and life, howsoever faint and dim their colours. Our mutual bickerings, degeneration of Indian princes and their largely antinational stance, revolutionary activities are all facts of the age to which he belonged, and they all find expression in his novels. He has a love for the Indian states because they were monuments of an India that was once free. The diffidence and disgust that envelope the novelist's national consciousness is writ large on every page of some of his novels. The savagery of the colonialist power generates patriotic fire in his characters who actually reflect the mental state of the novelist himself. The outburst of one of his characters is revealing and reflects the mental conflict through which most Indians were passing: "So far I had been led to think that the domination of the white race over the black, yellow and brown races was a natural boon to them—they would develop and better their lot through the white rule, but now I am convinced that this rule is nothing but a curse... I know now that in savagery and cruelty they are much ahead of Nadir Shah and Changez Khan". Durgaprasad Khatri was naturally jailed a number of times.

He wrote more than a dozen and a half novels, the major ones being: Bhutnath (1915-35), Pratishodh (1925), Lal panja (1925), Kala chor (1925), Raktamandal (1927), Safed shaitan (1935), Rohtasmath athva tilismi bhut (1941), Saket (1953). His Kalank kalima (1932) is a purely social novel which shows the aftermath of immoral love.

Durgaprasad Khatri is reckoned as a significant novelist of the pre-Premchand era, who continued to write long after Premchand's death.

KHATRI, JAYANT HIRJI (Gujarati, b.1909, d.1968) was a leading Gujarati short-story writer. By profession, like his father, Hirji Khatri, he was a medical practitioner. He lost his father when he was eight years old and had to face economic hardships. In Bhuj, he came into close contact with the life of the textile dyers and printers belonging to the Khatri caste to which he also belonged. In 1923, he shifted to Bombay and lived with his brother in an area where predominant inhabitants were textile mill workers. Thus, Khatri was able to observe the hardships and sorrows of the poor and the downtrodden from close quarters, and he developed sympathy for them. In 1935, he obtained an L.C.P.S. degree from the National Medical College, Bombay. Simultaneously, he also studied Marx and Freud, and developed a somewhat progressive outlook. Along with some friends, like Bakulesha, Svapnastha, Jitubhai Maheta and others, Khatri formed a group of progressive writers. After practising for some time in Bombay, Khatri shifted back to his native province Kutch and practised medicine in Mandavi. There also he engaged himself actively in the local politics, first as the leader of the opposition in the Mandavi Municipal Corporation, and then as its vice-President from 1954 to 1960. He died of cancer at the age of 59, before his creative talent reached its complete fruition.

Khatri has to his credit three collections of short stories: Khara bapora (1968), Phoram (1972) and Vahe-tam jharanam (1975). The total number of his short stories does not exceed fifty. His writing career is spread over 25 years. Thus, quantitatively, Khatri's contribution is not so significant. But it is from the qualitative considerations that Khatri's contribution to Gujarati short story is respectfully mentioned.

Much ahead of his time in the matters of technique, expression, point of view, and the chiselled perfection of the artistic form of his stories, Khatri was a harbinger of modernity in the Gujarati short story. However, owing to his commitment to the progressive ideology, many of his stories suffer from artistic impropriety.

Khatri is an author whose contribution to Gujarati literature has not been assessed properly. During his life time, he was under-estimated by most of the critics. This was, perhaps, due to his progressive leanings, or due to insignificant quantity of his writings, or due to the fact that he was away from the main centres of literary activity and power. It was after his death that some of the younger critics and writers noticed some of the outstanding qualities of his writings. Their view was that there was a well-planned conspiracy by the older critics to slight Khatri. But as it often happens, the truth lies somewhere between these two extremes.

KHATRI, KISHINCHAND TIRTHDAS-KHATTARA KAKA KA TARANGA

KHATRI, KISHINCHAND TIRTHDAS 'BEVAS' (Sindhi: b.1885, d.1947) was an eminent Sindhi poet. His father died when he was still a student. Being the eldest son, he had to shoulder the burden of the family. Therefore, after passing the Vernacular Final Examination, he went for Teachers' Training Course, and after completion of the course, entered service as a primary school teacher. Subsequently, he retired as Headmaster. It is not certain as to when he started composing poems, but as a poet, he drew attention when he was sixteen and a student in the Teachers' Training College, Hyderabad (Sindh). One night the hostel Superintendent, while on his rounds, noticing light in Kishinchand's room, peeped in and found him asleep in the chair, and a piece of paper with a poem scribbled freshly on it lay beside him. The Superintendent was so much impressed that on the next day, congratulating the young man, he prophesied that he would become a great poet. At the age of 22 he was wellknown as a poet. In his later days, he learnt enough English to study Tagore's Gitanjali and Sadhana in English translations. He is considered to be a dividing line between the 'old' and the 'new' in the history of Sindhi poetry. He brought newness in themes and freshness in imagery. His poetry grew out of contemporaneous issues and events expressing the consciousness of the times. He was intensely responsive to the milieu he lived in. There was something in his inner make-up which urged him to share the anxieties, misfortunes and sufferings of the people. All the same, as a genuine poet, in spite of his sufferings and misfortunes, he loved life immeasurably and felt strongly that life was all happiness. He called his house 'Jashan-khana' (Abode of joy).

Those were the days of national awareness and freedom movement. Bevas was a nationalist, and he was the first poet to write national songs which were on the lips of everyone. He expressed the concept of co-existence in his poem 'Vad' dil' (Big heart). He was the first to plead for the socialistic pattern of society in his poem 'Tun ain maan' (You and I). He had a clear understanding of sufist and vedantic doctrines which is evident from his ghazals called 'Pura' (Fancy). The collection of his ghazals was published under the title Samundri sipun (Sea oyster shells, 1929). At his hands ghazal became a vehicle for conveying philosophic ideas instead of love and beauty. The woman of his poem is modest and she is an individual to be respected. Bevas inspired and guided many rising poets of the day. Hundraj 'Dukhayal', Hari 'Dilgir' and Prabhu 'Vafa' being a few of them.

Shah and Tagore were his poetic ideals. From Shah he learnt to be truthful, bold and yet modest; Tagore taught him that the poet had not to bring sadness but joy and delight into the life of others.

Bevas began with poems for children and dramas for the stage. His poems published under the title Shirin shairu (Sweet poetry, 1929) are considered to be the simplest and the sweetest in Sindhi for the juveniles on a variety of subjects. His narrative poem Guru Nanak Jivan kavita (1941) is divided into eight cantos, the first two are in Persian prosodic form called 'Musaddas' i.e. six lined stanzas, rhymed aaaa bb, and the remaining six cantos are of eight-lined stanzas rhymed aaaa cc which was his innovation. The repetition of the line 'Guru Dev Nanak sacho patshah' (Guru Nanak Dev, the real king) at the end of every stanza throughout the book reverbrates with the deep sound of reverence. Shaire-e-Bevas is a representative selection of his poems published in India in 1953.

KHATTARA KAKA KA TARANGA (Maithili), a fictional satire by a highly distinguished Maithili writer and eminent philosopher, Harimohan Jha, was first published in 1948. Subsequent editions were published in 1955 and 1967. In the first edition, there were only twelve topics: in the 2nd, twelve more were added and in the revised and rearranged 3rd edition, the number went up to thirty. Most of the topics of the book have been translated into different Indian languages and have come out in various magazines. There is also a Hindi version (1971) of the book as a whole, rendered by the writer himself.

The scope of the Khattara kaka ka taranga (The thought-waves of uncle Khattara) is wide enough. Somewhat in the manner of Shavian plays, it lashes at outdated conventionalism and decries dogmatic and superstitious approach to life that seems to sap its vitality. The writer extends queer interpretations of men and matters, creates humour and flings irony and satire on subjects like: the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, Durga, jyotisha, conducts of gods, lunar eclipse, the story of Satyadeva, ancient ideals, brahmananda (the eternal bliss), the birth place of Chanakya, the essence of poetry, and so on. For an objective presentation of ideas, the writer has used a typical character Khattar Kaka as his alter ego. Khattar Kaka is a happy-go-lucky man and almost an embodiment of delight. He relishes the cool liquid 'bhaang' (an intoxicating drink prepared from hemp) and in his charged moods he is highly entertaining and a fountain of mirth and laughter. He proves himself a great comic satirist keenly alive to the incongruities of life. In arguing, he is a relentless logician having access to all shastras and literatures which he fully exploits to substantiate his statements. He is as much a representative of Gangesha Upadhyaya, the famed logician of medieval Mithila as that of Gonu Jha, the clever and witty humorist; as much a representative of the learned and logical in the tradition as one of wit and humour as it is still close to life in common.

Thus his criticism is directed most of the time against what is now considered crude or unjustifiable in myth and values in life and literature of the past. The implicit aim of this criticism is always the amendment of evils or absurdities by correction. What is involved in such a criticism is not merely derision or derogation of the past but a mock-serious scrutiny, as it were, of all kinds of truisms. With the help of sheer wit Khattara Kaka turns accepted values in life and letters upside down and revels in shocking the reader into a mixed state of disbelief and amusement which has an aesthetic justification as well. He can thus prove Ravana as the only ideal character in the Ramayana: and that the Mahabharata war took place for the offence of the Pandavas and the result was the victory of vices, not that of virtues and that Krishna deluded Arjuna in the Gita. Moreover, he projects the Ayurveda as an epic: the Cupid as the real creator: the composers of the Vedas as atheists and the sap of 'Som' as the juice of hemp plants. Through his arguments he evinces that fidelity is an unjustifiable conduct for a woman whereas unchaste wife is made to look chaste. So in his thought-waves the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, karmakanda and dharmashastra, Gita and Vedanta, jyotisha and Ayurveda, tantras and mantras, gods and goddesses, heaven and hell, rebirth and emancipation, are all made to look different.

Through these talks, the reader is led to a different zone of aesthetic experience in which what is merely accepted and seemingly true, ends up as something not worth accepting. It is not a conscious use of logic in an academic sense which accounts for the quick rebuttals of accepted situations in myths, life and letters, but a witty and fanciful use of the same to a variety of purposes, inductive or formative as the case may be.

Khattara kaka ka taranga is not a fiction in the usual sense of the term. The use of witty conversation round about a number of themes gives each of the section of this book a point and poignance. The talk as it is carried out between the uncle and the nephew offers a pattern of lively conversation. If juxtaposition of two points of view leads to a point of dramatic interest in the expression, the writer's capacity to use intelligent and lively talk draws on a natural use of colloquial speech rhythm.

It speaks of his ingenuity that he was the first among writers in Maithili to draw on such a strain in Maithili life. Earlier he had used it in his novels. But in these dialogues of Khattara Kaka, the writer isolates that element of pure talk, as it were, using it as a means of fictionalising two different attitudes to life.

As such the treatment of this intoxicated character in a variety of moods based on hard and dry ratiocination is a new thing in the use of fictive form in prose in Maithili.

It contains a series of digressions around a number of themes. Each one of these serves as a fugue to an intoxicated protagonist as he chooses to ruminate and argue. What gives unity to this work as fiction is the continuity in the nature of the character itself as he talks to one who is able to pose a series of conventional questions. Thus the latter serves as a foil to the former.

The ratiocinative power of the writer, thus, is put to a creative use around a variety of themes which serve as fugues and motifs for continued talk, each one of these leading to a new topic as it were.

However, it is significant that the examination of old myths and truisms is carried out in terms of a basic awareness of human values rather than a tame acceptance of what is old. And in his sallies of satire, wit, sarcasm, irony, etc., which are its constituents, the writer allows Khattara Kaka an advantage over the merely new too.

KHATWANI, KRISHAN (Sindhi; b. 1927) was born at a village called Tharushah in central Sindh. After doing his matriculation from the Bombay University, he joined Shantiniketan for further studies in arts. After the partition of the country, he migrated to Bombay, stayed there for some time and then moved on to Indore where he set his business and settled down permanently.

Khatwani is essentially a romantic fictioneer though he composed a few poems when he began writing quite early in life. While in Shantiniketan, he wrote a number of short stories. He was first published in an anthology of Sindhi short stories Praha Phuti (The dawn, 1945) which contained his story 'Kute jo mautu' (Dog's death). The bulk of the stories in the anthology followed the progressive trend which was just gaining ground in Sindhi literature in the forties.

Khatwani is a prolific writer and, in his literary career, he has traversed long distances to earn the reputation of being a first-line romantic fictioneer.

His first novel Amar pyar (Eternal love, 1961) was autobiographical inasmuch as it reflected his personal experiences. His second novel Munhinji Mithri Sindh (My beloved Sindh, 1962) has emotion-ridden expressions of what the author has lost after migrating to India. However, both the novels failed to click. Within the span of ten years, three anthologies of his short stories, Vindri (1964), Mithri to na sunjato (You did not understand me, my beloved, 1973) and Vairath zindagyun (The wasted lives, 1974) hit the news-stands. The dilemma that the stories pose remains essentially superficial. None of his characters develops and arouses sympathy as portrayed in these short stories. His quick-cut writing, however, sustains flagging interest and some of the stories are really fascinating. But he has given us elegant pieces in his subsequent short stories compiled in Akeli (1980) and Pardesin (The alien, 1980). Though the stories are old fashioned in style, they are virtually avant garde in their author's insistence on discovering the worlds that fiction writers create from what dull readers call 'real life'. For them Khatwani's romantic fiction is neither naturalistic nor realistic, nor even an indictment of bourgeois values, but a prose poem, a fantasy so far as it reflects a unique world of unique individuals. However, Khatwani is at his best in his novel Yad hika pyara ji (Reminiscence of love, 1978). It treats with candour and sensibility some of the most disturbing problems of human relations.

The characters in Khatwani's later fiction are archetypal lovers. His fiction is bereft of eroticism and sexual play, though a gentle hand reaches out occasionally to a discretely clothed bosom. The author has, however, carved out a place for himself as a good fiction writer in Sindhi literature.

KHAYAL, GHULAM NABI (Kashmiri; b. 1936) received his primary education at Islamia High School. His literary output is varied and it reflects his unsettled life and tendency to drift from one occupation to another. Before 1954 he wrote in Urdu. He started writing in Kashmiri after joining the cultural conference. He was one of the editors of the monthly Kongaposh. In 1956, he was appointed News Reader in Radio Kashmir, Srinagar. He was arrested in 1958 in connection with the famous 'Hazratbal case'. During his one-year detention, he translated Omar Khayam's Rubaiyat and also edited his first collection of poetry, Zanjuri hund saz (Music of shackles), which he published in 1963. In 1959, Khayal got a job in the research wing of the Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy, but was dismissed from service in 1965, and in the same year he undertook the assignment of editing a Urdu weekly Mahaz. After a few years he gave up the assignment and started his own paper in Kashmiri, the weekly Watan. Khayal is a poet of romantic temper and themes. His style is simple and unaffected. In his second collection of poems Pragash (Light, 1962), he seems to have abandoned the revolutionary themes and given expression to immediate sensations and contemplation of beauty. His popularity lies mainly in his versified translation of Omar Khayam's 'rubais', published under the title Rubaiyati Omar Khayam (1961). In 1962, he translated Aristotle's Poetics which served a good purpose. Khayal's other famous work, which got him the Sahitya Akademi award in 1975, is Gaashir munar (The luminaries, 1972), a collection of biographical essays on eleven eminent personalities of the world. Khayal has also edited Lakhimanjoo Bulbul's Samnama (The story of 'Sam', 1962), Mahmud Gami's Selected Poems (1964) and Masnavis of Sheikh Yaqub Sarfi, a famous Persian poet. Khayal is at present bringing out a Urdu weekly, the Iqbal.

KHEMANI, ANAND (Sindhi; b. 1933) was born at a village called Sadhuja in central Sindh. After doing M.A. in Hindi, he joined the Rajya Sabha Secretariat where he still continues as Editor of Debates.

Khemani belongs to the post-modern era of Sindhi literature. He is known as a rebel in thinking and frank in his uninhibited expression. He is one of the pioneers of new movement which brought dynamic change in Sindhi literary scene in the beginning of the seventh decade of this century. With his much talked about short story 'Devta' (The god), which appeared in the Sahit Dhara in 1964, Khemani attracted the attention of serious readers and critics alike. Param Abichandani, an eminent critic, was inspired to write a lengthy appraisal of this story as well as another of his stories 'Tukra tukra' (The pieces), acclaiming the latter as the best short story of the year 1965. Khemani continued to write remarkable stories like 'Hiku electric salam' (An electric salute), 'Barsat' (The rain) and 'Navambara ji akhri raat' (The last night of November) through which he brought new idiom and freshness of expression representing consciousness of the modern man. The Luchi (The Naughty one, 1965) and the November ji akhri raat (1976) are the collections of short stories to his credit. In his novel, Hika shaksa ji vasna (Lust of a man, 1970), Khemani has been bold and blunt. Through the play of sex and erotics, Khemani seems to quest for deeper meanings of human existence.

As a poet, Khemani is, perhaps, a crusader, who went in for an outright rejection of traditional form and content of poetry by writing 'akavita' (anti-poetry). His anti-poems compiled in two collections Bimar pedhi (The sick generation, 1974) and Shamshan ghat watan langhande (While passing by the crematorium, 1985), though reaching the border-lines of the prose, are very much striking and startling, exploring the yet unexplored. Khemani has also played a vital role in the field of literary criticism. Chetana (The consciousness, 1967), an anthology of selected pieces of practical criticism on various works in different genres published by eminent critics, and Sahitya ja sidhant, (Principles of literature, 1969), also written by critics of eminence, both edited by him, could succeed in introducing the concept of modern criticism to elite readers.

One of his short stories 'Rishtani ji siyasata' (Politics in relations) was converted into a Radio-play and put out on national hook-up of All India Radio in 1981. It was also translated into various regional languages and broadcast by the concerned Radio stations.

KHIDIO, JAGGO (Rajasthani). 'Jaggo' is the abbreviated form of 'Joggo Khidiya' whose real name was Jagamala Khidia. He was the son of a charan poet, Ratnaji, coming from the lineage of Luna Chandra (Tessitori's family details obtained from Rava of Ramasami, village of Jodhpur). In 1658 he wrote Vachanika Rathor Ratan Singh Ji Maheshdasaut Ri (ed. by Tessitori and published by Asiatic Society of Bengal) in the court of Rama Singh, son of Ratan Singh. It describes the battle of Dharmat (Ujjain) fought by the combined armies of Maharaja Jaswant Singh, Aurangzeb and Murad against Rao Ratan Singh Rathor who succumbed to injuries. The poet was inspired by his death to write this work, in verse and poetic prose, and the poem had an appealing effect on the minds of the courtiers. He was awarded the villages of Alogiya, Eka-lagadha, Dera and Dalevata. Its stanzas in 'trotak', 'bhujung', 'gatha', 'mukta', 'dam', 'duha' (doha) 'barda doha', 'kavitta', 'chandrayan', 'hanuphal', 'gaha chausar' and 'dumel' forms are charming, and enthuse the people with patriotism, devotion and emotion. The diction is apt and fit for devotional songs as well.

KHLNANI, KAUMOMAL CHANDANMAL (Sindhi: b. 1844, d. 1916) was an eminent Sindhi prose-writer and educationist. He was born in a small village called Bhiria in central Sindh, barely one year after the conquest of the province by the British in 1843. He got his primary education in a traditional school of a Muslim Akhund, where he learned Persian. Thereafter, he proceeded to Karachi to learn English and other subjects in a government school. Khilnani was one of the first four Sindhi students who went to Bombay for the Matriculation examination of the University of Bombay. On his return he worked in the Revenue and Educational Departments and was the Principal of the Training College in Sindh for a long time. Khilnani significantly contributed to the cause of education by preparing a good number of text books in Sindhi on different subjects. He was a notable social reformer also, and worked for the eradication of social evils and spread of education among women. It is not due to his educational and social service that Khilnani is remembered. He did a distinct service to Sindhi literature by discovering Samia ja saloka (verses of Sami), originally written by Bhai Chainrai of Shikarpur Sindh. Khilnani came across 2100 verses full of Vedanta philosophy in 1873. These were written in the Gurumukhi script and he published them in Perso-Arabic characters with meanings of difficult words by dividing them in three parts. The first two parts containing 520 and 781 verses were published in 1885 and the third part containing 799 salokas was brought out in 1892. A selection of Khilnani's prose writings was compiled by his son, Manohardas, and published by the Sahitya Akademi in 1960. It is mentioned in the appendix of the book that Khilnani had written 58 books. Besides the text-books for secondary schools, such as Sindhi Readers and works on History, Mathematics and Science, he had penned essays, biographical sketches, short stories and dramas. He was the first Sindhi writer to translate into Sindhi Harshadeva's Sanskrit play Ratnavali, in 1888. The translation can scarcely be called a good one as it contains a large number of Sanskrit vocabulary with which the Sindhi reader of that period was not conversant. Besides, the selection of this play for translation was not in tune with the times as it contained erotic depiction of female beauty which, due to centuries-old inhibitions in Sindhi society imposed by the Muslim rule, the common reader could not appreciate. Pako pahu (A strong vow, 1962) is the first treatise written by Khilnani which forcefully pleads for the need of women's education in Sindh. He wrote a number of biographies of saints, leaders and social reformers and eminent women of India, for instance, Arya nari charitra (1905), Santa Jaideva jo jivan charitra (Life of saint Jaideva, 1906), Bhagata jivinyu (Lives of devout people). Khilnani was a pioneer in the field of translating Bengali short stories into Sindhi which, due to their natural and simple language, became very popular. No doubt, he was one of the early pillars of Sindhi prose and drama. He guided his successors by laying the foundation of chaste, simple and colloquial Sindhi for use in literary works.

KHIYAL BALANI 'ASHA' (Sindhi: b. 1930, d. 1970) was one of the most significant writers of modern Sindhi short story. He was a novelist and a painter. Because of the two divergent arts, it becomes a little difficult at times to discern whether it is the painter or the writer, who holds sway in his writings. The same difficulty might be experienced in his paintings.

To leave behind an image of a good short story writer and of a painter within the working span of a few years, is no mean achievement. He was involved in a road accident in 1970 in Delhi and died a few days later.

Balani's short stories fall into three phases. Initially, he wrote stories with a tendency towards social realism. His short story 'Maan Kaari' (I, the dark-skinned) represents this trend of progressivism. Later on, he, like other Sindhi writers of modern sensibility, was disenchanted with progressivism and turned to Freudian-romantic trend. 'Prabha ain kranti' epitomises his second phase of writings. He won an All India award on this story. In the third and the final stage, Balani was apace with the new literature, and sometimes excelled even the best short-story writers in the Sindhi language. In this phase he had the stark confrontation with life and produced short stories that exhibited the ultra-realistic interaction with the tensions and cruelties of life. 'Milkyway ain dhundh' (Milkyway and the fog), 'Kachi saraka' (The unmetalled road) and 'Katha je saanche mein' (In the wooden frame) are some of his best stories. In 'Kaatha je saanche mein', the main character 'I', in a bid to catch the running bus, loses his balance and falls down surrounded by scattered potatoes, onions and gourds which were in a sack dangling from his shoulder. The fellow-passengers, in no mood to lose the opportunity to catch the same running bus, do not mind trampling him along with the vegetables under their feet. The works to the credit of Balani include: Hiku raahi anek raahun (A wayfarer and numerous paths, novel, 1961), Katha je saanche mein, (Short stories, 1971).

KHONGCHOMNUPI NONGKAROL (Manipuri) is a manuscript, probably belonging to the early 17th century. It narrates a strange story of love which baffles one's attempt to call it either a tragedy or a comedy. It depends on the standpoint from which one looks at it. But this much is clear that the path of love born between two socially different people is seldom smooth.

Once six beautiful girls belonging to the Luwang community came to buy fish to a fishing weir maintained by six tribal youths. They struck up acquaintance soon after they saw one another and as there was not enough catch that particular evening the youths prevailed upon the Luwang girls to pass the night in the open shed together with them so that they might take away the fish in plenty the next morning. The girls, at first, did not agree for fear of their parents and brothers but as the boys persisted they gave in. Thus nestled down in the dark one with another the boys and the girls flushed with the ardour of life soon gave themselves up to the temptation of the flesh. In the morning the girls were afraid of returning home and meeting the members of their families. Thereon the boys proposed that in the event their guardians were harsh on them they would ascend heaven together for which they would meet each other precisely after five days at a place called Tentongyan where Punsiba, king of the Luwangs, hung up his bow and arrows on a crossed branch of a tree.

As feared, the girls on reaching home were harshly treated by their mothers who taunted them and hit them with their fists for committing the sins of the flesh and that too with men socially inferior to them. Unable to bear the shame any further before the family and the neighbours, the girls left their homes together before the appointed time and wended towards the abode of Soraren, God of the heavens. A strange thing happened on the way as one of the girls was on her travail and gave birth to a 'hari' (cicada) instead of a child. She left it behind with the assurance that she would visit it once a year and hurried to catch up with her companions who had been resting at every point of the ridges waiting for her. They first knocked at the gate of the omnipotent and when admitted, fell before him praying for shelter. The benign God felt pity for them and soon they were joined by the tribal youths, their lovers, but he told them outright that in heaven no mortal could enjoy earthly love. He, however, condescended to their paying a visit to earth once a year to lead conjugal life and nurse their child (the cicada). Thus the six young couple began to lead an eternal life of bliss

B.R.N.

KHUDDAKAPATHA (Pali) is the first text of the Khuddakanikaya. The word 'khuddakapatha' means minor sayings. This text comprises nine short 'suttas' such as: Tisarana, Dvattimsakara, Ten Commandments (Dasa vatthuni) Kuemara-panha, Mangala sutta, Ratana sutta, Tisokuddas sutta, Nidhikanda sutta and Metta sutta.

According to the commentary, the book derives its name from the first four suttas which are very short and called 'pathas'. Three of the suttas occur also in the Suttanipata, one of the well-known texts of the Khuddakanikaya.

Of the nine suttas the first one deals with the Buddhist confession of faith, the second is the enumeration of the ten commandments for monks, the third contains the list of the 32 parts of the body and its loathsomeness and its perishableness and the fourth sutta deals with the question of the novice and explains the most important Buddhist terms. Of the remaining five suttas the 'Mangala sutta' (No. 5) is the most important. 'Mangalas', (i.e. pious deeds and their auspicious results) are associated with the daily life of the Indian people since the ancient times.

The 'Mangala sutta' contains Buddha's instructions on auspicious and beneficial things like the honouring of the parents, the maintenance of children and wife, the following of peaceful occupation, giving of alms and of leading a righteous life, the maintenance of the kith and kin, doing blameless and virtuous deeds, abstinence from sins and intoxicating drinks and the observance of religion. According to B.C. Law the Mahamangala jataka (Fausboll's Jataka, Vol. IV) may be taken to represent the Hindu background of the Buddhist 'Mangala sutta'. The other suttas are also inspired by higher codes of ethics. The 'Ratana sutta' (No. 6) is one of the finest lyrics in the early Pali poetry composed as a beautiful hymn in praise of the Buddhist Triad. It is recited to ward off the dangers and to ensure prosperity.

The 'Tirokudda sutta' (No. 7) of the Khuddakapatha occupies a special position both in Sri Lanka and Thailand because of its peculiar contents and magical character. It deals with the departed souls. Some of its verses or hymns are recited even now in Sri Lanka and Thailand at the time of the cremation of the dead bodies.

The eighth sutta of this text, called the 'Nidhikanda sutta', emphasizes that good deeds constitute the highest treasure.

The last but very significant sutta of the Khuddakapatha is the 'Metta sutta' (explaining Buddha's higher regard and concern for universal friendliness, 'metta' or 'maitri', which constitutes a very significant factor in Buddha's attitude towards life and his life-long effort both in words and deeds to preach amity among all.

KHUDDAKANIKAYA (Pali) or 'the collection of short pieces' is the fifth nikaya or last division of the Sutta-pitaka of Theravada Tripitaka.

Though most of the texts of the Khuddakanikaya are small pieces, there are some which are quite extensive.

The contents and character of the texts included in this collection show a great divergence. Again, some of the 'suttas' are mixed compositions written in prose and verse. The verses seem to have been introduced at a later period as there are hints to this in certain suttas of the Sutta-pitaka. The Khuddakanikaya consists of following texts:

The Khuddakapatha (Minor sayings) is the first text of the Khuddakanikaya. It is a book of prayer in daily use for the novices and comprises nine 'suttas'. The second book of the Khuddakanikaya is the Dhammapada. It contains the sublime teachings of the Blessed One (Buddha). It is a collection of 423 verses divided into 26 vaggas or chapters and is the most popular Buddhist text; its popularity can be compared with that of the Bhagavad-gita. It is an anthology of sayings and preaches the ethical doctrines of the Buddha. It is used by the novices in Sri Lanka for daily study before receiving 'Upasampada' (highest monastic order). Most of the verses of the Dhammapada have also been traced in several other texts of the Pali canon.

Next to the Dhammapada is the Udana which is a collection of pithy sayings of the Buddha, mostly in metrical form with narratives. The whole work is divided into eight vaggas each of which contains ten suttas. These suttas are short narratives recounting some events of the time of Gautama Buddha and end with a pithy utterance.

The Itivuttaka, meaning 'Thus has been said' is the fourth book of the Khuddakanikaya, closely resembling the Udana. It is a book of quotations of the Master's authoritative sayings on morality. The entire work consists of 112 sections composed partly in prose and partly in verse and is divided into 'nipatas' and then to vaggas. Here in this book the same thoughts have been repeated first in prose and then in verse.

Next in order comes the Suttanipata (the section of discourses) which contains many pieces of oldest Buddhist poetry. It comprises five sections namely Uragavagga, Chullavagga, Mahavagga, Attakavagga and Parayanavagga. The first four vaggas contain 54 short poems while the last section (parayana) is a long independent poem consisting of 16 shorter parts. There is an old commentary called Niddesa on the Attakavagga and Parayanavagga. The Suttanipata is a highly informative text describing the socio-economic and religious conditions of India of the sixth century B.C. It is also a great aid to the understanding of Buddhism as an ethical religion.

Next to the Suttanipata are to be mentioned the Vimanavatthu and the Petavatthu. They seem to be very late compositions among the canonical texts. The first book (Vimanavatthu), in its 83 stories, provides a graphic description of celestial palaces enjoyed by the devas who, as human beings, had performed meritorious deeds in one of their past existences.

The second one i.e., the Petavatthu, describes, in 51 stories, the sufferings of the spirits and the restless souls (peta), which they have to undergo to obtain expiation from their sins committed during their last births.

Now we may mention two interesting lyrical compositions namely the Theragatha and the Therigatha. They are the poetic outbursts of the feelings and sentiments of the monks and the nuns respectively and rank very high amongst the lyrical compositions of Indian literature. The former comprises 107 poems with 1,279 verses and the latter 73 poems with 522 verses. These poems are important for the understanding of the religious theories and practices which are prevalent in the Buddhist order. The language of these two books is not very simple and it needs the help of a commentary to understand it.

The tenth book of the Khuddakanikaya is called the Jataka which is supposed to contain, by definition, tales of the Buddha's previous births. The canonical Jataka book comprises 6653 verses, constituting 547 Jatakas. The Jatakas have been grouped under twenty-two nipatas, depending on the number of verses in each nipata. In majority of verses there is no story, neither in prose nor in verse. The shorter Jatakas are but teachings of moral or religious precepts, or even of some practical knowledge, but in some verses there are hints to background stories. The Vidhura-jataka (no. 545) and the Vessantarajataka (no. 547) present complete outlines of the tales. The gathas of the Jataka book must have been associated with suitable stories in oral tradition, most probably in languages other than Pali. The Pali gathas have only been preserved in the canon and later on the author of the Jatakathakatha built the grand edifice of the Jataka stories on the foundation of these gathas with the help of the oral and written traditions prevalent in India and Sri Lanka.

The Niddesa, the eleventh book of the Khuddakanikaya, though now forms a part of the canon is virtually an old commentary on the Attakavagga and Parayanavagga of the Suttanipata. It consists of two parts the Mahaniddesa (Great explanation) and Chullaniddesa (Short explanation). The Mahaniddesa is a commentary on the Attakavagga and the Chullaniddesa on the Khaggavisana-sutta and the Parayanavagga.

Next comes in order the Patisambhidamagga (The path to analysis). It consists of large sections dealing with some important Buddhist doctrines including the Four Noble Truths, the theory of 'Karma', the knowledge attained by meditation, etc.

The last three books of the Khuddakanikaya are the Apadana, the Buddhavamsa and the Chariyapitaka.

The Apadana is a vast collection like the Jataka though of lesser literary value. An 'apadana' means heroic or glorious deeds of the saints done in their previous lives. The Apadana is written entirely in verse.

The Buddhavamsa, the fourteenth book of the Khuddakanikaya, also in metrical form, describes the stories of all the Buddhas—the former ones and Gautama Buddha. Gautama Buddha himself narrates the stories in the first person, telling who he himself was under the preceding Buddhas.

The Chariyapitaka is the last book of the Khuddakanikaya. It is a collection of 35 Jatakas in metrical form in which the Buddha speaks of the ten 'paramitas' (virtues for perfection) which are a precondition of Buddhahood.

KHUMANTHEM, IBOHAL SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1925) is a poet and novelist. He had practically no formal education but was a self-taught man with a fair command over Bengali and English. His Nachom lei (Bouquet) is a book of lyrical poems published in 1948. It was followed by another collection, Nungshi keina kada (To my beloved Keina). His ambitious collection, Thammoi paodam (The murmurs of my heart), a sequence of love poems with beautiful illustrations of a love-lorn lady in each page, on the line of the Petrarchan love poems, was published in 1966. He looked at love between man and woman from different angles. What distinguishes his works is his preoccupation with the theme of love between man and woman. The first novel, Eidi oktabini (I am a whore), created a sensation among orthodox Manipuri readers for it is the confession of a whore who has been compelled to take to prostitution. This was followed by another novel Imana eibu manghanbani (Mother polluted me) which also is the confession of a young girl who was forced to undergo abortion much against her will after which she led a wretched life. The two novels are considered bold attempts at exposing some of the ugly aspects of social life of the Manipuris. Chaokhatpadi eikhoigi khutta leire (Progress is in our hands) which is a collection of short stories was published in the seventies. He was the General Secretary of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, a premier literary and cultural organisation of Manipur during 1969 and 1970.

KHUMANTHEM, PRAKASH SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1932) is a short story writer, poet and lyricist. He passed the B.Com. Examination of Gauhati University in 1960 and spending a few years in teaching he switched over to broadcasting, working as a producer at the Imphal Station of All India Radio. At present he is the Secretary of Jawaharlal Nehru Manipur Dance Academy, Imphal, and member of several literary and cultural organisations in and outside Manipur.

Ichegi sham (Sister's hair), a collection of his short stories, was published in 1965. It was followed by Manggi ishei (Song of dream) in 1981 and Eigi ishei (My song) in 1982. These last two are collections of some of his wonderful lyrics and poems. They are marked by the intense feelings of a romantic yearning expressed in sonorous words. His short stories are also remarkable for the great skill they show in building-up situations. His prose is precise and flexible. He also edited the Ritu and the Sahitya and at present edits Kangla which is a publication of Atombapu Research Centre.

KHUMMAN RAS (Rajasthani). The modern readers first came to know, of the work, Khumman ras in Colonel James Todd's work The Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan, in 1829. Todd assigned to it the position of being the oldest historical narrative poem of Mewar, although in the preface to his voluminous work he also described it as a modern work of poetry with an antiquated subject matter. On the basis of the first point made by Todd, and on account of the association of the title of his work with Khumman ras, most-scholars of Hindi considered it as belonging to the period 1000-1400. In fact it belongs to the 18th century.

The author of Khumman ras was Daulat Vijay (1643-1743), a Jain monk of Tapagachha, and a disciple of Shanti Vijay, who belonged to the tradition of 'Sumati Sadhus'. A copy of Khumman ras lies at the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute of Poona. Its pages numbering about 139, contain 3,576 chhandas of the poem, and since its last few pages are missing, it is incomplete. In the fourth canto, there is a mention of one Maharana Sangramsimha II of Mewar during whose reign this work had been written. He ruled from 1700 to 1723. Thus, the time of its composition may be computed on this basis. Even on internal evidence, the period of its composition is around 1713.

There are various titles of the rulers of Mewar, such as 'Khumman', 'Rana', 'Maharana', 'Diwan', 'Sisodia', 'Elpura', 'Chittaura' and so on. 'Khumman', means the descendants of Khumman. Khumman and Rana are synonymous. The work derives its title from its account of Khumman and his descendants. This is justified also, because to some extent it traces in outlines the history of the rulers of Mewar from Bapa-Raval upto Maharana Sangramsimha II, besides Khumman and his descendants. There should also be a description of the three Ranas who succeeded Rajsimha viz. Jaisimha, Amarsimha II and Sangramsimha II but it is untraceable. Thus Khumman ras is predominantly a descriptive 'historical-narrative' poem.

The poem consists of eight cantos. In the first canto, there are prayers to Sarasvati, Ganesha and other gods and goddesses. Then follows an account of Chittaurgarh, which in turn, is followed by a list of the descendants of rulers belonging to the 'Suryavanshi' clan. This list is incomplete; at places it is even incorrect and not consistent with the list of descendants contained in historical works. There are accounts of the boon of uninterrupted reign secured by Bapa Raval from the hermit Harit, and of the former's conquest of Sajangarh and Chittaurgarh. Khumman belonged the eighth generation of Bapa's descendants. In the second, third and fourth cantos, there are poems associated with Khumman. The second canto describes the love affair and the wedding of Khumman and princess Ratisundari, the daughter of Jet Tunvar (the then ruler of Delhi). The princess had vowed that she would marry only that man who would pierce one pillar 'Gajathumb' of her palace with one blow of the sword; but she married Khumman, although he did not fulfil her condition. The third canto describes the following events: the taunts hurled at Khumman on his failure to pierce the Gajathumb, his visit to Nalwar and falling in love with Lakha, the daughter of Raja of Nalwar, and again on the occasion of the festival of Gangaur falling in love with Tilottama, a married woman who had been deserted by her husband Champakdatt. The fourth canto narrates the following events: the sending of message by Ratisundari (during her separation) to Khumman at Nalwar, his return to Chittaurgarh with Tilottama and Lakha, the visit of Champakdatt to Ghazni and inciting the Emperor Muhammad Ghazni to attack Chittaur, the battles fought by Songira Kanhada, his nephew Kasamod, Kasamod's wife, Khumman and his wives and their ultimate victory. In the fifth canto we find a list of rulers from Khumman upto Alanasi. It also narrates the marriage of Alanasi with the daughter of Siddharaj Jaisimha the marriage of Samarasi with the daughter of Prithviraj Chauhan of Delhi. Prithviraj's fraudulently marrying the daughter of Raja Jaichand of Kanauj and Emperor Ghauri's invasion of Delhi and Samarasi's death during the battle. There is a vivid description of the conquest of Chittaur by Pratap and his assumption of the title of Rana, etc.

The sixth canto contains a list of descendants from Rana Pratap to Ratnasen and also describes the famous legend of Padmini and Alauddin. The seventh canto mentions the outstanding deeds of the Rana's rulers from Arasi upto Rana Sanga-Hammur, Khetal, Lakha, Mokai, Chunda, Kumbha and Raimal. An account is given in canto eight, of Rana Sanga, Vikramaditya, Udaisimha, Rana Pratap and the battle of Haldighati, apart from the mention of the names of Rana Pratap and the successive Ranas including even the construction of the Rajsamudra dam by the Ranas.

There are two ways of approaching the poem. In the first place there are the cantos 2, 3, and 4 which comprise a character-sketch of Khumman, and canto 6 which narrates the tale of Padmini. In this the historical aspect is dealt with in a manner which does not make it appear to be of remarkable significance; nevertheless, from poetic content point of view and the richness of imagination appropriate to the theme, this canto is exquisite. Secondly, there are cantos 5, 7, and 8 wherein the description of historical events predominate over the poetic aspect. As regards the subject matter, it deals largely with numerous personalities and a conglomeration of events. In poems of this type, the heroic and the erotic rasa occupy a place of prominence; further, there is also to be found a treatment of the heroic and the erotic, particularly in tales associated with Khumman and Padmini. In the story one finds a description of love, separation and union, the various states of separation, physical descriptions of heroines, the six seasons, the twelve months, and types of heroines. The descriptions fit the occasion and are vivid and artistic. Rarely does one find in Jain poets such picturesque descriptions. Depiction of the heroic is really masterly. The life-span of the heroes in this poem is from the age of 15 years upto the age of 25 years. It is their conviction that being unmarried, they will give proof of their heroism. If they die in the battle, they will have celestial dancers for their brides. Their motto is: 'Khag' (Sword or battle) and 'Tyag' (sacrifice). While the Khag symbolises valour on the battle field, the tyag symbolises munificence. The poet presents a very powerful description of the battles. Alongwith the 'virrasa' or the heroic, other rasas or sentiments, viz. 'raudra' (the ferocious), 'bhayanak' (macabre) and 'vibhatsa' (the morbid) are also treated. There are also beautiful descriptions of the war between heroic men and heroic women, and of the latter becoming 'satis' or burning themselves on the pyres of their deceased husbands. There are also occasional glimpses of Rajasthani folk-life and the attractive descriptions of the 'Gangaur' and 'Savan ki tij' festivals find a place in this work. Here and there, one also comes across an induction of the 'super natural' phenomenon. In this poem the poet has gathered his narrative material from numerous books. A number of lines have been borrowed from the celebrated poem, Dhola Maru ra duha and Hemrata Suri's Padmini chaupai albeit, with some modifications. Besides these, the poet has embellished his poem by means of extracts from popular sayings picked up from Hemchandra's duhas, works of Bihari, Udayaraj and Sundardas, Prithviraj raso, Gadan Surdas, Achaldas Khinchi-ri-Vachanikas, Khidiya Jagga's Vachanika Rathaur, Ratan-simhaji's Mahenda sautari, and other works. Their language is Rajasthani in which there is a blend of Marwari and Dhundhadi as well as an occasional intermingling of Gujarati. Their major metres are duha-soratha, chaupai, kavitta and gaha (gatha). Apart from these, one also comes across 'ardhana racha', 'jhulana', 'nisani', 'chandryan', 'chausar', 'motidas', 'kundaliya', 'trotak', 'dingalagit', etc., but their use is very limited. The poet has also organised his lyric in popular folk-metres such as 'dhals' or 'deshi'. It is evident from the concluding portion of the fourth canto that the poet probably intended to end the poem after writing the first four cantos, but at the insistence of the disciple of Shyamsimha, he composed the later cantos, for a mention of a contemporary ruler in the very middle of the poem is made which would appear irrelevant. Underlining the fact of their being later compositions, Khumman ras ranks among the finer works belonging to the eighteenth century.

KHUNTHOKLON (Manipur) literally means a systematic study of immigration (from 'Khunthok', immigration, and 'lon' a systematic study). Immigration here means immigration to Manipur. The term 'Khunthoklon' indicates a number of books, the chief among which are Poireiton khunthok, Nongpok harm (Immigration from the East), Nongchup harm, (Immigration from the West), Bamon khunthok (Immigration of the Brahmins), Tekhao mayanglaon (Immigration from Assam), Lairikyengbam lon (A study of the immigration of the Lairik Yengbams) and Khetrilon (A study of the immigration of the Kshatri-mayum). Chingarembi khongghup may also be placed in this category.

Ranges of hills, which are a further extension of the eastern end of the Himalayas, lie on the eastern frontier of India and separate this country from Burma. But there are routes through these ranges and some of these routes pass through Manipur. From pre-historic times immigrant merchants, pilgrims, invaders and adventures have frequented the routes passing through Manipur in their journey from the Indo-Gangetic valley to what is now called Burma or from the latter to the Indo-Gangetic valley. Some of these people settled in the Manipur valley permanently and were eventually absorbed in its population. Books dealing with the immigration of pre-historic and early historic peoples settling in Manipur are rare but from about the twelfth century, the Manipuris wrote books specifically on this topic.

Account of the immigrants from the Kobo valley (now in Burma) which lies to the east of Manipur is contained in the book Nongpok haram. The immigration of the Brahmin forefathers of the present-day Manipuri Brahmins, who came from Bengal, Orissa, Uttar Pradesh, etc., are dealt with in Bamon khunthok. These books may not be of great value but their historical importance and to some extent, literary, cannot be denied.

KHUNTIA, BISHWANATH (Oriya). The influence of the two great Indian epics—the Mahabharata and the Ramayana—on the literature and people of Orissa has been incalculable and among the several poets who wielded their pens in producing or recreating the Ramayana in Oriya literature in the medieval period to cater to the need of the country, the name of Bishwanath Khuntia stands supreme. There are several versions of the Ramayana in Oriya commencing with the Dandi Ramayana or Jagamohan Ramayana by Balaram Das of the 16th century, but Bichitra Ramayana by Bishwanath Khuntia has been unique in its depth, dimension and literary appeal. Written in musical metres, this notable epic work has been widely popular and has left an indelible impression upon the rural readers of Orissa both as a reproduction of the Ramayana and as a piece of valuable literature to guide and to inspire the rural folk in the practice of essential virtues and noble qualities enshrined in it.

A contemporary of medieval Oriya poets like Dinakrishna Das, Upendra Bhanja and Lokanath Bidyadhar, Bishwanath Khuntia was a resident of Puri town and lived during the reign of Raja Dibyasingh Dev of Khurda in the later part of the 18th century. His work Bichitra Ramayana gives evidence of his being present at Puri during the famous car festival of Lord Jagannath when Divyasingh Dev was the king. The poet has given his identity as 'Bisi' at the end of each canto and for this reason the Bichitra Ramayana is known as Bisi Ramayana among the Oriya readers.

Although the theme of the original Ramayana is the main theme of the Bichitra Ramayana, it is unique and superb in its treatment and execution. The invocation of Lord Jagannath in the beginning of this notable work adds to the originality and imagination of the poet.

The poet commenced the writing of his Ramayana on the occasion of Gundicha and also completed it during the same period. It is found that while designing the musical metre for each canto of his Ramayana, the poet has taken as model the metre of some of the erstwhile compositions of his predecessors. On the whole Bishwanath Khuntia occupies a significant position in Oriya literature as the successful author of the musical version of the Ramayana and as an interpreter of the noble characters of the great epic for the social upliftment of the people.

KHUNTIA, KANHAI (Oriya) was a Vaishnava poet of Orissa born in the Khuntia sevaka family who are traditional servants in the temple of Lord Jagannath. He was renowned by the time Chaitanya came to Orissa in 1509. Srichaitanya charitamrita tells us that Kanhai Khuntia and Jagannatha Mohanti played the roles of Nanda and Yashoda respectively in the 'Nandotsava'. The date of his birth can be approximately fixed between 1455-1460.

Kanhai Khuntia composed a poem on Krishnalila. His book entitled Mahabhavaprakasha describes Radha as 'Mahabhavamayi', who had originated from the 'Mahateja'. The book identifies Sri Jagannatha with Sri Krishna. The book also speaks of some historical events including the Kanchi expedition of king Pursusottamadeva, the sudden invasion of Hussain Shah, the Sultan of Bengal of the temple of Lord Jagannath and the transportation of the idol to 'Gadakokala' on the Chilka Lake. Kanhai Khuntia probably died between 1540 and 1550 after the death of Chaitanya.

KHUNTIYON PAR TANGE LOG (Hindi) is the seventh collection of poems of Sarveshvar Dayal Saxena, published in 1982. Most of the poems of this collection belong to the period 1976-81. The sixtythree short and long poems compiled here depict the social and political reality with a deep sense of honesty and authenticity of experience. A vast sense of agony provoked by the lack of sensibility in corporate life pervades the poems. They are linked with the anguish of the common man and make a direct attack on the caprice of destiny. The poet specializes in making his own life's touching situations and emotional experiences non-subjective and general. The very first poem, 'Jangal ki yad mujhe mat dilao', depicts anguish of disillusionment. The torment of contradictions, incongruities and incoherences of life has smashed the tender dreams of life of the age. In spite of all this, these poems do not have the existentialistic idiom of despondency and weariness. One can still figure the hope and light of enthusiasm in poems like 'Fasal', 'Umra jyon jyon barati hai' and 'Coat'. The poet can listen to and feel every heartbeat of his time and social milieu. In these poems the social change seems to await a dark 'Bawandar' (typhoon), a big earthquake. In the poems 'Sweater', 'Moja', 'Dastane', the poet gives a meaning to these symbols—"Lekin yad rakho/Anyaya aur yatana ki seema/Jab par ho jati hai/ To bejan mein hi/ Sab se pahale jan ati hai"—'Coat', 'Dastane', 'Sweater', 'Juta', 'Nadi', 'Gaon', 'hath', all these take the form of a resentment and revolt in the perspective of the problems and challenges of the age. The poet creates new symbols, and the freshness and meaningfulness of his imagery gives them easy communicability. Hindi critics have usually complained of the lack of communicability in 'Nai kavita'. But here, these poems seem to assure the reader that the real potency of good poems of 'Nai kavita' lies in the truth of its sensibility and its innate communicability.

After a thorough reading of these poems it appears that the world of the poet's experience is very vast. The rural sensibility dominates his world of experience. The poet is weary of and unhappy with the urban sensibility. He yearns for fields, ponds, trees, rivers and streams of the villages. In these poems we hear the moanings of a farmer, a labourer. It is here that the poet emerges with all his deep feelings and ideas. The faces of life vary from the smooth and the bright to the rough and uneven. The imagery is rich in variety. It does not merely serve the purpose of enjoyment or luxury, but it explains the meaning and gives a concrete shape to the idea. Under the discipline of 'Nai kavita' the poet has created a compact structure, and the consequences are the poems rich in meaning—'Aghista mat chalo'; 'Tapara', 'Ungaliyon mein chubhe kante', 'Jab wah munha kholata hai', 'Mrityu danda', 'Prouh shiksha', 'Jarurat hai ek sarkari jasus ki', 'Ab kuchh thik nahin', 'Dukh', 'Paharon ko mere upar girane do', 'Machhali' and 'Natak' are some of the other poems worth mentioning. The sarcasm used in them as a poetic device is the real power of Sarveshwar's poetry. The distorted and grotesque phase of life and time is presented with great skill. The poems 'Ab mein suraj ko nahin dubane dunga', 'Mere bhitari ki koyal', 'Gaon ka sapera' give vent to the poet's pent up anger. 'Lushun aur chiriya' is a dramatic poem that expresses ideological experimentalism in a new idiom. In this way variety of form is also present in the poems along with the variety of the facets of life. Thus, poetry and experience become identical and the creativity of the poetic language attains the depth of potency. These poems are not merely political or social statements. The language with its basic sensibility is also imbued with cultural consciousness. It has the simplicity of a dialect. Diverted from the general track, this language has become a blend of the poetic and the dramatic.

The poet does not impose his logic on the poems. The words sprout from the reality of life. In this situation, these poems have the 'fire' of ideas, but there is no hackneyed formula of slogan-mongering, which is the weakness of most of the poems of Nai Kavita. Actually this collection gives a new dimension to the main stream of modern Hindi poetry.

The book was selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983 posthumously.

K.P.

KHUSHBU JO SAFARU (Sindhi) is a compilation of poems in 'rubai' form by the master-poet, Harumal Sadarangani 'Khadim'. The compilation consists of 475 rubais, out of which 208 rubais are those which were already included in the collections of his poems, Rangin rubaiyun (Colourful rubais, 1959) and Ruha d'ino relo (The outpourings of the soul, 1963), and the remaining 267 rubais are new compositions which have been included in Khushbu jo safaru (Sojourn of the fragrance), published in 1980. The idea of including the rubais from previous publications in this collection must have been to restore all the rubais written by the poet at one place under one publication exclusively for the compositions in that form.

Rubai is a poetic form which infiltrated into Sindhi poetry through Persian. It is composed of four lines, out of which the first two lines and the last one rhyme (aaba). The content of rubai in Sindhi poetry is mostly based on the wider and the significant moments of human life with a different poetic technique and complete command over the patterning of word-images into the fixed rhyme scheme. The composition in the rubai form in Sindhi has, therefore, always been considered the most difficult poetic genre of classical mould, and even the masters have sometimes faltered in its composition by deviating from the requirements dictated by this genre. Sadarangani's success in this genre should, therefore, be viewed as a proof of his mastery over the form and the content, especially when we find the punch lines (last lines) of many of his rubais reaching the climax, leaving behind a tremendous impact which sometimes leaves the readers spellbound. For example let us examine this rubai:

Khadim ko inha g'alhi jo ahe jawab:
Chha ahe hayat, chha jahan jo isbab?
Munkhe bi gharia pala ji haqiqat ahe
Ya khaba mein khaba tho d'ise khaba jo khab?

(Khadim, is there any answer to the question:
What's life? What's the value of the world?
My existence, too, is a reality of a moment
Or does a dreamer see in a dream the dream of a dream?)

From his rubais it is noticed that not only does the poet have a thorough knowledge of the Persian prosody, but he is fully informed of the basic requisites of the rubai genre.

KHUSHWANT SINGH-KHUSRAU, AMIR

Although rubai in Sindhi has retained its classical mould and no innovations in technique or rhyme scheme have been attempted, yet its theme and diction have undergone many changes. In many of the rubais of Sadarangani, these changes are visible. It is not that he does not indulge in the depiction of the traditional subjects of 'Gul-o-bulbul', or 'Saghar-o-mina', but more often than not, he makes rubai a vehicle of expression of diverse human experience and manifold fragments of contemporary life. For example the following rubai reflects his modern sensibility. It builds a bridge between the fleeting moments of subjective experience and the snippets of situations of everyday life.

Hod'anha d'iso sarak te nadhro kutro,
Ratu g'are, phathiki phathiki d'ie damu tho.
Chithiyo athasi brek bina motor kahin,
Kahin notu kayo ahe nambar unajo?

(Look yonder, see a small pup on the road,
Dying bleeding, writhing in pain,
It has been crushed by a car without a break,
Has anyone noted its registration number?)

The other works by the author include: Kakha ain Kana (Straws and stalks, essays, 1966); Pirha ji bakha (The first glimmer of dawn, free verse, 1972); Chikha (A shriek, free verse, 1977), which was honoured with the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1978; Kanwar parun patar mein (Lotus has its roots deep), critical work on Shah Abdul Latif (1984).

KHUSHWANT SINGH (English; b. 1915), is an eminent Indo-Anglian novelist, a short story writer, a historian and a journalist. Educated in Delhi, Lahore and London, he became Information Officer of the Government of India at Toronto in 1947-48, and then Press Attache and Public Relations Officer for the High Commission of India in the U.K. In 1966, he had a teaching and research assignment at Princeton, and in 1968 became visiting Professor at Swathmore College, Swathmore, Pennsylvania. In 1970 he was awarded the Panjab Government Prize for Distinguished Man of Letters in India. He was awarded 'Padma Bhushan' in 1975 but he returned it in protest against the "Operation Blue Star" for flushing out terrorists from the Golden Temple. He was a member of Rajya Sabha from 1980 to 1986.

Singh's first book The Mark of Vishnu and Other Stories (London, 1950) is a collection of realistic short stories in a vigorous style fused with wit, humour, irony and satire. The same kind of style was employed in his first novel Train to Pakistan (New York, 1956), earlier titled Mano majra, for which he was awarded the Grove Press India Fiction Prize in 1956. The novel deals with the plight of the Hindus, the Muslims and the Sikhs in a border village in India at the time of the country's partition in an absorbing narrative, re-creating the agony and tension of the people shaken out of their complacency by the traumatic experiences of communal frenzy. The moving event of the partition has been realistically presented. The tension is caused by the two diametrically opposed worlds of Juggat's love and of communal hatred. His second novel I Shall not Hear the Nightingale (London, 1959) is not a political novel even though there is an undercurrent of revolutionary activities of some youths. Here characterization is traditional and characters two-dimensional. The novel deals with the life of the Sikhs in India but with his characteristic robust realism and humour. His short stories in two collections—The Voice of God and Other Stories (Bombay, 1957) and A Bride for the Sahib and other stories (Delhi, 1967) are written in a traditional fashion, skilfully around one or more episodes. They have an undercurrent of irony which penetrates the surface of pretentiousness and hypocrisy.

In the field of journalism, he has occupied some important positions. After doing small editorial jobs, in 1969 he became editor of The Illustrated Weekly of India in Bombay. Later he edited many newspapers, including The Hindustan Times in which his weekly column and occasional articles continue to appear. What characterizes his journalistic style is his powerful narrative power, a strong ironical and satirical tone, some juicy stories and anecdotes, and an earthy flavour. It has the imprint of his personality. He has a fondness for Indianisms and his style which is a curious mixture of the crude and the educated synthesized into one.

As a historian, he wrote A History of the Sikhs in 2 volumes (Princeton, 1963 and 1966), chronicling the history of the Sikhs from their inception to the present day. His contribution lies in writing objectively and in separating truth from adulatory and occasionally superstitious material which other Sikh historians before him had used. Currently he has a Smithsonian Fellowship to update these volumes.

The dominating influence over his life and writings has been that of the Punjabi life and literature which contributed an earthy quality—warmth, vigour, passion, gaiety and an uninhibited attitude towards sex—so well reflected in his robust style that his urban life, western education and cosmopolitan outlook have failed to affect. The comic muse in the form of wit, humour and exaggeration enlivens his writings.

Ram. Sh.

KHUSRAU, AMIR (Hindi, b. 1253. d. 1325) was born in the village named Patiali of the Etah district. As Khusra's father expired when he was only seven, he was brought up by his mother. From the very childhood Khusrau showed great promise, and therefore, he became a scholar of philosophy and science in no time. At the age of twenty, he earned fame as a poet. He was a man of soaring imagination and skilled in the proper social etiquette. More than other litterateurs of his time, Khusrau was renowned all over the subcontinent.

Khusrau lived his entire life under the royal patronage. He saw the rise and fall of the three royal families—Gulam, Khilji and Tughlaq and of eleven Sultans. His first work Masnavi Kiranusa sadain written in 1289 is available. Thereafter, some of his works written during the reign of Allauddin are Mallol Anwar, Shirin Khusrau, Laila Majnu, Ain-e-Sikandari and Drisht Vidrisht. These were five typical romantic works famous as Panth Gant. Khusrau presented these works to his religious teacher Sheikh Nizamuddin Auliya. Besides these, he also wrote two prose works, viz. Khajainul Fatah and Ezazakhusravi. Of these the first one is a description of the victories of Allauddin, and the second one relates to figures of speech. In the time of Allauddin, he also wrote the famous historical work named Devalrani Khizrakhan. After Allauddin, in the reign of Mubarak Shah also Khusrau wrote a book named Nuh Sephar in which the main incidents of that time were mentioned.

The last historical work of Khusrau is entitled Tughlaq which was written in the reign of Gayasuddin Tughalak. After the death of his teacher Sheikh Nizamuddin in Delhi, Amir Khusrau could not bear the shock and died shortly after the event.

Amir Khusrau was chiefly a poet of Persian. Works of Khusrau can be classified into four categories—historical work, romantic work, Diwan and prose works. Khusrau's fame is based not only on his Persian poetry, but also on the "Hindavi" works. Amir Khusrau was not only well conversant with Arabic and Persian, but also with Hindi or Hindavi. And he was proud of it. He is also famous for many verse-riddles, sayings, puzzles and ghazals. Besides, his Persian-Hindi dictionary entitled Khalikbari is also a famous work.

The Hindavi works of Amir Khusrau were originally available only in the oral form and it is for this reason that we find variations in their language. Khusrau has his own place in the folk-life. He is still remembered in the context of Khariboli Hindi. Amir Khusrau is considered a symbol of the integrated culture of India.

KHWAIRAKPAM, CHAOBA SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1896, d. 1952) was an eminent essayist, poet, novelist and literary critic. He studied up to the matriculation standard. He knew Bengali, English and Sanskrit well. A teacher by profession, he studied Sanskrit literary criticism. Manipuri had been newly introduced in the school curriculum and he felt called upon to write text-books of Manipuri literature. He wrote lighter and small essays for children collected in works like Phidam, Wakhal (1925) while his Wakhalgi ichel is a collection of more thoughtful and serious essays. He had been influenced by Kaliprasanna Ghosh of Bengal, even in his thematic approach and stylistic pattern. He was a romantic poet and very often tried to see the sad side of life though he was not actually a pessimist. In his historical novel Labangalata (1939) romantic love and patriotism are depicted. His approach to love tends towards the Bhakti of the Vaishnavite literature. As a literary critic he tried to relate Manipuri legends to the mahakavya of classical Sanskrit literature. He was famous for his love of nature. His book of poems, Thainagi leirang (Ancient flower, 1950), includes some of the most outstanding poems of those days, like 'Lamgi chakla amada' (To a bird of the outer space) in which is depicted the delicate relation of human being and the great soul.

Associated with several literary and cultural organizations of Manipur, he was modest and unassuming. He was also associated with the publication and editing of such early literary journals in Manipuri as the Yakairol, the Jyoti, the Lalit manjari patrika, etc. He was honoured posthumously with the title of 'Sahityaratna' by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad.

E.D.S.

KHWAJA HABIBULLAH NAUSHEHRI (Kashmiri; b. 1555, d. 1617). During the medieval period, Persian was declared as court language by the Sultan rulers of Kashmir. Constant immigrations of people from Persia and Central Asia, and their settlement in the valley paved the way for the introduction of Persian language in Kashmir. Consequently, it influenced the people and became popular under the Muslim rule. This is very much evident in the compositions of Persian poets from the sixteenth century. Habibullah was also one such poet.

Habibullah Hubbi was born in Naushehar in the vicinity of Srinagar. He belonged to a famous Ganai family. His father's name was Shamas Ganai who was a leading salt merchant of his time. His father entrusted the education of his son to Mullah Hasan Afaqi. He studied Persian and Arabic scriptures from him. He grasped the whole literature by his sharp intelligence and became an authority on Persian. He remembered the Quran by heart at the age of seven. His spiritual 'murshid' was Sheikh Yaqub Sarfi. His father wanted to see his son a good and famous merchant. So he insisted that he took charge of his profession. Habibullah obeyed his father, but he had no skill in his profession. Consequently, he devoted his time to reading the Quran in his shop. Hubbi was so busy in the study of his scriptures that his customers weighed goods themselves and kept the money in his safe. According to this Kashmiri verse—"Namnamath chisodah vantuch na dani" (There are ninety-nine varieties of things but no skill in business). This shows his disinterestedness in this business.

It is said that he had a natural taste for music from his childhood and he won recognition for his sweet and impressive music. He was a contemporary of Haba Khatun (16th century) who was well-versed in the composition of the 'ragas'. Once her 'Kalam' was sung to him. He was very much impressed by it. The result was that he started composing Kashmiri poems at that time, though he was a Persian poet.

Once he attended a literary meeting (mehfil) in Ahmada Kadal. Qawwalis on Hussain were sung there. He then composed a Kashmiri poem in the same rhythm.

After some time his reputation as a great musician spread in the valley. Some people became jealous of his natural gift and wanted to destroy his image in the high circle. During his time, Ahmad Beg Khan was the Governor of Kashmir. Mullah Hassain Khabaz, an eminent scholar at that time, was against his musical taste because it was anti-Islamic. According to the Islamic law, playing on musical instruments and singing are prohibited. Mullah Hassain filed a petition against Hubbi. In a congregation, ordered by the Governor, the question was debated by scholars well-versed in the Islamic law. The debate ended in his favour, acquitting him of all the charges levelled against him. By this victory he became more popular in society.

Hubbi was a devoted Sufi absorbed in the music of the mystics. He received homage from both the king and the commoner. He was an eminent poet of his time. No doubt, his Kashmiri poems based on mysticism are superior to all other compositions. His poems, short and sweet, are written in a simple style. They contain rich ideas and show the originality and freshness of his imaginative mind in lines like:

Be true in love and you will have a taste of the wine which fills the river of life, that brought us hither; from whose waters God hath made every living thing.

Some drink cup after cup unceasingly; some, while drinking, attain to the Goal; some wait and they still have hope; some wait and wait, unavailingly.

He is the author of Diwan Hubbi, Tambin-ul-Qulub (Masnavi) Wafatnama and Rahat-ul-Qulub, Persian treatises on mysticism. His Sayahatnama (Avahal Ishan Saheb) is the biography of his teacher, Shiekh Yaqub Sarfi.

Habibullah has left an everlasting impression on the minds of the people with his immortal poetry. His poetry has the capacity and depth to inspire even those who are not deeply involved in the spiritual aspects of life.

KHYAL (Rajasthani). Generally speaking, a 'Khyal' in Rajasthani came to mean a 'khel' or a play, a show or a drama. The popular folk dramas in Rajasthan are of three kinds—'khyal' 'swang' and 'lila'. The khyals are played in different theatrical styles. However, all these styles and forms are called by the single name of Khyal. Almost all Khyals are religious, historical and social and concerned with worldly events. They are known by different names on account of various forms of stage, orchestra, recitation of the story, acting, region, playwright, merit, attribute, style, colour, impression, composition, subject matter, etc. Some such Khyals are: 'Macha', 'Turra-kalangi', 'Kuchamani', 'Shekhavati', 'Nautanki', 'Mewari', 'Alibakhshi', 'Kishangarhi', 'Rammat', 'Jaipuri', 'Kathaputli', 'Hatharasi', 'Gandharva', 'Nagauri', 'Kada', 'Chaubola', 'Jhadashahi', 'Dangali', etc. The Khyals are believed to have originated during the 18th century. Music is the very life-stream of the Khyal. The show presents a pleasant combination of instrumental music, dance and songs. Khyal forms the integral part of the Rajasthani folk literature. Rajasthani Khyals in written form came in vogue during the 19th century. Some preliminary Rajasthani Khyals were published under the head, Marawadi Khyalas in a book form edited by Father Robson and printed at the Scotch Presbyterian Mission Press, Beawar. Several excerpts from the Khyal Dungaji Jawaraji published in the aforesaid book, are quoted by S.H. Kellogg in his A Grammar of the Hindi Language (1st edition, Prayag, 1875). Khyals have been printed and published in large numbers in several parts of India. A list of 189 Khyals has been published by experts in the field.

KHYATA (Rajasthani). The historical prose is an important part of the bulk of prose works in Rajasthani. It is known by various names, such as, khyata, vat, vigat, vanshavali, pidhiyavali, tattavali, hal, yad, vachanika, davavait, etc. Khyata is a synonym for history. It was during the reign of Akbar that historical writings got a fillip and the Rajput princes also had their khyatas written from their own sources. Khyatas continued to be written from the beginning of the 17th century of the Vikrama era and up to the second decade of the 20th century. The khyatas are undoubtedly important from the historical point of view, and so are they from the linguistic, literary and cultural viewpoints. The khyatas may be placed under two major heads. In the first category are the khyatas sponsored by the princely rulers of the day and written by paid servants, clerks and other scribes; while in the second category are the khyatas written by individuals on their own. The khyatas written in the names of Bankidas, Nainasi and Dayaldas have gained much popularity. It cannot be denied that even the khyatas written independently were biased inasmuch as these were written in favour of the ruling princes of the times. The elementary form of the khyata may be seen in the genealogical accounts and eulogies. The manuscript known as Rathoran ri vanshavalī Rau Sihaiji sun Rau Kalyanmalji tain, available in the Anup Sanskrit library, Bikaner, may be taken as the earliest specimen of a khyata of this kind. Though it is named as Vanshavalī, yet it is a khyata for all purposes. The concerned manuscript was copied during the year 1543 approximately. Another work of this type is Bikaner Rai Rathoran ri vata tatha vanshavalī which is also available in Anup Sanskrit library, Bikaner. In the vata portion of this work are the details of the Bikaner princes, while the vanshavalī contains details of the Jodhpur ruling family. One more manuscript of this library known as Bikaner ri khyata Maharaja Sujansimha sun Maharaja Gajasimha tain, contains various accounts of the periods of Maharaja Sujansimha (1690-1735), Jorawarsimha and Gajasimha (d. 1787). Other important khyatas are Jodhpur ra Rathoran ri khyata, Udaipur ri khyata, etc. All these are available in the form of manuscripts.

The khyatas can be further classified according to styles. They are: (i) Those narrating historical events in a chronological order, such as Dayaldas ri khyata, part II, edited by Dashratha Sharma. It contains the history concerning 10 princes of Bikaner, starting from Rau Bika, the founder of the State, up to Maharaja Anupsimha. This account is very important from the historical point of view. Sindhayacha Dayaldas (born approximately in the year 1800 and died around 1891), also created three more historical works, Aryakhyana kalpadruma, Desh darpana and Panvara vansha darpana, edited by Dashratha Sharma (Bikaner, 1960). Another khyata of this type is Jaisalmer ri khyata (Parampara, quarterly journal, parts 57-58, 1981, Jodhpur). It contains a brief history of the ruling family of Jaisalmer from its beginning up to Raval Vairishala (enthroned during 1864). (ii) Those containing various independent vatas, and accounts of family and events come under the second category, such as Muhnot Nainasi ri khyata (parts I to IV, edited by B.P. Sakariya 1960, 1962, 1964 and 1967 respectively). The khyata written by Nainasi (1610-1670) is regarded as the most important of them all. The underlying factor of its popularity is that it contains the account of a good number of Rajput clans, such as Sisodiya, Chauhan, Bhati, Rathaura, etc., together with the description of the events concerning hundreds of individual historical personages. Besides the khyata, Nainasi has also given Marawa ra paraganan ri vigat (parts 1 to 3, edited by N.S. Bhati, Jodhpur, 1967, 1968 and 1974 respectively). The book contains exhaustive details of economic, social and administrative conditions of Jodhpur State and its parganas, i.e., Jodhpur, Jaitaran, Pali, Sojata, Phalaudi, Medata, Siwana and Pokarana in a methodical and scientific way. Both these works of Nainasi are unique in their own ways.

Bankidas (1776-1833) wrote Bankidas ri khyata (edited by N.D. Swamy, Jodhpur, 1956). This may also be counted in this category, but the vatas given therein are in the form of short notes. The attempts made to arrange them in a chronological order also failed to present a connected history. Nevertheless, its importance is unsurpassed in relation to certain facts and details.

There are also khyatas which are concerned with a particular prince or some individual. Maharaja Mansinha ri khyata is one such example. It contains a number of events and other details from the beginning of the Maharaja's rule up to his death (1782-1843). The khyatas are a rich source of history but their veracity needs to be tested. Their importance as historical works in poetry, narrating historical events or celebrating historical personages as well as the Dingala commemorative songs, is obvious.

KICHAK-VADHA (Maithili) is an epic in blank verse by Tantranath Jha. It was written at the request of his elder brother Ramanatha Jha for publication at first in his literary journal, Sahityapatra, and was intended to be issued as a full book later on. It may, therefore, be regarded as having been published partly in 1937. But the Sahityapatra stopped publication with six Cantos, and it was out in 1962 when three more Cantos were added and the epic could be published in book form for the first time. Later, on the advice of the veteran Bengali novelist of Bihar, Bidhubhushan Mukhopadhyaya, one more Canto was added between the seventh and the eighth in 1976.

Tantranatha conceived the idea of writing on the story of Kichak when he went to Calcutta in 1934 for the treatment of his eyes. There he was highly impressed by the performance of Sisirkumar Bhaduri as Kichaka in a

KICHAKA-VADHA-MARATHI

Bengali play. It also struck him that he should experiment with blank verse in Maithili on the lines of Michael Madhusudan Datta's Meghanada-badh.

Kichak-vadha was acclaimed as a major work even when it appeared in Sahityapatra, and even today it is regarded as one of the glorious achievements in Maithili. It is an epic in the new manner, different from the traditional epics. It is particularly remarkable for its masterly use of a dignified style and subtle psychological insight into the great dramatic event of the Mahabharata that is taken up as the theme. The fourth Canto is regarded as its best, but, as is known to all familiar with the episode, the entire story has an abiding charm in itself, more so when told in such fluent and elevated manner as in Tantranath's epic.

The work uses no symbolism, and does not-pretend to be the modern mouthpiece of a renaissance Mithila. That was achieved in Tantranath's second epic, Krishna charita which discusses the modern educational system and has a message for the modern reader.

But aesthetically Kichak-vadha still remains a greater achievement. Its gripping narration, wonderful diction and command over the elevated language, graceful movement and rhythmic sublimity are unparalleled.

J.M.

KICHAKA-VADHA (Marathi) is a play written with a mission by Krishnaji Prabhakar Khadilkar (1872-1948), the mission being the resistance to the British rule. Since such a mission could not be propagated openly, he turned to mythology and history for such themes as would be useful to present the prevailing mood of political discontent and uprising. The great Indian epics like the Mahabharata contained such myths and stories, which, when presented with a subtle allegorical slant, could easily fulfil his mission. The Mahabharata story of Kichaka is a simple story, depicting the downfall and destruction of an autocratic tyrant.

Lokamanya Tilak was then waging a relentless war against the imperialist Lord Curzon. Khadilkar could sense the underlying meaning and significance of the Kichaka story. He thought that this story had enormous possibility of serving his political purpose. The story depicted the struggle between the right and the wrong, justice and injustice and the ultimate triumph of the right over the wrong.

The dramatic episode from the Mahabharata relates that Kichaka was a Minister at the Court of Virata, but he was also in a way an all-powerful Viceroy. The Pandavas along with Draupadi had migrated to the Court of Virata, but fate so willed that they had to conceal their identities and live in exile for a year. This was the time when the end of the year was in the offing. Draupadi, disguised as Sairandhri, was serving as a maid to Queen Sudeshna, whose brother Kichaka happened to see her, and the sight of her dark beauty excited him to such an extent that his desire for her turned into a consuming passion. His plan for achieving that end was thwarted and smashed by Bhima, who in the end killed him in a duel. This, in short, is the story of Kichak-vadha.

Kichak-vadha is an extremely well-knit play and Khadilkar has succeeded in maintaining the suspense of the play right up to the end, even if the end is loudly declared by the title of the play. All the characters in the play, the mighty Kichaka, the powerless Virata, the patient Dharmaraj, the impatient Bhima, and above all the resolute Draupadi, determined to keep her honour unblemished, are sharply drawn with the sure touch of a confident dramatist, and the conflicting motives of all these characters keep the tension of the incessant action ever mounting. Even the fictitious characters of Ratnaprabha, the helpless wife of Kichaka and her maids Saudamini, Manjubhashini and Chanchala out to tempt him, are all portrayed very vividly. As a result, Kichak-vadha is, perhaps, the most effective of Khadilkar's plays.

But there is an aspect common to all Khadilkar plays, which must be noted in this context. All Khadilkar plays are in tune with the times. Being Lokamanya Tilak's confidante and assistant editor of Kesari, all his plays are political allegories. These plays invariably express the rebellious sentiments with regard to the British domination, and the audience was always fully aware of the political content of Khadilkar's plays. Kichaka was cast in the mould of the then Viceroy, Lord Curzon, and some of his aggressively arrogant utterances (like, 'the rulers are rulers and the slaves are slaves') found direct echoes in the words of Kichaka, while the popular mood of resentment and revolt was vehemently expressed by the fiery speeches of Draupadi and Bhima. They represented the extremist (ahal) political wing, while Dharmaraja represented the pacifist liberal (maval) attitude. Kichaka was immediately identified with Curzon's image, and the ultimate fate of his defeat was construed to prophesy the end of the British rule.

The British Government was rather slow in its action against Kichak-vadha but not only the native Anglo-Indian press, but even the London Times did not waste time in predicting the angry mood of the play. The London Times, in an eloquent outburst against this play, said in effect: "Khadilkar is a most dangerous extremist, and Kichak-vadha is a cleverly veiled incitement to murder the European officials." The article in question had correctly judged the obvious message of the play and the British Government was then compelled to proscribe the seditious Kichak-vadha.

Kichak-vadha happens to be the forerunner of the ensuing Khadilkar plays, which are cast in the same mould by way of motivation. They never vary themewise and contentwise. Kichak-vadha as a play is superb in construction and it is perhaps Khadilkar's most representative creation.

K.P.K.

KILIPPATTU (Malayalam). Ezhuttacchan is often regarded as the inventor of the poetic genre known as kilippattu in Malayalam. He adopted the literary device of appealing to a bird to narrate the story of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, and the epics are supposed to be narrated by the bird in response. Later his style of kilippattu became a special branch of poetry.

Kilippattu uses four different meters. They are 'keka' (24 syllables), 'kakali' (20 syllables), 'kalakanchi' (20 syllables) and 'annanata' (18 syllables).

Among these varieties the most popular one is keka. The second is kakali in which one line consists of three feet having five syllables each with a pause after the second foot. Kakali is also capable of considerable expansion. In Kalakanchi the two lines are not of the same length and syllabic value. The second line is the same as that of kakali.

Annanata is the last variety which consists of six but in a line, each composed of two syllables one long and the other short. A common feature of all these varieties of kilippattu is that they are all couplets with the second letter of both the lines rhyming with each other. Kilippattu was supreme in Malayalam literature till the rise of the neo-classical school towards the end of the last century.

T.G.R.P

KILU BOMMALU (Telugu) is a novel written by Gavini Venakata-krishna Rao (b.1914). It opens with Pullayya's returning home at dusk driving himself in his own bullock-cart. The problem of the novel is skilfully presented through the consciousness of Pullayya himself, his daughter acting as the agent provocateur. The external action, such as it is, is limited to Pullayya's driving home, his pleasantries with his grandson and a few bits of sleepy conversation in the evening with his daughter, Sita, and with two or three acquaintances the following morning. Pullayya's innocence is of course transparent. The reader's curiosity is roused but faintly. Yet the problem which is mainly that of character is clear enough though it all seems to be deceptively quiet.

Pullayya, the richest merchant and landlord in the village, is well-known for his honesty, integrity and pragmatism. But he is also uxorious. His wife, Lakshmamma, is strong-willed, affectionate and utterly devoted to her husband and children (Rama Rao and Sita), but rather hasty in speech and action. Pullayya is truly worried about his being a 'guarantor' about two years ago for Chandrasekharam, a moderately-educated and idealistic rural industrialist, in a financial transaction with a traditional usurer (a Marwari merchant), because Chandrasekharam is now unable to repay the loan. Pullayya's anxiety becomes almost unbearable for two reasons: first, his wife will not forgive him for his rash action in standing surety even for a friend; secondly, his reputation as a hard-headed realist in business will be seriously damaged. The rumour-mill in the village is already active, one or two even daring to ask him directly as to the truthfulness of Pullayya's reported surety for Chandrasekharam, a clearly sinking businessman. Pullayya evades the questions by giving ambiguous replies. When Sita also asks him in the evening about the public rumour, Pullayya drowsily replies from the bed that "people are mere idlers" without in the least realising the consequences of such an evasive reply.

Sita, with her unshakable faith in her father's truthfulness, quite innocently conveys the "news" to others that her father has not stood surety for Chandrasekharam. It spreads like a wild fire with the serious criminal implication that Chandrasekharam must have committed forgery. Lakshmamma gets vexed with her husband's naivete, and tries in vain to get the news confirmed or denied by Satyanarayana, her husband's faithful brahmin clerk for two generations. She, therefore, jumps to the conclusion that it is a case of forgery, calculated to strike at her family's prestige and fortune. She indignantly rushes to her lawyer-nephew in the town and seeks legal action against Chandrasekharam.

Pullayya, true to his character, vacillates and evades the issue until it is blown out of all proportion and allowed to divide the village. Mallayya for a while joins Chandrasekharam in order to spite his rival Pullayya. Two or three other persons who happen to know the truth keep quiet out of cowardice or fear and Chandrasekharam is finally sentenced to three years of rigorous imprisonment.

The final solution is ironical in that truth does not always triumph. But is there truth in the absolute sense any more than there is absolute good? Chandrasekharam has his own flaws in the character. He also suffers from vanity and irresponsible idealism and opportunistic slogan-mongering. Yet, in the particular situation of the forgery case, he is innocent even as Pullayya is guilty of unethical conduct. The public reception, accorded to him by the corrupt and dishonest social worker Ammayamma is ironical, in view of Pullayya's nefarious behaviour in getting his own son arrested on false charges (that he is a communist terrorist) and cynical disregard for the Gandhian principle of uplifting the Harijans. Even the simple-living and high-thinking doctor (Sastry) is not perfect as he allows Padma (Satyanarayana's wife) to commit the sin of adultery and exiles himself from the village, bequeathing his house to a Harjian family. Rama Rao, the only surviving son of Pullayya, also deserts the village finally when he comes to know that his father has stooped to the level of acquiring Dr. Sastry's house which has been bequeathed to Pullayya's family a few hours before at the public meeting. Satyanarayana, who alone could have told the truth, but did not, is already a nervous wreck when his wife commits adultery, literally driving him mad.

The novel ends as it begins: "Sardar" Pullayya's 'triumphant' arrival at home, fully convinced of the correctness of his conduct. He does not feel it necessary to inform his ailing wife of the fact of Rama Rao's (their son's) release from the prison; nor does he care about his son's self-exile.

Nevertheless, the conclusion of the novel is not cynical inasmuch as it concludes with Satyanarayana's schizophrenic recital of the famous shloka from the Bhagavadgita:

"Whenever dharma is strained, O Bharata;
To uplift the dharma I create myself;
To protect the good and destroy the evil;
And to establish the dharma I descend into the world in every age."

Thus the novel with its intensely moral vision is a significant landmark in the development of Telugu fiction.

KINHANNA, RAI KAYYAR (Kannada; b. 1915) is a poet. After his B.A., M.A., Vidvan (Sanskrit and Kannada) and Teachers' Training degrees, Kinhanna Rai worked as a teacher, winning the National Award (1969-70). He has been a member of the Karnataka Sahitya Academy. He knows Kannada, Tulu, English, Sanskrit and Malayalam.

As a poet Kinhanna Rai belongs to the Navodaya School. Idealism, love of nature and patriotism dominate his poetry. He is an idealist but his idealism fully takes into account the presence of conflicting forces and contradictions in nature and in life. There is a joyous acceptance of life and a calm, mature acceptance of death. He is also a social reformer, and a reflective poet. His diction is generally simple, assimilating the Sanskrit and Kannada elements in the language, but, despite its simplicity, it has range, and can be powerful.

Kinhanna Rai has won several awards, and has been honoured by the Karnataka Sahitya Academy (1969-70).

Some of his more important works include: Poetry: Shrimukha; Aikyaguna; Punarnava; Chetana; Koraga; Shatamanada gana; Prose: Ratnarashi, Lakshmishana kathegalu, Parashurama, A.B. Shetty; Short Stories: Anna Devaru mathu ithara kathegalu; Literary Criticism: Rashtrakavi Govinda Pai, Govinda Pai-smriti, Kriti, Malayalam sahitya charitam; Drama: Viragini; Children's Literature: Makkala padya manjari, Navodaya vachana male. Besides these original works, he has also translated the five Upanishads, and Kumaran Asan's khanda kavyas into Kannada.

KINNERASANI PATALU (Telugu) is a lyrical composition by Kavi-Samrat Viswanadha Satyanarayana. Ancient among the ancients and modern among moderns, Viswanadha was the poet laureate of the State of Andhra Pradesh and a recipient of the Jnanapith Award. He touched almost all literary forms and never touched anything but left it golden.

On his way to Bhadrachalam to oversee his father's lands, Viswanadha came upon the Kinnerasani in spate and instantly under the spontaneous flow of powerful feelings composed this lyric, as he himself admitted once. He took a common theme of those times as a backdrop for this composition. The maid Kinnera was caught up between a loving husband and termagant mother-in-law and sought the embrace of mother Godavari. The helpless husband could neither reform his mother nor defend his wife. The poem is a fabric woven out of the tragic pair. The turbulent emotions find echo in the evocative description of nature. When his wife is leaving him the husband stands helplessly and his deep sorrow flows from the depths of his heart thus: 'My self has melted, my life-spirit has departed, my soul has boiled and evaporated, O my love! Remembering his past bliss against the present separation he bemoans, 'It is just now that I have engulfed you in my embrace, and just now you have flowed away from between my arms.' In this context, the Telugu idiom 'the whole body melting into water' (niluvuna nirai) is quite significant. It brings out the full impact of the hero's loss while reminding one that the heroine is a stream. 'There was a time when you could not put your tender foot on rough stones. Now my heart breaks to think of you groping and sweeping through rough boulders and jutting rocks in your sweep'. His heart aches to find his beloved's tender beauty in a mere ripple and asks her if he had even said she wasn't true to her husband's love. Further, her career reminds him of the sheer purity of the manner in which the Ganges descended from the heights of heaven on the earth to follow the steps of King Bhagiratha. As he stretches his hand to stop his beloved she slips through his fingers. He cannot arrest her. He complains: 'You are mercurial, being ethereal; I am grossly earthy. How can I overtake you in flight?' All he can do is to raise his tone in anguish. He loses all sensation and turns into a stone.

The moment she saw her petrified lover, Kinnera swirled round the hillock, not having the heart to leave him behind. 'If only I have known of this deep love. Oh, alas!' She brooded bitterly over what might have been. She invited him to turn into a stream, so that they could flow together. She averred she was true to his love. But the hillock of her husband could not flow. Her heart melted in the fires of her frustrated love, and her flowing tears rolled into her stream. She could neither leave him nor stay. Casting a wistful look behind, she moved reluctantly forward, alone and woe-begone. The water nymphs swam to her urging her on to her journey, wafting cool breezes of sympathy like a dear mother's tender love. Now the flow steadied like the first ray of light coming after the matin star, like the scent coming after the bloom, like the sweetness of a Telugu lullaby. Fairies rained flowers. Spirits of the earth and sky joined their notes to that of the nightingales welcoming Kinnera.

The poet excels himself fixing in the literary frame the lilt and the swing, the rhythm and the flow of the river in the tripping steps of the lovely maiden. The similes he uses are masterly and aesthetic.

Mischief waits round the corner. The ocean sees the onrush of the maiden stream. His body swells in desire: 'exultation took the shape of his body'. The worlds are frightened to see the ocean swelling. Kinnera too becomes aware of the lust-filled eyes of the ocean. She repents having left her lover's side. Try as she might, she can no longer arrest her current. She tries to hand on to bush and boulder, but no, her own fright and tears add to her helpless swiftness. Her swirl cries to the mute skies, to save her chastity. Pathetic fallacy is employed here with beauty and grace; bird and beast and the very breeze stand helpless and in pitiful tears. Mother nature narrates all this to the Godavari. With a swelling heart the river rushed to rescue her dear daughter. The tearful union of the mother and child culminates in the Godavari engulfing Kinnera in her wavy embrace. Realising the purity of Kinnera, the ocean quiets down.

This rivulet Kinnera, joining the Godavari flows towards Bhadrachalam, changing its shape and colour according to the season, and gets sanctified by the sight of Bhadradi Rama.

KIRAT CHOITHRAM BABANI (Sindhi; 1922), a short story writer, playwright and critic, was born in a small village, Maro Lakho, in the district of Nawabshah, in a businessman's family.

As a child, he braved a tragedy that befell the family. In the attack of the bandits, two male members of his family were killed and the business premises were ransacked and set on fire. Consequently, the family abandoned the village and settled in the district town of Nawabshah, where his studies started. Kirat turned out to be a brilliant student from the very beginning.

He was in the final grade at school when the 'Quit India' movement started all over the country, and as a student leader, he was arrested for his involvement in the movement. While in jail he was initiated into Marxism by the illustrious student leader, Sobho Sianchandani. After his release he shifted to Karachi and eventually became the Vice-President of the All India Students' Congress. In the partitioned country, he became an active member of the Communist Party of India in Karachi and was jailed for 11 months for his political activities. On his release in 1949, he migrated to India.

Kirat was a voracious reader of Sindhi and English literatures during his school days. He had already started writing during that period, but his writings had a political tint. He took to creative activity in good earnest only during his college days in Karachi, and his first short story, 'Jilebiuni jo chor' was published in 1947 in Nai duniya, a literary monthly representing the Progressive Writers' Movement in Sindh. He was introduced as a budding writer, who believed in changing the prevalent social order. He wrote some more stories while he was in Sindh. He got associated with the Progressive Writers' Movement, and he has remained a progressive writer till today.

After migration to India, he continued his academic career on the one hand, and on the other, took active part in the movement for preservation of the Sindhi language and literature in India. Simultaneously he continued writing stories, essays and one-act plays. By late fifties, he was acclaimed as a versatile creative writer to reckon with. By then, he had obtained his L.L.B. and B.A. degrees, and took to teaching to earn his livelihood.

So far, the publications to his credit are Hua (Her, short stories, 1956), Dard jo dil mein samaiji na saghio (short stories, 1960) Suria sad'u kayo (One-act plays, 1972), Adab mein qadurani jo suwalu (Critical essays, 1974), Amana je ufaqa d'anhani (On world peace, 1978), Lenin, duniya ji azim inqalabi shaksiata (Biography, 1980), Okha dokha (Critical essays, 1981), Obol rani (folktales, 1982), Sindhi kahani virhange baid (Review, 1984), Pehi manjhi patar (Critical essays, 1985) and Na Laila na Majnu (short stories, 1987).

Kirat was given the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1980 which provided him with an opportunity to visit USSR in 1981. Kirat travelled abroad once again as a delegate to World Peace Assembly in Prague in 1983. He has since bagged more awards for his literary and critical works. Sindhi kahani virhange baid fetched him the Ministry of Education Award in 1982. ARMEC, a noted literary organisation, awarded him for his book Pehi manjhi patar in 1984, and the same book brought him the Maharashtra Sindhi Sahitya Academy award in 1988. In 1985, Akhil Bharat Sindhi Boli ain Sahit Sabha's Annual Award for literary proficiency was also bestowed on him.

Kirat Babani has been associated with literary movements and has been an office-bearer of literary organisations since 1944. He was president of the Akhil Bharat Sindhi Boli ain Sahit Sabha for eight years, from 1971 to 1979. He was again elected to this office in 1987. He has been a journalist of repute. He was associated with political weekly, Sadaqat, in Sindh and with the monthly Nai duniya, the weekly Sindhu dhara and the daily Sindhu samachar in India. He has always been at the forefront in the literary and cultural movements for renaissance in the post-Independence era.

KIRATARJUNIYA (Sanskrit) is the only mahakavya of Bharavi (circa 6th century), a famous Sanskrit poet. In eighteen Cantos it describes the fight between Arjuna (a hero of the Mahabharata) and god Shiva in the garb of a mountaineer. On the advice of Vyasa, to seek celestial arms by penance, Arjuna engages himself in severe penance in the Himalayas. Shiva comes to meet him as a Kirata, wild hunter, and a mighty boar, which came to attack Arjuna, is slain. Both Arjuna and the disguised god claim the merit of having slain the animal, and a quarrel and a fight ensue. When fighting in the air Arjuna holds the god by the feet and on his appeal, Shiva reveals himself and blesses the warrior with the gift of arms, with which he is to win back his lost kingdom. The poem displays a vigour of thought and language and a lofty eloquence of expression rarely equalled in Sanskrit literature. Its words possess a natural grace. The style of the poet is proverbially compact and meaning-laden (Bharaver arthagouravam). It is full of vigour of thought and language, and lofty and eloquent in expression. The first three Cantos are known as 'pashanatraya' (three rocks) because of the hard thinking pregnant expressions of the poet. In the 15th Canto there are verses with a variety of meanings and alliteration. Mallinatha, the famous commentator, describes Bharavi's language as 'narikelaphala' (coconut fruit) and says that the sweetness of his poetry is enveloped in a garb of apparent ruggedness. More than thirty commentaries of the Kiratarjuniya have been published so far.

The best edition of the text along with the Ghantapatha commentary of Mallinatha is that by Durgaprasad and Parab (Nirnaya Sagar Press, Bombay, 6th edn., 1907). A complete German translation by C. Cappeller was published in the Harvard Oriental Series, Vol. 15, (Cambridge, Mass, 1912).

KIRLOSKAR, BALVANT PANDURANG (Marathi; b. 1843, d. 1885) is the father of Marathi drama. His academic career was not much to talk about. To begin with, he worked as a school teacher in Belgaum, then as a clerk in the police department, and then in the Commissioner's office, which brought him to Pune. While still at Belgaum, he wrote two plays, one on the life of Sankaracharya entitled Shankar digvijaya and the other entitled Allauddinchi chitorgadavar swari (1873), but they attracted scant attention. When he went over to Pune, he happened to see some Parasi spectacle plays and thought about similar Marathi productions, the first one of which was Shakuntala (1880), an adaptation of Kalidasa's immortal classic. Only the first four Acts of this play were performed. It was this event which was destined to bring a revolution to the Marathi stage.

The main attraction of Kirloskar's Shakuntala was its musical score. There were innumerable songs set to music and sung by the various characters in the play. Thus, Shakuntala laid the foundation of the Marathi 'sangit natak'. Inspired by the tremendous response accorded to this play, Kirloskar composed an original mythological play, Saubhadra (1882), which still remains, even after a hundred years, the most popular Marathi musical play. It tells the story of Subhadra's wedding. It is composed in the style of a light musical comedy. The ironic situations in the play are deftly handled and the characters are neatly drawn. It is a well-knit play. But its main attraction is its haunting music.

Ramarajyaviyoga, the last play Kirloskar left unfinished, consists of only three Acts, and is cast in the mould of a tragedy. In the absence of Rama, his father Dasharatha and his stepmother Kaikeyi along with her maid Manthara dominate the stage. Shambika's appearance and his character in this play are rather intriguing.

Kirloskar was not only a distinguished playwright, but also a fine actor and an extremely able director of his own plays. He organised his own theatrical troupe. His efforts in this direction were encouraged and upheld by eminent men like Chiplunkar and Chhatre. It is remarkable that Chiplunkar wrote special articles in the prestigious Kesari to welcome the emergence of Kirloskar and his new theatre troupe. There is no doubt that Kirloskar was responsible for the future glory of the Marathi theatre.

KIRPASAGAR, LALA (Punjabi; b. 1875, d. 1939) was a scholar of Sanskrit, Hindi, Urdu, English and Punjabi, and was twice awarded prizes by the Punjab Government for his books in Punjabi. He had to discontinue his studies after F.A., and was, by turn, a school-teacher, a journalist and an accountant in the Punjab University from where he retired in 1934. His Lakshmi Devi (in two parts, 1920), though based on Walter Scott's Lady of the Lake, is a land-mark in the Punjabi narrative poetry. Its panoramic portrayal against the back-drop of nature makes it an immortal epic and an experience into pure aesthetics. He worked on its two parts continuously for seven years, and completed it in 1915. In it, he tried to imaginatively recapture the splendour and glory of Ranjit Singh's court. Rai raiae is another unpublished epic of his credit. He collected his miscellaneous poems in Mantarang (A streak of mind). In Lakshmi Devi, there is a marked difference from the early tradition of the Punjabi epic. Its dramatis personae are more life-like and they seem to be ordinary men. Superstitions and taboos of the hilly sects have been very artistically portrayed in it. Through the synthesis of history and imagination, it beautifully depicts the event of victory by Ranjit Singh. Maharaja Ranjit Singh has been elevated to the heights of a national hero in his dramatic trilogy Maharaja Ranjit Singh (1931, in two parts) and the third part entitled Dido Jamval (1934). In the last dramatic venture, a hero of the masses of Jammu challenges in vain the ever-expanding frontiers of Ranjit Singh's regime. The fourth and fifth parts of Maharaja Ranjit Singh are still in the form of a manuscript. Though these plays do not fulfil the requirements of the modern stage, they do represent a realistic panoramic picture of the Punjab of the bygone days. Its cultural vignettes are beautifully mirrored in them. The Kotwali (Police station), the Pathans, the Nihangs, dacoits, spirits and apparitions in the matrimonial ceremonies, a village house, its courtyard activities and the bazars have been painted nostalgically. Adding folk-songs here and there, their aesthetic pleasure has been enhanced. Felicity of expression, and lyrical qualities are the hallmark of his poetry.

S.S. So

KIRTANA (Bengali), it has been suggested by scholars, comes from the root 'kirit' which means 'to proclaim'. There is, however, a definition of the kirtan which apparently does not agree to this meaning. For example, Jiva Goswami in his Bhaktisandarbhā defines kirtan as 'only the inarticulate murmuring of the lips' ('oshtas-pandanamatrena kirtanam'). But in reality this definition, understood properly, does not clash with the preceding one. Both stress the utterance of something very intimate, sacred and secret. It needs, therefore, a special type of musical talent to sing a kirtan. It mixes recitation and raga, dance and music. It blends 'kathakata' with melody, and chorus with solo singing in a characteristic fashion which is its own. Even Abul Fazal, the matter-of-fact historian of Akbar's court, could not but wonder at this fusion of singing and recitation of the kirtanias. While dwelling on the class of singers, he observes in his Ain-i-Akbari: 'The kirtanias...dress up smooth-faced boys as women and make them perform, singing the praises of Krishna and reciting his acts.' The form may be compared to that of the baroque where opera and oratorio are juxtaposed. The kirtana also serves purposes which are literally distinct from each other and it combines within itself the triple stream of drama, music and poetry.

It is with the heightening of the emotional mood that the reading of heroic legends ends and the singing of romantic and bucolic melody emerges. This change-marks also the beginning of the kirtan and the Vaishnava lyric and the end of the epic or pseudo-epic strain. One must take note of this emotive and romantic mind behind the kirtan and the Vaishnava padavali. This mind is responsible for the mingling of classical ragas and folk-air, of purity and the subjective note in a kirtana. The soul of Bengal hungered for a means of self-expression. That is why the general run of people could not become followers of the Hindusthani school of music. That is why in spite of the rich musical material contained in Kanada, Adana, Malkaus and Darbari Todi, the Bengali had to create the kirtana. It is because he loved song that he wanted to fashion it with his own hands, nearer to his heart's desire.

The kirtana is significant not only for its flexibility of the melodic pattern but also for the conception of tal (rhythmic beat) and laya (tempo) in the permutations and combinations of certain systems of beats. The Kirtana-singers have given us a large variety of tals, based on the concept of matra. The composers in kirtana created innumerable tals in keeping with the variegated emotional scheme of their songs. This could handle very well the metrical scheme of the Vaishnava padavali. In keeping with their varied emotionalism, the Vaishnava poets had to speak through matravritta, which is charged with emotional power. As to the tempo of the kirtana, this provision befitting the rise and increase of emotion, is seen in the gradual crescendo from lahara and matana to murchchhana which marks the growing intensity of accelerated emotion from its rising level to its climax. All these facts have to be mentioned to substantiate the assumption that the kirtana and Vaishnava lyric went hand to hand. These details about the kirtana have to be taken note of because the padavali is reborn in it and amplified by it. The festival of Kheturi (c. 1581) marks the establishment of the classified modes of the kirtana and its marriage with the Vaishnava lyrics.

The poetic licence a kirtana-singer took in arranging and re-shuffling the constituents of the classical music is evident from the treatment of 'dhruva'. It was ordained that the dhruva was to come only as the third part of the song. We are not suggesting that the above-mentioned singers always metamorphosed the order, but it is seen from the arrangement adopted by them that if necessity arose they transgressed it. This attitude to dhruva would seem pronounced if we interpreted it from the way they performed the portion called 'dhua' (refrain) allotted to the main group of singers. The leader of the throng went on improvising while the others (e.g., the 'dohars', the word possibly coming from dhruva, i.e., the burden of the composition) repeated the improvised versions or a part of them. The leader of the throng, in case he was other than the lyricist himself, had no right to improvise but only to develop in the way of 'akhar' (which may have come from 'akshara', the immutable substance or from 'ankura', shoots from the seed.) Whatever it might be, it is an appreciation as well as explanation of the 'pada' concerned.

The once-composed song becomes thus re-composed by the 'mul gayen', i.e., the leader of the throng, and when the tension is heightened, the whole song assumes the air of a thoroughly composed song. Similarly akhar also appears to split the couplets to explain the meaning contained therein. But it spells out the meaning neither by didactic nor by verbatim reproduction, but by subtle melodic and lyrical improvisation. This vitalizes and invigorates the rhythm and the cadence of the lyric without marring its metrical structure. This spontaneous process of improvisation changed the order of the dhruva. This close and flexible relationship between akhar and dhruva modulated the pre-established order of the Indian classical music and moulded it to its more organic form. Hence, through the kirtan, the relation between music and poetry is made more reciprocal in Bengali lyrics than elsewhere in the world.

KIRTANA (Kannada). The word 'kirtana' means praise. But in religious literature it means praise of God, the Lord of the world. Verses in praise of Jina (the Tirthankara of the Jains), Shiva and Vishnu, are found in Kannada poetical works. But they are not regarded as kirtanas. Kirtana is a special form of literary composition, the subject-matter of which is praise or glorification of God, particularly as Vishnu or Hari, with all his divine attributes signifying his omniscience and omnipotence and his concern for the welfare of his devotees. Since all the names of Hari connote one or the other of his innumerable attributes, kirtana is also called Naṃsaṃkirtana. Kirtanas also describe the divine deeds or lilas of Lord Hari in his ten 'avatars' to uphold dharma when adharma happened to prevail and also to protect the devotees in distress. Stories of the first six avatars do find a place in puranic literature in Sanskrit, which is the main source of information for the composers of kirtana in Kannada, but they are not exploited by them for the simple reason that the avatars appeared either to punish a single Rakshasa (as in the cases of Hiranyaksha and Hiranyakashipu) or to carry out a definite purpose (as in the cases of Vamana and Parashurama). The more important reason is that they present no human drama. On the other hand, stories of Rama and Krishna are full of heroic deeds and interesting incidents, and rich in human interest; they embody philosophic ideals and ethical standards for the ordinary man to imbibe and to follow. Even so, Krishna is more popular than Rama with the composers of kirtanas, who are called Haridasas (Servants of Lord Hari) in Kannada, and whose musical compositions are called kirtanas or 'devara-namas'.

The Bhagavata or Vishnu-bhakti cult is based on the Mahabharata of Vyasa, the Bhagavata and the Bhagavad-gita. Most of the rulers of Karnataka were votaries of Lord Vishnu. The bhakti cult (Vaishnavism based on the dvaita philosophy) in Karnataka received a great fillip after Madhvacharya (13th century), born in Udupi of South Kanara district of Karnataka, propounded the dvaita philosophy with 'Hari-sarvottamatva' (Supremacy of Hari) as its main plank. Even earlier (in the eleventh century) Ramanuja, who had preached Vishnu bhakti (Vaishnavism based on Vishishtadvaita philosophy) in Tamil Nadu, spent most his last days in Karnataka. Very much before Madhva and Ramanuja, existed a broad-based Vaishnavism, which has been called Bhagavata Sampradaya, an off-shoot of the bhakti aspect of the advaita philosophy which gave equal status to Hari and which gave rise to what is known as the Hari-Hara cult, though the emphasis was on Vishnu-bhakti. All the famous poets such as Rudrabhatta (author of Jagannatha vijaya), Kumaravyasa (of Kannada-bharata) Nityatina Shuka Yogi (Kannada-bhagavata), Lakshmisha (Kannada jaimini bharata) and a few others belonged to the Bhagavata Sampradaya of the advaitic philosophy. But none of these wrote kirtanas. It was only in the 19th century that we come across a poet of this movement, Timmappa Dasa (1770-1860) who calls himself a Haridasa and writes hundreds of kirtanas, upholding 'nirgunopasana' through 'sagunopasana'. He also rendered the tenth Canto of the Bhagavata mahapurana into three hundred and odd kirtanas, set to definite ragas and talas.

But we owe it to a long line of Haridasas belonging to the dvaita school of philosophy propounded by Madhvacharya for the vast bulk of kirtana literature of 'Dasa sahitya' as it is popularly known. The earliest among Haridasas is Narahari Tirtha (1300). Sripadaraya of Mulbagal (1450) is regarded as the pioneer of the Haridasa parampara in Karnataka. But the greatest among the Haridasas is Purandara Dasa, a disciple of Vyasaraaya (1525), a guru of Krishnadevaraya, the famous ruler of the Vijayanagara Empire. The traditional belief is that Purandara Dasa (1550) composed 4,75,000 devotional songs, but only about a few hundreds of them are extant. Another equally famous composer was Kanaka Dasa (1550) a non-brahmin by birth but accepted as a disciple by Vyasaraaya. Both Purandara Dasa and Kanaka Dasa not only enriched the kirtana literature by their innumerable compositions containing noble philosophic thoughts and glorifying devotion of Hari, but also gave a rich variety to the musical form of the kirtana. Though the successive generations of Haridasas, prominent among them being Vijaya Dasa (1682-1755), Jagannatha Dasa (1728-1809), Gopaladasa (1750), Mahipati Dasa, have contributed a lot to keep alive the kirtana tradition, yet none of them has been able to outshine Purandara and Kanaka in making an impact on the society. The secret of the popularity and fame that the kirtanas of Purandara and Kanaka enjoy even to this day lies in the universal significance of the social criticism which has served as a foil to highlight the theistic philosophy, which is the bedrock on which the kirtana tradition is firmly established. As a musical form, the body of kirtana consists of three sections: the 'pallavi' (refrain), 'anupallavi' and three or more 'charanas' (stanzas). It is set to definite ragas and talas. The kirtana as a literary form has exerted considerable influence on the evolution of the modern Kannada lyric and its rhythmic pattern. The obvious difference between the kirtana form and the lyric form is that the kirtana, whoever may be its author, has a 'mudrika' or signature of the composer in the end while the modern lyric is generally bereft of any such mudrika; each composer has his own mudrika after his personal deity, such as Purandara Vitthala (of Purandara Dasa), Adi Keshava (of Kanaka Dasa), Vijayavithhala (of Vijaya Dasa), etc.

The kirtanas of Haridasas have found a place, though not a prominent one, in the repertoire of the performing musicians all over South India, and the A.I.R. Stations of Karnataka have done much to popularise them. There are also separate branches for studies and research in kirtana literature in a couple of universities. The corpus of kirtana literature has kept the lamp of bhakti burning bright even to this day and forms an important chapter in the history of Kannada literature.

KIRTANA (Marathi). There are nine modes of expressing devotion to God. They have come down from the mythological divine sage, Narada. Of this 'Navadha bhakti', the first two, 'Shravana' (listening) and 'Kirtana', were widely performed in Maharashtra. Though the nine-fold ways of devotion to the Lord are originally meant as personal and individual approaches to God, in practice they have become ceremonial modes of devotion by multitudes of devotees.

The Bhakti cult was extant in South India even before the days of Ramanuja. But it is Ramanuja who must be credited with spreading it from the south to the north. This naturally led to the multitudinous expression of devotion to Rama or Krishna in various ways and regions. The 13th century Maharashtra saw a great religious upheaval in the form of the celebrated Varakari sect, resurrected by the appearance of the great saint, Jnaneshvara. Saint Namdeva turned it into a widespread movement. The devotees of Vitthala (who was the same as Krishna) thronged the sandy banks of the Bhima at Pandharpur. There, Namdeva would start chanting the manifold names of Jnaneshvara, would recite his 'abhangas' and songs, and thousands of Vitthala devotees would repeat these lines or sing them spontaneously, as most of them knew the songs by heart. This is the typical form of the Bhagavata or 'Bhajan-kirtana' of the Varakari sect. Even to this day, such performances can be witnessed in which the head or the senior-most member of the group would chant an 'abhang' of a saint, preferably Tukaram, and the devotees would follow suit. These chantings are interspersed with the 'nirupan' or exposition of the greatness of the Lord, and the power of the simple 'smaran' (remembrance), 'sankirtana' (reciting) and 'shravan' (listening) of the names of God.

The second type of the kirtana also known as 'Harikatha', or simply 'Katha', is a more stylised form of the devotional performance. The educated middle class subscribed mainly to this type, and it was this 'Harikirtana' that was truly a 'Harikatha-nirupan', and as such it influenced the neighbouring regions including Tamilnadu. Tanjore (modern Tanjivur) was a great seat of learning, where many pundits and poets thronged, and quite a few Marathi poets formed a part of the learned gathering, as the rulers there happened to be Marathi-speaking descendants of Shahaji, the father of Shivaji. Many Marathi 'akhyanas' were composed by these poets and their authors were considered pioneers in that type of longer Marathi narrative poems based on the Puranic stories or 'upakhyanas'. This genre of the kirtanas became known as 'Naradiya kirtana'. As the divine sage Narada is supposed to have first started it, only the learned and well-versed exponents could perform this 'kirtana'.

The Naradiya kirtana has two distinct parts: (1) The 'Purva-ranga' comprises the expository part, also called 'Nirupan'; tenets of some ancient 'Darshan' (metaphysical-cum-philosophical system) are then explained with various quotations from the scriptures and references to some ancient incidents. The kirtankaras generally indulged in the oft-repeated expositions of Shankaracharya's 'keval Advait Vedanta', spun around the very familiar, yet most confounding concepts of 'Maya' (illusion) and 'Brahma' (The Absolute One). This purvaranga is followed by a short recess (Madhyantara) when the 'Kathekari buva' (the kirtankara) is garlanded and black powder called 'Bukka' is applied to the forehead of all those present, including, of course, the buva. Then follows the 'uttara-ranga' or akhyana, illustrating the precepts dealt with in the nirupan or purvaranga. The akhyana is composed in verse of different forms. The compositions called 'Ovis' 'Sakis', 'Dindis', 'Ghanaksharis' abounded, and the long-drawn 'Katava' and sometimes a rhythmic prose passage called 'Churnika' or 'Churna' was added to the already abundant repertoire of metrical specimens. All these were presented tunefully and many times rhetorically. Yet the main musical treat was the various 'padas' which were generally set to the tune of some classical ragas. But besides being expert musicians, the buvas had to perform a one-man show. The same person would first play the role of a learned pundit, and then, in the mythological 'Akhyana', he had to enact different roles of variant moods or 'Rasas'. Of course, the accompanying 'Mridunga' player, the harmonium player and the 'Zanjawala' helped him immensely. If it was the story of Sita-svayamvara, an expert 'buva' veritably performed the roles, first of Rama's parents, grieved by the separation of the young valiant Rama and Lakshmana. He had then to portray the sage Vishvamitra and the 'Rakshasas' (demons). When the party arrived at the auspicious 'Mandapa' or pandals, the buva would signify the coy and love-stricken little Sita. But then, the buva would describe the demon king Ravana, trying to pick up the 'Tryambaka Dhanushya', the divine bow of Shiva, giving ample suggestions of the comic relief as Ravana fell on his back with the divine bow crushing his chest. Sita, a little girl as she was, laughed at Ravana's discomfiture, her anxiety giving place to light-hearted laughter. Rama quite easily would pick up the bow, and while trying to put its string in place, would break it into two. The saint poet Ramadasa has very minutely described the various sounds created by the bow when it was thus tackled twice and the apt onomatopoeia is utilized by the Kathekari buva. In the late 19th century, the 'Subhadra-harana-akhyana' of the renowned Faltankar buva very competently rivalled with the dramatic show of the Saubhadra ably performed by such great actors as the late Bhaurao Kolhatkar of the Kirloskar Natak Mandali. And all this the Buva achieved with the same typical old fashioned Poona attire. The uttararanga ends with the ceremonial 'Aarati'.

There are two sub-groups of the kirtankaras. One of them begins the kirtana with the 'dhun' (quick-paced recitation) of some mantra-like rhythmic words such as 'Jai Jai Rama-Krishna Hari'. The other sect started the performance with a pada or song like 'Balakrishna haranin laksha lago re' said to have been composed by the dramatist Kirloskar, who himself had sometime toyed with the idea of being a Kirtankara. (It is common knowledge that this dramatist made ample use of the tunes and metrical compositions of the old kirtanas in his masterpieces like the play Saubhadra).

The modern movement of nationalism affected this institution of kirtana, not in form, but in content. The first part, nirupan, was devoted to the modern liberal ideas of democracy and nationalism, while the latter part akhyana was used for the narration of some historical or mythological events, allegorically suggesting the modern concepts of liberty, equality and fraternity as well as of nationalism and patriotism. Patvardhan started this modified form of kirtana and it was termed Rashtriya kirtana. After the advent of Independence, kirtana is also being used to propagate the various concepts of socio-economic progress. Yet it cannot be said that the kirtanas are now very widely attended. Good kirtankaras also are rare to come across. Thus, like many other old forms of education and entertainment, kirtana also is a matter of yesteryear. Only its nostalgic memories linger on.

N.G.J.

KIRTANA (Tamil), or songs of praise or prayer-songs set to music, have been in vogue for many centuries in Tamil Nadu.

The kirtana, originally a prayer to God set to music, came to mean later on a song with a 'pallavi' (refrain) an 'anupallavi' (additional refrain) and 'charanas' (feet) and sung to a particular 'raga' (tune) and 'tala' (rhythm) with slight variations here and there according to the whims of the composer or singer. There are kirtanas without anupallavis; some have a few and some many feet; sometimes a play of 'ragamalika' (a garland of different ragas) in the singing of charanas; and some kirtanas are sung with 'alapana' (exposition of melody) in the beginning and 'chitta swaras' at the end.

According to Arunachalam, the first Tamil kirtana was by Venrimalai Kavirayar in Vedamalai Venyaba (1654) and relates to God Muruga of Tiruchendur.

The 18th century saw the advent of three great music composers. Arunachalam Kavirayar rendered the whole of the Ramayana in hundred kirtanas and supplemented them with viruttams. His Rama nataka, inaugurated in the very mandapa in Srirangam temple, where Kamban's Ramayana was inaugurated became famous, and is sung in music halls even today. Arunachala Kavirayar's song 'En pallikondeer ayya' asking God Ranganatha as to why he chose a place between two rivers to sleep, is a classic for all time. The other two kirtana composers were Muttu Tandavar and Marimuttu Pillai whose erotic kirtanas were well-received.

The nineteenth century was the Golden Age of kirtanas and Tyagaraja was its saintly sovereign. Muttuswami Dikshitar and Shyama Sastri also held the field of music with their many kirtanas and other compositions. All the three were great composers and great musicians, who sang their compositions in Sanskrit or in their mother tongues. In Tamil, Gopalakrishna Bharati, Ramalingaswami and Vedanayakam Pillai all sang many Tamil kirtanas, poignant with emotion and even humour. Appa itenna atikaram (Why this power?) sings of cantankerous clients and their indefatigable lawyers and complains to God that he has no time to think of Him. Kavikunjara Bharati's Kandapurana kirtanai and Periyapurana kirtanai and Parvaticharittira kirtanai of Ramaswami Iyer during this period also deserve praise, as also the kirtanas of Oothukadu Venkatasubbayyan.

With the dawn of the present century came another bright era for the spread of Tamil kirtanas. Harikesanallur Muthayya Bhagavatar popularised and sang a number of Tamil kirtanas. The kirtanas of Subrahmanya Bharati, Desikavinayakam Pillai and Namakkal Rumalingam Pillai beaming with beauty, vigour and patriotism were sung on a thousand platforms in their appropriate musical ragas.

After Independence the movement for Tamil 'isai' (music) gained a tremendous impetus and many composers and musicians devoted to the cult of Tamil isai emerged. Of these Papanasar Shivan, who was composing and singing even in the pre-independence era, was a scholar of Tamil and Sanskrit and a musician as well. Among others Trivandrum Lakshmana Pillai, Subbaramayyar, Ganam Krishnayyar, Chidambara Bharati and P. Srinivasan should also to be mentioned. Suddhananda Bharati, who has written many kirtanas, is a man of letters, yogi and philosopher. Kannadasan's kirtanas are always exhilarating. Among women composers Ambujam Krishna has a significant place. Her kirtanas on Krishna are soul-stirring. One sees a bright future awaiting this branch of Tamil music and literature.

KIRTANA (Telugu) which literally means 'eulogy' is a generic name of musical compositions in Telugu. If padma or 'sankirtana' is intended for a dance recital, kirtana is meant for a music concert or a bhajan (singing of devotional songs in chorus to the accompaniment of musical instruments). Tyagaraja, the celebrated music composer, is believed to have composed 24,000 kirtanas, which are also known as 'kritis' (lit. acts), of which about a thousand are available today. Of these around 500 only have musical notations. They are highly devotional. Though they are devoid of literary flourishes or embellishment, their piety and earnest yearning of the finite for the infinite besides their adaptability to music render them immortal. Tyagaraja's kirtanas, though composed in Telugu, are sung by all South Indian musicians irrespective of their mother tongue. Syama Sastri, Muttuswami Dikshitar, Svati Tirunal and several others made rich contributions to this genre in Telugu. In kirtanas meant for bhajans, the musical component is less complex than in others, as they are meant for group singing. Prominent among those who composed poignant bhajan kirtanas are Ramadasu of Bhadrachalam, Kancharla Gopanna (17th cent.), Yadla Ramadasu, Nitthala Prakasadasu, etc. Kirtana consists of a 'pallavi' (refrain), an 'anupallavi' (secondary refrain) and a few 'charanas' (stanzas). Usually the name of the composer is mentioned in the last charana. Generally the sentiment expressed in the kirtanas is devotion, but there are a few dealing with the erotic sentiment as well, which are known as 'javalis'.

KIRTANA GHOSHA (Assamese) or simply kirtana, is a community song. It consists of two parts: a ghosha or a refrain and a number of padas, ordinary verses in 'payara', 'duladi' or 'chabi' metre. It is called kirtana (narration) as it is narrative in character, and several kirtanas generally combine to make a story. Shankaradeva began composing kirtanas after he had heard the whole of the Bhagavata-purana explained to him by Jagdish Mishra of Tirhut. It is thus possible that a considerable part of the work was composed before Shankaradeva left his native place about 1536-1537. Other portions of the work were written later at different times in Assam (Ahom kingdom) and Kooch Kamrupa. No attempt was made to bring all the sections together till the penultimate year of Madhavadeva's life (1596). When in the spring of 1594, Ramacharan went to Kooch Bihar to meet Madhava, Madhava asked him to compile the scattered sections of Kirtana -ghosha. Ramacharan required about a year to collect and put them together in an appropriate order in one volume. The volume was then presented to Madhavadeva in May-June, 1596. It may be noted here that the sections were not put in the chronological order of writing. The earliest, 'Uresha-varnana', for example, has been placed last, possibly because some of the matter in this section did not fully conform to the chastened views of the mature Shankaradeva or to the religious principles of the faith in the days of Madhavadeva. Two sections, 'Rukminir premakalaha' and 'Brigu-pariksha', were left out and are rarely found in the extant manuscripts.

The 'Uresha-varnana' which is probably one of the earliest sections, consists of twenty-one kirtanas twenty of which are actually a condensed rendering of the Brahmanda-purana, Chapters 43-51, 57-60 and 63.

The 'Ajamila-upakhyana' (the story of the Brahman Ajamila) section, consisting of four kirtanas, is adapted from the Bhagavata-purana, VI, 1-3, while the fifth kirtana glorifying 'nama' has been written independently by the poet.

'Prahlada-charitra' is made up of twenty-two kirtanas. The narrative interest is well maintained, and the verses have an easy lilt, while the principles of bhakti are explained in simple words from time to time. The sources of the story are III, 15-16, and VII, 2-10 of the Bhagavata-purana.

'Hara-mohana' (the Charming of Hara), which consists of ten kirtanas, is based on the Bhagavata-purana, VIII.12. It is one of the best pieces of poetry by Shankaradeva. Vishnu in his sphere, a part of Hara's prayers to Vishnu, the highly erotic words that Hara addresses to Mohini, the hermits' words of shame and derision, Hara's repentance, and Hara's explanation of his conduct to Parvati—all these are added by the poet-saint. The pictures of Mohini and the illusion of a garden where she appears to Hara seem to be of Shankaradeva's creation, although they might have been suggested by a verse in the original.

'Bali-chhalana' (the Cheating of Bali) in five kirtanas, seems to be independent of the Bhagavata and Vamana-purana at least in the present form of the latter work, even though it is stated to have been narrated by Shuka to Parikshita.

'Gajendropakhyaṇa' (the story of the elephant king) is taken from the Bhagavata-purana, VIII, 2-4. It is related in three kirtanas. The main feature of this section is the description of the Trikuta hill in the ocean of milk. A delicate use of imagery builds up the erotic atmosphere in which the elephant king enjoyed the company of the she-elephants.

'Pashanda-mardana' (the Suppression of the heretics), it seems, was written when the hostilities against the order were very much rife. There seem to be certain topical references to the ridicule that was hurled at the Vaishnavas by the hostile camp, and in places Shankaradeva even employs mild invectives. In order to make his utterances effective, he cites the authority of acknowledged scriptures—the Bhagavata-Purana, the padma-purana, the Brihannaradiya-purana the Vishnu-dharmottara-purana and the Sutasamhita.

'Namaparadha' in two kirtanas of simple 'payara' verses, has for its source the Svarga-khanda of the Padma-purana. Shankaradeva states that this shastra was obtained from Varanasi. The materials are from Chapters 32, 34 and 48.

The eleven kirtanas, entitled 'Shishu-lila' (the divine sports of Krishna as a child), describe the early life of Krishna in Vrindavana from his birth up to the quelling of the snake-demon Kaliya. Within its short compass this section covers all the activities of the child God, described in Chapters 3-8 of the Bhagavata-purana. It is one of the most popular writings of the poet.

The 'Rasa-kriṇa' retells briefly the story of Krishna's 'rasa' sports with the cowherdesses of Vraja as narrated in the 'Rasa-punchadhyaya' (Chapters 20-33) of the Bhagavata-purana, X, and other events in three subsequent chapters. Being an adaptation from some of the most exquisitely poetical passages of the great Purana, it is of much beauty. It has all the brightness of youthful writing. The narration is rendered in eighteen kirtanas. The original passages describing Krishna's dalliance with cowherdesses, making for 'sensual and glowing poetry which captivates the Hindu heart' (as Farquhar has said), are here faithfully reproduced.

The ten kirtanas, that make the 'Kamsa-badha' section render succinctly a considerable part of the Bhagavata-purana, X (Chapters 37-45). There is a dramatic character in all the pieces, and the narration is nowhere loose or diffuse.

'Gopi-Uddhava-sambada', 'Kujir banchhapurana', and 'Akrura banchhapurana' (the meeting of the cowherdesses and Krishna's love-messenger Uddhava; the fulfilment of the desire of Kuji, the hunch-backed perfumer of Kamsa; and the fulfilment of Akrura's desire) consist of one kirtana each.

'Jarasandhar yuddha' consists of three kirtanas rendered from chapter 50 of the Bhagavata-purana, X. In the third kirtana the fight between Balarama and Jarasandha is skilfully depicted by means of nimble eight-syllabic (jhumuri) lines.

'Kalayavana-badha' (the killing of Kalayavana) consisting of two kirtanas and 'Muchukundastuti' (the hymns of Muchukunda to Krishna) consisting of four kirtanas are adapted from Chapter 51 of the original Sanskrit. The first is illumined with a play of humour, while the second is characterized by a deeply devotional fervour.

'Syamantaka-harana' (the carrying away of the gem, syamantaka) adapted from Chapter 57 of the Bhagavata-purana X, is a popular piece of composition; and it is generally selected for copying as an act of piety. Two things account for its popularity: the story-interest and the appropriate rhythm of the verses. The swift, lilting, vigorous eight-syllabic verses, describing Krishna's fight with the Bear King, Jambavan, and Rukmini's sorrow owing to Krishna's delay in coming back from Jambavan's place, have their special appeal for simple folk.

'Naradar Krishna-darshana' (Narada's visit to Krishna) is retold from Chapter 69 of the Bhagavata-purana X.

'Damodara-viprakhyana' (the tale of the Brahman, Damodara) is pleasantly retold from Chapters 80-81 of Book X of the Purana in four kirtanas. The small dialogue between the ever-playful Krishna and his old school-mate, Damodara, who is very poor and, therefore, very diffident, possesses a dramatic character; and the character of the poor Brahman persists in the reader's memory.

In the three small kirtanas of the 'Daibakir putra anayana' (the bringing back of Devaki's sons) based on Chapter 85 of the Bhagavata-purana, X, is given the story of Rama's and Krishna's journey to the underground Sutala and bringing back to Devaki her six sons who had been killed by Kamsa.

The twenty-six verses of the 'Veda-stuti' render in soft and simple language a gist of the hymn that the Vedas sing to God Hari at the beginning of creation found in the Bhagavata-purana, X, 87. Shankaradeva rests content with rendering Shridhara's shlokas given in his commentary.

One hundred and nine verses, divided into seven kirtanas, under the caption 'Krishna-lila-mala', narrate the activities of Krishna's whole life in brief. It is something like a synopsis of the tenth book of the Bhagavata-purana.

A few manuscripts of the Kirtana-ghosha include 'Rukminir prema kalaha' (Rukmini's love-quarrel) and 'Bhriḡu-pariksha' (Bhriḡu's testing of the gods of the Hindu trinity).

KIRTANE, VINAYAK JANARDAN-KIRTANIYA NATAK

'Shrikrishnar Baikuntha-prayana' (the passing away of Krishna) relates the story of the civil war among the Yadavas, which ended in the effacement of that race, Krishna's death, and the death of the Pandavas. Materials from different Chapters of Books I and III, have been woven into this composition of nineteen kirtanas. It is an important piece of religious work inasmuch as it contains an exposition of the ideals and rules of conduct for a devotee.

'Chaturvimshati-avatara-varnana' (the description of the twenty-four incarnations of God) is based mainly on the Bhagavata-purana I, Chapter 3 (which speaks of the first incarnation as Purusha, enumerates twenty-two other chief incarnations and adds that there are numerous other such 'descents' of God with different fractions of his original power) and Chapter 7 of Book II (Lilavatara). It is probably influenced also by the Purana, Book XI, Chapter 4.

In many of the manuscripts of the Kirtana-ghosha the last two kirtanas are wrongly counted as a part of the 'Uresha-varnana'. These two songs are based on the Bhagavata-purana, XII, 12. This section, 'Bhagavata tatparya' (the essence of the teachings of the Bhagavata-purana) besides giving what the great purana wants us to conclude, forms the essence of Shankaradeva's teachings, embodied in the Kirtana-ghosha. It is devoted to the enunciation of his 'eka-sharananama-dharma' by way of enunciating or repeating of the message, contained in the twelve books of the Purana.

KIRTANE, VINAYAK JANARDAN (Marathi; b. 1840, d. 1891) was the elder of the well-known Kirtane brothers. Born in a Karhade brahman family, his father was Karbthari, Kolhapur state. Vinayakrao was a fellow student of Mahadeo Govind Ranade. Both were among the earliest Matriculates of the Bombay University. But unlike his accomplished contemporary, Vinayakrao could not secure a University degree.

He started his career as a school teacher in 1862. Being interested in Marathi literature, he enrolled himself as a member of the newly formed Marathi Jnanprasarak Mandali which was started in Pune by an enthusiastic group of youth to bring western culture and science into the Marathi language. The association was not destined to live long, but it did some valuable work for the all-round development of the Marathi language and literature. Vinayakrao's contribution to the Association's work was not mean. He read a number of research papers at its meetings. Even his celebrated play, Savai Madhavrao yancha mrityu published in 1861, based on the ill-fated but competent Madhav Rao Peshwa, a work surcharged with the feeling of the grandeur and tragedy of the life of that great Peshwa, was read before the members of this Association prior to its publication.

Vinayakrao then left for Bombay, and later, served in several states of Central India. His abilities attracted notice of T. Madhavrao (1818-1891), the statesman of Indore and Baroda. He took Vinayakrao with him and gave him positions of honour and profit. In Baroda, Vinayakrao rose to the position of Nayab Diwan, while in Indore he became Diwan in 1888, a position he was denied at Baroda. He was made Rao Bahadur in 1877. He left the service of the Maharaja of Indore in 1890 owing to certain differences with him. He went back to Pune, where he died soon.

Vinayakrao's flair for writing brought him fame at the very beginning of his career, but in the latter part of his life, he, however, gave up writing in Marathi. His literary output, therefore, remained very small. He left behind some unfinished works. But whatever he wrote had a distinct spark of originality. His play Savai Madhavrao yancha mrityu alone has secured a place of respect in the history of Marathi literature. Like his first play, his second play Jayapala (1865) was also successful. This play was based on the Biblical story of Job, but its handling by Vinayakrao was entirely different.

Vinayakrao also translated into Marathi John Malcolm's A Memoir of Central India (2 vol., 1823).

KIRTANIYA NATAK (Maithili) was a regional development of the vernacular drama in Mithila in the medieval times as it gradually emerged from the decadent Sanskrit drama. When fully evolved, it took its name from the theme of the most popular plays which happened to deal with the praise (kirtan) of the Lord. Tradition, as recorded by Chanda Jh., says that the name became common after the successful performances of Umapati Upadhyaya's Parijataharana (1650) purporting to celebrate the deeds of Krishna. But later even the deeds of Shiva were equally taken up.

The history of the kirtaniya natak (drama) may be divided into three stages, viz. the beginnings (1324-1650), the mature period (1650-1860) and the decadence (1860-1920). It lived on up to the present century as a relic of the past, wholly unsuited to modern sophisticated requirements of characterization, plot complexity and conflict. It, however, on its own, built up a great tradition of Maithili lyrical drama unique in its own way and contributed substantially to the growth and development of Maithili literature.

In the beginning the kirtaniya kept up a semblance of the structure and of some of the features of Sanskrit drama, but gradually it did evolve into a simpler and a newer dramatic mode, almost a new genre. This can be seen in Ratnapani's Ushaharana (1850).

Some critics have, however, expressed doubts about naming kirtaniya as a drama. They feel that it evolved into a form of musical performance, a kind of nritya, 'nach'. But, like the 'Rasalila' of Braja, the 'Ankia nat' of Assam and the 'Yatras' of Bengal, it was definitely a dramatic activity as testified by its texts. For example, the use of the Sutradhara or tatastha, a chorus like commentator, the 'praveshagita', announcing the dramtis personae in the very beginning, the stage directions now and then definitely make it a 'drishyakavya' and not a 'shravyakavya'. Another objection to the kirtaniya natak has been the continued use of Sanskrit and Prakrit in some plays, and it has been said that they are not Maithili dramas but just an extension of Sanskrit drama best to be called three language dramas, 'traibhashika nataka', where, in addition to Sanskrit and Prakrit, Maithili is also used. That these dramas were conceived and written as Maithili dramas where Maithili was not used like Prakrit just as a subsidiary medium, is abundantly clear from the fact that often the Maithili benedictory 'Nandi song' has the precedence over Sanskrit or Prakrit benedictory Nandi verses. Moreover, Maithili is used by the main characters and not like Prakrit used by women and servants only. Indeed, while often Maithili lyrics explain and repeat the contents of Sanskrit verses, at many places conversation is carried on in Maithili only. In course of time, gradually the use of Sanskrit and Prakrit was discontinued and, in later years, a wholly Maithili play was evolved. A similar evolution of the vernacular (Maithili) drama took place in Nepal, the Haragaurivivaha (1629) of Jagojjyotirmalla being one of the best Maithili dramas of Nepal.

The kirtaniya natakas were performed at night. The stage used to be a simple improvised platform. The Sutradhara made his appearance after the benedictory songs. His normal dress on the stage consisted of a 'jama', a 'nima' and a 'pyjama', a pair of sandals called 'paduka', and a 'satha' (60 cubits long when unfurled) turban. He would appear with a baton called 'phulahattha' in his hands. His chief work was to introduce the occasion, the author and the play to the audience.

The Sutradhara often was also the 'nayaka', the hero. His troupe consisted of the 'nayika' (heroine), the 'sakhis' (two or three friends), 'naroda' (male friend or negotiator called 'ghataka') and the 'vipata' (like Vidushaka of the Sanskrit drama). There were no women performers, boys would impersonate and dress as women. The stage properties were such as garuda, mayura airavata. The main attraction of a successful troupe was 'women singers of the traditional songs such as 'mava' and 'tirahuti' and 'nachari'. Acting was crude, but often many aspects of the performance were supplied by the imagination of the audience.

Among the leading kirtaniya natakas, Ramadasa's

Anandavijaya (1644-71), Umapati's Parijataharana (1650), Ramapati's Rukminiharana (1744-61), Nandipati's Srikrishnakelimala (1776-1808), Shivadatta's Parijataharana, Srikant Ganaka's Srikrishnajanma (1850), Ratnapani's Ushaharana (1833-1853), Harkhanatha Jha's Madhavananda (1880) and Ushaharana, Vishvanath Kavi's Ushaharana and Bhana Jha's Prabhavatiharana (1880)—all have plots connected with Krishna's exploits. But there were also equally famous dramas connected with the deeds of Shiva, such as, Lala Kavi's Gaurisvayamvara (1744-61), Shivadatta's Gauriparinaya and Kanharamanasa's Gaurisvayamvara (1842). There were some other plays not directly connected with Krishna or Shiva, such as Jayananda's Rukmanyadanataka (1776-1808) and Chanda Jha's Ahalyacharita (1912), which were, however, written to celebrate devotion to Hari or Rama.

The kirtaniya natak is today extinct, but it has been a glory of medieval Maithili literature. It simplified some of the sophisticated and learned characters of the Vidyapati tradition of lyrical writing and paved the way for the long poems of Manabodha and others.

KIRTIBILAS (Bengali), published in 1852, is the first original tragedy in Bengali. The author was Gobindachandra Gupta. As a work of art it is worthless and it was never staged. Its importance rests solely on its being the first tragic play in the history of Bengali literature.

Indian literature has no tradition of tragic drama. Therefore the dramatist, in his long preface, argues a case for tragedy and quotes Aristotle and Shakespeare in his defence. He models his play on Shakespearean play-structure. Acts are divided into scenes. But in doing so he does not completely dispense with the Sanskrit dramatic form. He uses both prose and verse and intersperses his play with songs and far too many soliloquies.

The story of the play falls in the familiar pattern of Bengali fairy tales. The old king Chandrakanta has two sons, prince Kirtibilas and Murari. When the queen is dead the king marries a young girl named Nalini. The young stepmother becomes attracted towards the young prince. Kirtibilas spurns her advances. The furious queen levels obscene charges against him. The king at first sentences the prince to death but he soon relents and rescinds the order. Then suddenly he falls seriously ill and dies. While Kirtibilas is attending his dying father, his young wife, Saudamini, under the false impression that her husband has been executed commits suicide. Seeing the dead body of his wife, Kirtibilas in utter despair takes his own life.

KIRTILATA (Maithili), is a historical kavya composed by Vidyapati (1350-1440) in 'Maithili Avahattha'. It is divided into four pallavas. It was composed in the praise of Kirti Simha who, with the help of Ibrahim Shah Sharqi, the Nawab of Jaunpur, got back the kingdom of Mithila from a Muslim usurper, Aslan.

After benedictory verses and few other verses in which a distinction is made between good and bad persons, the story begins in the form of a dialogue between a bee and his wife. The poet, then, gives names of the rulers of the Oinavara dynasty from Kameshvara to Guneshvara and his two sons Vir Simha and Kirti Simha. The second chapter describes how Aslan assassinates Guneshvara in a treacherous way in 1371, and how Kirti Simha vows to avenge the assassination of his father with the help of Ibrahim Shah Sharqi, the Nawab of Jaunpur. The third chapter describes the westward expedition of the army of Ibrahim Shah Sharqi and the privations and miseries of the two princes. The fourth chapter describes the eastward march of the army of Shah, the battle near the capital of Mithila between the two armies, one headed by Aslan and the other headed by Shah and the victory of Kirti Simha.

There is an unusual gap of 31 years between the assassination of Guneshvara by Aslan (1371) and the accession of Ibrahim Shah Sharqi (1402). As Kirti Simha was very young at the time of the assassination of his father, he had to wait for such a long period to avenge the assassination of his father. The interregnum is described in the Kirtilata (The creeper of fame), as a period of chaos and anarchy. It is not a fact that Vidyapati composed the work when he was young. The surmise is based on the word 'khelana' occurring in the colophon of the work as an adjective of the poet. But 'khelatu' instead of 'khelana' appears to be the right word functioning as a verb for the nominative 'bharati'. It is also corroborated by some manuscripts. The Kirtilata is a mature work of a mature poet.

Vidyapati has neither produced a historical document nor has he mixed up historical events with much that is fanciful which was a practice prevalent among the writers of Sanskrit historical kavyas. The Kirtilata is unique in being both a piece of history and pleasant poetry.

The poet has given very realistic sketches of buildings, temples and jostling crowds of men and women in the streets when he describes the city of Jaunpur. His description of the marching army of Shah even though somewhat exaggerated is very vivid and forceful. His presentation of socio-political conditions of his time prevailing in his part of the country is very faithful.

The Kirtilata is composed in the form more of a 'Champu' than of a kavya. When he narrates, he does it in a simple way, when he describes he does it in an embellished manner. Prose portions function as links between units of verses. Small and chiselled sentences are quite appropriate for the function of narration. In prose Sanskrit 'tatsama' words are found in abundance. Verses are employed generally for the purpose of description. His descriptions are never overdone. By selective use of figures of speech, especially and metaphors, the poet has been able to save his work from laboured ornamentation. Like other medieval poets he does not indulge in the hyperbolic praise of his patron. Rhymed and alliterative metres have added their own beauty to the descriptive skill of the poet.

The Avahattha of the Kirtilata may be named Maithili Avahattha as it differs on the one hand even from the Avahattha of this 'uktivyakti prakarana', and on the other from some of the charyapadas of the Siddhas.

A large number of metres prevalent in the Apabhramsha kavyas such as doha, radda, chapada, etc. are used in the work.

KIRTIPATAKA (Maithili), is a historical kavya composed in prose and verse by Vidyapati (1350-1440) in 'Maithili Avahattha'.

Unfortunately the text of the Kirtipataka (The banner of fame) is very corrupt and incomplete as there is a gap of twenty pages, from page nine to page twenty-nine in the manuscript. Only one manuscript is known to exist which was discovered by Harprasad Shastri in Nepal. The Kirtipataka was edited on the basis of a transcript copy of this manuscript by Umesha Mishra along with a summary in Maithili in 1960. Even a cursory glance through the text reveals that two thematically different manuscripts have been mixed up in one bundle. The first manuscript (from page 1 to 7) describes the love sports of Arjuna Raya who may be identified with the eldest son of Tripura Simha, son of Maharaja Bhava Simha (1371). It may be accepted as a work of Vidyapati as the author calls himself 'Nava Jayadeva' in one of the introductory verses. The second manuscript of which the first few pages are lost gives a detailed description of the battle between Maharaja Shiva Simha and the Sultan. From the colophon it is quite clear that Vidyapati is the author of this work.

The extant text begins with the description of the battle between Maharaja Shiva Simha and the Sultan; how Maharaja Shiva Simha exhorts his soldiers to meet the army of the Sultan, how the army of Sultan takes to heels and how he follows the fugitive army, loses his way in the jungle and disappears.

It is rather difficult to assess fully the poetic quality of the Kirtipataka on the basis of this text. From whatever could be gathered from the text it can be estimated as a good piece of poetry.

KIRUTTIKA (Tamil b.1915) is a woman novelist noted for her artistic inquiry into the efficacy of the ancient Indian moral and social virtues in the context of the post-Independent Indian society. Kiruttika's first novel Pukai natuvil (In the midst of smoke, 1953) depicts the uncomfortable position of the Government officials in Delhi who strive to preserve the ancient cultural values in contrast to the easier life of those who compromise with such ideals and indulge in self-centred activities. Vachavechvaram (1966) deals with the brahmin families of a village representing their problems, domestic and social, involving again the mutually irreconcilable attitudes of life in terms of conjugal fidelity, concepts of the high and the low, the interest of the village versus town, etc. Her next novel Dharmakshetre (1969) appears to be an extended metaphor of the Kurukshetra of the Mahabharata, cast in such a symbolic frame, it depicts again the conflicts between the claims of the ancient cultural values and those of the newly emerging society. Her realistic perspective consists in her depiction that the old values have become ambivalent if not obsolete while the new values are unable to assert themselves with conviction and efficacy. The same trend continues in her subsequent novels such as Satyameva (1971) and Patiya konanki (The new clown, 1971). Nerriruntom (Yesterday we were, 1975) the latest of Kiruttika's novels like its predecessor Putiya Konianki attempts to portray the dilemmatic situation that the younger generation finds itself in as to whether to cut off the old moorings in preference to the new ideals and aspirations encouraged by the theories of Freud and the Neo-Freudians, or to cling to their traditional values.

KISANAJI RO VYANVALO (Rajasthani) by. Padma Bhagat, is known by various names, such as, Haraji ro vyanyalo, Krishna Rukmini ro Vyanvalo and Rukmini mangal. Its popular and short name is Vyanvalo or Vivahalo. It was composed sometime between 1493 to 1500. Its reputation in the north and north-western parts of Rajasthan has created a climate of popular opinion of it which equates it with the Srimad Bhagavata for its devotional content. It is a narrative in the common man's language and can be set to music for recitation in different ragas, such as 'Maru', 'Ramagiri', 'Soratha', 'Kedaro', 'Sindhu', 'Hanso', 'Dhanasari', 'Velauli', 'Devasakh', etc. Manuscripts of the work are available in a large number and the earliest one written in 1612 is available in the Abhaya Jain Granthalaya, Bikaner.

This text has been published by the Rajasthan Sahitya Samiti, Bissau (Rajasthan) in a book named Rukmini mangal. At present the most popular edition available is known as Bada Rukmini mangal edited by Sivakarna Dharak and published by M/s. Khemraja Srikrisnadas, Bombay in the year 1924. In between these two dates there are many, other manuscripts written in the 18th and 19th centuries. From the point of view textual editing, a comparative study of various versions reveals that originally the text consisted of 265 to 280 verses only. The interpolations started mostly during the 19th century of the Vikarm era with the result that the aforesaid edition published at Bombay contains 9 to 10 times more verses than those in the original edition. The word 'Bada' (big) prefixed to the title also suggests that a number of miscellaneous padas by Padma Bhagat concerning the subject and popularly sung by the people, were also included in this edition. At the end of the padas there appears the line Padma bhanai kranavai paya lagun (so says Padma with respectful submission) which confirms the authorship of the poet.

The poet has in Bada Rukmini mangal related in his own way the well known Puranic episode of the marriage of Krishna and Rukmini. Dialogues, descriptions and utterances by the characters are the main ways in which it is rendered into music. Three of the dialogues are more important—the first held between prince Bhismaka and Rukmaiya, the second one between the queen mother and Rukmini, and the third one between Krishna and the Brahman. All these are as demanded by the context and are full of dramatic elements. They also help the story in its natural flow. The main descriptive parts are marriage parties of both Shishupala and Krishna, the beauty and makeup of Rukmini, the battle scene, the marriage ceremony and related customs, and finally the welcome accorded to Krishna on his return to Dwarika.

All these descriptions in the poem are done in selective phraseology and present a lively picture of the subject matter. The utterances by characters themselves include request to Krishna to save Rukmini, the challenge given by Rukmaiya to Krishna and the subsequent request of Rukmini to Krishna to set her brother free, and finally the convivial songs sung by the ladies of Kundanpur at the marriage ceremony, etc. All these are befitting the story and the circumstances, and are pleasing to the heart. The poem carries much importance in so far as the entertainment, devotion to spiritualism and refinement of taste are concerned. The entire work is full of devotional spirit and also presents a glorious show of heroism. The character of Krishna shows a spirit of self-restraint. Here, he has been painted as a hero and rescuer of his devotees. In this aspect it slightly differs from the Puranic tales. Having known the news about Rukmini from the Brahman, he does not proceed to Kundanpur all alone, but marches with his army. For the planned elopement of Rukmini also he goes with his army. The contemporary popular mind has inadvertently expressed itself in the narration of the tale. The popular customs and beliefs find their place in it at proper places. The spirit of caste, clan and profession was responsible for creating the feelings of low and high among the society. The utterances of Rukmini and Rukmaia go to prove it. The work has prompted many a subsequent composition and Rukmini mangal written by Ramlal (approximate date between 1718-1793) is one such example.

KISHORA CHANDRANANDACHAMPU (Oriya) of Kabisurya Baladeba Ratha (18th 19th cent.) is an immortal classic in Oriya literature, written after the rich tradition of 'Champu' in Sanskrit. The poet might have got immediate inspiration from Gundichachampu of Chakrapani Pattanayaka and Ramachampu and Sajjananandachampu of his father, who were contemporary. Champu is defined as a species of 'Kavya' in mixed verse and prose developed naturally from prose-kavya (katha and akhyayika), where the verse becomes as important a medium as the prose. Though champu can be written both in Sanskrit and Prakrit neither the Oriya portion of Kishorachandrananda champu is the inseparable part of Sanskrit portion nor has it been written as a complement to the later. Both of them are two separate self-contained creations, and no portion would seem incomplete if detached from each other. So the title of Kishorachandrananda champu is justified in relation to its Sanskrit prose and verse portion, not to the Oriya chaupadi (song) portion, though it has acclaimed its classic dignity for the latter. The appropriate title for the Oriya 'chaupadis' should be Kishorachandrananda-chaupadi-chautisha since all the 34 songs have been composed in 'chautisha' form. Its relation with Sanskrit champu is intimate in view of the thought and emotion and development of the theme. But the Oriya Chaupadis are so popular and dignified that they are regarded as the champu and not the Sanskrit portion.

Though the theme of the Kishorachandrananda champu is conventional and time-worn, still the romantic possibility and melody of tunes (raga and ragini) and verbal music of the Gitagovinda might have inspired the poet. It is an excellent small poem based on the popular love episode of Radha and Krishna and their union and erotic pleasure in Vrindavana. Since Radha's first sight of Krishna till their union, Lalita, the dearest companion of Radha has played a vital role, and the skilful portrayal of this character has enhanced the dramatic beauty of the theme and thus the title of 'gitinatyā' (song-drama) may be befitting to it. The whole poem has been written in the form of dialogues in songs and the theme has got the natural force of development due to the dramatic suspense created by the love-tricks and witty words of Lalita effecting a sweet relish in the hopes and desire of the lovers. Therefore the character of Lalita is really a unique creation in the whole realm of Oriya literature. In the construction of the plot and portrayal of character the poet may even appear to have excelled Jayadeva.

In the treatment of the love theme and portrayal of the amorous experiences of the lovers, the poet is more refined and sublime in comparison with his predecessors. Being a scholar and a talented poet, he could invent a style of his own which is unique lucid, spontaneous and lively. By making precise use of words of various origin (tatsama, tadbhaba, desaja and bideshi) and images, he has exploited the powerful possibilities of Oriya literature, suggesting the dawn of modernity. The chaupadis, set to various kinds of tunes befitting to various emotions, are highly estimated as the finest specimens of Odisi music, a real test for the musicians.

KISHORA KALPANAKANT (Rajasthani; b.1930) was born at Ratangarh in the district Churu, and was moderately educated. His father was well versed in the arts of music, painting, etc. and naturally passed on his art to his son. Kishora is a born poet, very sentimental by temperament. He has an excellent hand for script, painting and decorations. Bestowed with a melodious voice, he sings his own poems on stage and among gatherings, and keeps the audience spell-bound. Though he has written over one hundred poems and dozens of standard stories, he feels too shy to publish his own works. His services to the cause of Rajasthani can never be forgotten for the publication of a literary magazine, Olmon for a good number of years. It was through Olmon that many young writers were encouraged to write in Rajasthani. Without any external help, he continued to drag on with the magazine in several forms and always felt the urgency of recognition of Rajasthani as a language. He contributed his bit to the cause. His translation of Ritusamhar by Kalidasa won him recognition. Vishvanath Satyanarayan re batan, translation of telugu short stories by Satyanarayana and Nasthanid translation of Tagore's work were also published by him. Recently, he adapted some of the Upanishadas and the Bhagavadagita in his own poems. His poems are philosophical in nature. He also experiments with the styles of modern poetry, but feels at home with the metrical poems. His collection of poems and short stories are eagerly awaited. Though without any original publication to his credit, he has been honoured with awards by reputed institutions like Rajasthani Academy and several other societies in Calcutta.

KIZHAKKEMURI, D.C. (Malayalam; b. 1914) a native of Kanjirappally (Kottayam District), was a teacher till he as one of the founders of the Sahitya Pravartaka Co-operative Society, became its General Manager in 1945, the year of its registration and stepped into the shoes of its Secretary, Karur Nilakantha Pillai in 1965, when the latter retired. A few years later, D.C. also retired. He was actively associated with the literary movement, the development of government lotteries, organisations of traders, script reform in Malayalam and, as a columnist with a few newspapers. He is still contributing articles to a weekly in Kerala.

Kizhakkemuri's title to literary fame rests on his satirical articles dealing with a variety of situations. His satire is not of the venomous type but of the reformist type marked by disinterestedness and succinctness. Yet it hits the target on the face and with full force. Elivanam (Rocket, 1948) is a quiver of arrows directed against politicians. Veluppum karuppum (Black and white, 1949), Kuttichchool (Broom, 1950) and Metranum kautukam (The bishop too is inquisitive, 1955) are his other collections.

KOCHUNNI TAMPURAN (Malayalam; b. 1858, d. 1926). Kodungalloor, the seat of an illustrious galaxy of poets, is the birth-place of Kochunni Tampuran. He started learning at the age of three and completed the first phase of his study within seven years. Later he mastered most of the kavyas and the advanced books on Sanskrit grammar and poetics and become a full-time poet at 22. His later life was practically uneventful but for a pilgrimage to Benaras.

The most remarkable thing about Kochunni Tampuran as a poet is that he was perhaps the quickest composer of poetry Kerala has seen to date. Not only could he compose to order or while participating in a contest some hundred stanzas or so but also retain them in his memory and reproduce them in writing later. No wonder the Maharaja of Cochin conferred on him the title 'Kavisarvabhauma' in 1919.

Tampuran's Sanskrit works which are superior in quality number about ten and his Malayalam works about 30 including six plays, four epics or mahakavyas, a number of devotional poems and a few 'tullals' and 'kilippattus.' His Kalyani natakam (1889-91) has the distinction of being the first of its kind, with plot based on social life. Of the four epics, the best undoubtedly is Pandavodayam (1912), which in 22 cantos, narrates the Mahabharata story from the time the Pandava brothers begin to live incognito to the 'svayamvara' of Uttara. A mahakavya in the traditional style, it is full of striking vignettes, purple patches, verbal pyrotechnics and flights of imagination. Ramashvamedham is his longest poem in the genre of 'kilippattu'. This is a paraphrase of a Sanskrit work and since its completion in 1923 Kochunni Tampuran does not appear to have published it in book form.

KODANDARAMA REDDI, MARUPURU (Telugu; b.1902) is a reputed Telugu prose writer and critic. He is widely known in Andhra for his pellucid Telugu prose spiced with the idiom and vocabulary peculiar to the Telugu dialect spoken by the people of Nellore District in Andhra Pradesh.

Reddi, as a writer, fully vindicates the adage that 'style is the man'. He is the author of more than twenty works, original and translated. His latest work to-date is Tyagaraju bhaktisudharnavam (1984), a prose commentary explaining the devotional aspect of Tyagaraja's immortal songs. He is currently working on the second part of this work.

Kodandarama Reddi, was the eldest son of Konda Reddi and Kamamma of Madamanuru village in Gudur Taluk of Nellore District. Reddi's boyhood days were spent in his sister's house at Potlapudi in Nellore Taluk. This house, in the 1910s and 1920s, was a rendezvous for many a leader of the national movement in Andhra, and for Telugu poets of repute like Rayaprolu Subba Rao. Brought up in this milieu, Reddy imbibed, at an early age, a passion for nationalism and an ardent love for Telugu literature. He developed a particular love for Tikkana's rendering of the Mahabharata and Potana's rendering of the Mahabhagavata.

Reddi had his early education upto S.S.L.C. in V.R. High School, Nellore. Inspired by Mahatma Gandhi's call to the Nation to give up English education, he left V.R. High School in 1920 and joined the Andhra National College in Machilipatnam (Bandar), founded by Sri

KODIYAN

Kopalle Hanumanthi Rao and inaugurated by Bipinchandra Pal. His study of Notes on Mahabharathe by Sri Vedam Venkatchala Iyer (younger brother of the famous Telugu litterateur and critic Sri Vedam Venkataraya Sastri), and the critique of Sri Pendyala Subrahmenya Sastri on the Mahabharata, he claims, had improved his critical acumen and made him adopt a bold and original line of literary criticism.

Kodandarama Reddy may be said to have started his career as a writer in 1922, with a commemorative essay on Sri Kandadai Srinivasa Aiyangar, the veteran actor of Nellore, published in the Sarada, a journal from Machilipatnam. From that date he never stopped writing. He began his series of Telugu translations, in 1927, with a Telugu rendering of a story by the famous French writer Balzac, published in the Bharati, both as a writer of original works or of translations mainly from English. Reddy wielded his pen with equal felicity. His well-known works are:

Prapancha puttu purvottaralu (A translation of Nehru's Letters to His Daughter), Bidalapatlu (A translation of Victor Hugo's Les Misérables, 1940), Hindu pada padushahi (A translation of Vir Savarkar's Hindu pad padshahi, 1942), Majira gatha (A Telugu rendering of Silappadikaram, 1962), Vechano Kambaramayanamu (A prose adaptation in Telugu of Kamban's Ramayana, 1980), Asamiya sahitya charitra (A translation of B. Barua's History of Assamese Literature), Andhra vangmayam-vavilla samstha, Eesabu neeti kathalu, Tikkana sarasvata murthi (1982), Loka kavi vemana Yogi (1983), Tyagaraja bhakti suddharnavamu (1984), etc.

Kodandarama Reddy ably edited several Telugu works. He edited and published a work on "achcha" (chaste) Telugu, Satya vijayamu by Ayyanakota Parthasarathi. He has been the editor or one of the editors for a number of publications of the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi. He wrote the preface for some of these publications with a critical appreciation. These publications are, Andhra kirya svarupa mani dipika, Sametalu (proverbs), Mandalika Padakoshamu (Dialectical Dictionary), Karna parvamu and Kala purnodayamu.

For quite a considerable time, Kodandarama Reddy was in the journalistic field, where also he made his mark. He was associated with the Deshbandhu (1924), Samadarshani (1928), and the Zamindari rytu (1930), all leading papers of that times. In 1931 he started his own Press, called the Prabhata Press, and started a journal called Randhranveshi. Again from 1954 to 1966, he was the owner of the Mandakini Press which issued a weekly, Mandakini under his editorship. This weekly highlighted the literary events of the day, and was eagerly awaited every week by the lovers of Telugu literature.

Youthful in spirit, and ever active in his eighties, Sri Kodandarama Reddy is a writer who will never rest on his laurels.

KODIYAN (Gujarati) is the first collection of poems by Krishnalal Jethala Shridharani (1911-1960) published in 1934. It earned critical acclaim for its sheer beauty of language, which was a pleasant diversion from the contemporary poetry. The collection is imbued with fervent lyricism written in appropriate poetic language.

The Kodiyani is mainly a collection of lyrics of various types such as song, sonnets, odes, etc. It contains reflective and pure lyrics, short and long poems, etc. The 'khandkavya' and narrative poems of the collection bring to surface the subtle descriptive and narrative art of the poet.

The poems of Kodiyani are on various themes, ranging from the feeling of patriotism to personal love. The variety of themes and their treatment on one hand, and the metres and rhythm on the other are attractive and pleasing. He has made use of folk rhythms of the Saurashtra region of Gujarat very successfully and creatively. The group of poems named 'Varshamangal' shows the nature of Bengal and the impact of Rabindra-sangit.

In some of the poems in Kodiyani, one finds the impact of Gandhian ideology, as also the aesthetics of Tagore. Then again, there are poems which emit the poet's love for the downtrodden and the poor, but at the same time such poems as these escape the tint of propaganda and didacticism, and the poet's artistic ability results in aesthetic creations.

The freshness of language, the use of image and symbol, the masterly craftsmanship of metre, the delicacy of emotion, the sensuous word-pictures, the parabolic imagination and the artistic expression in Kodiyani deserve to be commended. The 'Prithvi' and the 'Gulbanki' metres used by the poet in the collection seem to be his most favourite and successful.

The first enlarged edition of Kodiyani was brought out in 1957 with an introduction by Umashankar Joshi, in which a few new poems were included. These new poems such as 'Athmun Delhi' (Eighth Delhi), show the poet's disillusionment on his return to India from abroad after twelve long years. This enlarged edition contains 133 poems. This edition of Kodiyani shows the poet's two phases—earlier and later. During the earlier phase, Shridharani dealt with his themes sympathetically and in a romantic way. But the poems of the later phase are treated satirically and in a more realistic vein. In these poems, the poet's utmost concern is the contemporary socio-economical and political condition of a country. These are the product of the post-Independence period which, it seems, struck the poet's mind and heart rather hard. Thus, one can find remarkable change in the language of the later poems of Kodiyani.

'Bharati', 'Athmun Delhi', 'Mona Lisanun smit', 'Laghutam sadharan avyay', 'Aj maro apardh chee', 'Raja', 'Avalokiteshvar', 'Sarjakshreshtha angalan',

KOHALA-KOLATKAR, ARUN

'Sapoot', 'Pankhar', 'Patangiyun ne chambeli' etc. are the memorable poems of Kodiyan.

The poet's beautiful style, keen observation of physical and human nature, impact of the Gandhian ideology and Tagore's beauty of expression and lyricism are the aesthetic creations in Kodiyan, which has earned for itself a high place in the realm of Gujarati poetry.

D.P.

KOHALA (Sanskrit) was an eminent ancient Sanskrit author on dramaturgy and music, not later than Bharata who in his Natyashastra has complimented Kohala on his work. The Kohaliya-abhinaya-shastra on dramaturgy, as well as the Tala-lakshana, the Dattila-kohaliya (jointly with Dattila) and the Kohala-rahasya (only thirteenth chapter) on music all available in manuscripts only, are attributed to him but without certainty. Most probably, his works are lost to us. He is respectfully referred to, mentioned or cited by many ancient Sanskrit writers like Bharata, Damodaragupta, Rajashekhara, Abhinavagupta, Manikyachandra, Ramachandra, Gunachandra, Sharadatanaya, Simhabpala, etc. He has written on various topics of drama and music such as the types of play, like, 'anka', 'vithi', 'bhana', 'sataka' (sattaka?), etc. saindahaka type of Prakrit play, treatment of uparupakas, eleven elements of drama, preludes and interludes, elements of plot like 'bija', 'bindu' and 'pataka', use of 'kaishiki vritti', its creation from 'shrngara', six types of 'samanyabhinaya', several dramatic gaits, movements in 'raudra' sentiment, 'chitrabhinaya', myth of the origin of 'tandava' dance, gestures like 'nikuttaka', 'raga-kavya', 'dvipadi', rhythm of 'dhruvas' and so on. Kohala thus seems to have written on dramatic forms and techniques, aesthetics, acting, musicology, almost all aspects of dramaturgy. Perhaps, the encyclopaedic Natyashastra made him redundant and gradually obsolete.

KOLATKAR, ARUN (English; b. 1932) was considered to be the most enigmatic figure in Marathi poetry during the decade 1960-70. He is a bilingual poet writing in Marathi and English with a modern sensibility. He is also well known for his inspired translation of Tukaram which was published in Poetry India (Vol.1. 1966). He was working in the field of advertising, is a gifted graphic artist and has won the top Artist's Guild awards regularly. Arun Kolatkar was the leading light of the monthly magazine of poetry, Shabda, founded by Ramesh Samarth, Bandu Waze, Arun Kolatkar and Dilip Chitre. The magazine had no manifesto and the poetic spectrum it presented was wide. It continued erratically between 1955 and 1956 and, after a brief restoration in 1960, ceased publication.

Twenty of Arun Kolatkar's poems translated from Marathi appeared in Dilip Chitre's Anthology of Marathi Poetry published in 1967 (Nirmala Sadanand, Bombay). These poems are characterized by sensitiveness to a sense of disintegration and disaster. Sex, death and urban experience are the themes of these poems which give expression to a crisis in the poet's individual experience. 'Room Next to Death', 'On the Fretful Bed' and 'Two Hairy Hearts', treat sex as a nightmarish experience which leaves a bitter, disgusting and revolting taste behind. The disintegration of the body and the imminence of death are expressed in the lines:

"The twittering Venus if the veins turns rotten" and "Their bed began to march all of a sudden with the legs of a bier".

As Dilip Chitre has pointed out, Kolatkar is always apt to 'become esoteric and cryptic. He suppresses feeling through a symbol or an image'. The poem 'The Emperor Stands' in an imagistic presentation of an anguish felt at the futility of human victory or achievement in the face of death. There is no moralizing or discursiveness except for an unadorned presentation of an object.

Nurtured on the traditional Marathi religious poetry and exposed to the modern aesthetic movements of Imagism, Symbolism and Surrealism, his poems are free from romantic sensibility; they are symbolic representations of his observations and meditations which have metaphysical implications. There is a tendency to use slang and the modern idiom to express emotion with an elemental force and 'barbaric simplicity'. Expressions like 'The Goat of glass in the corner/Takes a metaphysical leap', 'one-legged radius of light', 'the blood/of the stone as sacramental food', are very much in the surrealistic mode.

Arun Kolatkar's well known book of poems Jejuri was first published in the Opinion Literary Quarterly in 1954 and was awarded the Commonwealth Literary Prize of 1977. Jejuri consists of thirty one poems, in which the consciousness of the poet operates on things seen in Jejuri, a place of pilgrimage, on a particular day from the morning till sun-set. Jejuri has been considered by many critics the most exciting, unusual and extraordinary book of poems. Life in all its variety is presented here, and the poems are seen to be 'a symbolic representation and personal comment on the material poverty of India', a picture of the modern predicament and of the world as a wasteland. 'The simultaneous existence of various forms of animate and inanimate phenomena along with the existence of man's consciousness' has been seen to be one of the basic themes of Jejuri. This book of poems represents a certain crystallization of the poet's vision without resort to history or moralizing. An ironic observation of reality is expressed with an artistic density which has lent itself to a variety of interpretations. Arun Kolatkar has also been included in R. Parthasarathy's Ten Twentieth Century Indian Poets 1976.

KOLHATKAR, ACHYUT BALVANT-KOLHATKAR, CHINTAMAN GANESH

KOLHATKAR, ACHYUT BALVANT (Marathi; b. 1879 d. 1931) was born in a Chitapavan brahmin family and his father, Raobahadur Vamanrao, who had married a widow, was one of the earliest social reformers. Achyut was orphaned in early age and was, later, brought up by his uncle Balvantrao, who held diametrically different views from those of his brother and Achyut's father. Balvantrao was orthodox in views, but patriotic in spirit, while Vamanrao, in contrast, was a 'moderate' and believed in social change. Achyut imbibed the spirit of patriotism from his uncle. He was so much under his influence that he did not like his father's views, and the intense dislike for his situation led him to the extent of disowning his father and called himself Achyut Balvant Kolhatkar instead of Achyut Vaman Kolhatkar.

After passing his B.A., Achyutrao became a school teacher in Satara. Because of his volatile nature, he did not take to the sober profession of teaching for long. Soon after getting through LL.B. examination, he started practising as a lawyer at Nagpur. His literary talent came to the fore when he started contributing to the Shubhasuchaka, a weekly published from Satara. Later, he alongwith his cousin started Dashasevaka from Nagpur. In 1907, he was arrested on the charges of sedition, because in his writings he expressed anti-British views and was convicted for two and a half years.

On the completion of his jail term, Achyutrao went to Bombay and started Shritibodha, which published his Marathi rendering of the Rigveda. Soon again, he jumped into the field of journalism and remained in it till his end. He was an extremist, and therefore, became a follower of Bal Gangadhar Tilak. From Bombay he started the publication of the Sandesha, a daily newspaper, which became popular within a short time and captured Marathi readership. Achyutrao had a powerful and facile pen, and he used all the skills like irony, satire, even lampoon to convey his views. He had a rare knack for reducing the serious to the ridiculous.

Achyutrao in the beginning was a strong follower of Tilak, but when Tilak opposed him, he started a virulent attack on him and his school, forcing him to come to a compromise.

He published a series of letters impersonating a lady writer named Vatasalavahini, on all the contemporary social problems in a trenchant, ironical satirical style. These letters instantly earned him popularity, but controversy over the sex of the letter-writer ensued soon after.

Because of the incisive force of his attack and his recklessness, Achyutrao did not gain much influence on contemporary or educated minds. With few supporters, he was reduced to a broken-hearted man and was ruined financially. But because of his style, which was attractive, lucid and metaphorical, he became a model to many journalists, who followed him. He has left a distinct mark on the Marathi journalism. Besides Sandesha, he published during 1915-1931 many newspapers such as Svatantra, and Rashtramata, weeklies such as Yugantara, Chabuka, Ranasangrama and monthlies such as Shritibodha and Usha. All his publications were short-lived mainly due to paucity of funds.

Achyutrao tried his hand at writing novels and plays also and a few of which include Swami Vivekananda Nataka (1914), San. Vatsata Vahininche lekha (1915), Sundopasunda nataka (1916), Bala Kusumavati (1917), Naringi nishana (1917), Vatsala vahini (1923), Chaudve Ratna (1925), Ingrajancha prabhava (a novel) (1926), Mastani nataka (1926), Gulab vidhava (1930). His plays were staged, but did not prove successful.

A.T.

KOLHATKAR, BALKRISHANA HARI (Marathi; b. 1926) was born in a Satara, and he started writing plays early in life. He is also known as Bal Kolhatkar. Some of his popular plays have been staged for more than 1000 times. A few of these plays include Duritanche timir javo (1500 performances), Vahto hi durvachi judi (1400 performances), Mumbai chi manasen (1955 performances) and Ekhadyache nashib (1000 nights). During the last three decades, he has written more than thirty popular plays. The themes of his plays are mostly middle class family problems and sentimental tragic-comedies. The best and the most successful practitioner of social comedy, Kolhatkar has received many honours and awards from the state government and drama organisations. Educated only upto seventh standard, he wrote his first play, Johar, when he was fifteen years of age. He worked with the Indian Railways till 1947, and thereafter he had a chequered career. He literally starved for a week. Nevertheless, he devoted himself solely to the dramatic muse, and faced many ups and downs. He also wrote film scripts. He earned one and half lakh rupees through the performance of his play Vahato hi durvachi judi (1964), which testifies how successful and popular a playwright he is. His other plays are Vegale vhayachey mala (I want separation), Lahanpan dega deva, Dev dinaghari dhavala, De naryache haat hazar, etc.

KOLHATKAR, CHINTAMAN GANESH (Marathi; b. 1891 d. 1959) was a veteran Marathi actor and the author of Bahurupi (1957). He trained himself to be a capable character actor. He was one of the founders of the famous Balwant Sangit Natak Mandali. His acting career which culminated in the award of the Rashtrapati gold medal in 1957, brought him in contact with almost all the great dramatists of his time—Deval, Khadilkar, Kolhatkar, Warerkar, Gadkari, Savarkar, Bedekar. It seems that while writing his autobiography, his own career did not interest him as much as did his confrontation with the stalwarts among dramatists of his time. His Bahurupi, which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1958), is marked for the sharp portrayal of his contemporary dramatists.

M.M.

KOLHATKAR, SHRIPAD KRISHNA (Marathi; b. 1871 d. 1934) was a humourist, playwright, critic, essayist, novelist and short story writer. But in his day, he was best known as a playwright.

Born at Nagpur, he spent his childhood at Akola. As he was looked upon as a dull and naive boy, he developed a mental complex that made him shun society around him. It is reported that he had written a three-act play while he was studying in the fifth grade. He also wrote a play entitled Sukhamalika when he was in the ninth grade. Although this play is not traceable, it is to be noted with the plays like Guptamanjusha and Premashodhan (1911).

He topped the list of successful candidates at the Vernacular Examination and secured a scholarship. This gave him the confidence and he began to read voraciously Marathi and English books, including Scott's historical novels, and Marathi versions of the Arabian Nights. Also he read with devotion Vishnushastri Chiplunkar's Nibandhamala, a periodical containing the editor's frank and candid views attacking western attitudes to several aspects of Indian culture. This enabled Kolhatkar to be endowed with a fresh and new insight into the sociology of Indian Life.

After his matriculation, he joined the Deccan College at Pune (1888). He took his B.A. degree in 1891 and proceeded on to be a law graduate in 1893. The critical articles he wrote during this time on such popular plays as Vikramashashikala and Shapsambhram gained for him special popularity and eminence. These articles projected the view that the drama and the morality went together. Even stylistically these essays inaugurated a new era in the sphere of criticism.

His maiden play, Viratanaya, was staged by the Kirloskar Mandali. It is a play mainly based on the courage and chivalry, as its concept reveals Scott's influence thereon.

He started his legal practice in Akola (1898) and moving from place to place, he finally settled at Jalgaon Jamod when a separate court was established there.

He has also authored a book on astrology and was elected as the President of Astrological Conference at Sangli (1918). Besides, he was a keen student of mathematics.

He was also a keen reformist and wrote innumerable humorous essays on themes of social relevance, e.g. education of women, conditions of the Indian widow, casteism, fundamental rights of women, re-marriages and eradication of untouchability. Whatever he wrote, he never hesitated from accepting his commitment to the society at large.

Although he is unhesitatingly accepted as a pioneer of a new era of humorous writings which were punctuated by his sharp wit and superb pun, his historical writings were not accepted as successful owing to the fact that they were marred by the superior plays turned out by his contemporary playwrights like K.P. Khadilkar, which were considered more aesthetic and relevant to the existing social and political scene. However, Kolhatkar's name will continue to be remembered as a play-wright who found a link between the works of Kirloskar-Deval on one hand, and Gadkari-Warerkar on the other. The songs and music in Kolhatkar's plays unfolded a new dimension of closeness to gazhals and Kawwalis. His other works include: Plays: Mukanayak (1897), Janmarahasya, Mativikar (1906), Sahacharini (1918), Sivaparvatiya (1924), Parivartana, Vadhupariksha (1931); Short stories: Ganare yantra, Pati hachstreshta alankar, Sampadika, Garib bichare padas; Novels: Dutappi ki duheri (1925) Shyamsunder (1925), Humorous essays, Sudamyache pohe.

Kolhatkar wrote some stray poems of no particular importance and also 25 critical essays and 36 articles on various themes.

KOLTE, VISHNU BHIKAJI (Marathi; b.1908) did his M.B., LL.B in 1931 and took Ph.D. in 1948 from Nagpur University. Akhil Bharatiya Mahanubhava Mandal gave him the title of Vidyaratna. He was Professor of Marathi in Morris College, Nagpur from 1931 to 1944. Later, he joined as Principal of Nagpur Mahavidyala in 1956, and remained there up to 1964. He was Vice-Chancellor of Nagpur University from 1961 to 1972. A volume was presented to him in a function arranged in his honour when he was 75. His publications are: Bhaskarbhata Borikar: Charitra va kavyetihasa (1935), Mahanubhava tattvajnan (1945), Mahanubhancha achardharma (1948), Mahanubhava sahitya sanshodhan (1962), Sri Chakradhar charitra (1977). He edited Rukmini svayamvar (1962), Murtiprakash (1962), Sahyadrivarnan (1964), Bachhaharan (1965), Jnanprabodh (1973), Govindaprabhu charitra (1982), Acharaband (1982) and Lila charitra (1982).

His biography of Bhaskarbhata Borikar is a 30-page long essay in which the first 22 pages are devoted to the sources from which he gathered material. Mahanubhava texts are written in a secret script and these needed decoding and deciphering.

Some of the poems in Lavali (1933), his collection of poems, have a fine expression of tender emotions between the mother and the child.

Kolte also wrote a humorous play Sodchitthi (1938). Nonetheless, he knew that his real work was in the field of research and not in that of creative writing. He is a fine critic and a well-known educationist. He gave in Hindi lectures on the social work of marathi saints' in Banaras Hindu University. He presided over the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan and his monumental work was on how to simplify Marathi spelling. He abolished all the unpronounced cumbersome nasal sounds.

KONARKA (Hindi). Amongst the modern Hindi playwrights, the name of Jagdishchandra Mathur deserves special mention for his undertaking many a meaningful experiment to forge an appropriate relationship between the drama and the stage. He was convinced that the drama could not have an existence of its own irrespective of the stage.

Konarka (1951) represents such an experiment. It does not only strike a commendable balance between the ancient and the modern histrionics, but it can also be termed as a well planned and well-balanced work from the standpoint of the plot, its logical development, dialogues, acoustics, colour, craft, etc.

Situated on sea shore at a distance of about 19 miles from Puri in Orissa and built in the 13th Century, the sun Temple, Konark, is the last in the series of great artistic temples of India. (It represents the highest watermark in architectural beauty, artistic execution and rich variety of imaginative perception. Master craftsmen unfold through the sculptures in the temple the whole range of human activity divided into two temporal blocks of night and day. It is, however, beyond one's comprehension as to why this temple stands in a dilapidated condition, whereas all earlier temples stand well-preserved. What still remains intact is the 'Jagmohan', i.e. the pavilion adjacent to the 'Viman'). There is a legend widely prevalent in the area in connection with the building up of this architectural beauty. Partly accepting the story inherent in the legend, the author builds up his composition around it. To quote the author himself, he has transformed a story steeped in graceful and pathetic emotions into a work of wrathful emotions. In a similar manner, he is not tied down by history, although he accepts it in a relative sense. He does not delineate the chief architect Vishnu, his former love, the daughter of Shabar and their talented son, Dharmapad, as mere sentimental and helpless creatures, but makes a meaningful effort to put across through them the quiet virility of the artist who forgets his own entity in the fascinating experience of creating beauty, and also provides a manifestation to the ever-raging internal fire of the artist.

We, therefore, do not only find life-like portrayals of the mighty king of Utkal, the ever-conspiring Prime Minister of the state, the chief architect 'Vishnu' and his defiant son Dharmapad, but we also find that the whole of the artisan fraternity unites to take up cudgels in defence of the artist's honour and identity.

While reading the play, we can hear the echo of the modern conflict between individual and society and also the palpitations of the human heart in the midst of thunderous clouds of history. The diction has rather a deep poetic touch, but this has not caused the impairment of the dramatic situations and their overall impact. The architect's revenge in all its fury leaves the spectators completely stunned, and makes it clear that the artist knows no defeat.

KONARKE (Oriya) by Nilakantha Das is considered to be an epic in Oriya literature. It describes in the first two parts, 'Ramachandithare rati' (Night at Ramachandi) and the sad love story of Prince Narasimha Deba and Maya Debi, the princess of Shishupalagada, a feudal state. Konarke, in which the influence of Scott and Tennyson is evident, is nonetheless an original work of Nilakantha which testifies to his poetic craftsmanship and imagination.

In 1917, Nilakantha, then a teacher of Satyabadi School had escorted some students of visit Konarka. It was a fullmoon night and because of heavy rain and storm the children spent the night at Ramachandi temple. The fatigued children went to sleep and the young poet teacher imagined the dreams of children as he ruminated over the glorious past of Orissa. In 'Ramachandithare rati', Nilakantha nostalgically reflects over the art and sculpture, the flourishing trade, the indomitable military might and the intense patriotism of the Oriyas of the past generations. The sacrifices and the betrayals, the glorious feats of heroics, the magnificent natural sceneries and the lives of the people are described in rich poetic concentration in details. Occasionally also the poet laments the fall of the Orissan pride and glory. It is as if the entire history dances before the eyes of the readers in a vast kaleidoscopic pattern. Inter spersed with this narration of history is the poet's occasional address to the children, which lends it a soft, tender touch. In 'Ramachandithare sakala', (in the morning) the clouds have cleared and the children look at the grand beauty of Konarka. The poet shows and narrates the splendour of the sea and the beauty of the glistening sea-shore with the rivers picturesquely flowing across it. In the course of the narration, he comes to describe the love between Narasimha Deba and Maya Debi, which a minstrel had told him during his visit of the Garhjats.

Once during the reign of emperor Anangabhimha Deba, Prince Narasimha Deba goes on an expedition to quell the bandits. During this expedition he meets and falls in deep love with Maya Debi. But meanwhile the king has settled the marriage of the prince with the princess of Kashmir. On learning this the prince meets Maya Debi and conveys to her this sad news. Maya Debi, without getting least unhappy welcomes this and requests the prince to visit Shishupalagada with his wife after the marriage. But just after the marriage the prince has to move to Tamralipti to suppress the sea-pirates and before leaving he instructs his wife to visit Maya Debi. The princess of Kashmir accordingly meets Maya Debi and the latter dies in the arms of the princess. As per her wish, her body is put into a coffin and is flown into the river near Barabati fort. The prince while returning from Tamralipti through Chandrabhaga comes upon the coffin. Then in the memory of Maya Debi, the prince builds the temple at Konarka. In 'Upasamhara' of the poem the poet interprets this love story in terms of the earthly incarnations of the Sun god and other gods and goddesses.

The epic in its various phases of description adopts different styles to transform history into poetry. In the first few lines of 'Ramachandithare rati' where the poet feels deeply for the children who are away from home on such a festive night, the style is extremely tender and simple. And later on, when the poet describes the heroics of the past, the tone is usually dignified and invocative with the sonorous music of words. 'Maya Debi' has for its theme, love, which is marked not by any royal splendour, but by a unique simplicity and intensity of submission and sacrifice. Here one notices a style of deep lyrical intensity and similes and metaphors that testify to the poet's imagination and keen observation. Here he uses varied styles—of language, metrical compositions and the like. In 'Maya Debi', there is the grandeur of diction and yet a lilting rhythm by means of which the poet makes a successful fusion of history and romance.

KONDAVADA (Marathi) is a collection of poems by the wellknown Dalit author Daya Pavar. The poems express the anger of the untouchable community which has been treated like slaves for centuries by high caste Hindus. The collection contains a poem entitled 'Utkhanan' (Excavation) in which an old city is unearthed many years after the 20th century, and it is found that the separate poets marked for separate castes are still there. Similarly in another poem, the poet has received a letter from his Indian friend abroad, stating that in a hotel there he had seen the sign 'Dogs and Indians are not allowed'. The poet comments: 'Friend, I am glad that what you experienced that night in a far-off land, is something which we have been going through for two thousand years'. This distinction between man and man of higher and lower birth is the undercurrent of this slender volume of poems. This collection was published after the publication of Namdev Dhasal's Golpitha, and it created a furore in Marathi literature in early seventies. Daya Pavar, however, does not use slangs, nor does he rake up the morbid and perverted images. He and Keshav Meshram have lesser vitriolic violence in their verses and have better poetic command. There are many tender poems on the plight of the poverty-ridden slum-dwellers, and basic human emotions. This work received the state government award.

KONDAVILKAR, MADHAV (Marathi; b. 1941) is Dalit novelist and autobiography writer of significance. Born of illiterate parents, he is not sure of his birth date. He was born at Devache Gotane, Sogamwadi, Rajapur, district Ratnagiri. Stationed in life as he was, he could not pursue formal education beyond the eighth standard. However, informally, through self-education, he went upto S.S.C. in 1968 and Sahitya Prajna in Marathi. He is a primary school teacher.

His publications include the first Dalit autobiography, with a proper place name as the title Mukkam Post Devache Gothane (1979) for which he received the Maharashtra State Literary Award. His novels include Novels: Azun Ujadayache ahe (It is still dawn, 1981), Anath (Orphan), Chhed (Divide, 1982), Vedh (Search, 1983), Zapatlela (The possessed, 1986), Hatachi chhadi tondavar bot (A stick in the hand, a finger on the lips), Savitri. His other works include; Itukalerao (1977), Chhan chhan goshti (1979), Anath (1981).

KONDURA (Marathi) is a powerful novel by C.T. Khanolkar, one of the top writers of modern Marathi literature, published in 1966.

A winner of State Literary Award, it is considered to be his best novel. The excellence of the book lies in the fact that it exhibits all of Khanolkar's mystique, his symbolic imagery, poetic language, surrealistic atmosphere, strange, unusual theme and his perennial urge to know the meaning of life.

'Kondura' is a huge cavity in the rocky cliff made by the consistent onslaught of the mighty waves of the sea at a sleepy, almost primitive village in Konkan. The place is worshipped as an abode of the god Kondura who is supposed to rule their destiny by way of a command given through a symbol of ever thundering roar heard miles away in the background. Kondura dominates the novel. Though the principle character in the novel is Parshuram Tatya around whom the novel is woven, he remains a non-hero. A frustrated man, dominated by his elder brother, he decides to leave his home to seek his fortune elsewhere. He meets a Yogi on the moor, who tells him that his destiny is differently preordained and orders him to go back and observe celibacy, and gives him as a parting gift a tree-root which has the power to abort a pregnancy. Taking the Yogi to be Kondura, he goes back and shuns his wife. He experiences strange hallucinations. The superstitious villagers make a holy man of him and try to raise him to unbelievable heights. Tatya takes upon himself the task of rejuvenating a local temple, but makes a mess of his life. He makes an evil pact with a rich man, Naroba, who is an arch villain of the village. Unable to know the meaning of good and evil, he administers the aborting root to Naroba's daughter-in-law. He does not understand why the rich exploiters of the poor are not punished for their sins, while the poor are not redeemed. Finding himself impotent to change anything in life, he disobeys Kondura and leaves home never to return.

Set against the background of ever present Kondura, Khanolkar weaves his story around archetypal characters, the weakling Tatya, the evil incarnate Naroba, his ugly uncouth nephew, his saintly wife, the water-diver shepherd, Tatya's elder brother, a true patriarch, his scheming friends and the superstitious, primitive crowd of the village. The novel has a haunting atmosphere and its descriptions of nature have almost a mythical quality. The novel poses some eternal questions whether human life is pre-determined and man is just a puppet in the hands of his destiny, and what is good and evil, and that whether evil goes unpunished and also that whether man can ever get satisfactory answers to these questions. If not, his life would be aimless and meaningless like that of the hero in the novel.

KONGU VEL (Tamil) was a great poet of probably the 7th century whose Perunkathai ranks as one of the great epic poems in Tamil. As his name implies he belonged to the Kongu mandala which comprised the present Coimbatore, Periyar, Salem and north Tiruchirappalli districts and was a prosperous land-holder, perhaps holding political sway over a limited satrap. He flourished in Kurumbunadu, a part of the present Periyar district, his headquarters being Vijayamangalam.

Vijayamangalam seems to have been a flourishing metropolis in the 7th century and was an important Jain religious centre in Tamilnadu. Konguvel was a devoted Jain who must have been a leading light of the Jain movement in Tamilnadu on account of his powerful political clout and his vast scholarship and poetic ability and also as the chief citizen of the town which housed the biggest Jain shrine in the country.

Kongu Vel composed the Perunkathai based on Durvinita's Sanskrit Brihatkatha which seems to have been based on Gunadhya's Brihatkatha which was in the Paishachi dialect. Gunadhya's Brihatkatha had nothing Jain about it but King Durvinita who was a Ganga monarch was a pious Jain who infused the Hindu story with Jain ideas and doctrines; Kongu Vel who too was an ardent follower of the Jain faith went farther along the way and made it a wholly Jain work.

The story centres on the romantic adventures of the Vatsa prince Udayana who marries four young women during the course of the long narrative which starts with the events leading to the birth of Udayana and ends with his renunciation. Udayana though good at war is the eternal play-boy whose mind is centred on a hedonistic enjoyment of life; fortunately for him and his subjects, he is helped in all matters by two devoted and resourceful ministers Yuhi and Urumannuva (corresponding to Yaugandharayana and Rumanvan in Sanskrit tradition). The story is replete with ascetics and supernatural elements; there is little moral fervour and the tone is not particularly elevated.

With such material on his hands and with the two added disadvantages of a north Indian story being set in a south Indian setting and a Hindu narrative being converted into a Jain epic, Kongu Vel transforms the rambling, loosely connected chain of episodes into a remarkable poem. He often reminds the reader of Ilango, partly on account of the 'asiriappa metre' and mainly because he has a poetic calibre comparable to that of the Chera poet. If his work is today regarded as lesser than Silappadikaram it may be on account of three reasons; the characters in the latter work have greater innate strength than those in the former who are stylised, type-cast; there is greater unity in the saga of Kovalan and Kannaki and the tragic ending is the high point to which the entire poem moves inexorably, like a Greek tragedy while Perunkathai is more on the lines of Odysseus, a series of adventures; and importantly, Kongu Vel displays mere religious sectarianism while Ilango manifests an elevated humanism and a pervasive moral earnestness in his epic poem.

KONTHOUJAM LABANGO SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1750, d. 1820) was a court scholar of Maharaja Bhagyachandra who reigned between 1763-1798. He is a good example of a courtier turned scholar. An embodiment of modesty, honour and charm, he spent his life in relentless pursuit of knowledge. He had a great interest in Sanskrit literature. He was acquainted with Bengali and Sanskrit besides the old Manipuri language.

His works include Ram Nongaba which is a long work on the later part of the life of Lord Rama. It was most probably composed at the close of the eighteenth century.

Manuscripts of the work were preserved by the late

KOPPARAPU SODARA KAVULU-KOSALA

Pandit Madhop, the late pandit Chandra Singh, Pandit Amuyaiah Singh and N. Khelchandra Singh.

KOPPARAPU SODARA KAVULU (Telugu). Kopparapu is the surname of a family in the Kopparam village of Prakasam District of Andhra Pradesh. 'Kopparu sodara Kavulu' stands for two brothers, Venkata Subbaraya Sarma (1885-1932) and Venkata Ramana Sarma (1887-1942).

The poet brothers studied Sanskrit under Ramadugu Rama Krishna Sastry. Their Telugu teacher and teacher of poetry was Potaraju Ramakavi-a great scholar of Elchur, a nearby village. Ramakavi trained these boys to compose poems spontaneously.

Both the brothers by regular training and practice became 'ashukavis'. They were able to compose any poem on any subject in Telugu even at the age of fifteen. They began to give performances of poetry from their sixteenth year.

Their first noted performance was at Alavalalaskar near Hyderabad. It was much appreciated by the poets and scholars of that place and the zamindar of that village A. Tirumala Rao honoured these poets with 'gandapendera' (a golden ornament for the leg).

The second meeting was at Manikonda Samsthanam. There they were honoured with the title Balasaraswati. The third was at Nellore. In this meeting the title of 'Ashukavisimha' was given to them where very famous scholars came and tested these brothers.

Then these brothers moved to Madras, the then capital of the combined State of Andhra and Tamilnadu. In those days Madras was the centre of south Indian culture. Eminent scholars of that time appreciated the extempore poetry of Kopparapu brothers.

The wonderful, flawless, meaningful and beautiful poems came out from the mouth of these poets at an amazing speed of four hundred poems per hour. This was never seen or heard of in the history of Andhra literature. All the scholars were struck by this unique exhibition. Generally it is not even possible to read four hundred poems per hour with open book. But these brothers could pour forth poems at this speed on the subjects specified by the scholars in the meeting at once. There was no gap between the question and the answer. As soon as the subject was given, poems began to flow from the mouth of the Kopparapu poets. The scholars of Madras honoured these two with poems of praise and titles.

A number of performances of the two brothers were arranged in Madras. The Rajah of Pithapuram was very impressed with the beauty and speed of the poems spontaneously composed by the two Kopparapu brothers and honoured them with one thousand and one hundred sixteen rupees which was a rare honour in those days. The poets performed 'ashtavadhanam' and 'shatavadhanam' at different parts of the state along with the exhibition of ashukavitva.

Tirupati Venkata Kavulu and Kopparapu Venkata Subbaraya Kavi met in a meeting at Guntur and it led to an unpleasant controversy which divided the poets and scholars of the state into two groups. Poems, essays, discussions flowed abusing one other in the press, on the platform and everywhere. Literary controversy degenerated into personal invective. However, even the abusive poems have a wonderful literary standard.

Kopparapu Sodara Kavulu composed hundreds and thousands of poems in various meetings but it is highly deplorable that many of them were not preserved.

Shatavadhanams of Kopparapu poets are of a special category. Many poets who claimed themselves as shatavadhanis did not fully perform the avadhanam for hundred questioners. These brothers performed this great feat at many places for hundred questioners. This achievement was acclaimed by the press in those days. Madras, Bapatla, Chirala, Guntur may be mentioned among the places where the brothers displayed their great talents.

One of the great meetings mentionable is a sanmanam function arranged in connection with the marriage of the daughter of Raja Mantripragad Bhujanga Rao Bahadur at Eluru. There was a meeting, where hundreds of scholars of the state were present, Kopparapu poets rendered hundreds of spontaneous poems on Haimavati Kalyanam at an extraordinary speed and with rare beauty. The President of the function Sri Vedam Venkata Raya Sastry gave the title of 'Ashukavi Shikhamani' and declared that there were no such great Ashu Kavis at any time in the history of Telugu literature.

In this way they went across the length and breadth of the country and gave thousands of performances and secured name and fame.

Buchchi Rama Kavi the third brother also joined his second brother in the performances after the first brother's death and after the second brother's death, he gave performances independently and kept up the name of Kopparapu family until his death in 1956.

Nidadavolu Venkata Rao, a great scholar, wrote the biography of these poets with the help of Minnikanti Gurunatha Sarma. Muntamukkala Janakirama Sarma, a devoted admirer of Kopparapu poets, collected a few hundreds of poems of these great poets and published them in two volume. They stand as specimens of the literary achievement of the Kopparapu brothers.

KOSALA (Marathi). With the publication of Bhalachandra Nemade's Kosala in 1963, a new novel in all aspects came into existence. The content and form, and the style of the novel were so new that the readers as well as the critics, accustomed to the established traditional norms of novel, were very much amused and confused at the beginning. But more than this, the work checked the romantic dominance and influence on the Marathi novel and presented the liveliness of experience both directly and obliquely with a new vision of life. This novel paved a new way of writing for the practitioners of the form and also promoted a new awareness of absurdity in modern life. Nemade managed to touch the domains of new sensibility that brought out the struggle between the self and the social culture in the immediate here and now.

The novel written in the first person narrative, begins with an unusual statement, "I, Panduranga Sangavikara, am today twenty-five years old. In fact, this is all that can be told to you, etc." This is the beginning and the end as well, because everything else in the novel is his own postmortem of the haphazard accounts of his life. This does not mean that the rest is elucidation in words. The greatness of Namade as a novelist lies here, in creating significant awareness on various levels, giving the dimensions of space and time, exploding the concealed potentialities of existential problems through this narration. Only a few fictioneers have been able to depict this kind of exposition and Nemade is one amongst them.

Kosala is an honest confession of Panduranga of his self-awareness, of his alienation and of his peculiar way of thinking and living. He is a young man hailing from a small village and now studying in a well-known college at a culturally advanced city like Pune. During the course of his studies, he realises and experiences the hypocrisy in society, in the family, educational institutions, in human relations and in everything around. He observes it and mocks at it, expresses his views constantly in oblique and piercing way; but he is aware of and confesses the fact that his boredom and ennui are sterile and impotent in this atmosphere, as he cannot revolt. His behaviour is peculiar. He is simple, innocent and normal, but the fun of the fact is that his simple and natural living appears to be abnormal to the other people, who are, in fact, leading artificial and hypocritical lives without a sense of shame. He is inoffensive and modest; but, he can distinguish between the truth and falsehood. He never initiates anything but reacts to everything that happens, that too, only when and to the extent to which the event concerns him. He never differentiates between the things on the basis of superiority and inferiority. Whatever he does, he does with honesty, sincerity and intensity. Because of the peculiar state of mind, he becomes a stranger in his own family and society as well as in his college, in the hostel and amongst the people he is surrounded by. People take the life for granted and think of the problems, but for Panduranga life itself is a problem and he is haunted by the basic question 'Why life'? The only way out he had learned, is to live in this world by not living in it. He is terribly shocked by the death of his dear little sister and considers death as the only ultimate reality. Considering himself a misfit in this practical world, Panduranga returns to his village with an upset mind and leads a life that is boring and meaningless. Tremendous restlessness is the only thing left for him; the days just pass; some events happen and some don't, but his whole life turns into 'Prashnopanishad'. He neither believes in so-called ideal norms nor does he nurse any illusions. The stream of his consciousness flows continuously, crossing the barriers of the time and space. The characters, Panduranga's father, Giridhara, Suresh Ichalakaranjya, Gune, etc. are true to the soil, and the problem of alienation in the novel is not imported as a modern fashion; it is revealed through the native atmosphere and the prevailing conditions, and on the moral and social, spiritual and existential levels of life. It is an attempt, fully successful, of examining one's own life and that of others in the light of flickering experiences, instead of static tendencies of life. Kosala grows out of this attitude. The form of Kosala is achieved through the fusion of satire and contemplation, humour and seriousness. This has become a device for creating aesthetic distance necessary for understanding. Instead of using static and standardised language, Nemade has used dynamic, vital, colloquial and conversational language for Kosala, a prose perfectly suited to the very purpose of the novel. In a way he has exposed the fashionable, metaphorical, ornamental, rhetorical and closed style of writing, and once again given prestige to the living forms of language. However, this is not the only speciality of this narration; the creative use of the language by the author has turned it into meta-language. By using the informal first person narration, dialogues, memories, diary, dreams and events, the author has kept the narration free and formless.

The literary impact of Kosala is very important. It provided a fresh and new outlook for observing the total environment extending its tentacles around men and their lives, and socio-cultural ethos. "Even after too much thinking I have not found out what is to be done?" says Panduranga. This serious inevitable and honest confession is not only that of Panduranga alone, but also of the whole young generation. It is an artistic interior monologue of those who are facing the absurdities of life. When the novel ends, he no longer remains an adolescent; he has matured a great deal in the process. In fact, he stands before us as the end-product of the several past generations. The novel also transforms itself into a valuable piece of social document.

KOSAMBI, DHARMANAND (Marathi; b. 1876, d. 1947) is an internationally renowned Buddhist scholar. Born at

KOTAINAYAKI AMMAL, V.M.-KOTHARI, JAYANT

Sakhwal, a village in Goa, he married at the age of 15, but did not like to be a family man. He left home in 1899 and studied Sanskrit at Pune, Gwalior and Kashi. In Kashi he ate in an alms-house at one time and pursued his studies. He went to Nepal but was very much depressed to see the condition of decline of Buddhism. He learnt Pali from a Buddhist monk there. He, then, went to Sri Lanka and Burma. He studied Buddhism and the Pali language in Viharas. He fell ill there and came back to India. He became a family man. He went four times to U.S.A. on the invitation of J.H. Woods of Harvard University. He edited Buddhaghosa's Visuddhimagga, a Pali Buddhist text, in Roman (1927). He taught Pali at Calcutta University, Fergusson College, Pune (1912-18), Bombay University and Leningrad (1929-30). He joined Gandhi's Satyagraha movement in the forties. He worked in Gandhi's Gujarati Vidyapith and died in Sevagram. He founded 'Bahujana-Vihar' and 'Ananda-Vihar', the two Buddhist institutes.

In 1924, he wrote his autobiography, Nivedan, in which he confessed how at the age of 21 he wrote on the life of the Buddha in a children's magazine, and how he went on his spiritual quest. This account is only for the period upto his going to USA with Sayajirao Gaekwad's scholarship to study sociology. Events of his life are narrated dispassionately in this autobiography.

Dharmanand Kosambi's other great work is Bhagwan Buddha (1940). It was selected as the first book by Sahitya Akademi, in 1956, to be translated into other Indian languages. It provoked controversy amongst Jains, as Kosambi opined that monks ate non-vegetarian food given in alms.

S.V. Ketkar gave his opinion about Gautama the Buddha in his Sankirna lekh (1913) that Buddha did not know the Vedas, nor did he know Sanskrit; only he had the courage of a Charvaka. This view was vehemently opposed by Dharmanand Kosambi.

He was so devoted to the Buddha that his other two important Marathi works are also on the Buddha: Buddhalilasarasangraha and a play on Bhagwan Buddha's life. He differed with Gandhiji and left Gujarat Vidyapith and wrote a book on 'Ahimsa'. As a person, he was a noble soul, very simple and determinate.

His other works include: Buddha, dharma and sangha (1924), Samadhimarga (1924), Nivedan Atmacharitra par, (1924); Bauddh sanghacha parichaya (1926), Marathi translation of Suttanipata (1933), Abhidhammattha sangaha-navanita-tika (1941), Visuddhimagga-dipika (1943), Bodhisattava (1949), Parshvanathacha chaturyamadharma (1949).

KOTAINAYAKI AMMAL, V.M. (Tamil; b. 1901, d. 1960) was one of the early and popular women novelists in Tamil. Kotainayaki did not have any formal education.

She received, however, very useful instruction in the basic tenets of Hinduism and in the Hindu puranic lore. This traditional knowledge enriched by her personal readings of the contemporary works through journals provided her with the necessary spiritus mundi for her vocation as a novelist later.

As a fiction writer she chose, in the wake of Arani Kuppaswami Mudaliyar and Vatuvarur, the genre of detective novel as her medium to represent the social problems of her day such as unemployment among the educated youth and domestic problems such as persecution of the wife by the in-laws, etc. She was one of the early novelists during the inter-war period who had cultivated the habit of general reading among the public. An author of more than a hundred novels to her credit Kotainayaki was very popular, especially among women readers. Though she started her literary career with a drama Indra mohana (1923), her creative talent led her to novel-writing. Her first novel Vaideki serialised in 1925 in a journal Jagan mohini edited by herself was followed by Gopala ratnam (1929). Like most of the writers of her time, Kotainayaki was also attracted towards the Freedom Movement and went to jail as a freedom fighter. Such of her experience find an artistic treatment in a novel Vira Vasanta or Suyecchaivin paribhavam (1930). Champakavijayam and Gauri Mukundan, Padmasundaran, Radhamani, Tyagakkoti (1934), Vanakkuyil (1939), Anataippen chitti, etc. are some of her famous novels. Of these the last two are adapted for film production. Her last novel Kulirnta nencham has been left incomplete owing to her sudden death at the age of sixty.

KOTHARI, JAYANT (Gujarati; b. 1930) is an eminent critic of Gujarati. He studied at the Dharmendra Singhji Arts College at Rajkot, passed his B.A. (1957) and M.A. (1959) from the Gujarat University, standing first in both examinations, winning Gold Medals. He has been Head of the Gujarati Department of the G.L.S. Girls College at Ahmedabad. Since 1980, he is the chief editor of the Gujarati sahitya kosh. As the Secretary of the Academic Council of the Professors of Gujarati for several years, he has given his attention to the activities concerning the study of literature.

Right at the start of his teaching career, he brought out two well-studied works, giving evidence of his devotion for teaching and honest literary criticism, the works being Bharatiya kavya sidhant (written in collaboration with Natubhai Rajpura; 1960), discussing in very clear-cut terms the different aspects of poetics, and Plato-Aristotleni kavyavicharana (1969), ably discussing the literary ideas of these two original Greek thinkers. The spontaneity and fluency of style expressing the subtlest ideas and the solid but pleasant quality of his prose are noteworthy particularly in the second work.

Upakrama (1969) is a collection of his scholarly articles on literary criticism. The work is an outcome of his continuous critical writings since 1960. Beginning with an enlightening reappraisal of the medieval poets, this work discusses the most modern aesthetic concepts, and reveals his distinct view regarding the forms of critical writing. He has his own convincing manner of stating his points, and his analytical discussion depends completely on the authenticity of information. His scholarly approach is always accompanied by the readiness to accept with grace the most modern trends in aesthetic criticism. His subsequent works like Anukrama (1975), Vivechananun vivechan (1976) and Anupang (1978) also deal with literary criticism and show his increasingly mature style and outlook. Of these, Vivechananun vivechan is the most outstanding work of critical writing in Gujarati. With its well-researched, comparative and analytical criticism, this is the first work of its kind in the language. As a literary critic, his primary concern appears to be his concentration on the work he is writing about, which enables him to establish certain principles of literary criticism. Because of this characteristic, his criticism has been described by a learned scholar as metacriticism.

Bhasha parichay ane Gujarati bhashanun svarup (Introduction to Gujarati language and its structure, 1973) is a new product of his approach and methodology applied to the study of this subject. Prepared according to the University syllabus, it is an excellent example of the author's grasp of the subject and his ability to effectively express himself.

Equally noteworthy are his edited compilations of great works concerning literary theories, in which he brings together in an organized manner the theoretical writings by various scholars on different literary concepts. These compilations, which call for strenuous work, include Nibandh ane Gujarati nibandh (1976), which deals with the essay form, Tunki varta ane Gujarati Tunki varta (1977), dealing with the short story and Ekanki ane Gujarati ekanki (1980), dealing with the one-act play as developed in the Gujarati language. These compilations can serve as an authentic reference material for students as well as scholars engaged in the study of the development of the various literary genres in Gujarati.

Jayant Kothari, with his originality and subtle sense of judgement as evinced in his critical writing, has earned respect both from the old and young generations of interested readers.

KOTTAMANKALAM SUPPU (Tamil; b. 1910, d. 1974) was a renowned Tamil poet, dramatist, novelist and writer of lyrics, stories and dialogues for films during the post-Independence period. In the beginning of his career Suppu associated himself with the world of drama which facilitated later his entry into the cine-world. His roles as a comedian and afterwards as a story-writer in films like 'Chirikkate', 'Mainar Rajamani', 'Anataippen', 'Tirunilakantar', etc some of which he even directed, led him to his more fruitful association with the famous Gemini Studios in Madras.

His interest in contemporary politics led him to compose songs for the Independence struggle. A song which he composed on the eve of the end of World War II, and which begins with the lines, 'Vettai mutinchu pochchu tambi, Vittukku Vanka.....' had earned him enormous popularity and it was translated into many European languages like German and was sung in the fronts. 'China veti' is another song by Suppu which had gained nationwide popularity by being broadcast on the Republic Day in Delhi in English translation. It is in such patriotic fervour that he composed 'Kantimakan katai' the mode being 'Villuppattu'. He has enriched Tamil folk literature with the following verse narratives: 'Bharatiyar katai', 'Minakshi kalyanam', 'Valli kalyanam', 'Nayanmar varalaru', 'Antal' and 'Swami Vivekanandar'. He has written and acted in hundreds of short plays for All India Radio. He served Ananda vikatan, a popular weekly in Tamil by writing short features like film-reviews, imaginary tete-a-tetes and political tit-bits. It is this association that gave him an impetus to turn to novel-writing in his 48th year and continue to publish his novels through several journals as serials. His first novel Tillana Mohanambal was serialized in Ananda vikatan during 1958. Miss Radha and Rao Bahadur Chinkaram followed it in the same journal. His publication of Katta Bommu katai from old manuscripts in the same journal has been of great help in reconstructing the biography of that great freedom fighter. Ponni vanattuppunikuyil in Kalki and Pantanallur Pama in Tinamani katir are his other novels which appeared as serials. Manchi virattu (collection of short stories), Gandhi tatta kataikal (Stories of Mahatma Gandhi) and Kamba Ramayana chintu (Version of Kamba Ramayanam in 'chintu' form of folk-songs) are some of his other contributions to Tamil literature. His efforts of retelling the greatness of Bhagavad Gita in chintu metre and of writing an autobiography serialised in Pesum patam from 1973 came to an abrupt end owing to his sudden death.

The Government of Tamilnadu honoured him as the best cine-story writer for the film Tillana Mohanambal. The titles 'Kalaimani' by Varakavi Subramani Bharati and 'Kala Chikamani' by Tamilnadu Music Academy in 1968 (March, 22nd) speak for his achievements in the field of arts including drama and literature. The Government of India awarded him in 1971 'Padmashri' title in recognition of his meritorious service.

KOTTARAKKARA TAMPURAN-KOVOOR, E.M.

KOTTARAKKARA TAMPURAN (Malayalam; 17th century) was a poet and playwright. He is supposed to have lived between 1625 and 1675. He belonged to the royal family of Kottarakkara. He is the progenitor of 'ramanattam', the earliest form of 'kathakali'. Kathakali is a kind of dance-drama in which the actors wear crowns and stylized make-up. In giving shape to ramanattam, Kottarakkara Tampuran seems to have borrowed much from 'krishnatam' and Gitagovinda. His works are not known for their literary excellence. But his sense of music is superb. He has used many uncommon ragas in his works. As the creator of a new literary genre, 'attakkatha' (kathakali plays), his place in the history of Malayalam literature is secure.

He wrote eight kathakali plays. They are Putrakameshti, Sitasvayamvaram, Vichchinnabhishekam, Kharavadham, Balivadam, Toranayuddham, Sebubandhanam and Yuddham. The stories are all from the Ramayana and that is why the form of drama evolved by Kottarakkara Tampuran is known as ramanattam.

KOVILAN (Malayalam; b. 1923) is the pen-name of the novelist V.V. Ayyappan. He was born in Vattomparambil as the son of Sanku Velappan. He lost his mother when he was yet a boy. In his early days he had to suffer hardships owing to acute poverty. He passed SSLC examination privately in 1948. Through hard work he attained proficiency in Malayalam. He learnt English and Sanskrit also. In 1948 he joined the Indian Army in the signal corps. He was a radio mechanic for sometime. He worked in Indian Institute of Technology, Kanpur, as an N.C.C. Instructor for one year. He was in the Himalayas for a period of four years, which included the days of the India-China war. In 1963, he joined the Indian Navy, but was discharged in 1964. His experience in the Army is reflected in his writings.

Kovilan is a good novelist and short story writer. His first novel written in 1942, was published in 1948 under the title Takarna hridayangal. The short stories he published in the periodicals caught the attention of critics. His short-story-collections include Orikkal manushyanayirunnu, Oru kashanam asthi, Oru palam manayola and Shakunam. Shakunam won for Kovilan the Kerala Sahitya Academy Award. His short stories are remarkable for their economy of words, laconic style and the penetrating power of appeal to the new sensibility.

Kovilan presented the loneliness and misery of the soldier who found himself rootless in the army. He found the monotony of the daily routine tiring; the shock of sudden military actions only intensified the sense of futility of life. Kovilan was also concerned with squalor and poverty of life in India. Both in his short stories and novels he exploited the stream of consciousness technique.

Kovalin won an award for his novel Tottangal in 1970.

His earlier novels A minus B; Tazhyarakal, Ezhamedangal and Himalayam had already won him a prominent place among the Malayalam novelists. In 1977 Kovilan brought out Bharatan, a powerful mixture of fact and fantasy.

The style of Kovilan is tense; it has verve and vigour. He can depict individuals and huge masses of people. The new sense of alienation and loss of identity characteristic of the moderns was first expressed by Kovilan. His novels have a tragic intensity. A minus B is the story of a soldier whose life turned out to be tragic just because he lacked the one quality that was to ensure his success.

In Ezhamedangal the emphasis is on the misery of the wives of soldiers. Tazhyarakal and Himalayam like A minus B portray army-life. Tottangal and Bharatan are social novels; the former is a social tragedy, bringing out poignantly the tragedy of the Indian mother. Kovilan is not a prolific writer, but he is a seminal fiction-maker.

KOVOOR, E.M. (Malayalam; b. 1906) was born in Kovoov family in Tiruvalla as the son of Matthew Ninan and Mariamma. He had his school education in Tiruvalla. He graduated from the Maharaja's College, Trivandrum. In 1928 he took his law degree. He first practised as a lawyer in Alleppey. In 1938 he was appointed Munsiff and gradually rose to the position of District and Sessions Judge.

Kovoov won distinction as a humorist with his hilarious personal essays. His short stories were noted for their broad comedy and sharp criticism of life. He attempted to bring out the comedy of middle class life in Kerala. He sympathised with the misery of the miserable, laughed at the folly of the people of his class with full understanding. He won an award for a collection of his short stories, Achchingayum Kochuramanum. From short story he turned his attention to the writing of novels. His famous novels include Kadu, Kodumudikal, Malakal and Guhajivikal. He has also travelogues and a few translations of plays to his credit. As a novelist his prime concern was to understand men of his own community, engaged in big business and plantation. The pioneering planters suffered much, but later there emerged from among them big planters. Big business came into power in Kerala. Through the people engaged in business. In Kadu and Malakal he depicts the shady dealings of the rich people, their competitions, their joys and miseries. In his Kodumudikal, his best novel, Kovoov sees life as a whole with its variations and vicissitudes. In Guhajivikal Kovoov depicts Keralites working in the United States. Their life is not pleasant, most of them seem to lead a miserable life like being confined in caves. Kovoov will be remembered for his bold exposure of the weaknesses and strength of the class to which he belongs and also for the broad humour of his novels.

KOVUNNI NEDUNGADI, T.M.-KRALAVARI, MAQBUL SHAH

KOVUNNI NEDUNGADI, T.M (Malayalam; 1830, d. 1889) born at Kodukad in the erstwhile taluk of Valluvanad, learnt Sanskrit and astrology in the traditional way. He worked as a Sanskrit teacher first at Calicut and later as Munshi at Presidency College, Madras, and Maharaja's College, Trivandrum. In 1875 he moved to Alwaye, on being appointed to the post of government pleader there. After about five years he resigned the post. Later, he spent most of his life as a private tutor in a noble family.

Nedungadi's fame rests mainly on his well known Malayalam grammar book Keralakaumudi (1875). His elaborate work is based on Panini's grammar and a few Tamil grammar books which he had studied while at Trivandrum. He had also done a good deal of research to trace the evolution of certain Malayalam verbs. Apart from grammar, Keralakaumudi also explains, in verse, the important metres dealt with in Vrittaratnakaram and the popular Tamil metres. The last part of the book gives an account of some of the important figures of speech.

According to Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, the renowned literary historian, there is also an autobiography to Nedungadi's credit.

P.N.K.

KRAL, SAUCH (Kashmiri). Nothing authentic or definite is known about the date of birth and death, formal education and salient features of the life of Sauch Kral who was, however, a contemporary of Mahmud Gami (d. 1855), and, like Karam Blund, the disciple of Momin of Beabgum, a mystic poet of that period. These facts lead us to say that Kral Sauch has seen the last years of the eighteenth century and the first half of the nineteenth. It was a period of political turmoil in Kashmir, for it saw the end of Afghan rule, the rise and fall of the Sikh rule and the beginning of the Dogra rule. Sauch Kral lived at the village Yandar in Pulwama district.

In those days there was no proper arrangement for formal education for a common man. However, it was not impossible for men of poetic sensibility and communicative nature with mystic aptitude to find mature guides and enough time for apprenticeship. Sauch Kral has surely been such a disciple. His verses show that he was an adept artist and a man of mystic turn. The word 'kral' (potter) which is now a part of his name, reveals beyond any doubt his vocation. He has been buried in his native village Yandar where his grave stands preserved, a proof that people of the locality have respect for him even after his death. The singers and musicians used to sing his poems on occasions and through them his poems kept reaching people for a long time even after his death. But like the poetry of most the other poets, his poetry was not available to them in printed form. The publishers, Ghulam Muhammad-Nur Muhammad of Srinagar, published a selection of his verses in the thirties of the present century. In 1964, the State Cultural Academy published three volumes of Sufi shair, which were edited by Muhammad Amin Kamil. In its first volume appears a selection of eleven poems of the poet.

What distinguishes the poetry of Sauch Kral from that of others is its argumentative power, suggestiveness, galloping metre, crisp language, selection and use of metaphors and similes from his immediate environment never done so well before and above all, its sustaining lyricism. The J. & K. Academy of Art, Culture and Languages had installed a memorial plaque on his grave as a mark of homage. The Academy has also published a considerable compendium of his poems in its recently published work, Sufi Shairi, edited by M.L. Saqi.

KRALAVARI, MAQBUL SHAH (Kashmiri; b. 1820, d. 1876) belonged to an impoverished family. His father, Abdul Quodous was a priest. Maqbul's life was series of misfortunes and sorrows. He was of delicate health and had no son of his own. He adopted a child, namely, Mustufa Shah, who displayed a youthful precocity but died young. A son was born to him only six months before his death. Maqbul is one of the most original poets in Kashmiri. He had no zeal for experimentation and accepted all those forms and genres which had been firmly established by his predecessor, Mahmud Gami. However, the thematic variety in his poetry was unprecedented. His fame rests chiefly on his masnavi Gulrez which he wrote in 1850. The kernel of its story has been borrowed from a less known Persian poet Zia-Nakhshabi. Maqbul's treatment of the story, unfolding of the intricate plot; vivid depiction of the landscape, intermingling of the natural and the supernatural and portrayal of highly romantic and unusual characters with a semblance of truth, have made Gulrez, perhaps, the most admired book of literature in Kashmiri, even though its idiom is predominantly Persianised. Maqbul's second work Grisnama (1852) is a flaying satire on peasantry whose pauperization and moral degeneration in the inhuman feudal system demanded sympathy; but Maqbul, like a sadistic persecutor, takes pleasure in tormenting them with his pernicious satire. Crammed with malicious portraits, Grisnama at several places becomes a lampoon. However, in this masnavi, too, Maqbul's opting for a theme concerning the everyday life is still commendable, because there was no such tradition in Kashmiri poetry. In order to compensate for the injustice and cruelty in his Grisnama, he wrote another satirical masnavi Pirnama in which he attacked 'mullas' for their blind-mouths and merciless exploitation of the ignorant peasants. He wrote a short descriptive poem in the masnavi form which is entitled Baharnama.

KRANTI KALYANA—KRIDABHIRAMAMU

Another of his short masnavis Qissa-ayule Sabir is a didactic narrative without any artistic merit. Besides the masnavis, Maqbul has written a number of short lyrical poems in the traditional strain and a few naats and ghazals. His collected works have been compiled by M.Y. Taing with scholarly diligence and insight and have been published by the J & K Academy of Art, Culture and Languages.

KRANTI KALYANA (Kannada) is a novel by B. Puttaswamiah, which received the Sahitya Akademi Award (1964). This is the sixth novel in a series of historical novels by the author, dealing with the lives of the great Virashaiva saint Basaveshwara (1131-1167) and other Virashaiva saints and reformers. This novel deals with the events of the period 1150-1167. The novel depicts the many-sided struggle of the Shivasharanas under the leadership of Basavanna; they fight against caste, against social inequality, and against the old and rotting order represented by the king Bijjala. Another value also is suggested—the value of republicanism against monarchy. The principle of Kayaka (honest labour to sustain oneself and one's family, undertaken in a spirit of total surrender to Shiva) is glorified. The novel depicts the heroic struggle of the Shivasharanas in degenerate times; although they may be defeated for the time being, the values for which they lived and died are deathless.

KRIDABHIRAMAMU (Telugu) is a 'veedhi' which is one of the ten varieties of drama according to Telugu dramaturgy. A veedhi consists of one 'ankamu' or act, and there is only one hero. Sometimes there may be one or two more characters. Shringara is the chief rasa. There is also a little play of other emotions. Kridabhiramamu is a veedhi rupakamu.

There are some who believe that Kridabhiramamu was written by Vallabharaya (15th century) while some others hold that Srinatha is its author. Judged from the mastery of language, style and diction it appears that it was written by Srinatha. Be that as it may, it reflects the contemporary Telugu society. Its plot is simply this: Govinda Manchana Sarma is a native of Orugallu. For sometime he has been abroad on business, but now he returns home. He goes round the city in the company of his friend Tittibha Setti to visit the famous sights in the city. Afterwards they reach the house of a prostitute by name Kama Manjari where their peripatetic amusements end, and the real amusements of love begin.

Even at the outset the poet gives us an unmistakable sketch of a paramour in those days. He is represented as wearing a pleated dhoti, with 'pundraka' marks on their forehead drawn with the silt of the Ganges, and an upper cloth with gold-laced border thrown across their left shoulder and to top it all a silk sacred thread.

Then there is a detailed description of the women who belong to the lower classes of women and the localities they live in, their dress and their varieties of speech. He gives a list of them: Medara women (weavers of bamboo screens, baskets, etc.), Chandalangana (the untouchable women), Karnata women, Pamara women, Telika joli (women who sell oil), Kaputalu (the women working in the fields), Jakkula purandhri, Goraga paduchu, Pushpa lavika, prostitute, Thammati sani and many other classes. The word pictures are so detailed that a painter could well paint them on a screen. Some of the descriptions are true even today. For example, the Pamara women are seen even today making cow-dung cakes in front of their houses.

In those days a particular fair called 'maila santha' was held. Things like 'susara bethu' were sold in ivory caskets. People were engaged in gambling in the open streets and the sight attracted crowds. The tailors lived in a locality called Mohari wada. They teased the prostitutes who gave them cloth for stitching petticoats, by making them visit their shops again and again.

The main street was crowded with the traffic—moving elephants, horses, carts, and the guards. A clock was installed on the front of the King's palace. The couplets of the heroes of Palnad were sung in the streets, and the audience mimed to the song. It appears that statues of Brahmanayudu, and Balachandrudu were installed in the temples of Shiva. We are also told that the shrine of Eka Veekadevi havins sang the tales of Parashurama to the accompaniment of a musical instrument called 'pamba'.

There was a belief that childless couples would be blessed with children if the grace of the Goddess Kameshwari was secured. Accordingly, Jakkula women were engaged to sing praise of the goddess to the houses of childless couples. The maitara men exhibited their religious fervour by performing deeds of courage or daring, like walking on the heaps of live coals, or piercing their bodies with sharp-pointed rods. On Saturday—which is dedicated to Shiva—the city was splendid with decorations. In the areas assigned to the prostitutes, the house-fronts were sprinkled with water mixed with sandal paste, and decorated with patterns drawn with a dust brought from Kashmir; and festoons of lotus flowers were hung across the thresholds. Incidentally, the fact also indicates that the prostitutes as a class were generally prosperous; and a glimpse into their love of art and the appropriateness of their choice of gods and goddesses whose patronage they sought is gained from the pictures with which they decorated the house with pictures showing Daruka, Saraswati, Chaturmukha, Gopikas with Krishna, Ahalya and Devendra, Tara and Chandra, Satyawati and Parashara, Menaka and Vishwamitra, and Rati and Manmatha—all symbolically suggesting and even justifying their lives by pointing to the legends of Gods' and Goddesses.

When two people met each other in the morning they greeted each other saying 'suprabhatam'—(the equivalent of good-morning at present). When young boys met their elders they (the boys) touched their ears with their hands with pieces of 'darbha' held in them. Then they said their names, their 'gotram' (i.e., the name of their ancestor), before offering their salutations. Those who were childless used to hold a 'kolupu' (i.e., service or a form of worship), called 'akkala kolupu'.

The inns or boarding houses were very popular resorts. Food was cheap; a fairly satisfactory meal, with puddings made from wheat flour and well-flavoured with spices cost no more than a rupee. Sugar, fresh ghee from cow's milk, greengram cooked into paste, four or five chutneys, thick curds—all these were invariable items of the meal that made the mouth water. Redgram does not seem much in use in those days.

Widows used to sing a version of the Ramayana known as Viddi kanchi ramayana in a melodious voice. There was a practice called 'mukura diksha' which preceded the first night spent by a prostitute with her paramour. The diksha was performed by the woman's father by chanting 'Sribandhaswamu'. Fairs and jataras were fairly common, as evident from the description of the 'Tirunalla' at Srikakulam. Profligacy was quite common at such fairs.

Cock-fighting, ram-fighting, snake-charming were their popular entertainments in the evenings. In addition, young women performed a dance called 'Pushpa gandhi' dance in the town-halls or in the gardens. Young girls used to play with balls.

Love was sold and bought on a liberal scale. But though a trade it was subject to certain rules, and limited to certain times. If any person was cheated in this love-trade, he or she could complain to an authority constituted for the purpose, and the one found guilty was punished. People strongly believed in omens.

Thus a vivid reflection of the life of the contemporary Telugus is found in Kridabhiramamu. This work is based on the Premabhiramamu written by Ravipati Tripuranthakudu in Sanskrit. Kridabhiramamu holds up the mirror to the life of the Telugus of the fifteenth century.

KRIPALANI, KRISHNA R. (English; b. 1907) educated at Karachi, graduated in 1928, and was called to the Bar from Lincoln's Inn in London in 1931. He practised law at Karachi, but soon was attracted to Mahatma Gandhi's Civil Disobedience Movement and was jailed in 1931. He joined Rabindranath Tagore's Visva Bharati in 1933 and worked there for thirteen years (1933-46). Later he became director of the Tagore Museum and also edited Visva Bharati Quarterly. In 1946, he joined the All India Congress Committee Secretariat at Allahabad and visited several countries. He worked as Secretary of the Sahitya Akademi (1954-71).

Krishna Kripalani is known primarily as a very sensitive interpreter of the life achievement of Rabindranath Tagore. His biographical work Rabindranath Tagore: A Biography (1962) is regarded as one of the finest biographies of the great poet because it is the product of a kindred spirit, marked by intensity of devotion, deep understanding and objectivity. Along with the work of B.G. Chakravorti (Rabindranath Tagore: His Mind and Art, 1971), Niharranjan Ray (An Artist in Life: A Commentary on the Life and Works of Rabindranath Tagore, 1967), Marjorie Sykes (Rabindranath Tagore, 1943), Edward Thompson (Rabindranath Tagore, 1926), Krishna Kripalani's excellent biography is rated as one of the classics in this area. His intimate association with Tagore and his awareness of the time spirit, covering the whole Gandhian Era, the Nehru Era and the later phase make him a unique biographer, who can synthesize the personal with the impersonal in projecting his vision of the man and his achievement. He had earlier translated Tagore's poems in a project jointly undertaken by himself and Amiya Chakravorty, Nirmalachandra Chattopadhyaya and Pulinbihari Sen (Poems, 1943). He had also translated Tagore's work, Two Sisters (1944), The Garden (1956), and Binodini (1956). In this context, Farewell My Friend (1956) is deeply moving.

Krishna Kripalani's deep devotion to Tagore is only one facet of his involvement with the nineteenth and early twentieth century Indian Renaissance. His works, Tagore, Gandhi and Nehru (1945) and Modern India: Rammohan Roy to Rabindranath Tagore (1965) amply demonstrate this deep concern. Krishna Kripalani has also written an excellent appreciative study of Mahatma Gandhi, Gandhi: His Life and Thought (1970), which reflects the same concern with the Indian Renaissance, and deep involvement with Indian nationalism. Krishna Kripalani's comprehensive approach to literature is reflected in his Modern Indian Literature: A Panoramic Glimpse (Bombay, 1968).

Krishna Kripalani was till recently Chairman of the National Book Trust, New Delhi.

KRISHAN CHANDER (Urdu; 1914-1977) was one of the front ranking short story writers and novelists of Urdu. Perhaps no other contemporary short story writer in Urdu had a larger readership. The typical features of his stories are fundamental humanism and abounding wit as well as charm of style and suppressed poetry.

Krishan Chander spent the greater part of his early life in Kashmir, where the beauty of nature left a permanent mark on his aesthetic sensibility. He was educated at Forman Christian College, Lahore, where he completed his master's degree in English. For a number of years he wrote for the Ambala Tribune, and the weekly Northern Review, and then became attached to All India Radio. But, dissatisfied with the government service, he moved to Bombay, where he continued to write for the movies till his death.

A prolific writer, he produced well over eighty volumes, which include more than thirty collections of short stories and more than twenty novels. The themes of his work are as varied as they can be—romantic, social, psychological, political, national, international. In fact, he wrote about the whole gamut of contemporary problems and human relationships. He was influenced by Marxism and wrote with a purpose, sometimes too obviously so. Art with him was a criticism of life and a vehicle for social uplift. Most of his work is spirited, with a tendency toward romanticizing and formlessness. His readers were pleased with his racy idealism, sentimentalism and sincere exhortation. His stories usually have a foundation in fact and, in addition, his choice of realistic detail within loosely spun plots gives his work an air of verisimilitude. He is significant for his combination of story-telling, idealistic approach and a personal, happy tone. The tone reflects his own kindness and good humour. He can be called a 'charmer'. Like some, he is not severe or objective, but tender and sympathetic towards the misfortunes of humble people. What he lacks in technique and form, he makes up by his humanism and style. His style is at once spontaneous, charged, swift and sweeping, and often approaches the qualities of poetry in prose.

Perhaps because of his early experiences in Kashmir, perhaps because of his sympathetic treatment of people, in his early stories Krishan Chander displays a remarkable ability to deepen the effect of his portrayals of oppressed people by setting them within a context of exceptional natural beauty. A superb painter of scene, from his very first collection, Tilism-e-khayal (The magic of thought), he was unequalled in Urdu for his ability to contrast effectively and painfully human cruelty with the lush scenery of the mountains, rivers, lakes, fields and villages of Kashmir. As might be expected, in some of these stories he depicted the natural scene at such length that he seems to have forsaken the progressive principle and avoided the harsh realities of life by taking refuge in nature.

Almost as an antidote to the kind of romantic excess into which his depiction of nature led him, Krishan Chander adopted a satirical tone in some of his stories.

Among stories of this kind are Galicha (Carpet), Mahalakshmi ka pul (The bridge of Mahalakshmi), Kalu bhangi (Kalu, the sweeper), Brahmaputra (Brahmaputra) and Anndata (Food giver). Anndata, specially, a story of the Bengal famine told in three parts from three different points of view, was extremely influential because of the sharpness of its satire, the intensity of its feeling and the boldness of its theme.

Because he had been such a prodigious writer, Krishan Chander was able not only to vary the kinds of stories he wrote but also to make innumerable innovations in the narrative technique of his stories. Of his earlier stories, Garjan ki ek sham (A garjan evening), Balkoni (Balcony) and Zindagi ke mor par (At the turning point of life) are notable for their technical experiments, while with Do farlang lambi sarak, (A road a quarter mile long) he introduced into Urdu the vignette story in which a series of seemingly unconnected incidents taken together produce a total effect.

In contrast to both Manto and Bedi, in addition to his short stories, Krishan Chander wrote more than twenty novels, the most important of which are Shikast (Defeat) and Jab khet jag (When the fields awoke). Dealing with the failure of love in a class and status conscious society, Shikast expounds its theme through two parallel love affairs, that of Vanti, the daughter of a woman of doubtful reputation, and Shyam, a college student with revolutionary ideas, and that of the half-brahmin, half-chamar Chandra and Mohan Singh, a Rajput youth. Although marred by Shyam's excessively long speeches, in which the author's voice is clearly discernible, this novel amply demonstrates not only Krishan's charming writing style but also his ability to portray the deleterious effects on human freedom of both poverty and the restraints imposed by the caste system.

Written immediately after independence, Jab khet jag deals with the problems of the Telengana peasants and especially with their attempts to retain land given them as a result of reforms in the land tenure system. The novel focusses on the twenty-two year old peasant leader, Raghu Rao, who is about to be hanged as the novel opens. Depicting Raghu Rao's memories during his last night in prison, the novel provides a moving portrayal of the economic difficulties of the peasants, of Raghu Rao's fleeting love affair with a tribal woman, of his various activities within the peasants' movement and the confrontation with the government that led to the sentence of execution. Although the novel is a little flawed, both in its plot and its development of theme, nevertheless it accurately reflects his socialist convictions and is considered by many his best novel.

Besides the kinds of themes that Krishan Chander treated, what accounted most for his general popularity was the unequalled charm of his writing style.

However, his later writing was marred by excessive oratory. Too often, in these later works, characters are forced to give long didactic speeches on revolution and equality. Despite these defects, however, and the general decline in his writing in later years, for his vast and varied corpus alone, as well as for the number of excellent works he added to Urdu, Krishan Chander's contribution to the development of Urdu fiction has been decisive and significant in many ways. Other important works of Krishan Chander are:

Nazzare, Lahore 1940; Purane Khuda, Lahore, 1944; Ham vahshi hain, Bombay, 1947; Ek girja ek khandaq, Bombay, 1948; Ajanta se aage, Bombay 1948; Toofan ki kaliyan, Delhi, 1954; Kitab ka kafan, Delhi, 1956; Ek gaddhe ki sarguzasht, Delhi, 1957; Meri yadon ke chinar, Delhi, 1962; Dadar pal ke daache, Delhi, 1965; Dil kisi ka dost nahin, Delhi, 1966

Krishan Chander has been widely translated into many Indian and foreign languages. Some of the well-known English translations are: I Cannot Die, tr. of the novel, Anndata, by Khwaja Ahmad Abbas, Poona, 1945; Flame and Flower, fifteen short stories tr. by the author, Bombay 1951; Virgin and the Well, eight short stories tr. by the author, Dehra Dun, 1968; Seven Faces of London, novel tr. by L. KRISHIVALUDU (Telugu) is a long poem by Durvasi Rami Reddy. It is described by an eminent educationist and literary critic, C.R. Reddy, as 'the first work in Telugu which chose the life of farmers as the main theme'. The poet himself belonged to the farmer community and was full of sympathy and admiration for the lives of farmers in villages. One of the hopeful developments in modern Telugu poetry is this shift from traditional subjects approved by the pandits through the authority of their use in epics already written. The heroes approved were kings and high personages, whose fortunes and misfortunes affect the human race. But as with the romantic poets of England like Wordsworth, a tendency of preferring the lives of common people—farmers, shepherds and the rural folk—became prominent in Telugu also. A little while earlier, Rayaprolu Subba Rao had published Trinakankanamu in which he celebrated the love of two common rural young couple, which was above physical passion. About the same time, Abburi Ramakrishna Rao published his Kapupata, which also could be considered as a harbinger of the new epic in Telugu.

In Krishivaludu, (1919) Rami Reddy chooses to describe the life of farmers on a day from dawn to dusk. The long poem commences with the evocation of the common scene of villages at dawn. The women folk rise before all others, especially the daughters-in-law of the household. Their day starts with the performance of daily chores like sweeping the floor. The poet in this context also extols the dignity of labour. He then advises the men, still a little sleepy, to wake up and attend to their duties like milking the cattle, fetching water from the village pond and getting ready to leave for work on the farm. They gulp their cold breakfast and carry with them food for the midday in a 'chikkam' (a bag made of thin ropes). The poet utilises the occasion of dawn to give us memorable descriptions of the scenes of morning in the villages, at once realistic and imaginative. He compares the soaring birds to the kids hurrying towards the lady of the house, as she puts down a basket of fine cobs of corn. The jingling sound of the anklets of the women on their way to the village pond for water is compared to the lisping sounds of children. The poet also describes the fragrance of the newly blossoming chrysanthemums and the land filled with flowers of resplendent colours which look like a carpet of diamonds; the whole scene is like a celestial picture drawn by a heavenly painter. The daughters of the house sprinkle saffron on rounds of cowdung ('gobbi'). The tender spider's web dew-covered on grass dazzling under the sun is like a wreath of pearls. The poet depicts the strenuous life of women all through the year and of men on the farm under the scorching sun. The women are presented as paragons of virtue and selflessness and the farmer's house a place of traditional hospitality. The poet exhibits an overdose of enthusiasm for rural life in praising every aspect of that life and turning away totally from urban life. The poet presents the playful young girls teasing the passersby, the village lads having a ride on the buffaloes and the other children laughing their hearts off, a pathetic beggar woman, the non availability of essential commodities in villages during summer and the depths of debt into which the farmers sink for paying taxes, for the maintenance of family, for festivals, etc. Rami Reddy skilfully blends the description of the human scene with the change of seasons. He describes the heat of summer and the cheerful rains about to descend on the earth. The water-bearing clouds are to the rural woman gods incarnate; the rainbow is the wreath of pearls adorning the palace of the goddess of rains. At last, in the evening after a strenuous day in the fields for the men and tiresome work at home and long wait for their men, the men return home to receive the affection of a warm bath. The poet ends his poem with the men and women retiring to sleep at the end of the day.

The long poem is for the most part realistic in the evocation of the daily routine of the farmers, both men and women, but is elevated occasionally by rich descriptions of nature; this dimension of Rami Reddy's poetry invests his work with a touch of alchemy, not mere photographic realism.

The long poem was reprinted several times by Kavikokila Grantha Mala, Pemmarreddy Palem, Nellore District.

KRISHNACHARITRA (Bengali) is a work by Bankimchandra Chatterjee. Bankimchandra was a great intellectual product of his age. The political, social and religious conditions of the then Bengal drew his attention. In his novels the idea found expressions in terms of stories and episodes and in his essays the same idea was expressed in a passionate prose embellished with facts, reason and apt examples.

Towards the close of his literary activities from 1882 Bankim's mind came down from the realm of romanticism to the stern reality of the earth, stricken with multifarious problems, particularly with the problems of religion. From the very dawn of the 19th century Hinduism was a subject of bitter criticism as a source of superstition, and idolatry in the pages of Samachar darpan of the Christian missionaries. With the rise of Young Bengal and the rise and spread of Brahmoism it almost reached a climax in the duel between Christian monotheism and Hinduism. Reason and faith were in continuous conflict. Non-dual Vedanta fought against the dualism of the puranas. The dispute did not escape the notice of young Bankim, who was imbued with western education. During Bankim's age of maturity developed the movement of Hindu revivalism with Shashadhar Tarkachuramani and Chandranath Basu as leaders. They tried to explain every superstitious belief of the Hindus in the light of science, but this could not satisfy the rational religious hunger of Bankimchandra. As a student of Comte, Mill and Herbert Spencer Bankimchandra was thinking of a new religion based on humanitarian and utilitarian ideal. Meanwhile a controversy broke out on the pages of The Statesman in 1882 centering round a Shradha Ceremony in Sovabazar between Hastie, the principal of the General Assembly Institution and Bankimchandra under the pseudonym of Ramachandra. Perhaps this controversy inspired him to propound the essence of Hindu religion. The result was the publication of the first part of Krishnacharitra in 1886, Krishnacharitra was an illustration of his Dharmatattwa-anushian which was published later in book form in 1888.

The full fledged Krishnacharitra is divided into seven parts: 'Upakramanika', 'Vrindaban', 'Mathuradwarka', 'Indraprastha', 'Upaplabya', 'Kurukshetra' and 'Prabhas'.

The parts combined cover the entire life and activities of Krishna. In the eyes of the orthodox Hindus Krishna is the supreme God. Though an avatara, Bankim mainly painted him as a perfect man. His life had been full of many supernatural and unnatural events and traits as found in the Mahabharata, the Harivamsha and the puranas. It was a very bold step that he, with a scientific and rationalistic out-look, wiped out those unbelievable elements and added a reasonable explanation to establish the real fact. According to Bankim, Krishna is an ideal man about whom one can say, "Ecce Homo", look at the man.

Bankim agrees with the Comtian theory that the substance of religion is culture. But his idea of culture differs in many respects from that of Comte. Comte's positive philosophy recommends no God. Bankim believes in God. To Bankim incarnation of God is a perfect man, who is a grand synthesis of all the noble 'vrittis' or faculties. He enumerates these vrittis mainly in two categories, 'shaririki' (physical) and 'manasiki' (mental). The mental faculties are again three in number- 'jnanaranjani' (intellectual), 'karyakarini' (active) and 'chittaranjani' (aesthetic). Culture means a proper cultivation and assimilation of these faculties, which prepares a perfect man, who may also be called a superman. Krishna is the most perfect sum-total of such a culture. So he is the best, wisest and noblest of all.

KRISHNADEVARAYA (Telugu) is undoubtedly the greatest of the Vijayanagara Emperors. He is equally famous as a poet and patron of letters. He wrote many poems in Sanskrit, viz., Madalasa charitam, Satyavadhuprinanam, Sakala katha sara sangraham, Gnana chintamani, Rasamanjari, etc. But of these Jambavatiparinayam alone has been recently published. The only Telugu poem he wrote is Amuktamalyada which is otherwise called Vishnuchittiyamu and which is considered one of the best prabandhas in Telugu.

Krishnadevaraya is the son of Narasanayaka and Nagamba. Narasanayaka was the commander-in-chief of Salva Narasingaraya after whose death Narasanayaka made his son the king. We do not know whether he was a kshatriya or not by caste. But Allasani Peddana while writing the geneology of Krishnadevaraya traced it from Turvasu the son of Yayati and called it the Tuluva dynasty. There is difference of opinion regarding the birth date of Krishnadevaraya. Some are of the opinion that he was born in 1465 while some hold that he was born in 1487. Narasanayaka had three wives, and Vira Narasimharaya the son of Obamamba ruled for a short time till 1509. Afterwards Krishnadevaraya became the emperor and ruled from 1509 to till his death in 1530.

KRISHNA MENON, T.K.—KRISHNA PAKSHAM

It is well known that Krishnadevaraya had two wives, Chinnadevi and Tirumaladevi, but there is historical evidence to say that he had a third wife by name Thukka Devi, who is called by some as Lakshmi Devi and as Jaganmohini by some others. Chaganti Seshayya is of the opinion that he had a fourth wife by name Annapurna Devi.

The empire was surrounded by many enemies when Krishnadevaraya occupied the throne, but with the help of Timmarusu he defeated all the them and extended the empire.

The court of Krishnadevaraya is called 'Bhuvana-vijaya' which was decorated by the famous eight poets who are generally called the 'Ashtadiggajas'. There is difference of opinion amongst the critics regarding the point who these Ashtadiggajas were. Manucharitra of Peddana and Parijatapaharana of Timmana are dedicated to Krishnadevaraya himself and this dedication ceremony might have taken place during 1516 and 1517.

Krishnadevaraya wrote in detail in the introductory portion of Amuktamalyada the circumstances in which he wrote that work. When he went to Srikakulam to pay his devotional tributes to God Andhravishnu, that God appeared to him in his dream and mentioning all the works that he had written in Sanskrit requested him to write a poem in Telugu also. He indicated the theme also to him saying "Hear, the theme which you have to describe in your work, should be the story of my marriage with the girl who offered me the garland first worn by her at Srirangam. I received a garland of flowers from a man during the incarnation of Krishna and I am ashamed of it. Please make good the disgrace by narrating my story wherein I have a received a garland worn by my beloved". This girl is Godadevi who is otherwise called Amuktamalyada. In this context alone God told him the reason why he asked him to write a poem in Telugu: "You may ask me why I have asked you to write in Telugu. The country is Telugu country. I am the God living in the Telugu country and Telugu is as sweet as sugar-candy. Don't you remember that you told before all the vassal kings that Telugu was the best amongst the vernaculars?" Krishnadevaraya woke up in the morning invited all the scholars and poets of his court and narrated the story of the dream and sought their advice in the matter. They explained the good effects of the dream, described his geneology and encouraged him to write the poem praising his poetic talents. Krishnadevaraya was delighted and began to write the poem Amuktamalyada.

The age of Krishnadevaraya is rightly called the golden age of Telugu literature. He not only patronised many poets and encouraged them to write prabandhas which are ornaments to Telugu literature but also personally wrote many words in both Sanskrit and Telugu. He is called 'Andhrā Bhoja' which means that he patronised Telugu as much as Bhoja patronized Sanskrit.

KRISHNA MENON, T.K. (Malayalam; b. 1869, d.1949) belonged to a distinguished matrilineal Nayar family. Son of Nandikkara Chathu Panikkar, he was tutored in Sanskrit by various scholars and had his higher education at Ernakulam, Calicut and Madras. He graduated in 1894. Though he completed the B.L. course, he could not take the degree. However, he was allowed to practise at the bar and did practise, for a while, at some district courts.

His works include Prachina aryavartam (Ancient India), Indyayile mahanmar (The great men of India), Grama pravesika, Chandrasahana, Sarojanalino, Bharatiya vanitadarsham, some Science Primer Series, Books for Bairns Series (all these are translations), Dravidian Culture and its diffusion (English), The Days that Were—Memoirs (English) Gita mahatmyam (The greatness of the Gita), Ente tirthayatra (My pilgrimage) Hindumatam ennalentu ? (What is Hinduism) Bhasha kavva pravesikha (A primer on Malayalam poetry) and Lekhanamala (Collection of essays). The Days that Were is an autobiography of rare value reflecting the cultural life of Central Kerala (1880-1945).

He was a member of a number of literary and other societies such as Bhasha Poshini Sabha, Cochin Sahitya Samajam, Kerala Sahitya Parishat, etc. and founder member of Rama Varma Research Institute, Ernakulam Literary union, etc.

The Maharaja of Cochin honoured him by conferring the title 'Sahityakushala' on him

Krishna menon was seriously interested in the uplift of the backward communities and Pandit K.P. Karuppan, one of the champions of their cause, was a friend of his. He was generally regarded as the first citizen of Cochin and the rulers and dewans often sought his advice.

His wife, T.C. Kalyani Amma, was also a well-known writer in Malayalam. The large collection of his books donated to the Trichur Museum and now kept in Kerala Sahitya Akademi Buildings for the use of scholars and researchers is known as Krishna-Kalyani Library.

KRISHNA PAKSHAM (Telugu) a collection of lyrics by Devulapalli Krishna Sastri, was first published in 1925 with a beautiful introduction by Sivasankara Sastry who was an eminent writer of modern poetry. The title means the dark phase of the moon and suits the mood of melancholy which looms large over the poet's mind. The volume was dedicated to the Raja of Pithapuram who was the royal patron of their gifted family.

Krishna paksham marked the triumph of romantic poetry in Telugu literature because of freshness of content and innovation in expression. It contains an inspired tribute to Gurajada Apparao as the herald of modern spirit embodied in the folk-metre perfected by him and christened 'mutyala saram' (garland of pearls). There are seven poems which delineate the personalities and which glorify the literary achievement of his uncle and father who distinguished themselves as scholars and poets of high calibre and who exerted a strong influence upon the poet's sensibility. In the remaining fifty and odd pieces the poet expressed the romantic agony with intensity as well as delicacy. Some poems brim over with tears welling up from a bereaved heart. The rose nurtured with his life-blood was plucked, torn and scattered in the dust. In the dense clouds of despair he could find no flash of joy or ray of hope. In some pieces we hear the deep sighs of the poet's heart yearning for freedom and chafing under the yoke in an unfriendly world. The poet felt despondent like a helpless bird whose wings were clipped and whose spirit fretfully longed for flights across the boundless blue. He denounced the cruelty of the world which callously trampled upon his creative spirit. He sought to be left alone to weep out alone in the dark without hindrance. He pictured himself as the embodied spirit of sorrow wearing a crown of thorns in the desolate hall of sorrow. His preoccupation with sorrow was misunderstood and caricatured by critics who failed to grasp its source and purpose. Krishna Sastry regarded sorrow as a baptism of tears to wash away all taint and render it worthy of acceptance by the divine. He was inspired by the saying "Give me the bread of affliction and wine of tears". He held that sorrow chastens and sanctifies the human spirit. In one lyric he describes the tear-drops of the penitent sinner as pearls in the Lord's necklace.

Freedom is the life breath of the romantic poets. "A Robin Red-breast in a cage. Puts all Heaven in a rage". The creative spirit revolted against all constraints imposed by the world. One lyric blows the trumpet of freedom wherein the poet claims kinship with the unfettered wind, with the eagle circling in the air and the blue cloud floating in the sky.

Krishna paksham is a typical specimen of romantic poetry which is a ceaseless quest for something unattainable. Beauty, love and freedom beckon the poet from afar and he is ever restless groping to realise those tantalising values in this humdrum world. The poem entitled 'Anveshana' (Quest) gives poignant expression to the love-lorn Radha's pining for a vision of Krishna. The treatment of love is exalted, avoiding the conventional description of the human form in an excitingly sensual and erotic style. A rare delicacy and suggestiveness lend an air of freshness to the poem dealing with love and pangs of separation.

Nature provides an inspiring theme because the poet comes out of the rut of stereotyped convention and looks at beauties from his own angle. He craves for identification with the leaves, the flowers, the creepers, the flowing streams and the floating clouds, becoming a part of the cosmic consciousness dancing in rhythmic measures.

From intensive subjectivity the poet shifts to a mood of surrender and supplication to God who is the supreme embodiment of love. This spirit of devotion enables the poet to grapple with giant despair in the slough of despondence. Towards the conclusion of the volume, we find lyrics where the ray of hope gleams.

Even in form Krishna paksham is full of innovations like stopping in the middle of the line in tune with the flow of thought, avoiding disgusting space-fillers, etc. Krishna Sastry, being a consummate artist, always hits upon the right word and apt phrase, his metres are always in perfect consonance with the nuances of his feelings and emotion. Krishna paksham has had far-reaching and profound influence on the development of Telugu poetry from 1925 to 1945 until progressive poets revolted against the romantic school.

KRISHNA PILLAI (Tamil; b. 1827, d. 1900) with the full name Henry Alfred Krishna Pillai was the son of a Tamil scholar, who along with his wife Deivanayakiammal had specialised in Kamba Ramayanam. He studied under Tirupakadanthan Kavirayar in the old gurukula style and improved his Tamil learning. In 1852 he was appointed teacher in the Mission School at Sawyerpuram. On coming to know that his younger brother and two of his friends became Christians he gave up his job and proceeded to Madras from Palayamkottai. At the instance of Percival, superintendent of Tamil Studies, he worked as Tamil Pandit, Presidency College. He also did journalistic work for the Dinavartamani, a Tamil daily, like his great contemporary C.W. Damodaram Pillai. He became a Christian. His conversion caused sorrow to his wife and mother who however reconciled themselves and joined his faith later. Returning to his native district, he took up Tamil teaching at Sawyerpuram. He remained there for about 17 years and became the the Head Tamil Pandit of C.M. College, Tirunelveli and later of Maharaja College, Trivandrum. While at Trivandrum he gained the friendship and admiration of Sundaram Pillai, a distinguished poet and author of Manonmaniyam. He returned to Palayamkotti as the Literary Advisor to Christian Literary Society, Madras. He was known and recognised for his poetical works which constitute works on the contribution of Christianity to Tamil literature. Rakshanya yatrikam is his masterpiece. An epic poem of 4000 stanzas in 5 books and 47 chapters; it is interspersed with songs and hymns which he calls 'devaram'. The work is based on John Bunyan's Pilgrims Progress and on the whole deals with Christian theology, morality and salvation. There is an entire chapter of five hundred verses on the life of Jesus Christ narrated in a string of magnificent verses. He shows all the ardour and zeal of a new convert. The chief merit of the work is its poetry, excellent and easy poetic diction, the beauty and simplicity of which can be enjoyed by all lovers of Tamil. With propriety he is called Christian Kamban in the sense that he deliberately modelled his poetic diction and style, as he himself affirms in his preface, on Kamban's Ramayana. He attained considerable measure of success and this is no mean achievement. He has written several hymns and songs, having high literary and musical qualities. His Rakshanya manoharam published in 1899 contains very fine lyrics in praise of Jesus Christ. Most of them are written in the exact manner and style of devaram. In Rakshanya kural he renders Christian religious tenets and biblical sayings in the form of kural couplets. Following the manner of presentation in Shivagnana siddhar, Krishna Pillai has composed a work entitled Rakshanya smayanirnayam. Unlike Siddhar this is in prose. In keeping with the matter the style is elevated and the text contains a copious admixture of Sanskrit words.

KRISHNA PILLAI, CHANGAMPUZHA (Malayalam; b. 1911, d. 1948) is an efflorescence of phenomenal significance in modern Malayalam poetry; he is the romanticist par excellence. He is the bard of youthful love and he sings fervently of its ecstasy and agony in an exquisitely mellifluous style. His master-piece is 'Ramanan', which unfolds with sentimental exuberance the ill-fated and tragic love of his friend and fellow poet, Edappally Raghavan Pillai, who took his own life as he was jilted by a faithless enchantress. A sense of inexplicable melancholy pervades all that he wrote, a characteristic inhibition of the true romantic.

Krishna Pillai was born in Edappally in Ernakulam District. He started writing poems when he was hardly nine years old. The shaping influence on his muse was western poetry which he got familiar with while studying for the Honours degree in Malayalam at the Arts College, Trivandrum. Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Browning and Whitman seem to have fascinated him.

Changampuzha is basically a man of feeling. About what he deeply felt, he sang with abandon and gusto. The egotistical element is predominant in his poetry. His main concern is to unfold a felt emotion exclusively from the personal angle. His dominant theme is romantic love, of an impassioned kind, as in 'Ramanan' 'Aradhakan' or 'Tilottama'. Sporadically he gave vent to revolutionary fervour and concern for the under-dog, as in pieces like 'Padunna pishachu' or the magnificent narrative lyric 'Vazhakkula'. 'Mohini' is a treatment of morbid love. It sends us echoes of Browning's 'Porphyria's Lover'. Changampuzha translated 'The Last Ride Together' also. More significant is that he acclimatised, through his narrative lyrics, Browning's dramatic monologue in the language with suitable modifications. Another interesting piece is 'Sudhangada', a splendid indigenisation of Tennyson's Aenone. A free rendering of Solomon's Song of Songs is Divya gitam. Jayadeva's Gitagovinda is entitled Devagita in his translation. 'Madirolsavam' is written in imitation of Rubiyat. 'Yavanika' is based on Tagore's story 'Victory'. Changampuzha is the finest lyricist in the language. His lyrics are perfect in form, controlled in thought and mellifluous in style. To his credit are 500 and odd lyrics and short poems.

Changampuzha's output is considerable. During the span of 17 years, he indited forty thousand lines, published in 44 collections. Most of these express romantic sentiments. Hence the bane of repetition became inevitable. Occasionally he touched on socio-economic problems when the mood took hold. However, he is incapable of a consistent point of view, and the substratum of thought in his works is chaotic. The mood and the moment dominated. His utterances are sincere though valid only for the given moment.

The attempt to incorporate the intrinsic grace of pure vernacular diction, free of the influence of Sanskrit, started with Cherusseri. It gained momentum in the erotic verse of the Venmani School, And Vallattol lent dignity and grandeur to it. It was Changampuzha who brought it closest to popular song. Admirers rightly hail him as 'Ganagandharva', the Seraphic Lord of Song.

KRISHNA PILLAI, E.V. (Malayalam; b. 1894, d. 1938) was a celebrated Malayalam humorist, essayist and dramatist. He took his B.A. Degree and became a clerk in the erstwhile Travancore Secretariat, and subsequently became a Tahsildar. Later he resigned that job, did B.L. Degree course and was called to the Bar. He set up practice in Quilon. He also became the editor of Malayala manorama; by then he had established his reputation as a writer, journalist and lawyer. During the last years of his life he entered politics, as a staunch Gandhian and Congressman. In 1931 he got elected to the Srimulam Prajasabha (The Lower House of the erstwhile Travancore State Legislature) from the Kunnathur constituency. He shifted his practice to Trivandrum in 1933 and got elected to the legislature again from Pathanamthitta. He did not contest the election in 1937 but supported the candidature of T.M. Varghese. He worked as a legislator for six years during which he earned for himself unrivalled reputation as an effective parliamentarian. He took ill in Trivandrum and died. There E.V., as he was popularly known, wrote under his name and used pen names like Triloka sanchari, Netrarogi and Divijendranatha Tagore.

He had also written hundreds of journalistic pieces unsigned and there are hints in his autobiography that he had even written books for others.

E.V. was a prolific writer, and the variety and extent of his literary output are amazing. All his best works were written during a period of twenty years between his graduation and death at the age of 44. Universally acclaimed as the best humorist since Kunchan Nambiar, E.V. was a versatile genius; humour is only one of the aspects, perhaps the best, of his multi-faceted personality. About 35 of his works appeared during his life time, but only half a dozen of them, including his autobiography and collections of humorous essays, got reprinted during the last quarter of a century. Several of his stories, articles, skits and pen portraits published in almost all the literary magazines of the day remain uncollected.

E.V.'s literary career began with the publication of a story, 'Mariamma' in Atmaposhini, when he was a pupil of the VIII standard. E.V. was also one of the first realists in Malayalam short story. Considering the daring experiments he conducted with the genre, he is considered a link between the first and second generations of Malayalam short story writers. His short stories are collected in E.V. Kathakal (E.V.'s short stories) and Kelisaudham (Pleasure castle, 4 parts). He wrote four novels of which the first one, Balakrishnan was a juvenile production. The influence of C.V. Raman Pillai, his future father-in-law, is evident in the choice of the theme and the style of this novel. Arute kai (Whose hand, 1935) is a detective novel, one of the early models of the form in the language, serialized in Malayala manorama. Toratta kannuniri (Never-ending tears, 1936) was another Manorama serial, modelled after a Tolstoy story. Bashpavarsham (Torrent of tears), shortest among his novels, is the best. This novel which stresses internal conflicts rather than external incidents is the forerunner of the new novel in Malayalam.

E.V. was the originator of serious prose drama in Malayalam. Though he had also written farces, as and his genius was better-suited for humorous themes, his serious plays on historical and puranic themes are pioneering works. He wrote 17 farces and plays. Of these Kannan Kumar (Kumar, the scoundrel), Arunodayam (Sunrise) and Nalanum Kaliyum, (Nala and Kali) are short plays. It is not known if his Uddandan M.L.C. was ever acted or published. The remaining 13 plays were widely acted and read. Among these special mention may be made of Sitalakshmi (1925), Raja Keshavadasan (1928) and Iravikkutti pillai (1933) which are based on historical themes. E.V.'s historical plays are based on his reading of Travancore history. They continue the tradition set up by C.V. Raman Pillai in his immortal romances. The glory of royalty and the loyalty and valour of Nair heroes and heroines are a recurring theme in these plays. His Ramarajabhishekam (The coronation of Rama, 1932) is based on the Ramayana. All the rest are farces, of which mention may be made of Kuruppinte Daily (Kurup's daily), Pennarashunatu (The land of the amazons), Vivahakammattam (Marriage mint) B.A. Mayavi (The trickster graduate) and Pranaya kammishan (Love commission). His Mayamanushan (Tricker) is an adaptation of Stevenson's Jekyll and Hyde. E.V.'s farces are delightful satires on the fads of society.

Humour was E.V.'s life breath. Human life was, for him an extended laughter. Whatever he saw around him, including himself, gave him occasions for mirth and laughter. He was a pastmaster in handling all varieties of humour, humour with a definite social purpose, humour arising out of lampooning and humour for its own sake. His M.L.C. stories (1928), a series of delightful sketches centred round an illiterate legislator, the hero, or more precisely, the anti-hero of these pieces. That there were demands in the legislature to ban the M.L.C. stories show how shattering their effect had been. His Polis Ramayanam (Police Ramayana, 1935), a mock-heroic poem, was inspired by the repression let loose by the then English Police Commissioner L.A. Bishop. Though himself an ardent freedom fighter, E.V. saw the dangers of misguided agitationism as well as the horrors of repression and he lampooned both. E.V.'s humour serves a definite social purpose when he holds up for ridicule petty officials strutting about in borrowed plumes, literary critics who have no sensibility at all raking up non-issues in literature, local correspondents who believe that their despatches are of international significance, those who dabble in metaphysics not knowing what it is all about and a host of others. Good humoured mockery reigns supreme in these writings.

There is nothing in the language which excels E.V.'s Kavitakkesu (Poetry litigation, 1929) in the quality of its delicious -rillery. His other humorous pieces include Kandaktar Kutti (Conductor Kutty) Hajjur Pranayam (Love in secretariat) Adhyakshanammavan (President uncle) and Kokkippulu prakshobhanam (Hook-worm agitation).

As a nationalist politician, E.V. was not a supporter of the princely rule in Travancore. He published a series of imaginary letters comparing the congress administration elsewhere in the country with that of the loyalist bureaucracy of Travancore. These letters were collected under the title Ravum pakalum (Night and day). E.V.'s pen portraits and thumb-nail sketches that appeared regularly in the popular periodicals combine good humoured observation of personal features and pointed comments on the unsavoury aspects of the victim's character.

E.V.'s fame as a humorist is matched only by his reputation as a writer of light essays. His contribution to the growth of light essays which combine gentle humor and observations on the life around is unique. None before or after him has surpassed him in this genre. His light essays have been collected in two volumes entitled Chiriyum chintayum (Laughter and thoughts, 1935) 101 such essays have been included in the collected edition of his works. His serious essays, mostly political commentaries, have been collected in Akkalanga (Those days).

E.V. died at the young age of 44. But he has left an autobiography entitled Jivitasmarankal (Reminiscences of my life). It is not a serial or sequential narration in the traditional sense of an autobiography. It is a string of reminiscences unfolding his experiences. Though the reminiscences contain 44 chapters, only the first part with 26 chapters came out during his life time. The second part was published three years after his death.

E.V. was an accomplished writer of children's literature. His Viramahatvam (Greatness of heroes) is a simplified abridgement of Carlyle's Heroes and Hero Worship. His Balalila (Children's play) and Bhaskaran are again, adaptations from English. Gurusamaksham (Before the teacher) is written in the form of advice given by a teacher to his pupil. Gunapathangal (Moral stories), Subhacarya (Good conduct) and Sukhajivitam (Happy life) were also popular children's books at the time of their publication.

KRISHNA PILLAI, N. (Malayalam; b. 1916, d. 1988) was an eminent dramatist, critic, literary historian and academician. He was educated in Varkala, Attingal and Trivandrum. After taking Honours Degree in Malayalam Literature in 1938, he worked as Lecturer, Professor and Principal in different Government Colleges. He was connected with several official and University bodies and also with several literary and cultural organisations. He is a visiting Professor in the University of Kerala and also Fellow of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi.

Krishna Pillai's contribution to the field of drama is wide-ranging. He has to his credit 15 full-fledged plays and 16 one-act plays, besides a translation of Strindberg's A Dream Play. Krishna Pillai, an ardent admirer of Ibsen, the Norwegian playwright, introduced into Malayalam the concept of the well-made play, dealing with realistic problems. It was a total break with the old traditions of farces and musical plays and Krishna Pillai brought into Malayalam playwriting, an air of seriousness and vigour, which resulted in radical and far-reaching changes. In Bhagnabhavanam (Shattered home, 1942) the dramatist deals with domestic conflicts resulting from temperamental differences and emotional entanglements, which do not provide for any facile solution. The unresolved conflicts within the domestic atmosphere, arising out of a variety of reasons, form a recurring theme in several of his other plays. They may arise from the unquenched desires of an exploited spinster as in Kanyaka (Virgin), or from the possessive instinct of a dominating mother-in-law as in Balabalam (Trial of strength); but the only way out is compromise which involves much give and take on the part of all concerned as the dramatist powerfully points out in Anuranjanam (Compromise). Apart from being a close observer of human nature, Krishna Pillai is a consummate craftsman who puts all the dramatic devices to maximum use. Not one unnecessary word crops up in the composition of dialogue, and not one unnecessary character is allowed to make his appearance. The salutary changes brought about by Krishna Pillai revolutionised the entire field of Malayalam drama, during the forties.

Apart from drama, Krishna Pillai's contribution to the fields of literary history and criticism is also significant. His Kairaliyute Katha, a critical history of Malayalam literature, is considered to be a standard work of its kind. Tiranjedutta prabandhangal (1971) is a collection of essays that reveals his power of judgement and critical insight. He has published about 250 articles in various journals and contributed copiously to children's literature also. His Pratipatram bhashanabhedam is a stylistic study of dialogues in the novels of C.V.Raman Pillai, the eminent novelist.

Krishna Pillai has received many awards including Kerala Sahitya Academy Award, Vayalar Rama Varma Sahitya Award, Sangeet Natak Akademi Award, Sahitya Pravartaka Award and Odakkuzhal Award. His Pratipatram bhashanabhedam received the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1987.

Later he published several old texts like Unnunilisandesham, Kottayam kathakal (attakkatha), Kiratam (a 'prabandha' in Malayalam), Patalaramayanam (Kilippattu), etc. He wrote commentaries on a few Sanskrit texts, and also translated a few, including Kalidasa's Shakuntalam. His poems are Uttaramacharita, Nitimalka and Laghur-amayanam. In the field of linguistics, he has written Bhashadarpanam, Rasikaratnam, Vidyavivekam, Keralabhashayum sahityavum, etc. Kerala sahitya charitram is a short history of Malayalam literature, while Sangitachandrika is an authoritative text on music.

KRISHNA RAO, G.V. (Telugu; b. 1914; d. 1979) was a talented poet, essayist and novelist. He was awarded the degree of Doctor of Philosophy for his thesis Studies in Kalapurnodaya by the University of Madras in 1956. His poetic and prose works reveal a sensitive individual with a transparent mind and pellucid style. His versatility as a creative artist and scholar, perfectly at home in the Indian as well as western literary culture and philosophical schools of thought, has been clearly established with the publication of his celebrated novel Kilu bommalu (The puppets) in 1951. It has since been reprinted several times. It is this novel that gives him a permanent niche among the creative writers in Telugu. It illustrates his mastery of irony and understatement to achieve the desired narrative effect in both characterisation and description of scenes. The disastrous consequences of "suppression of truth and suggestion of falsehood" has perhaps nowhere been more artistically represented than in this novel. The locale in the novel could be any place in the world; human nature is the same everywhere. In a brief introduction to the novel, the author acknowledges the intellectual and aesthetic inspiration of Boazer's The Power of a Lie. But this is neither a translation nor an adaptation of it. Broadly speaking, the theme of the novel relates to the characters and the vulnerability of the poor individual villagers and their culture and the new winds of political change in the wake of India's independence. Categorically denying that it is romantic or historical or moralistic, the author pleads for a detached aesthetic experience of reading his novel which transcends political loyalties. In the history of the novel in Telugu, the publication of Kilu bommalu marks an important development. Essentially a work of art rather than a thesis novel, Kilu bommalu is one of the finest illustrations of 'technique as discovery'. Through the portrayal of Pullayya, the principal character in the novel, the writer presents his view of life in an ironical manner. By shifting the points of view from one character to the other, the writer succeeds in keeping the reader's interest alive throughout the novel. The locale is a typical Indian village at the dawn of India's independence.

Besides Kilu bommalu Krishna Rao published in Telugu over 10 books including Chaitraratham (1936), Varuthini (1942), Yugasandhya (1942), all poetry; a philosophical treatise entitled Jegantalu (1950) and a piece of literary criticism, Studies in Kalapurnodayam (1956)

A.V.K.R.

KRISHNA RAO, MUTNURU (Telugu; b. 1879; d. 1945) was the editor of the celebrated journal Krishna patrika. He was a great patriot whose writings inspired many young men to fight for the Independence of India.

His ancestors belonged to Mutnuru, a village in Krishna district. But they moved to Sivangakshetra which was almost a suburb of Machilipatnam. Krishna Rao was born here, lost his mother in his early months and was brought up by his grandmother Subbamma who always occupied the place of mother in his mind. His father died when he was only six.

Krishna Rao underwent his education in Hindu High School and Noble College, both in the same town. He mastered both Sanskrit and Telugu while he was there. Later he joined Madras Christian College for his B.A. degree. He came under the influence of Miller whose lectures on English literature attracted him so much that his attention was diverted from his preparation for the B.A. degree examination. He lost the examination, returned to Machilipatnam in 1903 and joined the Krishna club. He was taken in as the assistant editor of Krishna patrika.

Krishna Rao became the chief editor of Krishna patrika in 1905 and he toured Bengal along with Bipin-chandra Pal. He came in contact with eminent men like Aurobindo Ghosh and returned to Machilipatnam with a strong sense of determination. His writings took an extremist form while arms were used by the freedom fighters of those days. The management of the journal was under heavy pressure by the Government with the result he was relieved of his editorship. Later he himself acquired the journal.

His leaders in the journal acquired an enormous prestige. His prose was matchless. He brought out the poetic excellence of Rabindranath Tagore in his review articles. He gave a boost to social reform and native religion through the medium of his journal. He exposed corruption and dishonesty mercilessly even at the risk of facing defamation suits.

His life was inseparably associated with the word, Krishna; his name, Krishna Rao, his journal, Krishna patrika, native place, the shores of Krishna river. Besides he had membership in the Krishna club; and was associated with the Krishna Swadeshi Press. The original name of his wife was Achchayamma, but it was changed to Rukminamma. He even used to give vent to an expression that if he were associated with the commencement of journal, he would have christened it 'Krishna veni'.

He was no doubt influenced by the writings of Aurobindo in his journal, Arya from Pondicherry. But he was not bound by any particular dogma or doctrine. He could interpret Gandhi's doctrine of non-violence in a unique way that attracted the latter's attention. His nature was such that he would not like to come into lime-light. Only a few intimate friends had the benefit of his persuasive and eloquent talks and conversation. His stay in prison as a sequel to his participation in civil disobedience movement made this evident to the lucky circle of his friends.

He was like a teacher for many who were eager to learn from him. There used to be a 'goshti' functioning in the office of Krishna patrika. Poets associated with this called it a 'darbar' and compared it to the darbar of Sri Krishnadevaraya. Venkateswara Rao Katuri, a poet of wide reputation used to address the whole crowd of people as 'Gurugranth Sahibji'. He occupied the central place in the darbar while other young poets like Rukmininatha Sastri Jalasutram, Buchchisundararama Sastri Madhavapeddi, Narasimha Rao Munimanikyam, Venkata Suryanarayana Rao Ravuri, etc., played their respective roles in the darbar.

Krishna Rao published in his paper a series of articles called Lovelugulu (Inner lights) and another series called Velugu jilugulu (Rays of lights). Through these series he brought 'Vedanta' to the reach of the common man. His words always carried a new aura around them. Krishna patrika raced like the famed horse, 'Panchakalyani' under his leadership in the literary, social and political fields and with the death of the rider lost all its vigour and vibrancy.

V.S.K.A

KRISHNA SASTRY, DEVOLAPALLI (Telugu; b. 1897, d. 1980) was a superb lyrical poet and literary artist, whose influence is vast though his output is small. Born in the family of traditional poets and scholars, Krishna Sastry liberated himself from the fetters of orthodoxy and became a humanist and reformer under the inspiring guidance of R Venkataratnam Naidu. Some of his fervent outpourings express the mood of profound devotion to God, who is an embodiment of all-embracing love and who cannot be confined to any name or form. The slender collection of his devotional songs Mahati is a fine specimen of spiritual poetry which takes its rank beside Francis Thompson's 'The Hound of Heaven'. Six volumes of his poetry and prose were published posthumously.

He made his debut with Krishna paksham which offers the quintessence of the romantic spirit. The strong element of subjectivity, deep love of the beauties of nature, burning zeal for freedom, respect for the dignity of the human personality, concern for the simple joys and sorrows of the common people, a pervasive melancholy and a vague sweetness work out the lyrics as fine flowers of a new school of poetry which gained recognition. Krishna Sastry became the leader of the new trend which was named 'bhava kavita'. His dress and address, his hair-style and manner symbolised the new spirit which broke away from the tradition-bound artificial poetry of pedants who could not articulate the throb of the heart. His impassioned lyrics expressed varying moods and wistful longings, with a diction that is sweet, fresh and simple. In his lyrics we find the ethereal fire of Shelley combined with the consummate craftsmanship of Keats and the visionary quality of William Blake. His pictures of nature glow with the warmth and derived from careful observation of the panorama of the wonders that captivate the eye and the ear. Common objects arrest our attention when he describes in memorable phrases scenes which are adorned with the halo of his creative imagination. His Urvashi and Pravasam (Exile) deal with the theme of love tracing the varying moods of the lovelorn soul, the agony of separation, the throb of expectation, the anguish of the quest, the thrill of realisation and the transport of union.

Krishna Sastry treated the emotion of sorrow as an exalting theme. He regards tears as cleansing and baptising agents which consecrate the human spirit and elevate it. His lyrics give the strongest expression to the spirit of individual liberty which refuses to be bound by rigid and external rules in religious, social and political spheres of life.

His prose is as lyrical and inspiring as his poetry. His collections of prose, Bahukala darshanam (Meeting after a long time), Pushpa lavikalalu (Flower-gatherers) contain some pieces of rare felicity and poetic fancy.

Even in the commercial field of film-writing, Krishna Sastry, left his stamp with lyrics of haunting beauty. He never compromised in the matter of taste, by playing to the gallery. Though he borrowed liberally from the folk melodies, he never permitted vulgarity to tarnish his lilting lyrics. His style is inimitable as it combines simplicity, sweetness, sadness, delight and depth. His quest for the right word imparted an inevitable quality to his poetic utterance. He could convey a world of feeling through a simple but aptly chosen word which was invested with dignity by his superb craftsmanship.

Krishna Sastry was endowed with a breadth of vision and width of sympathy which could embrace the entire cosmos and which could discern the golden thread of unity behind the baffling diversity. He marched with the times, keeping step with the changing tempo of modern thought and trends. His universal outlook and personal charm influenced generations of writers. It was a great misfortune that after attaining sixty years of age he was deprived of his resonant voice, which swayed and regaled vast audiences, by a malignant throat cancer. Still he continued to communicate on scraps of paper his views with the ease and grace of conversation to visitors as he always loved company. "I love men and women more than I love poetry. I shun isolation", he used to remark. As man and as poet, Krishna Sastry endeared himself to generations of lovers of literature because what is unwritten is greater and sweeter than what is written. His personality radiated a rare charm because of his humanism which transcended the narrow barriers of caste, creed or region. The amplitude and the altitude found in his work is remarkable because it is seldom found in contemporary Telugu poetry. In emotional and devotional lyrics he stands above all others.

C.N.S.

KRISHNA WARRIER, N.V. (Malayalam; b. 1917) is a celebrated poet, scholar, journalist, thinker and critic. Born near Trichur and educated in some nearby schools and the Sanskrit College at Tripunithura, Krishna Warriar started his professional career as a teacher of Sanskrit. He continued either in that capacity or as Headmaster or college lecturer for about twelve years including the intervals devoted to other activities. The call of nationalism was too strong for him to resist. He plunged into the Quit India Movement and published the newspaper Swatantra Bharatam and a number of pamphlets, living underground. The poems 'Ahimsaka sainyam' (1939) and 'Mahatma Gandhi' (1942) are also products of this period. By 1948 when he took his M. Litt degree he had passed, by private study, the Rasthra Bhasha Visharad and B.O.L. examinations. He acquired a working knowledge of sixteen other Indian and foreign languages. He also worked as Secretary of the Cochin Text Book Committee. In 1952 he was appointed Assistant Editor of Mathribhumi Weekly and visited, as a journalist, several places in India and abroad including Great Britain (1958) and the U.S.A. (1959). When the state Institute of Language was started in 1968 in Trivandrum, he was appointed its Director. Since his retirement from there on superannuation he has worked as editor of more than one periodical.

A man with an exceptionally perceptive mind, N.V., as he is popularly known, had also the courage to break established conventions and even the canons of rhetoric for the sake of intensifying the atmosphere of poetry. When his Neenda kavitakal (Long poems, 1948) came out with a new technique, perspective and style, it was hailed as the first chapter in the transition of Malayalam poetry from traditionalism to modernism. The poems in this collection and the Kurekkoodi neenda kavitakal (More long poems, 1950) have all the characteristics of his poetry in which a balance is struck between reality and imagination. He avoided clouding the theme with imagery and concentrated on the impact the poem should create. In 'Kochuthomman', the title poem in a collection (1955) which won a prize from Madras Government, N.V. portrays a student's life in Madras, showing another outstanding experiment in poetry. 'Alexis Punyavalan', one of his two monologues, tells the story of the de-divinisation of St. Alexis, who flew from his wife in search of eternal peace and returned after years to see his wife worshipping his picture beside that of Jesus Christ.

The mechanisation of urban life had its impact on N.V.'s poetry. In this respect he was ahead of his times. His use of irony and stylistic innovations have brought poetry closer not to music but to speech. But he could exploit word music as well, as evidenced by earlier poems like 'Pazhaya pattu' (The old song) and 'Teevandiye pattu' (The song in the train).

A born enemy of hypocrisy and pretensions, N.V. is bent on exploding the romantic myths and the unrealistic concepts of values. Even during the period of non-violence he sang songs of revenge and retaliation against injustice, oppression and cruelty. For him post-Independence India has presented only bitter scenes of disillusionment and he gave vent to his feelings in the series Gandhiyum Godseyum (A collection of 16 poems, 1969). The disillusionment and consequent indignation can be seen in other poems as well. 'Bangladesh' (1970) 'Bakki vallatumundo?' (Anything remaining? 1982) and 'Kuttikalude kurishsuyuddham' (Crusade by children, 1984) are good examples.

N.V. has made substantial contributions to other literary genres such as the essay, criticism, drama and attakkatha. His Kalolsavam and Pariprekeshyam are collections of essays on art, literature and culture. As the president of Samasta Kerala Sahitya Parishad, Kerala Sahitya Samiti and Kerala Union of Working Journalists and as member of Kerala Sahitya Akademi and Kerala Press Academy and as Director of the State Institute of Language, he has rendered yeoman service for the development of literature and culture. He has received the Sahitya Ratna Award, Soviet Land Nehru Award and Sahitya Akademi Award.

KRISHNA WARRIER, P.V. (Malayalam, b. 1877 d. 1958) belonged to the family of Panneempally, Malabar, and learnt Sanskrit first under the guidance of some renowned scholars belonging to his own community of temple-attendants. Later he studied under the best known scholar and poet of the time, Kodungallur Kunjikuttan Tampuran who was an inspiration to him in more than one respect. His family had a tradition in Ayurveda and it was one of his first cousins, P.S. Warriar, who founded the Arya Vaidyashala at Kottakkal. Naturally Krishna Warriar inherited some knowledge of the indigenous system of medicine and studied it in depth. He was interested in classical music as well and, in fact, not only studied that art in earnest but also wrote a book on it. In addition to all this, he acquired proficiency in English by attending the Zamorin's College at Calicut for about four years.

Even as a boy Krishna Warriar began to versify, following the model furnished by the neo-classic school led by the Venmam poets. Though the school attached little importance to imagination, he continued to believe that technical perfection was in itself a great achievement and went on writing poems with that end in view. His poetical works were published in 1956. They were well received at the time but have since been virtually forgotten owing mainly to the evolution of Malayalam poetry in a different direction. Today he is more remembered as the Asstt. Editor and later Editor, of Kavana-kaumudi. He encouraged a large number of budding poets by publishing their contributions in that fortnightly originally started by Pandalam Kerala Varma, one of the leading poets of the time. No less valuable are the services he rendered to the cause of poetry by collecting and publishing the poetical works of Kodungalloor Kunjikuttan Tampuran, V.C. Balakrishna Panikker, Oravankara Raja, Oduvil Kunhikrishna Menon, etc.

There is yet another field, a related one no doubt, in which Krishna Warriar was almost a pioneer. It is informative literature. The first notable attempt in this regard is a history of Kerala serialized in the journal, Kerala sanchari. He also frequently contributed articles on modern and ancient systems of medicine to the magazine Dhanvantari. Strange as it may appear, he started an economic publication named Lakshmi vilasam, which continued for 14 years from 1905. These prose writings have been later published as books, they are Vijnanamandalam (Essays on science and philosophy), Uddanda Shastriyum pattathanavum (history) and Writers of the Past (literary history).

As an organiser, Krishna Warriar was responsible for the Sahitya Parishat anniversary held at Kottakkal in 1928 and also for the Parappur Congress Session. He was the President of the Taluk Committee of Congress for a time.

In recognition of his services in a variety of fields, the ruling Maharaja of the former Cochin State conferred on him the title of 'Kavikeshan', which means a lion among poets.

Poet, patron of literature, essayist and a pioneer in science journalism in Malayalam, he rightly commanded respect from the people of Kerala. A good physician and an outstanding organizer, Krishna Warriar was always receptive to new ideas, which almost always took concrete shape under his magic touch. Though much of his poetry has not stood the test of time, the activities in other fields have secured him a permanent place in Kerala's culture and Malayalam literature.

P.N.K.

KRISHNABAI (Gujarati; 18th cent.) belonged to a Nagar Brahmin family, and hailed from Vadnagar in North Gujarat. She has composed lullabies of Krishna, a genre rarely handled by medieval Gujarati poets. Her four lullabies have been published in the Kavyadohan (Part V), an anthology of mediaeval Gujarati poetry. In the lullabies, she has described the handsomeness of child Krishna, and the exquisite beauty of his cradle. She has also described the joy of the persons who rock the cradle and their effort to make the child comfortable. In one of the lullabies she has described a dialogue between Krishna and his foster-mother, Yashoda. Krishna asks his mother to help him learn walking. The motherly love of Yashoda is depicted in an enchanting manner. The words are onomatopoeic, and express the mutual feelings of the mother and the child.

Krishnabai is famous for her Sitajini kanchuli (Blouse of Sita). It is a story-poem in which she depicts the incident of Sita asking Rama to kill the golden deer, as she wants to wear the blouse of its skin. In the narration the obstinacy, and the hyper-sensitive nature of woman is depicted in an effective manner. At the end of the poem, she draws a lesson from the poem that because Sita disregarded her husbands's instructions, and was obstinate, she herself suffered and made others suffer. The poetess has also composed Sitavivah (Marriage of Sita) and Rukmini-haran (Abduction of Rukmini) which have not yet been published. She will be remembered for having correctly depicted women's sentiments through mythological characters.

KRISHNADAS KABIRAJ (Bengali; b. 1527, d. 1615). Born in a well-to-do Vaishnava family, Krishnadas was a follower of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu and Nityananda. Being disgusted with worldly life he left home for Virndavana where he reached about 1550 and met Sanatan Goswami and his brother, Rup Goswami. Both the saints were impressed by his learning and piety and trained him up as their spiritual disciple. They deputed him to look after the seva (daily worship) of Madangopal, the deity installed by Sanatan Goswami himself. Krishnadas dedicated the rest of his celibate life to the service of Madangopal. After the death of Santan and Rup, Krishnadas regarded Raghunathdas as his mentor. However, Krishnadas in his writings has mentioned all the six Goswamins of Vrindavan—Sanatan, Rup, Jiva, Gopal Bhatta, Raghunathdas and Raghunath Bhatta—as his preceptors or gurus. According to some, Krishnadas was initiated into Vaishnavism by Nityananda himself in his early life. His intimate contact with Sanatan, Rup and Jiva Goswamins, who were intellectuals of a very high order, made him a perfect scholar especially in the philosophical discipline of Vaishnavism. Krishnadas distinguished himself by writing three books, two in Sanskrit and one in Bengali. His first work Govindalilamrita, a Sanskrit epic in twenty-three 'sargas' and 2588 'shlokas' (couplets) depicts the love of Radha and Krishna at Vrindavana. This work was completed in 1569-1580 (It was first published from Murshidabad in 1884). His second work was a Sanskrit commentary on Krishna-karnamrita by Krishnalila-shuka named 'Sarangarangada' (Calcutta), (1853). Krishnadas's magnum opus is his Chaitanya-charitamrita, a biography of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu in three parts or 'lilas'. This comprised 10,503 'payars' (couplets) in Bengali and 1012 couplets (shlokas) in Sanskrit. Out of the 1012 Sanskrit shlokas, 97 were his own compositions, the rest being extracts from the Sanskrit scriptures or standard Sanskrit classics. The first part (or lila) depicts the first twenty-four years of Chaitanya's life as a householder. The middle part or madhyalila depicts Chaitanya's acceptance of monastic order and visit to various sacred places in India. The antyalila or last part depicts in 20 chapters the last phase of Chaitanya's life for the remaining eighteen years. No biographical work of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu has been able to depict the spiritual struggles and the heart-rending yearning for union with the Godhead or the supreme being embodied in Krishna with so much faith, understanding and pathos as Krishnadas has done. Krishnadas in depicting the last phase of Chaitanya's life has acknowledged his indebtedness to the diaries of Swarup Damodar, a close associate of Chaitanya, lending thus a stamp of authenticity to the work.

Besides being an authentic biography of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu written in a forceful language and elegant style, the work also embodies the philosophical discipline and theological core of the Chaitanya faith and order. Completed by 1615, the work came to be considered as a landmark in the Vaishnavite literature which prompted the celebrated philosopher-scholar Biswanath (Chakra-barty) of the 17th century to write a Sanskrit commentary on the work.

The Chaitanya-charitamrita still continues to retain its place of honour not only among the devout but also amongst the reading public in general. First published from Calcutta in 1827, it has run into several editions.

G.S.

KRISHNADAS RAI (Hindi; b. 1892, d. 1980) was born in a very prosperous family of Benaras. Out of respect he was addressed as 'Sarkarji' by one and all. The prosperity of the family can be surmised from the fact that during the last days of the Mughal empire, the Mughal emperors were said to have borrowed money from his ancestors. During the Indian freedom movement, this family sacrificed its riches and prosperity for the service of the country. Since his early childhood, he was nurtured by the all-pervading fervour of the national, cultural awakening. He grew up into a symbol of India's cultural ego and its identity. Though he could not get much formal education, yet he had a wonderful command over Sanskrit, Hindi, Persian and English. He made a vast and deep study of philosophy, religion, history, literature, language and arts. He was a keen judge of all things artistic and culturally relevant. His most important contribution in the field of art criticism is that he does not judge Indian painting, music and poetry through the standards borrowed from the West but by the typically Indian standards. He gave them proper direction and vision and defined many of the conceptions of Indian art tradition in a new way. He founded 'Bharatiya Kala Parishad' in 1920. Rabindranath Tagore became the chairman of the Parishad. His dedication towards literature and arts attracted a number of Hindi poets like Prasad, Nirala, Pant, Maithilisharan Gupta, Dinkar and Agyeya. Later, Prasad and Gupta became his intimate friends. He was also intimate with the renowned artists of his age. In 1915, Bharat Kala Bhavan was founded as a part of Banaras Hindu University, due mainly to the efforts of Rai Krishnadas. In a very short time the Bharat Kala Bhavan became one of the famous places for the collection of art. He made a collection of all that was classic and beautiful in Indian tradition. S.H. Vatsyayan 'Agyeya', writes about him: "I have received (learnt) so much from Sarkarji that I cannot measure (describe) it. If Sarkarji was a devotee of art, his devotion was not limited to painting and music or poetry. His devotion to art was life's devotion to art." (Smriti-lekha, 1982).

Rai Krishnadas wrote poems in Brajbhasha as well as Khariboli. His poetry is a colourful world of deep and subtle sensitivity and imagery. The collection of his poems Brajraj, published in 1918, possesses a high degree of emotive vitality. Later, he wrote gadya-kavya (prose-poetry) in a new style and with a new sensitivity. This gadya-kavya created new standards in literary creativity through prose. His Sadhana (1919), Sudhanshu (1922), Bhavuk (1928) and Chhayapath (1928) brought a new sparkle of poetic beauty to the dullness of prose. His prose-poem Praval (1926) creates a unique world of 'vatsalya'. Sadhana, written in a symbolic style, reminds us of Tagore's Gitanjali. This is a melodious and pictorial piece of literature of 'bhakti'.

In addition to being a poet, Rai Krishnadas was also a significant story writer. His first story 'Rahasya' was published in 1917. Later, his historical stories 'Inam', 'Humsaya', 'Tajjub', 'Kahar', 'Kabja mukhaliphana', 'Ittala', etc. became quite popular.

His two works on art, Bharat ki chitrakala (1939) and Bharat ki murtikala (1939) are a valuable treasure of Indian art and culture. These works give us two excellent examples of modern Indian art criticism.

In 1965, he was awarded 'Padma Bhushan' and in 1980 'Padma Vibhushan'. He had been also a fellow of the Lalit Kala Akademi, New Delhi.

KRISHNADAYARNAVA (Marathi; b. 1596, d. 1683) was given the sacred thread at the age of five and was married very early. He took his initiation at an early age, and his original name Narahari was changed to Krishnadayarnava. He went to Gaya and gave a discourse on the Bhagavata-purana. He returned from there and settled at Pimpanler. His first wife died when he was thirty-seven. His mother had died in his early childhood. He married again in the family of an Agnihotri, but contracted leprosy at the age of fifty-four. He lived for 87 years. By the age of 60, he completed the first half of his great work, Harivarada. He completed the remaining 37 Chapters by the time he died.

He calls himself a disciple of Eknath (1533-1599). The manuscript of Harivarada was found in the Paithan Math. He wrote Datta janotsaha, Vichara-chandrika and three chapters of Tanmayananda-bodh. Some critics are of the opinion that he also wrote Gitasara. He wrote Harivarada to rid himself of his malady. This work has 42000 ovis on the tenth book of the Bhagavata-purana. His popular 'arati' of Mukundaraja is available, but his Mantra-bhagavata is not extant. He is also credited with the composition of Chinmayananda-bodh, Inanamrita and Yogasara.

KRISHNAGATHA-KRISHNAJI SHAMRAO

KRISHNAGATHA (Malayalam) is a literary classic on the life of Krishna by the poet Cherusseri. The poet belonged to the Court of King Udayavarman of the Kolattunad kingdom in North Kerala who is believed to have reigned between A.D. 1446 and 1465. Tradition has it that the poet composed this work at the request of the king for use by his wife and other women-folk. Indeed the style of the work is such that not much effort is required for at least a first reading. It is almost entirely written in 'manjari', a Dravidian metre, suitable for the purpose of singing. Historically, Krishnagatha is the first full-length work written in easy Malayalam in a Dravidian metre, although the term gatha, meaning a song, is as old as the Prakrit Gathasapatashati of the early Christian era and has been used as 'Katai' in early Tamil and generally means a song. Subsequent to the composition and the enormous popularity that the work achieved, the term gatha came to be restricted to works written in the particular metre employed by the poet Cherusseri.

Krishnagatha narrating the story of Krishna is described in the tenth skandha of the Mahabhagavata. Forty-seven episodes in the life of Krishna are described, beginning from his birth, and ending with his ascent to heaven. Generally, the poet follows the Bhagavata-purana faithfully although he adds an episode here and deletes one elsewhere, obviously dictated by the artistic needs of a poetic composition.

The poet mentions his patron king in the work and specifically says that he is composing the work at the command of the king. We have little more information about the poet except that he was a brahman (Nambudiri). Literary historians mostly agree that he belonged to a Nambudiri family of the name of 'Cherusseri'. There was also another Nambudiri family with the name, 'Punam', which too has produced distinguished poets, and there is a controversy whether our poet belonged to this family. Some palm-leaf manuscripts contain an inscription which reads 'written by Punattil Sankaran Nampiti'. Tradition also says that the two families were amalgamated through adoption at some time. We may, however, conclude that Cherusseri was the name of the family to which this distinguished poet belonged. The work itself has been known through the centuries as the Krishnagatha of Cherusseri. Another name under which the work is known is Krishnappattu (A song of Krishna).

While the ostensible purpose of writing Krishnagatha was to provide easy, poetical and devotional reading material as tradition would have it, it is clear that the poet had a deeper purpose, as he himself clearly states. Thus he writes at the very start:

We hear that detachment from worldly ties
Is the means of liberation from the cycle
Of births and deaths. I compose this work
For achieving this detachment.

And true to his original intention the poet completes his work with a narration of his imagined visit to Lord Vishnu at the end of his life and taking refuge in Him.

Krishnagatha is significant in more respects than one. It is a deeply devotional work written at a time when a powerful Vaishnavite movement was spreading in India. This work functioned as a major literary medium in Malayalam of this movement. And it was written in Malayalam with the least admixture of Sanskrit at a time when Malayalam compositions contained a very large proportion of Sanskrit words. Cherusseri wrote his monumental work in unabashed, pure Malayalam almost as a protest. A third point about the work is that while its devotional purpose is obvious, its status as a major literary composition is unquestioned. There is an easy flow of poetry undisturbed by irregular patches. There is a profusion of figures of speech which has earned for the poem the eulogy 'utpreksha is the forte of Krishnagatha', a eulogy that compares with the one about Kalidasa, 'upama is Kalidasa's forte.' Critics have pointed out the suggestive quality of Cherusseri's language and of his figures of speech. The salient sentiment in the work is the erotic with a strong mixture of humour. Other sentiments like the heroic, largely masculine in their expression, are, by and large, avoided by the poet. Indeed in this as well as in the generally feminine charm of the style, the work has sometimes been described as conveying a femininity rather than a robust masculinity in expression. We may render a few lines into English to show the felicity and suggestive power of the figures of speech. The poem starts with the following prayer:

Let me bow before that Lord
Whose body, when bathed
In the moonshine of Indira's smile,
Shines like the blue mountain
Immersed in the white waters of the milk ocean

One can easily see that, quite apart from the felicity of the image of Lakshmi's smile bathing Vishnu's body, the entire episode of the milk-ocean being churned with the Mandara mountain is also evoked.

Krishnagatha is the most popular devotional and lyrical work in Malayalam, next only to the work of Ezhuttacchan. Its palm-leaf manuscripts had an all-Kerala distribution till it was edited and published in the recent decades, over forty times either wholly or partly.

KRISHNAJI SHAMRAO (Marathi) was a Marathi writer of the Peshwa period. His biographical details are, however, not known.

KRISHNAKANTER WILL

Krishnaji Shamrao is supposed to be the writer of Bhau Sahebanchi bakhar, a well-known Marathi narrative about the third Battle of Panipat (1761), fought between the Afghan King, Ahmedshah Abdali, and the Marathas.

The graphic description of this great battle, and several other skirmishes and the episodes leading to it, suggests that the author was a witness to this catastrophic event and wrote this book not long after it. The tone of this book and his tilt towards the members of the Scindia family, especially Dattaji and Jankoji, indicate that he must have been closely connected with that family either as their courtier, or a diplomat or a vakil.

Krishnaji Shamrao also seems to be a very knowledgeable person, who had inside information of political undercurrents in the various contemporary courts, infighting between powerful Maratha Sardars, and the power-game played by several groups and persons during that period. Barring a very few errors of dates and facts, he gives a thorough and authentic account of the major events relating to this battle which tallies with other historical records. His portrayal of the main characters who participated in this tragic drama, like Bhausahab, Holkar, Surajmal Jat, Shujaudaula, Najibuddaula, the Vajir, Balwantrao, etc., is very realistic and lively. He had a good command over the Marathi language and he seems to have been familiar with Sanskrit and Hindi. He must have also been well-versed in Indian mythology and geography of various places as the book is replete with anecdotes, quotations and proverbs current at that time.

Written in an inimitable style, his book has a literary flavour and merit as a historical document of the period.

His personality, as revealed in this book, is that of a knowledgeable, lovable, though occasionally garrulous, wise diplomat with good literary ability.

KRISHNAKANTER WILL (Bengali), a social novel by Bankimchandra Chatterjee (1838-94) came out as a book in 1878. Its first few chapters were published in the monthly Banga darshan of 1876. During Bankim's lifetime the book had had four editions. The fourth edition came out in 1892. Up to the fourth edition the book underwent many revisions. Rohini at first was conceived as a greedy woman without morals. Subsequently the author changed the character. In the fourth edition Gobindal also underwent a radical change.

Krishnakanta, the zaminder of Haridragram made a will. The principal beneficiaries of the will were his son, Haralal, and nephew, Gobindalal. Gobindalal's share, being equal to Haralal's, was opposed by the latter. Krishnakanta turned a deaf ear to Haralal's plea. Haralal threatened to marry a widow. Angry Krishnakanta disinherited Haralal. Haralal sought the help of Rohini, a young widow, to steal the will from Krishnakanta's safe.

Tempted that she would be a lawful wife of Haralal, Rohini stole the will, but as Haralal refused to marry her, Rohini refused to hand over the will to him. Insulted and aggrieved, Rohini was weeping by the side of the lake Baruni when Gobindalal came into the picture. He felt a deep pity for this beautiful girl and Rohini a deep regard for this handsome youth. Prompted by this regard for Gobindalal, Rohini went to Krishnakanta's room to put back the stolen will but she was caught red-handed. Gobindalal came to her rescue. At first Bhramar, Gobindalal's teen-aged wife, knew nothing of Gobindalal's inclination toward Rohini. When the neighbourhood was loud with the gossip connected with Rohini and Gobindalal, Bhramar advised Rohini to drown herself in Baruni. Bewildered, Rohini decided to do so. But Gobindalal rescued her from drowning. Thereafter, they came into close contact. Gobindalal's tormented soul had no other alternative than to run downhill. Because of Bhramar's folly, their conjugal life was about to be ruined. Krishnakanta at this crisis could do nothing but to change his will again. This time he disinherited Gobindalal and gave the property to Bhramar. This last change of the will dealt a death-blow to the relation of Gobindalal and Bhramar. Gobindalal left Haridragram with Rohini for Prasadpur. In the immoral and a social desolation of Prasadpur, Gobindalal realised the difference between Rohini and Bhramar, but by then he had reached the point of no return. Madhabinath, Bhramar's father, deployed Nishakar to destroy Gobindalal and Rohini's relation. Nishakar went to Prasadpur and met Rohini in secret. No sooner had Gobindalal come to know of this affair than he took Rohini to task and killed her with his pistol. Gobindalal was put in the dock, but the skilful Madhabinath managed to manipulate the police. But Bhramar never pardoned Gobindalal. Their separation was final. Gobindalal had only one chance to meet Bhramar while in deep agony she was dying a pathetic death. Gobindalal renounced the world and became a sanyasi. His quest for Bhramar ended in the quest for God.

This is a social novel full of psychological tensions. Gobindalal's lust for the feminine beauty of Rohini, Rohini's greed for the pleasures of life and Bhramar's honest folly intertwined with the outer reality have built up a tragic inevitability from the very beginning.

The propriety of Rohini's death at the hands of Gobindalal was questioned first by Saratchandra Chatterjee. He contended that the preponderance of Bankimchandra's moralist self was responsible for Rohini's death. Since then the question has been an open one. Critics have been sharply divided over the issue. One of the critics opines that Rohini was destined to die but her death was abrupt and because of the abruptness it lacked 'art'. However, that Rohini is a vigorous female character created by the author and that she influenced later widow characters, including Rabindranath's Binodini in Chokher bali (1903) to some extent, is beyond question.

KRISHNAKELIMALA (Maithili) is a popular 'kirataniya natak' (drama) of Nandipati. It was written in the middle of the eighteenth century and it appears to have been frequently performed. It represented the stage in the development of the kirataniya natak when the 'regular' kirataniya play had not become 'irregular', that is when the structure of Sanskrit drama was more or less intact. But gradually the narrative in Maithili was overtaking the older form. There is a 'pravesagita' (entrance song) where all the dramatis personae are introduced to the audience. The new form of the play was becoming a series of Krishna's lilas: 'Dadhilila' (The sport of curd), 'Kadam-balila' (The sport of Kadamba tree), 'Kaliyalila' (The sport of the subjugation of Kaliya naga), 'Putanabahalila' (The sport of the slaughter of Putana), etc. That is why the play is perhaps called a garland of Krishna's sports (Kelimala).

There are clear indications that this play was influenced by Manobodh's Krishna-janma and had given up the Vidyapati tradition of lyric writing. It was no longer bound by shackles of musical 'ragas' and 'raginis' and was free from sophisticated diction and imagery. The charms of simplicity and directness are enhanced by the smooth march of rhythms.

The play is sometimes called Shrikrishnakelimala also conforming to the custom of naming Krishna with the honorific 'Shri'.

The importance of the play is increased by the use of a long prose passage in the manner of Jyotirishvara's Varnaratnakara. It shows how these descriptive prose passages could be useful to the playwright like the Nepalese tradition of Maithili plays such as Jogajjyotirmalla's Haragaurivivaha.

Finally, the play exhibits the meaningfulness of the name 'kirataniya natak'. The whole play reads like a 'kirtan' (praise) of the Lord Shrikrishna.

The plot of Krishnakelimala is familiar to all who have heard the Brahmavaivarta, Harivamsha and other connected Puranas.

The story begins with the very birth of Krishna. His mother Devaki is shown in labour and the episode ends with the transfer of Krishna to Nanda's home. Then follow the childhood miracles of Krishna—the slaughter of Putana, the breaking of the cart, the slaughter of Vakasura and other miracles of Krishna's childhood.

It is in the third Act when Radha is shown as a grown up girl and the amorous sports of Krishna with the gopis are described, that the play gathers momentum. Radha is shown to pass restless nights in Krishna's absence. Finally she is shown to unite with the Lord.

It must be understood that instead of dramatizing each episode, the poet loves to concentrate on a narration of the episode. Throughout, the poet provides Maithili colour in the minutest details of everyday life.

The superhuman character of Krishna is all along stressed.

Krishnakumar has worked in several fields and brought out more than a hundred books. His 125th book, Basana bhavane (1987) was released recently. His poetry shows an awareness of tradition with a humanistic outlook. His criticism blends a sound knowledge of Sanskrit and Kannada literatures with a study of western criticism, and emphasizes the value of the experience embodied, without being dazzled by mere technical experimentation. As a translator, Krishnakumar has rendered several Sanskrit plays and important critical writings from English into Kannada. He has received the Karnataka Sahitya Academy Prize for his Aranya parva, Kavya viveka and Pashchatya kavya chintana, the Kuvempu Vidyavardhaka Trust Prize for his Kuvempu sahitya kelavu mukhagalu and the Karnataka Government Prize for Tharasakha. KRISHNAKUMAR KALLUR (Kannada; b.1908, d.1982) was a short story writer, playwright and prose writer. Educated at Dharwad, Santiniketan, Calcutta University and Bombay University, he served as a teacher in several high schools and retired as the Principal of Patak Technical High School. In addition to Kannada and English, he knew Marathi, Gujarati, Hindi and Bengali. A man averse to public recognition, Kallur did very useful work, without show. Associated with several Kannada periodicals, he was also the founder of Bharati devoted to short stories. He was also the author of works in English which reflected his varied interests, like Karwar and Kanara Ports and Karnataka Calling. For some time he was a member of the Ports Committee of Bombay Government.

Kallur's first works were Mangana meravanige and Bisilugudure (both in 1932). In his best stories Kallur can embody a profound experience, as in his very well-known story, 'Gubbiya samsara!' His play, Jagrita rashtra, inspired by an Irish play, creates an atmosphere in which we watch the action, hardly daring to breathe. The action itself takes place in a tea-shop, against the background of the Quit India upsurge. Every character seems charged with a new purpose and determination. There was a poet in Kallur, and so he could transport the reader-spectator to a new world.

Jagrita rashtra secured the Bombay Government Prize. He also edited Kavya bhandara (anthology of poems) and translated Pannalal Patel's Gujarati novel, Malela Jiva, under the title, Janumada Jodi.

FURTHER WORKS· Collections of short stories. Bisilugudure (1932), Managana meravanige (1932), Jivana (1935); Drama: Min-china hudi (1944), Neralu-bisilu (1949), Goravi-korava (1959) (1959)

V.K.

KRISHNAKUMARI (Bengali), a historical tragedy, is the first of its kind in Bengali language. Written by Michael Madhusudan Datta and published in 1861, it is the best of his six dramatic works. Madhusudan based this play on Colonel James Tod's Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan.

Krishnakumari, daughter of Bhim Singh, is the beautiful princess of Udaipur, whom Tod refers to as the 'flower of Rajasthan'. She is only fifteen when her beauty draws rival claimants. The first of the suitors is Jagat Singh, king of Jaipur, who sends his accomplice Dhanadas to Udaipur with his proposal. Dhanadas has a selfish motive in this marriage, whereby he wants to put an end to the attraction of Jagat Singh towards his mistress Bilasbati on whom Dhanadas himself has an eye. Bilasbati has an attendant named Madanika who follows Dhanadas to Udaipur to thwart his plans. She forges a letter in the name of Krishnakumari and sends it to the king of Marudesh asking him to come to her rescue. Disguising herself as an emissary of Man Singh, she meets Krishnakumari and arouses her feelings for Man Singh by showing his portrait. When Man Singh's actual emissary arrives with the proposal of marriage, king Bhim Singh finds himself in a great dilemma. Both Jagat Singh and Man Singh vow that if they do not get Krishnakumari they will destroy the city of Udaipur and ransack the whole kingdom. The only course left to Bhim Singh is to sacrifice his daughter's life to save his kingdom. When his minister puts forth this advice, Bhim Singh resigns to his fate. He orders his brother to perform this cruel act but himself becomes mentally deranged at the thought of it. As the king's brother enters Krishnakumari's chamber to kill her she wakes up and finds her uncle with a dagger. She remembers the vision of Padmini she had in her dream telling her, "A young woman who lays down her life for the honour of her noble family endears herself to heaven". She picks up the dagger and stabs herself. The anxious queen comes in search of her daughter, blames the king for her death and embraces death herself.

Madhusudan took some liberties with the historical material he found in Tod. Man Singh who was mainly responsible for initiating the conflict has been relegated in this play to the background. Instead, two fictitious characters, Dhanadas and Madanika, have been brought to the forefront of action. Krishnakumari's infatuation with Man Singh as incited by Madanika is also an innovation. Madhusudan's portraiture of the female characters, Krishnakumari and Bilasbati, betrays the influence of the heroines of Sanskrit drama. Perhaps because Madhusudan allowed his imagination to colour the available historical material, he preferred to call this play a romantic tragedy. His characterization of the central tragic figure Bhim Singh, though it closely follows the source, is not without a touch of romanticism. Bhim Singh's failure to resolve the conflict between his duties as a sovereign and his feelings as a father leads him to his catastrophe. His ultimate loss of himself in madness reminds one of King Lear, though compared to the latter his insanity is quite abrupt. Krishnakumari is an advancement in the development of Bengali drama for its creation of characters and dramatic form. Historically, though it is not the first attempt to write a tragedy in Bengali, it is the first to be reckoned as worthy.

KRISHNALILASHUKA (Sanskrit), a Vaishnava saint, grammarian and Sanskrit and Prakrit poet of the thirteenth century is also known as Lilashuka and Bilvaman-galam (or Vilvamangalam). He was the son of Nivi or Nili and Damodara, disciple of Somagiri who is often identified with Ishanadeva and the preceptor of Durgaprasadayati. Probably he belonged to Kerala, but, doubtless, he travelled throughout India. Stories connected with him are current in several parts of India, like Orissa, Bengal and Andhra. The story of his connection with a courtesan named Chintamani and her advice to him against his impetuous and foolish love for her and how wonderful it would be if he had such love for Krishna are also current in several parts. These stories say that the courtesan's advice proved a turning point in the life of Krishnalilashuka who renounced the world forthwith and proceeded to Vrindavana.

Krishnalilashuka's famous work, Krishnakarnamrita, is a collection of verses with exquisite beauty of the lyricism of devotion to Krishna. Its assonant verbal structure, lucidity of expression and striking imagery made the poem high class poetry. The majority of the stanzas describes the divine beauty of Krishna. Though the stanzas are detached from one another, they weave themselves into a perfect unity by revealing the ardent longing of the poet-devotee for a vision of his deity and his sense of wonder at the fulfilment of his desire. The work rose to the exalted position of a basic text in the Chaitanya movement of Bengal and in the Vallabha movement of western India. Krishnalilashuka is a master of prosody and rhetoric; even in the first Canto he introduces 28 different metres. His use of figures of speech is also noteworthy. The poem is available in two recensions—the South Indian and Bengali. The former comprises three 'ashvasas' (Cantos), but the latter accepts only the first one as genuine. It is believed that Chaitanya came across a manuscript, most probably containing only the first Canto, in a certain temple on the bank of the Krishnavena, near Pandharpur, which he brought to Bengal and introduced to his followers.

The text of the South Indian recension has been commented upon by Papayallayasuri (Suvarnachashaka), Brahmadatta (Suvarnapattri), Krishnapandita (Prapa) and Avanchi Ramachandra (Bhagavadbhakti rasayana). The Bengal recension, i.e., the first ashvasa, has been commented upon by three luminaries of the Gaudiya sect, viz., Gopalabhatta (Krishnavallabha), Chaitanyadasa (Subodhini) and Krishnadasa Kaviraja (Sarangarangada). There is an English translation of the poem by M.K. Acharya (Madras, 1924).

Krishnalilashuka's Govindabhisheka is a poetic work in Prakrit in twelve sargas, illustrating the rules of Vararuchi's Prakrit grammar, Prakritaparakasha. The work is also called Sirichindha (Skt. Shrichihna), in that, the last verse in every chapter has the word Shri in it. Krishnalilashuka wrote the first eight Cantos and his pupil and commentator Durgaprasadayati wrote the last four. Perhaps this incomplete work of Krishnalilashuka was his last work. His works on Sanskrit grammar are Purushakara, a commentary on the work, Daiva, on Sanskrit roots by Deva, Subantasamrajya (On the world of nouns) and Tinnantasamrajya (On the world of verbs). He also wrote a commentary on Bhoja's Sarasvatikanthabharana called Krishnalilavinoda. In addition to this he also composed some hymns on Krishna, Shiva, Durga and Ganapati. There are also a short kavya, the Kalavadhakavya (A kavya on the slaying of Kala), and a work on ritual to his credit.

KRISHNAMISHRA (Sanskrit; 11th cent.), the author of the drama, Prabodhachandrodaya (The rise of the moon of knowledge), was an ascetic of the Hamsa order and a follower of Shankara, propagator of the Advaita doctrines. The play was written at the instance of Gopala, the General of King Kirtivarman (1049-1100) of the Chandela dynasty whom the dramatist mentions in the prologue to the play. The genealogies of the Kamakoti Pitha record that Krishnamishra was contemporary of Chandrashekhara Saraswati, the 47th pontiff of the Pitha.

Prabodhachandrodaya is a play in six Acts and deserves special attention as one of the most remarkable products of Indian literature. It is a profound philosophical allegory of the whole life of man where abstract notions such as Folly, Reason, Vice, Truth, etc. appear embodied like persons having flesh and blood, the scene of action being Varanasi which is the meeting ground of all faiths and heresies. This symbolical drama of Krishnamishra, by means of personified abstractions, attempts to synthesize Advaita Vedanta with Vishnubhakti (devotion to Vishnu). This is the only drama where the quietistic sentiment has been represented on the stage. It is remarkable for dramatic life and vigour, and the dramatist has succeeded in presenting a vivid picture of the spiritual struggle of the human mind in the dramatic form of a lively conflict wherein the erotic, comic and devotional interests are cleverly and dramatically presented. His power of introducing staire of the purest type is highly commendable, and his power of characterization is bold.

The history of the origin of allegorical dramas in Sanskrit is little known, and the works of later writers inspired by him are of little importance. But, of all such plays in Sanskrit, Krishnamishra's work can undoubtedly be named as an outstanding effort of much real merit.

KRISHNAMURTI, JIDDU (English; b. 1895, d. 1986) was the son of Jiddu Narianaiyah, who was a tehsildar in the Madras Government. At the time of his birth his mother Sanjivamma had a premonition that her son, who was her eighth child like Lord Krishna, would become a great spiritual master.

In the school, Krishnamurti was considered a very dull student by his teachers. He felt much happier outside. In 1909, Narianaiyah retired and came to stay at Adyar, Madras, to serve the Theosophical Society. It was here that the young Krishnamurti came in contact with Mrs. Annie Besant and her associates, who discovered in him what they were looking for, a future world teacher, the third incarnation of Lord Maitreya, the Messiah who would grant salvation to the suffering humanity. In 1911 he was taken to England and special arrangements were made under the supervision of Leadbeater to train him properly for the role of the world teacher. In 1922 Krishnamurti had an extremely remarkable spiritual experience which changed his life completely. Very strangely, this experience brought with it acute and almost continuous pain in his head and spine which persisted for almost forty years. In 1929 a special ceremony was arranged in England to proclaim Jiddu Krishnamurti as the Messiah. But to the utter dismay of the world assembly headed by Annie Besant, Krishnamurti disbanded the organization of which he was to be the head, and declared that he was not a preceptor and that he did not want any disciples. In 1930, he resigned from the Theosophical Society. Since then he travelled through the English speaking world, giving public talks, private interviews and speaking to groups of people, discussing their problems intimately and deeply. His gentle, simple, and human example inspired thousands of people the world over. In an era of worldwide confusion and general demoralization, the simplicity and compelling directness of Krishnamurti's teachings proved for all those who listened to him, young and old alike, a welcome beacon in the prevailing darkness of their daily life.

He died, at Ojai, California, of cancer of the pancreas, and was cremated the next morning without any ceremony.

Krishnamurti's writings are the outcome mainly of his talks to large audiences and discussions with smaller groups of people who came to him to discuss their problems. Verbatim reports of such talks and discussions that took place at various places in India, England, America, and Europe over the past four decades have been published. And now, with the growth of technology, these talks are available in cassette tapes and video-tapes. Apart from these reports, many major works of J. Krishnamurti have been edited mostly from his talks, discussions, and question-answer sessions. There are a few books made out of notes written down by Krishnamurti himself. Among his major works the following titles may be listed.

First and Last Freedom (Victor Gollancz, London, 1954): This was Krishnamurti's first major work to which a foreword was written by the famous British thinker, Aldous Huxley. It discusses with a deep insight the various problems faced by man all over the world throughout the history of human civilization.

Commentaries on Living, 1st series, second series, and third series (Victor Gollancz, London, 1956): Edited by D. Rajagopal this book notes down his recollections of the conversations, relating them to the surroundings of nature. Krishnamurti wrote down simply and truly what happened. These commentaries are among his most popular and significant works.

Life Ahead (Victor Gollancz, London, 1964): This book contains a comprehensive collection of Krishnamurti's talks to students, teachers, and parents.

This Matter of Culture (Victor Gollancz, London, 1964): It contains a second series of talks of Krishnamurti to students, teachers and parents.

Tradition and Revolution (Orient Longmans, Bombay, 1972): It contains a gist of the dialogues Krishnamurti had with his associates in India during 1970-71.

The Awakening of Intelligence (Victor Gollancz, London, 1973): Includes Krishnamurti's conversations and talks in recent years, covering the widest variety of problems of modern life.

Krishnamurti's Notebook (Edited by Mary Lutyens; Victor Gollancz, London, 1977): In June 1961 Krishnamurti started keeping a daily record of his perceptions and states of consciousness. It continued up to 1962. This is one of the most important books for understanding Krishnamurti's teachings.

The Wholeness of Life (Victor Gollancz, London, 1978): Contains discussions between Krishnamurti and a renowned physicist of England, and a well-known psychiatrist. It also includes talks and discussions.

One thing stands out very clearly when one goes through any one of Krishnamurti's writings, whether earlier (belonging to the late twenties) or more recent. Nowhere has he ever taken for himself the role of a guru. And throughout his vast literature he has never, even once, given any quotation from a holy book or person. In fact, it has been the main thrust of Krishnamurti's teachings all along that truth is a pathless endeavour, and so it cannot be approached by any religion or sect. He has emphasised the fact, again and again, that 'for each individual the central human problem can be solved in only one way—for and by oneself'. Krishnamurti has, therefore, denounced the dependence on gurus, holy books, and any other kind of authority. He has always urged his listeners not to take him as an authority or to follow him.

The essence of Krishnamurti's teachings is that only through a complete change of heart in the individual can there be a change in society. And such a change is not a matter of gradual development or improvement; it rather comes about instantaneously and spontaneously. It is a mutation, a transformation. It is an inward revolution which takes place when one sees oneself clearly as one really is, without any justification or condemnation. His message, addressed directly to everyone, is one of unity and wholeness, of total understanding and love.

The direct understanding of the immediate condition of the human being, the very stuff of one's existence—this has been Krishnamurti's passion throughout his life. He is not concerned with ideas or hypotheses, and theories and philosophic explanations. His remarkable perception of the human problem is revealed in every page of his writings, which is, in essence, an investigation into the nature of consciousness, and exploration of the depths of the human mind, its movements, its frontiers, and that which lies beyond.

The expression that has come out of Krishnamurti's thoughts over half a century is never quite the same, although it often appears like a repetition of the same theme. One finds him describing the trees, mountains, rivers, clouds, sunlight, birds, flowers, and passers-by over and over again. But these descriptions are extremely vivid and for ever 'new' because they are seen each time with eyes that have never become accustomed to them. Each day they are a totally fresh perception for him, and so they become for us. Herein lies the beauty par excellence of what Krishnamurti has tried to convey over half a century to every well-meaning human being.

After taking his B.A. (Honours), M.A. (Mysore University) in Sanskrit and Ph.D. (Bombay University), he taught Sanskrit in Karnatak University and retired as Head of the Department. After this he became the Professor & Head of the Department of History & Indian Culture, Sri Sathya Sai Institute of Higher Learning, Andhra Pradesh. He received the President's Certificate of Honour (1978). He is also the recipient of prizes awarded by Mysore and Kerala Universities.

He was the first to translate into English Dhvanyaloka, a classic of Sanskrit poetics. He has made available to the Kannada reader translations of several classics of Sanskrit poetics. He has also rendered into Kannada creative writings like Pratimanataka and Abhijnana Shakuntala. His command of Sanskrit and Kannada shows that works of poetics can be rendered with accuracy and clarity, and that creative works do not lose their distinction in translation. His scholarship, particularly in the field of Sanskrit poetics, has enabled him not only to interpret precisely Sanskrit texts but also to clear up misconceptions. He points out, for example, that in a statement of Tauta, quoted in the Lochana, which is generally taken as referring to rasa experience, Tauta is in fact referring to pratibha. In his own writings on poetics Krishnamurthy examines earlier concepts and principles in the list of modern trends and he shows the universal applicability of the theories developed by the Sanskrit theorists. His Kalidasa (1972), published by Twayne Publishers, New York, is a comprehensive study of the great poet-dramatist, and examines both Indian and western judgments.

KRISHNAMURTHY, MATIGHATTA GUNDAPPA (Kannada; b. 1931, d. 1975) belongs to the tradition of teachers of English engaged in Kannada literary criticism. He studied in Mysore, Banaras and Madison, U.S.A. and worked intensively on Katherine Anne Porter and D.H. Lawrence. He taught English in colleges in Madras, Baroda, Wisconsin and Chicago as well as the American Studies Research Centre, Hyderabad. He was a member of the faculty of English, Jodhpur University, at the time of his sudden death.

Krishnamurthy's Adhunikha bharatiya sahitya assures him a place of prominence among the Kannada critics. It contains twelve critical essays, the first of which is a historical survey of the various socio-cultural factors prevailing in colonial India leading to the birth of modern Indian Literature. The next essay studies the nature of response to literatures in alien languages.

Krishnamurthy makes a competent analysis of five Vachanas of the Virashaiva saints. The essay on Gopala Krishna Adiga's Bhumi-gita (The song of the earth) is a piece of practical criticism.

The remaining articles are devoted to Kannada fiction. Short stories and novels written by major writers such as K.V. Puttappa, Masti Vankatesha Iyengar, Shivarama Karanth, Lankesh and Anantha Murthy are studied in depth.

The critical approach in all these writings is essentially that of a formalist critic. However, attention is also paid to the cultural milieu of the writer. Thus many valid insights into the nature of the relation between the writer and his society surface in these articles. The writing is objective only within the limits of its theoretical framework. The linguistic elements of a poem and the structural arrangement of a novel are given due regard, perhaps for the first time in Kannada literary criticism. His style is rather terse and matter-of-fact. This is a welcome departure from the prevalent critical style of the time replete with adjectives and exclamations.

With his premature death, Kannada lost a critic of rare merit and impeccable integrity.

KRISHNAMURTI, R. (Tamil; 1899, d. 1954). A very famous journalist, short story writer and novelist, Krishnamurti, known popularly as Kalki, was weaned away from his school final by the call of Mahatma Gandhi to serve the nation by joining the Freedom Movement in 1921. His service chiefly consisted in spreading the message of Gandhi to the masses for which he was sent to prison more than once (1922, 1930, 1941). He received good training in journalism under V. Kalyanasundaram, a famous Tamil scholar and a trade union leader. He started his journalistic career as a sub-editor of Navashakti. Then he served Vimochanam (a journal of Raja's Tiruchengode Ashram), and the famous Ananda vikatan till 1941, and this year he started his own journal, Kalki, christened after his pen-name. It is during his journalistic career that he demonstrated his literary talents as an essayist (all of them helping to propagate the Gandhian ideals of Rama Rajya) and as a fiction writer.

Kalki has written some 55 short stories of which 'Kanaiyaliyir kanavu' (The dream of a ring), 'Itinta kottai' (The dilapidated fort), 'Orrai roja' (The solitary rose) and 'Amara vazhvu' (Eternal life) are the most famous in terms of theme and artistic skill. Written during the pre-Independence days, his short stories reveal his social consciousness and his abiding interest in reformistic ideals to shape the slowly emerging new society of his time. He was one of the pioneers who brought the modern literary forms to the masses during the thirties and forties of this century. Though his literary personality manifested equally well in essay-writing, journalism and short-story writing, his strength as a fiction writer lay in the field of novel-writing. Kalvanin katali (The love of the robber, 1939), Tyaga bhumi (The land of sacrifice, 1941), Mak-tuapati (1944), Sivakamiyin sapatam (The vow of Shivakami, 1946), Ponniyin selvan (The son of Ponni, the Cauvery), Parttipan kanavu (The dream of Partipan), Alai Osai (The sound of waves, 1950), Solaimalai ilavarasi and Poiman karadu are the important novels of Kalki, besides Amaratara which he left unfinished to be completed by his daughter Anandi. Of these Alai Osai, Tyaga bhoomi and Kalvanin katali are concerned with social themes. Kalki considered Alai osai as his masterpiece. It also posthumously won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956. Sivakamiyin sapatam gives us the picture of the Pallava age in the seventh century with remarkable skill in the delineation of characters and in the construction of the plot. Parttipan kanavu is also set against the background of the Pallava regime while Ponniyin selvan takes us to the age of imperial Cholas, especially Raja Raja I. These three are his major historical novels which set the pattern of historical fiction in Tamil, to be followed by several later novelists like Akilan and others. He can be rightly called the father of the historical novel in Tamil.

Simplicity of style, genial humour without bordering on vulgarity, and clarity of thought with an aim of social amelioration are the characteristic features of Kalki as an essayist. Apart from hundreds of editorial and critical writings, Kalki wrote the biographies of Mahatma Gandhi, Mantarukkul oru teyvam (A God among men), and Rajaji, Nattukkoru Putalvar (An illustrious son of the nation). His essays on the greatness of Tamil music are found collected in a book Chankita yokam (The book of music).

Kalki enriched his mother tongue by his art of translation also. He translated the autobiographical essays of Gandhiji from The Young India which formed a book later, namely Satiya sotana. He has also translated into Tamil Lala Lajpat Rai's History of Indian National Movement and Swami Vivekananda's Our Motherland. Several writings of Kalki have been translated into English, Russian, German and many of the Indian languages. For example, his Parttipan kanavu has been translated into the different languages of India by the Sahitya Akademi.

KRISHNAMURTI SASTRY, SISHTU (Telugu; b.1890) was born at Gollapalem in East Godavari district. He was proficient not only in Telugu and Sanskrit but also in music. He was the poet laureate of the rulers of the province of Ramachandravaram. He was a great scholar. He lived at Srikalahasti for about 16 years as poet laureate at the request of Damerla Venkatapati, the ruler of Srikalahasti. He lived for some time at the house of Tulasinga Setty, Sirastadar in the Collectorate of Kakina-da, as an exponent of the puranas, during which period he wrote Strinita shastram. He turned Andhravyakaranam into Harikarikavali in Sanskrit. Some of the critics like Kalluri Venkata Rama Sastry believed that Chinnaya Suri's Balavyakaranam was only a translation of Krishnamurti Sastry's Harikarikavali. On the contrary, critics like Duvvuri Venkata Rama Sastry proved that Krishnamurti Sastry has written his Harikarikavali only on the basis of Chinnaya Suri's Balavyakaranam.

Krishnamurti Sastry was well-known as a great scholar, a great poet and an expert in the six darshanas. Works like Yakshollasam, Pallvipallavolasam, Madanabhyudayam, Kankanabandham, Nilashailavadheeyam and Ashwasastram written in Sanskrit stand to his credit. His works in Telugu include Venkatachalamahatmyam, Sarvakamadaparinayam, Strinitishastram, Panchatantram, Natakadipam, Vasucharitravyakhyanam and Vayuputra Shatakam.

KRISHNAMURTI SASTRY, SRIPADA (Telugu; b. 1866, d. 1960) was a scholar, poet and versatile writer hailing from Rajahmundry, a traditional centre of culture and learning. His literary output was amazingly prolific, running into nearly two hundred volumes. He attempted almost all forms of literature, classical as well as lyrical—including poetry, social, mythological and historical types of dramas, essay, biography and criticism. He wrote with such ease that the original draft was as good as the press copy. The rapidity of his composition was the envy and despair of his compeers. Endowed with rare gifts he could accomplish the feat of translating single-handed all the eighteen parvas of the Mahabharata. His aim was to keep close to the original text, avoiding the liberties taken by the older poets when they rendered Sanskrit classics into Telugu. Ease and fidelity were there though felicity may be wanting at some places in his Srikrishna-bharatam which took him twenty years to complete. He repeated the poetic feat by translating the Bhagavata and the Ramayana into Telugu verse. It is an achievement which any poet may legitimately feel proud of.

Among his dramas, Bobbili yuddham, a play based on an episode in historical chronicles, proved to be popular and successful on the stage. His power of vivid portrayal of characters is highly appreciated. He immortalised the wifely devotion of Mallama Devi and the revenge burning in the heart of Tandra Paparaya.

Some of his minor poems are satirical and some are written in pure Telugu without a single Sanskrit word. He performed verbal acrobatics by composing a long poem with only eight letters of the alphabet. His original poem 'Madhukara vijayam' is highly imaginative and reads like a novel written in verse.

In the field of journalism Krishnamurti Sastri has a special place of distinction, because his Gautami was the first daily newspaper in Telugu. Later he ran a journal named Vajrayudham for some years. In its pages he expressed his views without fear or favour, with a rare courage and conviction. He sought to stem the rising tide of 'vyavaharika' (spoken word) style. He was a stout champion of 'grandhika' (literary) prose style which he did not abandon till his death. Tenali Ramakrishna charitra is regarded as the best of his prose works.

His literary efforts were widely recognised and he received several titles of honour like Mahamahopadhyaya, Kavi Sarvabhouma, and Kalaprapurna. Andhra Pradesh Government honoured him by designating Sripada as poet-laureate which title he held till his death.

As a man Sripada was equally admired for his integrity of character and generous temperament. When he was provoked to enter the fray, Sripada proved to be a formidable adversary in literary controversies, displaying his gift of wit and sarcasm.

Even if sheer bulk is taken into consideration, Sripada Krishnamurti Sastry stands in the literary horizon at a lofty and awe-inspiring peak of eminence. He crossed swords with his illustrious contemporaries on several issues relating to literary taste and style. He boldly attacked the ancient venerable poet, Pothana, because Sripada believed that Pothana's portrayal of Krishna was not faithful to the original and not justifiable on grounds of propriety. He found fault with Pothana for having painted Krishna as a thief and a profligate. Such was his strength of conviction that he did not spare anyone living or dead. Though he knew he was in the minority, Sripada continued to fight against the vyavaharika movement which advocated the breaking of grammatical rules and the employment of the spoken word in literary works. Though it was a battle doomed to failure he fought to the last with unshaken faith and unswerving loyalty. Like a hero he could stand up against the opinion of the majority when he felt sure that his stand was right.

KRISHNANKUTTY MENON, (Malayalam; b. 1928). Moorkanat Krishnankutty Menon, better known by his pen name 'Vilasini', is the son of Kurupath Raman Menon and Kochunarayani Amma. A journalist-turned-novelist, he graduated from St. Thomas's College, Trichur. He worked as a teacher and clerk for some years and joined the India Movie News published from Singapore in 1953 as editor. In 1955 he joined the international news agency called Agence France-Presse (AFP) as sub-editor at Singapore and came up the ladder as News Editor, Bureau Chief and the Director of its South-East-Asia-Bureau. Leaving AFP in 1977 he returned to Kerala to devote his entire time to writing.

Vilasini's literary career began from his college days, when he attempted writing poetry and short stories. But he soon identified the novel as his favourite medium, and it started flowering with Niramulla nizhalukal (Coloured shadows, 1965). The story is based on the life of the Keralites who lived in Singapore during the time of the Second World War. Raghavan goes to Malaya, grows up in a competitive and amoral atmosphere and survives. He betrays his friend, Zacharia, and rapes the latter's wife. But Raghavan gets disturbed when he learns that his daughter Indira is in love with Muniswamy. Indira elopes with Muniswamy. Raghavan reveals to his wife, Dakshayani, that Muniswamy is his own son by Lakshmi, his maid servant. There are several pulsating scenes in the novel. In this novel, Vilasini has followed the stream-of-consciousness technique. The story is presented as flash-back. This novel won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award.

Inangatta kannikal (Links that do not match, 1968) of Vilasini is a philosophical novel. The plot element in it is very meagre. Panikkar, who loses his wife, Sati, in a car accident, is invited to live with Rajan and Uma.

A flash-back reveals that there was once a scandal about a liaison between Sati and Rajan. But actually the liaison was between Pannikar and Uma. Pannikar goes away and after a lot of wanderings, in body and mind, comes back to claim Uma openly. But she refuses to leave Rajan. Pannikar goes away leaving a long letter wherein he says that life should be action and not escape. The bulk of the novel is taken up by very abstract analyses and discussions of Husserl, Gurdjeff, Ouspensky, Indian philosophy and Sartre. Pannikar finds peace in the philosophy of detachment as exemplified in the Bhagavad-gita. This novel is considered to be the best of Vilasini.

His Oonjal (Swing, 1969) traces the mind of the chief character named Vijayan. His mind wavers like a swing between the reminiscences of life in Kerala and Singapore. In this novel also the stream of consciousness technique is used. Vilasini has elsewhere said that he considered his Chundeli (Mouse, 1971) as a little masterpiece, but the readers did not share his view. In his Tutakkam (Beginning, 1977) the story of Bindu facing life at a juncture when her lover has been killed, father sentenced to capital punishment and mother on her death-bed is projected. In between his own creative writings, he translated from English the Japanese Nobel prize winner Kawabata Yasunari's House of Sleeping Beauties (Sahashayanam, 1974) and the Persian novelist, Sadiq Hidayat's The Blind Owl (Kurutan moonga, 1977).

Vilasini's Avakashikal (The heirs, 1980), which runs into four big volumes, also employs the stream of consciousness technique. The novel is narrated from the points of view of different characters. As a stupendous work of sustained inspiration encompassing myriad thoughts, feelings and impressions, Avakashikal claims a unique position in Malayalam literature. Avakashikal has bagged the National Award, the Otakkuzhal Award, Sahitya Pravarthaka Benefit Fund Award and the Vayalar Award. Vilasini's works also include Kaittiri, (Wicks-poems, 1972), Utirmanikal (Fallen grains, essays, 1969) and Swa-le (Our correspondent, journalism, 1970).

KRISHNAN NAIR, SIROMANI, P. (Malayalam; b. 1891, d. 1957). Born at Pykulam house, Palghat, P.Krishnan Nair, better known as Siromani Krishnan Nair, became one of the eminent Sanskrit scholars and Malayalam writers of the time. He was a teacher by profession and worked first in the Municipal College, Coimbatore and then in the Presidency College, Madras.

Krishnan Nair was the first to write an elaborate treatise in Malayalam on the principles of literary criticism based on Sanskrit aesthetics, especially the Dhvani theory of Anandavardhana. His Kavyajivitavritti, in three volumes (published by the University of Madras, 1937-42, where he was a research scholar also), contains critical commentaries on Sanskrit aesthetics and an evaluation in their light, of Malayalam poetry, both ancient and modern. Kavya-lokam is another work written by him.

Krishnan Nair has a good sense of discrimination and takes only the best and most authentic elements from ancient aesthetics. He unhesitatingly rejects the scholasticism associated with the decadent age in Sanskrit poetry. Above all, he applies his modern sensibility in his assessment of poets like Vallattol

He was also an admirer of indigenous performing arts like Kathakali. His book entitled Attakkatha adhava kathakali is well-known, though he is chiefly known for the monumental Kavyajivitavritti.

P.N.K.

KRISHNAN TAMPI (Malayalam; b. 1890, d. 1938). Born in Trivandrum as the youngest son of his parents, Krishnan Tampi became a member of Vadassery Amma Veedu (hence the initial V. prefixed to the name) when Srimulam Tirunal Maharaja of the erstwhile Travancore state married his eldest sister and adopted the entire family. One of his private tutors happened to be the famous poet K.C.Kesava Pillai who taught him, even while he was a school boy, literature and music, for which he had shown unusual talent right from his childhood days. He took his B.A. degree with Malayalam and Sanskrit as optionals in 1913 and left for England for higher studies two years later. Being an intense lover of freedom and a champion of the down-trodden, he was drawn into the vortex of the Irish Home Rule movement gathering momentum in Great Britain at that time. So he had to come back in 1917 without any additional academic qualification. In the same year he was appointed Principal of the Government Sanskrit College at Trivandrum. Afterwards he worked for about four years as the Head of the Department of Oriental Languages at the Arts College, Trivandrum. While addressing a student gathering, he slumped down and collapsed.

Krishnan Tampi was a poet, composer, playwright, novelist and promoter of the arts, especially the indigenous art of Kathakali. There are to his credit about 22 works belonging to different genres, written in Sanskrit and Malayalam. His Chanakyan is a very successful translation of the Sanskrit play Mudrarakshasam. Of his three 'attakkathas', the best known is Tataka-vadham, in which he had introduced some welcome innovations. The novels Kapalakundala and Soudamini are both historical. He is remembered today chiefly as a great scholar, philanthropist, patron of the arts and above all as a talented writer.

K.S.N.

KRISHNARAO, ARAKALAGUDU NARASINGARAO (Kannada; b. 1908, d. 1971) was a prolific Kannada writer who has to his credit nearly two hundred works in almost all branches of writing except poetry. Born at Kolar he had his schooling at Bangalore at the National High School where he cultivated a habit of wide reading to the neglect of his studies. A dropout from school, he read on his own as his tastes and aptitudes dictated. Admiration for Varadachar, the great actor and an associate of his father, developed his interest in drama. Reacting against the predominantly mythological themes of Varadachar's performances, Krishnarao produced his first work, a social play, Maduveyo manehalo. This started him on his career as a writer. He began with short stories but soon graduated to the novel in which form he excelled. Though he has written much else, Krishnarao remains primarily an extraordinarily popular novelist.

KRISHNASASTRI AMBALE RAMAKRISHNASASTRI

Of the 190 books he published, 112 are novels of which all but fifteen deal with a wide spectrum of social themes. These range from the problems of the artists to the evil effects of western education, from the sustaining values of Indian culture to the break-up of the joint family system, from prostitution and sexual promiscuity to communalism and corruption in public life, from women's freedom to marital disharmony, from religious hypocrisy to political opportunism, from prohibition and jail reform to the beauty of pure love and the glory of sacrifice for the national cause, from the callousness of the rich to the degradation of the poor and so on. There is hardly an aspect of contemporary life he does not touch. Some of his novels deal with the glories of the Vijayanagar empire.

The phenomenal popularity of his novels is explained by what is their strength and weakness at the same time. They flatter the sensibilities of the middle class he depicts by romanticising their joys and sorrows. The realistic technique of narration subtly conceals a slight excess of idealised sentiment in respect of both good and evil so that the reader finds himself portrayed as he would like to be portrayed and situations developing along his own wishes. While this makes the narrative interesting it weakens characterisation by tilting it towards extremes. But the extraordinary facility of his prose, the liveliness of his dialogues and the briskness of the story's movement engage the reader's mind. In historical novels too the glorification of the chosen heroes pays similar dividends. The success of this technique led to repetitive patterns of characterisation and narrative in dozens and dozens of his later novels so that, paradoxically, his best novels belong to the early phase of his career. His plays and short stories too which deal with similar themes, despite their readability, suffer from this inherent weakness.

His non-fiction writings fill several volumes. They can be classified under some heads. First there are innumerable essays dealing with literature and the arts, their relation to life, the way they can enrich the life of the people. Another group comprises appreciations of individual writers like Raghavanka, Sarvajna, Basava, Omar Khayyam and Kailasam and of the contribution of the Virashaiva writers generally. A third group consists of biographical sketches of Kannada writers and artists, famous and less known. Short biographies of saints and savants like Allama, Kabir, Vivekananda and Gandhi form another group. His study of Ravi Varma's paintings is the first of its kind. An interview with himself and portions of an autobiography form yet another group. Then there is a considerable body of polemical writing dealing with current affairs, chief among which stands his book-length defence, Sahitya mattu kamaprachodane, when his novels dealing with prostitution were charged with obscenity. His compilations of representative Kannada and translated stories have been prefaced by long and well-informed introductions. He was in the vanguard of the progressive movement in Kannada which, however, did not strike roots.

Krishnarao was an unflinching champion of the Kannada cause. His eloquence like his writings drew unbounded admiration. He presided over the Kannada Literary Conference in 1961, was the first Chairman of the State Sahitya Akademi and a recipient of the honorary doctorate of the Mysore University.

V.M.I.

KRISHNASASTRI AMBALE RAMAKRISHNASASTRI (Kannada; b. 1890, d. 1968), the eminent Kannada professor, scholar, critic and editor, was born in Mysore and received his early training in Sanskrit from his father who was a professor of Grammar at the Maharaja's Sanskrit College. After schooling at the Wesleyan Mission School, he graduated in English, Sanskrit and Kannada and took the Master's Degree of the Madras University with distinction in Sanskrit and Kannada. Working for a time in the District Office at Mysore, he joined the Mysore University as a lecturer from where after thirtyone years he retired as Professor and Head of the Kannada Department.

When he joined the University, Kannada studies did not enjoy the position and prestige of other subjects. He set about ensuring for Kannada the prominent position due to it; his assiduous teaching attracted a band of students who under his guidance and encouragement became the harbingers of the Kannada literary renaissance. The Karnataka Sangha he founded became the mother of similar institutions to promote the cause of Kannada, and the quarterly journal Prabuddha Karnataka which he started set the standard of good writing and balanced literary judgement.

With his deep and precise scholarship Krishnasastri contributed masterly introductions to the classical Kannada works he edited—Nayasena's Dharmamrita and Raghavanka's Harishchandra kavya. The chapter on Alankaras he contributed to the Kannada kaipidi is scholarly and authoritative. He edited Kavijimvhabandha- nam, a sixteenth century work on prosody, which throws light on the influence of Telugu on Kannada metres. As the first editor of the Kannada-Kannada Lexicon for fourteen years he engaged his scholarship to put the great project on an even keel. His brochure on Sarvajna can be a model for brief exposition of a poet's work. But his erudition and fine critical sense are best seen in his Bhasakavi and Sanskrita nataka. In the former a review of the entire research work on Bhasa is accompanied by his own discerning evaluation of the plays. The latter which is a study of the origin, development and achievement of Sanskrit drama is unsurpassed for its meticulous scholarship and fine taste in literary appreciation. Not less impressive is his Vachana Bharata, which, in about four hundred pages of transparent prose, retells the entire epic story without omitting anything of significance. Its introduction traces the growth of the epic and elucidates its relevance to modern times. His prose rendering of Somadeva's Kathasaritsagara is a close rival to similar distinction.

KRISHNASWAMI SHARMA, B.N.—KRISHNATTAM

But his finest critical work is his Bankimchandra, an exhaustive critical account of the life and work of the novelist. The writing of the book which won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1961 involved rendering not only the novels in the original but almost everything written about him and his work into English and Bengali. His habits of meticulous study and fine literary sense made his book a real treat. Attracted to Bengali early in life he studied the language to be able to read the novels in the original when he had to teach them to the students. From Bengali he translated Saratchandra Chakravarti's Nagamahashaya and Swami shishya samvada. The latter was done in collaboration with Venkanniah as also an account of his life of Ramakrishna Paramahansa. Another translation from Bengali was Tagore's Nibandhamala. A few short stories (Sripatiya kathegalu) is all he did as creative writing. His other occasional writings, speeches and reviews, collected in two volumes, are, like all his other writings, exemplars of a fine and lucid prose style and impeccable scholarship.

Krishnasastri along with Srikantiah and Venkanniah was a pioneer in promoting the cause of Kannada language and literature at a time when they suffered from neglect. He not only helped a revival of their study and cultivation but by precept and example encouraged new writing and set up high standards of literary excellence. Presidentship of the Kannada Literary Conference and an honorary doctorate of the Mysore University are but two of the many distinctions conferred on him for his services to Kannada.

KRISHNASWAMI SHARMA, B.N. (Sanskrit; b. 1909) was born in a family of traditional Sanskrit scholars. He had his post-graduate education in Sanskrit at the University of Madras and worked as a lecturer at the Annamalai University. In 1953 he became the Head of the Department of Sanskrit at the Ruparel College, Bombay.

Krishnaswami is a well-known scholar of Sanskrit and his contribution to Sanskrit scholarship has been recognized with the conferment of distinctions and titles by various institutions. The most distinguished work of Krishnaswami is his A History of Dvaita School of Vedanta and Its Literature. He received the Sahitya Akademi award on this work in 1963. He has also published a number of learned and research papers. Krishnaswami's work is an authentic history of the Dvaita thought as initiated by Madhvacharya (13th cent.) and developed by his successors such as Jayatirtha, Vyasatirtha (1478-1539), Anandabhataraka (c. 1535-1605), Vanamali Misra (c. 1650-1720), Vijayindra Tirtha (1574-1595), Vadiraja Tirtha (c. 1480-1600), Vidyadhiraja Tirtha (1388-1412). The long and rich tradition of writers right from the Acharya down to the present time has been fully represented. The work contains authentic biographical sketches of all the writers of the tradition and analysis of all their major works. The book also includes an exposition of the line and technique of polemics of the Madhava writers against opponents, particularly the Advaita school.

It is well-known that some of those writers were good poets who wrote excellent poetry—though hagiographical and religious. Krishnaswami makes an attempt to assess their contributions to Sanskrit poetry KRISHNATTAM (Malayalam), which literally means a dance pertaining to Lord Krishna, is a form of dance performance which originated in Kerala during the later half of the seventeenth century. The performance is based on a Sanskrit work called Krishnagit, composed by king Manaveda of the Zamorin dynasty. Krishnagit, which consists of shlokas (quartets in Sanskrit metres) and padams (songs set to various tunes), has clearly imitated the Gitagovinda of Jayadeva. It narrates the story of Krishna from birth to death. For the purpose of performance the entire story is divided into eight episodes as follows: Avataram, Kalyanaraddanam, Rasakrida, kam-savadham, Svayamvaram, Banayuddham, Vividavadham and Svargarohanam. Each one of these parts will be performed for one night, the entire series extending to eight days but, according to the custom, the first story, Avataram has to be performed once again on the ninth day. This is done because the series should not conclude with the Lord's death as that would be inauspicious. There is an unwritten convention which prohibits the performance of Krishnattam outside temple premises. Of late, however, this is not adhered to as the performance is conducted in public places also.

The performance consists of mainly dances and appropriate facial expressions. The actors do not employ the highly conventionalized 'mudras' (hand gestures) that are used in kathakali. There are two singers who position themselves behind the actual area of performance. They sing the shlokas and padams continuously one after another and the actors enact them on the stage. The lyrics are accompanied by 'maddalam' (a type of drum beaten on both sides by both the hands), 'chengala' (a gong) and 'ilattalam' (cymbals). Because of the absence of 'vakyabhinaya' (translation of the lyrics through symbolic gestures) and because of the accompanying text being in chaste Sanskrit, this art has a limited appeal. Its structure and performance are not so dynamic as to attract wide appreciation. The art has survived through the years chiefly because of its devotional content.

The make-up and costumes resemble those of kathakali and kutiyattam. For some characters extensively decorated crowns are used. For others masks are employed. These masks are imitation of those used in folk arts like tirayattam, teyyattam and bhutamtullal which were prevalent in Kerala even before the introduction of Krishnattam.

Krishnattam is even now performed regularly on certain days in a year at the Srikrishna temple at Guruvayur.

KRISHNAVATARLILA (Kashmiri) is a long poem by an anonymous poet. The manuscript of this poem was located for the first time by Buhlar in 1887 during his visit which he made in search of Sanskrit manuscripts.

The manuscript located by Buhlar was later edited by George Abraham Grierson and published by the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal in the early twenties of this century. Grierson attributed this poem to Dinanath on the basis of the word 'diyun' used in the last stanza of the poem. It will be interesting to note that diyun is neither a name nor a synonym of Dinanath. It simply means a bhakta or devotee. Another point to note in this connection is that we have not been able to locate a poet Dinanath by name till date.

This poem is also known as Krishnavtar charit, which is revealed by the other manuscript of the poem in the research library of Kashmir University and is listed at No. 730. How Grierson gave its present name to the poem, Krishnavtar lila, is not known; most probably he gave this title to the poem on the basis of its contents. There is a slight variation in the published and unpublished versions of this poem. The unpublished version seems older and close to the original.

This poem has also been attributed to Sahib Kaul (b. 1629), but the language and diction of the poem are far away from those of Sahib Kaul. The diction of Sahib Kaul is archaic, close to Sanskrit, while this poem has borrowed quite a number of words from Persian. So far as the language, diction and word-hoard of Krishnavtar lila are concerned, this poem seems to be the composition of Prakash Ram of Kurigram (1819-1877).

The Royal Asiatic Society has published this poem in Devanagari script with certain modifications in the script so as to make it suitable for Kashmiri. This poem is yet to be published in the present-day Kashmiri script.

This poem is the first of its kind in Kashmiri and is important in a number of ways.

It marks the beginning of Krishna-bhakti in Kashmiri literature and represents the Kanta-bhava of this school which was till the date of the composition of this poem unknown in Kashmiri.

The devotional element has added grace and charm to this poem. It is written in the form of 'Vatsun', a melodious folk form of Kashmiri poetry. The poem is full of captivating music. It must have been very popular in the past as some portions of this poem are still sung during marriage ceremonies as folk wedding-songs.

The poem, spread over 1172 stanzas, is considered a milestone in the Krishna-bhakti literature of Kashmiri.

KRISHNAYAN (Hindi), a modern epic by Dwarkaprasad Mishra composed in Awadhi, follows the great epic tradition of Ramcharitmanas and Padmavat, and stands out as the third remarkable poetic composition in the line. Composed during the most turbulent era of the Indian independence struggle fought between 1942 and 1945, it narrates the tale of Krishna in a novel and original fashion. The traditional hero that was Krishna, is inspired and transformed here into a different mould dictated by the needs of the times. The most outstanding incarnated character is infused with the spirit and energy generated by the popular radical movement launched by the enslaved Indian nation for its awakening and independence. While keeping intact his godhood that finds a permanent niche in the popular mind, the poet's perpetual emphasis is on his human quality and humanity. Born and brought up as a normal human being, the human aspect of Krishna's personality forms the pivot of the epic. The natural beauty of the country, its vast woods, the changing scenario of the countryside, its flora and fauna find adequate place in the total set-up of the work. Except for the unbearable summer, all other seasons and the natural wealth of beauty that they unfold, are all there in their glory and grandeur.

The Krishnayan is unique in its manifestation of Indian unity that lies underneath all her diversities. It is the poet's unfailing belief that the realisation of this ultimate truth is possible only through emotional experience and not through reason. True patriotism, according to him, lies in this realisation of unity in the midst of diverse forms. True liberation is for those who worship this unity and identity as the basic reality amongst all divisions and diversifications. The valedictory address by Krishna to Maitreya that forms the concluding part of the epic, represents the essence of the Bhagavadgita which, according to the poet, marks Krishna's Weltanschauung and is an everlasting inspiration for all ages.

Being a statesman himself, the poet's characterisation of Krishna is a happy blending of statesmanship and practical morality. The unfathomable complexity of character manifested by Krishna with a rich amalgam of ethical quality and morality is inspired by the objective of the 'Dvapara age' for the establishment of the 'Rule of Law'. The Krishnayan projects Krishna, perhaps, for the first time in a literary composition, as a pioneer of a widespread popular revolution against the inhuman atrocities wrought by such savage characters as Kalayavana, Bhaumasura, Jarasandha and his son-in-law, the infamous ruler of Mathura, Kamsa. Krishna's detachment is richly imbued not only with a deep sense of duty, but also with profound sympathy. Krishna emerges as almost a novel character symbolising self-abnegation as well as benevolence.

The whole story of Krishna finds its poetic manifestation in the Krishnayan. The abundance of the episodes in Krishna's multidimensional life-history has been successfully interwoven by the poet into a logical sequential relationship. He has succeeded in delineating both Aryans and non-Aryans as equally lively characters. Drawing freely from the Mahabharata, the Puranas and the Bhagavata-purana he has interwoven the various strands into an overall emotive story pattern as a systematic history. He gives ample evidence of his meticulous ingenuity in carving out all his male as well as female characters according to his aesthetic principle, and they range from Ugrasena, Kamsa, Vasudeva, Devaki, Nanda, Yashoda, Shishupala, Balarama, Uddhava to the various demonic kings and Dhritarashtra, Vidura, the Pandavas, Karna, Dronacharya, Bhishma, Shakuni, Kunti, Gandhari, Draupadi, Rukmini, Satyabhama, Mitravinda, Subhadra and above all Radha, the embodiment of selfless love. In short the Krishnayan is a historical-cultural epic depicting the sway of the Aryan life pattern and the righteous state power over the forces ranged against them.

KRISTUBHAGAVATA (Sanskrit) is an epic on the life and teachings of Jesus Christ written by P.C. Devassia (b.1906). The work earned for the poet the Sahitya Akademi award in 1980. The work is set on the pattern of court epics and consists of thirty-three cantos corresponding to the years of Christ's life. The verses are composed in selected pleasing metres chiefly anushtubh and upajati and in Vaidarbhi style. The poet has used simile and a few commonly known figures, but his composition is rich in allusions to Indian mythological lore. The title Kristubhagavata is well justified as the work depicts the life of the founder of a religion and hence should be called, in Indian terminology, an 'Acharya' or a 'Bhagavan'. The predominant sentiment (rasa) of this mahakavya is 'shanta' (sublime). Though the author relies on the Gospels and on some well-known biographers, yet he shows, at places, his freedom and imagination as a poet. While narrating the story of Christ's life, the poem recounts not only the incidents and miracles of his life, but also his immortal sayings which continue to inspire millions of souls. The treatment of the theme is dramatic and the style is chaste and ornate and the presentation is poetically imaginative. The work is a notable contribution to the field of modern creative writings in Sanskrit.

KRITTIBAS OJHA (Bengali; b. 1398), the earliest and the greatest amongst the writers of Bengali Ramayana, came from a Brahmin family. His surname was Mukhuti. Ojha was the corrupt form of his ancestral surname, 'Upadhyaya'.

Pieces of information regarding Krittibas are available in various manuscripts of his Ramayana. An autobiographical narrative ascribed to him has also been found. As most of the statements of this narrative are corroborated by other sources, their authenticity has been established.

From these sources, we learn that the names of Krittibas's parents were Banamali and Malini. The poet was born on a Shripanchami day. He went to North Bengal for higher studies. After completing his studies he began to write the Ramayana. He also went to Gaud, the capital of Bengal (now in the district of Malda, West Bengal) and met the king of Bengal in his court. The latter felicitated the poet with sandal, garland and a piece of cloth. Scholars are not unanimous about the identity of this king. As the names of some of his courtiers mentioned by Krittibas are common with the names of some nobles of Rukn-ud-Din Barbak Shah (1455-76), it is reasonable to hold that it was he who felicitated Krittibas. This view is corroborated by two other facts. Firstly, a grandson of one of the brothers of Krittibas was living about 1515 and secondly, Barbak Shah was a great patron of literature and learning.

Krittibas's Ramayana became extremely popular in Bengal amongst all sections of the people. In it they find the reflection of their own life. For these reasons this Ramayana may be regarded as the national epic of the Bengalis.

But because of its popularity, many interpolations have taken place in this work and its language has also been modernised. Scholars, however, are trying to restore the original text with the help of old manuscripts.

KSHEMDHARI SINHA (Maithili; b. 1894, d. 1961) belonged to the family of the Maharaja of Darbhanga and lived all his life at Madhubani as a 'Babu Saheb' (Zamindar) popularly known as 'Srikar Saheb'. He had his early education at home. He passed the Matriculation Examination of the Calcutta University in 1910, and the Intermediate Exam from the Muir Central College, Allahabad, in 1913. Then he worked as a teacher in the Watson High English School, Madhubani, from 1914 to 1917. He graduated, however, from Patna University in 1918. He was made an Honorary Magistrate by the Government from 1918 to 1935. Meanwhile he read the standard texts of Sahitya, Vyakarana, Dharmashastra and Vedanta from traditional pandits of Mithila. Indeed, he patronized a large number of Sanskrit pandits and devoted days and nights to higher learning. He was honoured by the title of 'Vedantavinoda' by the Sanskrit Vidvat Parishad in 1923. Unfortunately he became crippled at the age of 32 but continued to pursue the study of traditional and modern works with genuine dedication.

He wrote extensively in Sanskrit in prose and verse, chief of which are Surathacharita (epic) and several poems (such as Shrikarabhaktitaranga, 1963). In Maithili he translated Kalidasa's Abhijnanashakuntala in prose in 1918 which is still unpublished. But he is better known for his text-books on Sankhyakhadyotika (1937), and the unpublished Manovijnana (1947-1948) and Kartavyashastra (1953-1954). He wrote some hymns also but his fame as a writer rests on the collection of his essays called Nibandhachandrika (1969) which were actually written from 1945 to 1952.

There are some Hindi and English writings also to the credit of Kshemdhari Sinha.

Kshemdhari Sinha will be remembered in the history of modern Maithili literature as a creator of a prose style which is at once serious, grave and profound without being abstruse; it is lucid, simple and but not commonplace or facile, loose or flippant.

KSHEMENDRA (Sanskrit), the Kashmirian polymath, surnamed Vyasadasa, was born in A.D. 990 as the son of Prakashendra and grandson of Sindhu, in a very rich Shaiva family. He lived in the times of king Ananta (1029-1064) and his son Kalasha (1064-1088) and his literary activities fall in the middle and the second half of the 11th century. He must have lived further than 1066, the year of the composition of his Dashavataracharita. He is a communicative writer and tells us about his friends like Devadhara, Ramayashas, Viryabhadra, Nakka, Saj-janananda, Ragnasimha and the princely Udayasimha and Lakshmanaditya. On his own telling, he had studied under four teachers, viz., Gangaka, Abhinavagupta, Somapada and Viryabhadra (a Buddhist). Somapada was his spiritual guide and Abhinavagupta taught him the 'sahityashastra' (poetics) and allied subjects. He himself, though hailing from a Shaiva family, was a Vaishnava (Narayanaparayana) and praises Vishnu at the beginning and at the end of his works. Somapada was a Bhagavata and might have been responsible for this element in Kshemendra. His literary ideals were Vyasa and Valmiki whom he praises and whose works he epitomised. He abridged also the Brihatakatha of Gunadhya, the Kadambari of Bana and the Kamasutra of Vatsyayana, and produced a collection of Buddhist 'avadanas,' recreating older legends.

His literary compositions number well over forty, though not all are available. Some of these works have been published, some are in manuscript form awaiting publication. S.K. De enlists thirty-seven works which for the present can be taken as authoritative. These works fall into six natural groups dealing with religion and divine incarnations, human conduct, social satires, literary criticism, summaries of renowned works and original compositions.

Into the first group falls the Amritataranga, a short poem that deals with the mythological theme of churning of the ocean by the gods and the demons. The Kanaka-janaki, not available now, possibly dealt with the life of Rama after his return from the exile and particularly with the use of Sita's image, made of gold at the 'ashvamedha' sacrifice. The Chaturvarga-samgraha, a poem of 606 verses divided into four sections, deals with the four 'purusharthas' i.e., dharma, artha, kama and moksha. The Dashavataracharita is a poem of 1760 verses, praising the ten incarnations of Vishnu. The Bodhisattvavadana-kalpalata, also known as Avadanakalpalata, treats the former lives of the Buddha and Buddhist theme. The second group would include the Charucharya, a poem of hundred verses that deals with the principles of good conduct, the Muktavali-kavya, a poem in praise of the ascetic mode of life, and the Sevyasevakopadesha, a poem of sixty-one verses, that deals with the ideal relations between the master and the servant and where contentment on both sides is advised as the best solution to a naughty problem. The poem in the 'mangalacharana' itself praises 'santosha'. In the third category of social satires, falls the Kalavilasa, a poem of 551 verses in ten cantos, that deals with pride, greed, lust, courtesans, kayasthas, goldsmiths and rogues. Muladevam, the teacher of Chandragupta, is the hero of the poem. He puts forth his thesis that roguery has descended on the world and has found shelter in ascetics, medicine-men, musicians, goldsmiths, merchants and actors. The Darpadalana, a poem of 600 verses in seven sections, discusses causes of pride, due to high family connection, wealth, scholarship, beauty, teaching, education, valour, generosity and penance, indicating that pride precedes fall. The Deshopadesha, an ironical social satire of 300 verses, exposes the wicked, the miserly, courtesans, go-betweens, students and old wives. The Narmamala, a poem of 410 verses in three 'parihasa' (ridicules) discusses the mischiefs done by the hypocrites and the rogues in the society; the Lavanyavati describes a sage scholar Artivasu being cleverly deceived and humiliated by the courtesan Vasantika; the Samayamatrika, of 640 verses, resembles in character the Kuttanimata of Damodaragupta in describing, in a satirical manner, the wives of the courtesans; but the author aims at warning the gullible wealthy young people against the lure of the prostitutes. The fourth group that consists of works on literary criticism would include the Auchityavichararcha, a work of 39 karikas which seeks to establish the novel and also a valuable doctrine that 'auchitya' (propriety) is the soul of good poetry. The Suvrittatilaka deals with metres in all their aspects in 424 karikas and is divided into three 'vinyasas'. The last vinyasa discusses the important and interesting topic of themes, rasas, and the different metres suitable for them. This work is very important, and is perhaps unique in the discussions of metrics. The Kavikarnika appears to have been the third work of this class. Here the merits and excellences of poetry are discussed. The last and the fifth class includes the Bharatamanjari, the Ramayananamanjari and the Brihatkathamajari, abridgements of the Mahabharata including the Harivamsha, the Ramayana and the Brihatkatha of Gunadhya, respectively. The Padyakadambari, a summary in verses of the Kadambari of Banabhatta and the Vatsyayana sutrasara, a brief summary of the Kamasutra of Vatsyayana also belong to this class. The last of Kshemendra's next class of writing would be his original compositions and would include the Avasararasasara, a poem in praise of the king Anantaraja; the Chitrabharata, a play based on the Mahabharata in all probability; the Pavanapanchashika, a poem of fifty verses describing the wind; the Nitikalpataru, a commentary on a work of Vyasa on politics, the Munimatamimamsa summarising the teachings of Vyasa; the Lalitaratnamala, a play dealing with the romance of Vatsaraja and Ratnamala; the Lokaprakasha, a poem reflecting the contemporary life; the Vyasashtaka, a poem that in eight verses praises Vyasa, and the Rajavali, offering a list of the kings of Kashmir.

This considerable literary activity of Kshemendra began in 1037 and ended in 1066. Kshemendra was a poet, playwright, historian, rhetorician and also a lexicographer. His abilities had limitations but his love of labour and ambition seem to have had no limits, and by the sheer bulk and variety of his work he acquired a prominent place among the writers of his time.

KSHETRAYYA (Telugu; b. 1600, d. 1680) was a great exponent of Karnataka music and 'pada kavita' in Telugu. Nothing definite is known about him. His real name is supposed to have been Movva Varadaya. As he visited a large number of 'kshetras' (pilgrim centres) composing songs on the deities, he earned the pseudonyms Kshetraya and Kshetragna. The latter perhaps, was due to his way of life. He visited the courts of Tanjore, Madura and Golkonda and composed erotic lyrics in praise of the rulers. His compositions numbered more than 4000 though hardly more than 380 are now extant. His compositions are called padas, lyrics in matra-feet suitable for song and dance. His lyrics are of great artistic excellence and are rich in erotic imagination. Though the orthodox believe that they depict divine love, modern scholars see only profane love in them. They say they reflect his licentious life. Written mostly in 'vilambakala', they represent forty 'raktiragas'. It is now discovered that they illustrate various types of heroines portrayed in Bhanudatta Mishra's Rasamanjari. It seems he was influenced by Annamayya and Purandara Dasa.

KSHIRASAGAR, SHRIKRISHNA KESHAV (Marathi; b. 1901, d. 1980) was born at Khandobachi Pal, in the district of Satara. He had planned to study for LL.B. and to become a lawyer, but his love for literature proved more powerful. He became a teacher in a high school.

He rose to fame as a free thinker and literary critic in 1937. He published his first novel Rakshasa vivaha in 1940, which became a controversial piece of writing because of his unorthodox views. In 1945 he wrote a collection of essays and advocated M.N. Roy's views in his Suvarna tula. He remained a romanticist in literature as in life.

KSHIRASAGARA-KSHUDRAPRABANDHAM

In his Tika-viveka (1965) he discusses in detail the difference in English, German, French, Bengali and Marathi romanticism. But in his socio-political reflective essays he was a progressive. He opposed the reformism of Agarkar. In 1976 he published Tasbir ani taqdir (picture and fate), an autobiography. How a romantic and a realist conflicted in him is delineated in this work. In 1980 he wrote a critical work on Keshavasut and Tambe. In Shri-ke-kshi Vangssayin lekhasangraha (1983) all his literary essays are collectively published. His introduction to the translation in Marathi of Tolstoy's Kreutzer Sonata again created controversy.

He gave Tagore lectures in the Pune University in 1969. His other literary works are Vyakti ani vangmaya (1937), Vangmavin mulven (1946), Sagarmanthan (1959), Vad-Sanvad (1960), Umarkhayyamchi firyad (1961), Bayaka (1962), Vade-vade (1962), Setuparvati (short stories, 1962).

He presided over the Marathi Literary Conference at Baroda in 1951. He presided over the All India Marathi Sahitya Sammelan, Miraj, in 1959 and also over Sharadotsava in 1959 and Gwalior Vangmaya Parishad in 1960.

KSHIRASAGARA (Kannada; b. 1906, d. 1977) is the pen-name of B. Seetharama Sastry, a noted Kannada playwright and short-story writer. A graduate of the Central College, Bangalore and an M.Sc in Mathematics of Calcutta University, he taught Mathematics in Mysore University (1928-62). In the third, fourth and fifth decades of this century his plays were very popular. He wrote about 20 plays, most of them mildly humorous, with just a couple of serious plays; Nammorina paschimakke won popularity both as a play and as a story. He offered mostly the humour of situation. Fifteen Kannada plays and the Best of Three (a mathematical play in English) have been brought together in the two volumes of Kshirasagarara natakagalu (1967 and 1968), ten stories were included in Veelya (1946). He also wrote poems and books on mathematics in Kannada. In addition to Kannada, he knew English and Sanskrit.

KSHIRER PUTUL (Bengali) is one of the best written books in juvenile literature. The author is Abanindranath Tagore (1871-1951), a nephew of Rabindranath Tagore. As he himself tells us, Abanindranath found the story in the note book of Mrinalini Debi, wife of Rabindranath, who, encouraged by her husband, used to collect this type of folk-tales.

The story of Kshirer putul (1896) centres round the traditional characters of a king and his two queens, one fortunate and the other ill-fated; and the usual sufferings and sorrows of the ill-fated queen, who has been cursed with an apparently sub-normal son (here a monkey), who, as time passes, proves to be a prince and brings his mother all the happiness in the world. The story ends with a happy wedding.

Abanindranath did not invent the story but he completely refashioned it. His use of a wonderful stylized language and skill in adapting commonplace folk elements to traditional structural beauty constitute his originality. The language deserves special attention. It is a kind of prose absolutely free from the influence of Rabindranath. It is natural, with an easy-flowing rhythm but is also picturesque. It is musical but full of vigour. It is marked by a bold use of colloquialism and successful neological experiments. His use of folk-rhymes and folk-songs is so appropriate, skilful and so much in harmony with the language and context that the book has become a source of pure joy. Kshirer putul has been a wonderland for the children and a dreamland for the adults. The book was reprinted by Signet Press, Calcutta, in 1971 and was also included in the second volume of Abanindranath's works in 1974 published by Prakash Bhavan, Calcutta.

KSHUDRAPRABANDHAM (Telugu;) is a denigrating name given to shorter poems in Telugu. Appakavi classifies poems into two broad categories; 1. Prabandhas (running into several sargas or chapters) and 2. Chatu Prabandhas (diminutive poems). The latter is called Kshudraparabandha (a trivial poem). It is again subdivided as 1. Sankhyabaddha (having a definite number of verses) and 2. Asankhyabaddha (without such a restriction). In the first category are enumerated: 1. Mukataka (a single-verse poem), 2. Duika (two verses), 3. Trika (three verses), 4. Pancha Ratnalu (five verses), 5. Gajamala (eight verses), 6. Navaratnamalika (nine verses), 7. Nalinamitra Malika (twelve verses), 8. Indukala (sixteen verses), 9. Nakshatra Malika (twenty-seven verses), 10. Trimsat (thirty verses), 11. Panchasat (fifty verses), 12. Shatakam (a hundred verses), and 13. Ashtottara Shatam (one hundred and eight verses). Some added Dvattrimsat (thirtytwo verses) and Saptashati also to this list. The following nine genres are defined under the second category 'Asankhyabaddha' in which the number of verses is not restricted: 1. Udaharanam, 2. Birudavali, 3. Gucchamulu, 4. Chakravalamu, 5. Gucchatati, 6. Chatubhadramu, 7. Ragada, 8. Manjari, and 9. Dandakam. Some theoreticians included 'gadya' (poetic prose) also under this category.

When literature was the monopoly of the highly educated and privileged elite having plenty of leisure at their disposal, the longer poems with their emphasis on erudition and rhetorical jugglery reigned supreme. The shorter poems, mostly devotional and didactic in nature, were looked down upon and were dubbed as Kshudrapra-bandhas.

B.V.S.

KUBERNATH RAI (Hindi; b. 1935) is known as an elegant essayist, adept in interpreting the sublime traits of Indian culture in the context of modern life. Born in Matsa village, in the district of Ghazipur (Uttar Pradesh), he received his education in the Benaras Hindu University and Calcutta University.

His literary talent received recognition in the field of essay-writing. In the beginning, he contributed his thoughtful essays to Madhuri and Vishal Bharat. Afterwards, inspired by Dharmavir Bharati, he started writing on aesthetics. Till now he has to his credit about a dozen published essay-collection. In 1968, his first essay collection Priya nilkanthi was very well received by the Hindi literary world. He followed it up with collections titled Ras akhetak (1970), Gandhamaadan (1972), Vishad yoga (1973), Nishad bansuri (1974), Parna-mukut (1978), Mahakavi ki tarjani (1979), Kamadheni (1980), Mani putul ke naam (1980), Man-pavan ki nauka (1982) and Kiraat nadi mein chandramadhu (1983).

Kubernath Rai has tried to observe and understand the traditional Indian life and culture in the modern context. Besides imbibing the Indian concept of contemplation, he has also studied modern socialism and existentialism. According to his view, the Marxian socialism in its permanent and puissant form becomes in practice a 'amlatantrik samajvad', i.e. bureaucratic socialism. In pristine socialism, the press and literature both get controlled by the governmental authority through 'amlatantra' (Bureaucracy), converting the entire country into a veritable cell for slaughter! Though agreeing with the concept of existentialism to quite an extent, he believes that after making one get the real feel of the surroundings, the real sense of instantaneous sensibilities and the ultimate experience of sorrow, this doctrine gets exhausted. It cannot provide one with a clue to get out of this rigmarole. Purely on the contemplative plane, he believes in finding a new 'karmayoga' to facilitate unfettered, free growth of the spiritually-conscious personality of the country. He seeks to achieve it with the empirical synthesis of the cream of Indian culture with the essential content of modern thought.

In the process of his untiring study of Indian culture, Kubernath Rai has observed that both Aryans and non-Aryans have jointly contributed to the growth of the rich Indian culture. Many fundamental traits of Aryan culture have grown in their intercourse with the 'Kirat-Nishad' culture. For the fundamentals of 'Agam' philosophy, 'Sankhya' and 'Yoga', we are deeply indebted to the Kirat-Nishad culture. Similarly the root of 'Kamakhya' worship can be found embedded in the Nishad-Kirat culture. Nowadays, he is engaged in the study of the culture of 'Greater India', i.e. the culture of the vast concourse of the South-East Asian countries.

Kubernath Rai's essays reveal the elements of personal suggestivity, aesthetic finesse together with investigative and analytical thinking. In these essays, we find a tendency to reinterpret facts obtained through research. He also influences the reader by his original culture-based interpretations of the old myths. This simple melodiousness of folk-life, a sound judgement achieved through deep study of literature, his probing and alert culture and historical perception, his philosophical musings and his practical and result-oriented approach, all these blend to contribute to enrich his essays. After Hazari Prasad Dwivedi, it is undoubtedly Kubernath Rai who impresses the Hindi reader most as an aesthetic essayist.

KUCHH KAVITAYEN (Hindi) is the first collection of poems of Shamsheer Bahadur Singh, a significant poet of the 'Nai kavita' trend. Though associated with the 'Nai Kavita' trend, Shamsheer is still different from the general run of the poets of this school inasmuch as his poetry represents a synthesis of different sources of inspiration. Impressionist school of art, imagism, symbolism, Marxism, experimentalism, surrealism, Urdu poetry and the 'chhayavadi' romanticism have all joined to cast his poetic consciousness into a curious and complex mould. In the present collection, the creative conflict of his Marxist social consciousness with romantic individualism helps build up a tension that projects his environs effectively.

Kuchh kavitayen, published in 1959, contains poems of different moods and not of 'vision'—the moods of a person who exists in the midst of many lives and experiences realism. His realism is the realism conditioned by the internal heat of a typical psyche. Shamsheer never subjugated himself to the confines of any form, style or theme (Introduction-Kuchh aur kavitayen). It is precisely because of this that we find a conflict between the poet's subjectivity and psychological realism and class consciousness. The poet's divided mind caught in a fix, now touches the objective surface and again recedes into subjectivity. This is amply reflected in his two poems titled 'Rag' and 'Ya sham hai'. In 'Rag', the poetic expression resorts to the device of impressive images. According to Shamsheer, the spontaneous expression of formal experience is poetry. Poetry is spiritual, and spontaneity is its life-breath. On the other hand, we find an emotional adoption of social realism in 'Ya sham hai'. An effort has been made here to reflect the shoot-out incident at Gwalior in all its tragic ramifications. Shamsheer has the skill to completely harmonize subjectivity and social obligation. 'Ek peeli sham' reflects such a perfect harmony.

By nature, Shamsheer is a romantic poet. The image of the poet that emerges through the myriad tender images of romantic life, is totally different from that of the poet who is adept in the portrayal of social reality. In his romantic consciousness and aesthetic sense, he is very close to the chhayavadi poets, especially of 'Nirala'. It is not a mere accident that in his very first poem of this collection 'Nirala ke prati', he invokes the personality and poetic genius of Nirala.

Thus, on the one hand, Shamsheer has assimilated the poetic tradition and aesthetic sensibility of the chhayavadi poetry, and on the other, emphasises the authenticity of experience by coordinating the different facets of Nirala's personality. 'Ek peeli sham', 'Ek salona jism' and 'club' are essentially romantic poems in their sensibility. 'Vasant aya', 'Chhip gaya mukh', 'Geeli mulayam laten', 'Din kishmishreshami', 'Gora' abound in love, passion, aesthetic ambition and intense emotion.

Shamsheer is a psychologically objective poet in his concepts. This objectivity is reflected in the portrayal of psychic responses and conflict with the external world in his choice of emotional contexts. His objectivity lies in the systematic treatment of psychic responses within the framework of emotional aesthetics. In the poem 'Ao' and 'Radio par ek Europiya sangit sunkar', he has adopted the technique of free association of ideas where we find the predominance of broken images pieced together within the subconscious mind.

The importance of Kuchh kavitaen lies in its craftsmanship. It is because of this that Shamsheer could infuse a novelty in these poems ridding himself of the chhayavadi romantic consciousness. In these poems we do find an effort to create a miraculous impact through his images, symbols and similes. It has, of course, a freshness all his own. We also find here the art of projecting minute symbols through the use of suggestive language on the pattern of European symbolists. He chooses his similes and parallels from amongst the objects that we witness in our everyday life. He is a keen observer. His similes strike us as new, effective and expressive. Shamsheer seems to be fastidious about the selection of his words, phrases and usages, and reflects an alertness that is rare amongst the Hindi poets. His words are pregnant with meaning unusually significant and have the power of creating an impact on any sensitive mind. The choice and setting of his words also have a sonorous quality and he creates sound patterns that intensify their effect.

KUDUMPA VILAKKU (Tamil) is major work from the pen of the renowned revolutionary poet of Tamilnadu, Bharatidasan (1891-1964). The work is in five parts and depicts an ideal Tamil family. It is the result of the poet's keen interest in the emancipation of women in society.

The figurative title denotes the lady who is the head of the family. The Tamilians consider 'vilakku' or lamp as divine and auspicious. They worship the lamp with all sincerity. The poet compares the lady with the lamp and brings out the essential qualities which make her great.

The poet wrote a poem 'Takunta kudumpam sarva kalasalai' (A good family is a University) in the Sri Subramanya Bharati kavita mandalam, a journal devoted to poetry, in the year 1935. Later, at the instance of many of his friends, Bharatidasan developed the theme and published Oru nal nikalcchi, the first part of the book Kudumpa vilakku, in 1942. This was followed by Viruntompal in 1944, Tirumanam in 1948, Makkatperu in 1950 and Mutiyor katal in 1950. It took nearly fifteen years for the poet to produce the work; however, it is said that the poet had written the first part in a single night despite the failure of light. The sincere and the devoted services of his daughter Saraswati to the family had inspired the poet to write this work.

For the last part of Mutiyor katal he is deeply indebted to his wife, Palaniyammal, whose love and affection he cherished for ever.

The first part of the work, Oru nal nikalcchi (The incidents of a day) begins with the waking up of the lady, Thangam (Tankam), early in the morning. The dawn is described thus; "The soft rays of the sun have not risen from the East. The darkness worn by the night was not lifted. However, the midnight was slowly vanishing like the foolishness which is removed by the words of the wise. The darkness is shattered just like the mixing of lime in a tub of blue". The lady is duty-conscious and carries out the morning work with all sincerity. After taking breakfast she teaches the children and then sends them to school. In her family she is the cook, she is the tailor, she is the carpenter, she is the doctor, she is the servant, she is the mason. The whole family centres round her. She receives her father-in-law and mother-in-law with great affection. She cooks food keeping in mind the likes and dislikes of the members of the family and also their health. She is appreciated by the older members and respected by the youngsters. When her husband is tired, she goes to the shop run by them and deals with the customers. In the evening, she walks to the beach along with her children and spends the time in a happy mood. At night the husband tells her that they have received an award for bringing up children. They spend some of their time and money for the development of Tamil. The husband is ready even to sacrifice his life for the sake of Tamilnadu. The first part ends with the husband entering the bedroom late at night. He says:

"All the objects in the world,
The next day become old.
All the sweet things in a few days
Will become sour and tasteless.
But, O, my dear, it is fresh and new
The pleasure that you give."

KULANTAIPPULAVAR

The second part is entitled Viruntompal (Hospitality). Thangam welcomes the visitors from Villiyanur, viz., Mavarasu, his wife, Malarkkulali, their son, Navarasu and daughter, Nakaimuttu. They are given the best treatment at home. The guests listen to the old father-in-law of Thangam, who narrates some of the adventures of his early days; he also tells them of the ideals of life, the right path for the welfare of the society and his views on many other matters such as service to the people, love affairs, family planning, death, etc. Thangam, on the other hand, tells the visiting lady about the importance of education for women and nutritious cooking. She says:

"Women without education are barren lands;
Grass may grow there
but not useful songs.
Women, who are learned,
are fertile lands,
I need not tell that they will beget wise children"

(Vol. I)

The children return from the school and at the request of the visitors sing beautiful songs. This part ends with Vetappan, the son of Thangam, falling in love with the visiting beauty, Nakaimuttu.

Tirumanant (Wedding) is the third part of the work. Vetappan, who was sent by his father to recover the loan from one Chinnan at Villivanur, meets Nakaimuttu. She takes the initiative and asks him;

"I will ask you one question
In this beautiful surrounding of Scent, air and shadow;
When will be our marriage?
What have we to do next?"

(Vol. II)

Because of a misunderstanding between the two fathers the marriage cannot be celebrated. An old man who accidentally knew about the love of Vetappan and Nakaimuttu conveys the message to Thangam and her husband. Manavalaku immediately accepts the proposal despite the ill-feelings. Nakaimuttu tells all of them that the marriage should be simple and after that they should be allowed to live in a separate house. The marriage had no religious rites and was performed in a new style without any of the old customs.

The fourth part is Makkat peru which means begetting children. The parents devote much care to the health of Nakaimuttu during her pregnancy. She delivers a female child which is later named by the elders as 'Amiltam'. In the lullabies of the mother, lady companions, grandmothers, the poet brings out the beauty of Tamil and the richness of Tamil culture. There are some nursery rhymes written by Bharatidasan in this part.

The fifth and the last Mutiyaor katal is first of its kind in Tamil poetry. This portion depicts the 'love of the aged'. The elders are under the care of their children. Though they become old their mutual affection and love has not diminished. The old man, Manavalaku, says:

It is not a new flower but a bundle of dry grass, her body;
It is not a dance, her walk.
the staggering steps of an old lady.
It is not a moon, her face,
a barren land; holds deep eyes.
What will give me pleasure?
It is nothing but her existence".

(Vol. II)

When the elderly Manavalaku is asked about the secret of his long and happy life till the age of 105, he replies: "My parents had good character. They made me a learned man. I, too, did not go wayward. To top all these, the wife I have is too dear to me; she is my eyes. A woman without any blemish, she will sacrifice even her life for me. I owe my life to her; only because of her I keep my character intact. My family knew no sorrow all because of my wife. One who has a very good wife is sure to get great fame and long life".

The long poem ends with a beautiful picture of the love of the old people. Though they have become inactive and lost use of all the senses, they have the love and affection which make them happy. Theirs is a love which could not be extinguished by any force in the world.

Poet Bharatidasan's handling of the theme should be appreciated. The work does not have any story value as such. The intention of the poet is to present the Tamils with an ideal family headed by a dutiful wife and a sincere father, and he has accomplished his aim.

Kudumpa vilakku serves as a handbook for a happy married life.

KULANTAIPPULAVAR (Tamil; b. 1906, d. 1972) was a Tamil scholar and epic poet. Even without any formal education, he could familiarize himself with the rules of Tamil prosody and literature and start composing poems from his early youth. He passed Tamil Pulavar title examination (Madras University) in 1934 as a private candidate and served in the erstwhile District Board High School at Bhavani as a senior Tamil Pandit till his retirement in 1962. Though he lived during the turbulent period of the struggle for independence, he was not drawn to the national stream but was rather attracted towards the Self-Respect Movement started in 1925 by E.V. Ramasami, popularly known as Periyar. Convinced of the ideals of this movement which subsequently came to be known as Dravida Kazhakam, Pulavar Kulantai came to be recognized as poet of the D.K. Movement along with poet Bharatidasan. The best of his poetic creations are intensely informed of the principles and ideals of the D.K. Movement whose target of attack was the brahmin domination in Tamil Nadu in terms of literature, politics and social culture. It is in such a spirit of anti-brahmin ideals that he composed his epic poem Ravana kaviyam. This epic poem, excellent in literary beauties, is a conscious attempt to portray Ravana, the king of Lanka as the hero, and Rama as the anti-hero. Though written to belittle the significance of the Ramayana by Kamban, Ravana kaviyam, but for its antithetical verve, remains to be an excellent contrast to Kambaramayanam as far as its literary beauties are concerned. The ban imposed on it on 2.6.1948 for its so-called anti-Aryan spirit was lifted on 17.5.1971 and the second edition was published on 15.9.1971. Pulavar Kulantai is noted for his felicity of diction and fidelity to the ideals of the Tamil Movement.

KULASHEKHARA VARMAN (Sanskrit) was a Kerala king, who wrote two important Sanskrit plays, Tapatisamvarana and Subhadradhananjaya besides the Ashcharyamanjari (which is not extant but was probably a prose work or katha). Kulashekhara was probably a dynastic title with Rama Varman as his real name. His date is also not definite. His contemporary commentator refers to the dhvani theory. Kulashekhara's Ashcharyamanjari is said to have been praised by Rajashekhara and by Jalhana. His two plays are on themes taken from the Mahabharata. One is on the love between Tapati, daughter of the Sun-god and Samvarana. Subhadradhananjaya has the abduction of Subhadra, sister of Krishna by Arjuna, as its theme. Both were commented upon by a learned contemporary of the playwright. These commentaries are known as 'Vyangyavyakhya' (a commentary on the suggested meanings in the plays. The commentator says that he first saw the plays enacted privately by the author himself taking the different roles before he wrote his commentary. To Kulashekhara Varman goes the credit of far-reaching reforms of Kerala stage and formulating sets of new rules for the staging of Sanskrit plays by the Chakyars of Kerala. In this he was aided by his court-poet and humorist, a brahmin by the name of Tolan. One of the reforms thus introduced was that Malayalam could be used by the Vidushaka in the staging of Sanskrit plays.

We understand from the prologue to the Tapatisamvarana that the king ruled with his capital at Mahodayapuram, and that the Tapatisamvarana was the first of the two plays. Kulashekhara is also known as the patron of the 'yamaka' poet, Vasudeva.

KULINKULA-SARVASWA (Bengali) is a drama by Ramnarayan Tarkaratna on the evils of polygamy widespread among the highest caste of the Hindus of Bengal in the nineteenth century. Ramnarayan, who was a Sanskrit scholar followed the Sanskrit model by beginning with a nandi (prologue), and with interludes in verse among prose dialogues. Published in 1854, it is the first Bengali dramatic work on a social problem.

Kulinkula-sarvaswa is concerned with the four daughters of a Brahmin named Kulapalak, who are aged thirty-two, twenty-six, fourteen and eight and whom their father has been unable to marry off because he could not find a suitable match from the highest caste of Brahmins. Kulapalak employs two match-makers one of whom, shrewd and unscrupulous as he is in his profession, finds a match for the girls. The prospective bridegroom is aged sixty years. The match-maker insists that the marriage takes place the very day lest it might be called off. The mother of the girls, overjoyed that her daughters will be wedded, calls them in order to break the happy news to them. The eldest one gives a negative response as she has well passed the marriageable age; the second is sceptical and the third is excited. The youngest, who is still in her playing age, does not know what marriage means. Women from the neighbourhood gather on the occasion and remember their plights of married life. As the hour approaches, the eldest laments for her past youth, the second is curious, and the two younger girls rush to have a look at the bridegroom. They find him "aged, thin and worn out in health". He could only be a right match for their eldest sister. As the ceremony starts they discover that not only is the groom advanced in age but also ugly, uneducated, blind of one eye and deaf. But the marriage takes place and the match-maker receives his fees.

Different aspects of the practice of polygamy, which prevailed as a traffic among the Kulin Brahmins has been shown in this drama with the writer's natural sympathy for the weaker section. He ridicules this system and those who practised it and abused it. His naming of some of the characters has even a pungent touch in it. His portrayal of certain characters was aimed at making them the objects of fun and laughter. As a caricature of social cruelty this work deserves to be called the first farce in the Bengali language. It has its weaknesses. The story has been told mostly through narration and there is very little dramatic action. The plot is loosely constructed, the episodes not closely knit and the drama lacks a central focus. Ramnarayan was following a literary tradition which had yet to undergo changes to suit the requirements of the modern stage. The influence of medieval Bengali narratives is manifest in his verse dialogues. Still he was the first to deal with a contemporary social problem and to use the colloquial language in his dialogues. His awareness of social realism paved the way for future dramatists. Kulinkula-sarvasva was a success on the stage and created a stir among both sections of people who agreed and disagreed with him.

KULKARNI, G.A.—KULKARNI, KRISHNAJI PANDURANGA

KULKARNI, G.A. (Marathi; b.1923, d.1987). Born in Belgaum, he lived all along in the Dharwar district, a border area between Maharashtra and Karnataka, playing as it were, the role of a lighthouse from some remote mysterious island. A professor of English and an ardent lover of Greek literature, he made his literary debut only through the translation of classics from these two languages into Marathi.

Stationed as he was at Dharwar, a place faraway from Pune and Bombay, the popular centres of Marathi literary activities, he attracted his readers by the unique style in which he wrote his short stories, winning their warm appreciation. His was the philosophy of an artist, and his style of writing took the Marathi readers by storm. In the decade 1970-80, he became a name unanimously acknowledged for his unique contribution to the enrichment of Marathi short story.

His life remained an enigma to most of his readers. Seldom did he attend any social gathering, and mostly kept to himself, making his readers wonder about his life style and ways of writing. Marathi readers are still at a loss to figure out his range of experiences and the span of events in his life that went into the shaping of his thought. All that they can see is the mind-boggling play of esotericism and strange ways of destiny effectively depicted in his short stories.

His first collection of short stories, Nila sawala, was published in 1959, followed by Parawa and Hirawa rawa in 1962. In 1966, Raktachandan was released. And then onwards the Popular Prakashan, Bombay, a prestigious publishing house, backed him up for the publication of the rest of his books. Nila sawala and Raktachandan won him the state government awards. In the year 1965 itself, the edition of Nila sawala had to run into second print. These four collections of short stories speak a lot about Kulkarni's view of life, his responses to the experiences unfolded to him by the course of life, and his style of expression.

G.A. Kulkarni's short stories can broadly be classified under two categories: (1) Those which dwell upon the social realities and (2) the ones that wander unrestricted in the world of imagination. The stories belonging to the former category are from these four collections. Kajalmaya came out in 1972. In the second part of this collection, one gets the first glimpses of the characters belonging to the world of his imagination. This was the milestone which won him recognition from the Marathi literary world. Kajalmaya won him the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1973 which he could not accept for technical reasons. Later on, in 1975, another of his collections, Ramalkhuna, was brought out by the Continental Prakashan. The same year another collection, Sanjshakun, was brought out by the Popular Prakashan. This collection stands in total relief from the elements of realism evident in his earlier stories. Pingalawel, released in 1977, combines both the types of his short stories, and is truly representative of his style at its best. Before his death, he completed his last collection, Onjaldhara.

The meaninglessness of human existence, the sovereign power of the destiny governing human life, inevitability of certain elements and the helplessness of man as a mere puppet in the hands of destiny, resulting into depression, isolation, defeat and sickness of mind, all this put together make a terribly gripping experience forming the core of Kulkarni's world of short stories. Kulkarni's range of experience spans the various levels of the society, people from different professions, ages, backgrounds, from the borderlines of Maharashtra and Karnataka region, mystic atmosphere of the caves and temples larger than life, the stern indifference of nature, animals personifying life in different manifestations, enchanting beauty and hideous ugliness, leave the reader spellbound. He looks straight into the eyes of the primal tussle between human capacities and limitations to draw out the lively patterns of life with its inherent sense of futility and agony. G.A. Kulkarni also has had his share of criticism from the critics in the literary circles mainly for his pessimistic, cynical attitude towards life. Pandit Aawalikar has written a book, G.A. chi katha, a critical appraisal of his short stories. In a way, the focus of his criticism is not without basis. Kulkarni, though at his best in the portrayal of agony and distortion, has drawn a blank on the brighter side of the life like unadulterated happiness, intoxicating thrill of great dreams and strength of high hope.

Unilateral view of life may be his serious limitation, but his stories like 'Vidushak', 'Yatrik', 'Swami', 'Talpat', etc. reveal great intellectual heights, mastery over the craft to bring the experience alive, and a style drawing heavily on imagery making this unidimensional view of life arresting. He transplants the conventional stories in a strong and daredevil manner with his grip firm over the destructive elements in human life in some form or the other. The credit for bringing existentialism at its penetrating best in Marathi literature goes to him. He enjoys, therefore, a position of a sovereign island, a class by himself in the present generation of Marathi writers.

KULKARNI, N.K. (Kannada; b. 1913), known as 'Enke', his initials, is a popular and versatile writer. Later, he served as a Programme Assistant at the A.I.R. Stations of Dharwad, Bombay and Bangalore (1946-47) till his retirement as Programme Executive from the A.I.R., Bangalore in 1971. The tragic vein running through certain woeful situations of these novels captures the minds of the readers throughout. More known as an exquisite playwright of lighter moods, Enke is hilarious, which quality of skilful art is best exemplified by his one-act plays like 'Election' (1935), Belliya habba (Silver Jubilee—a collection of eight one-act plays, 1940), Kavyada karak-hane (Poetry workshop, a collection of eight one-act plays, 1953), Bush-Coat (a collection of eight one-act plays, 1956), etc. His innumerable pen-pictures and biographical sketches of various luminaries and dignitaries in the fields of Karnataka art and literature and his personal essays and skits on all and sundry questions are most lively and entertaining. As a scholar and critic, he has specialised on the poet Kumaravyasa having written five valuable works on his great epic. His Kannada sahitya vahini (Stream of Kannada literature, 1940) which is a rapid survey of various movements in the old Kannada literature, is deemed a popular hand-book on the history of Kannada literature with five editions to its credit. Some of his radio-plays and musical operas were broadcast from the A.I.R. as national features and some secured national awards too.

KULKARNI, R.V. (Kannada; b. 1918) is a noted Kannada scholar and critic especially of old Kannada language and literature. Kulkarni, or 'Raku', a pseudonym by which he is popularly known, is a personal essayist of a high calibre. With a first class M.A. in Kannada and Sanskrit and B.Ed. Degree of the Bombay University, he served first as a research scholar in the Historical Research Institute, Dharwad, for a few years and then took to teaching working as a high school teacher and later as a lecturer in Kannada in an evening college in Bangalore for several years. KULKARNI, WAMAN LAKSHMAN (Marathi; b. 1911) was a teacher at Wilson High School and later, Professor at Wilson College, Bombay. He was the Head of the Department of Marathi in Marathawada and Bombay Universities.

Kulkarni was a distinguished critic who created a sympathetic understanding for modern literature amongst readers and literary scholars. He is a serious thinker and he has deeply studied the literary principles and problems. He is not theoretical only, but he has also applied his theories to serious writers and dramatists like V.M. Joshi, S.K. Kolhatkar and K.P. Khadilkar.

He rose to his distinguished position as a critic during 1935-1950 with his famous books, Vangmayantil Vadas-thalem (1946) and Vanmayin matem ani matabhed (1949). He is an advocate of pure aesthetic autonomy and the freedom of the artist. He is a little critical of the cheap entertainment as one of the aims of literature. He says that an artistic creation should not be adjudged by extra-artistic criteria like sociological, ethical or historical ones. The purpose of all writings is a quest for beauty. He does not think that a writer should be carried away by the passing political or social movements. 'A writer is like a lighthouse, not disturbed by the storm around'.

He suggested in his article on the 'great merit and demerit of Gadkari' in Maten ani matabhed that the genius of Gadkari was more fitted to write farces. He maintained that the poetry of 'Bee' derived its sublimity from the use of Sanskrit. His works include Vaman Malhar-vangmayadarshan (1944), Vangmayin tipa ani tippani (1953), Sripad Krishna vangmaya darshan (1959), Vangmayin drishti ani drishtikon (1959), Sahitya ani samiksha (1963), Natakakar Khadilkar: ek abhyas (1965), Marathi jnanaparsarak-itihasa Va vangmayavichar (1965), the Sahitya shodha ani bodha (1967). He edited Marathi rangabhumi ani natak and Kavyatil durbodhata.

KULLIYAT AZAD (Kashmiri) is a collection of poems by an eminent poet, Abdul Ahad Azad (1903-1948), edited by Padamnath Ganju and published in 1976 by Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages. The editor, who has written a long introduction in Urdu, divides the poems, 244 in all, into three periods, each period of approximately ten years, but arranged in the reverse chronological order, the last ten years of his poetic career being the first in the book. This section, containing the poems written during the last years of his life, shows a maturity of style and intensity of feeling. These poems are imbued with a humanistic strain, and the influence of 'Radical Humanist Movement' is evident in them. Though his poetry cannot be categorized as pure slogan-mongering, the three slogans he raises in it are revolution, secularism and equality. The poet exhorts his countrymen to rise and become the masters of their destiny. Azad, the poet of the downtrodden and the exploited, voices his protest with a vehemence that cannot fail to impress. He wants to shake his countrymen out of the deep slumber induced by the obnoxious effect of the 'opium of religion'. He sings the praise of his country and recounts the deeds and achievements of the great kings, the scholars and the saints of the Valley to shock the youth out of the sloth that has immobilized them. Revolution is the symbol of hope, progress and equality. It is the panacea for all ills. The poet uses everything in his armoury to make the people break the shackles of slavery.

He is no less concerned with artificial divisions of humanity on the basis of colour, caste and creed. Religious toleration is the lesson he teaches. Unity of mankind and equality are his constant refrain. Humanism is his basic creed and he wails over man's degradation in the modern world.

It irks him to find that religion has become an instrument of exploitation. If religion is meant to sow the seeds of hatred among people, he would prefer to go without it. His faith in God is sometimes shaken by the state of affairs in the world. Influenced by Iqbal, the great Urdu poet, he voices his complaint in a long poem which may be called "Satan's complaint". Elsewhere, the poet admits that the whole question of God's existence is ambiguous and the answers are vague. If man's world is an uninteresting proposition or if it is irrational, nature is not so uninspiring. Nature not only awes him, but is responsible for his moral uplift. It gives him hope. He never ceases to learn from nature.

Azad is at his best and achieves great heights of poetic excellence in poems that depict different aspects of nature. 'The River Daryav' is, perhaps, the best of such poems. No movement or sound of the river is without a lesson for him. The river stands for freedom, progress and unity. Stagnation is death and movement is life. So looking back is a sin. These and other such poems form the middle section of this anthology. The last section includes ghazals and short poems written in his early years. These poems are thematically love poems and modelled on Persian prosody. The lover's desire, yearning and pangs of separation are well described though with much repetition of imagery. The poet seems to have a limited stock of metaphors which he repeats too often. But these poems have a lyrical quality that made the poet popular with the common people. Although he uses all the poetic devices to make his poetry effective, yet this part of his poetry is not impressive. Even when he is lamenting over the separation of lovers, the preacher in him raises his head. This can be due to the fact that he wrote poems with a political purpose and had set upon himself the task of awakening the people. The anthology does not include the 'masnavis' written by him though it purports to be a complete one. The classification into three periods is a little confusing and there is much overlapping.

KULPATI (Hindi), a 17th century poet, flourished at the Court of Maharaja Ramsingh of Jaipur. The following five works are said to have been written by him: Draunaparva, (1680), Yuktitarangini (1686), Nakhshikh, Sangramsar (1676) and Ras-rahasya (1670).

The most important work of Kulpati Mishra is Ras-rahasya, which was written in 1670 on the request of Maharaja Ramsingh in his Vijay Mahal. Ras-rahasya is a book on poetics mostly based on Kavya-prakash of Mammata and Sahitya-darpan of Vishwanath, particularly on his discussion of the 'Alankaras' and 'Rasa'. The book is divided into eight Chapters and has about 652 verses, besides some prose passages.

Considering his treatment of various topics of poetics in his Ras-rahasya which is very comprehensive and written in a flawless language, Kulpati Mishra seems to be a very serious scholar of Sanskrit poetics. He gives apt definitions of all the topics covered in the book in either 'doha' or in 'soratha' and 'kavitta' or 'savaiya' with examples. He has used prose at a number of places for elucidation and explanation. He has not followed the Sanskrit Acharyas blindly, but he shows his originality in a number of instances.

As a poet, Kulpati Mishra is not considered to be one of a very high order but his contribution to the field of poetics is quite significant.

KUMACH (Sindhi) is a collection of selected poems of Krishin Rahi, published in 1969. The book was picked up for the Sahitya Akademi Award in Sindhi in 1971.

Kumach in Sindhi means the bow of a fiddle. Like a bow, which can produce a variety of musical notes, this collection presents compositions in various forms. It contains poems in the old traditional forms like 'doho', 'soratho', 'kafi', 'wai', 'lat', 'loli', 'orano', 'lado', 'jhumiri' and 'chheja', as also in such established forms as 'ghazal', 'kawali', 'rubai', the Japanese 'haiku', the French triolet (tarail), English sonnet, etc.

The book has been divided into four sections, each containing particular forms of compositions symbolising a string of the instrument. Each section, according to the poet, represents the compositions arising out of different conditions of feelings. The first section named as 'Jindu ji tandu' contains compositions in which the poet describes nature and different situations created by the play of nature. It also depicts the poet's feelings for his separation from his motherland, Sindh. These feelings represent the nostalgia of all Sindhis for their native land. The second section, 'Loka tara', represents folk-songs like 'lado', 'sahiro', 'jhumiri', etc. These compositions present various occasions of people's life such as the birth of a child, the marriage of a youth, and other occasions of happiness. The third section titled 'Mana ji tandu' contains the reaction of the poet to different situations, natural and social, which he confronts in his life. It also brings out the patriotism of the poet as he not only sings the songs in praise of the country, but also wishes to change the present condition by providing all and sundry with the basic necessities of life. It also brings out the progressive in the poet when he strives to better the lot of the farmers, labourers, etc. The fourth and the last section called 'Tarza taunwri', contains other forms of poetry such as 'haiku', 'tapa', 'triolet', 'sonnet', etc. It describes various occasions of national importance as well as national personalities who attracted the mind of the poet.

The book by and large expresses directly as well as through folk-tales nostalgia of an average Sindhi for the land beyond the frontiers which was snatched away from him after the partition of the motherland. His profound feelings for the soil in which he grew and thrived, are expressed in lines like:

Those born here will also be called Sindhis; Though Sindhis, they would be deprived of seeing Sindh. When they go to Sindh like other visitors, people will say, 'The Sindhis have come to see Sindh'

KUMAR, C.B. (Malayalam: b. 1910, d. 1972), whose full name was Chakrapani Bhaskara Kumar, was a distinguished essayist and travelogue-writer destined to spend most of his life outside India, especially in London, New York and Geneva. Born at Pavitraswaram in Kottarakkara taluk and orphaned in childhood, he was brought up by his elder brother, C. Sankara Varier.

Kumar had his early education in Kerala itself. He took his B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Madras. In 1933 he went to U.K., where he qualified for the B.Com (Hons) degree and obtained his Ph.D. degree in Economics from London University (1956). His first notable assignment was that of the Asstt. Secretaryship of the Mill Owners' Association of Hyderabad; later he was appointed Secretary of the Bombay Mill Owners' Association (1943-46). In 1946 he joined the International Labour Organisation as its Executive Secretary and had, in that capacity, to tour widely.

KUMAR GANGANANDA SINGH-KUMAR KISHORE

He was a regular contributor to the well-known Malayalam weekly, Mathrubhumi. His 'London Letters' published in its issues, were very popular. He was a pioneer in writing that type of essays in Malayalam. These letters have been later brought out in book form. His main works are London kathakal (1950), Mexican nadukkadalil (Travelogue, 1959), Samuhyā chintakal (Reflections on society, 1968) and Upanyasopaharam (Collection of essays, 1970).

P.

KUMAR GANGANANDA SINGH (Maithili; b. 1898, d. 1970) was born in the royal family of Srinagar (Purnia). He had his college education in Calcutta from where he obtained M.A. in 1921. During his student days as early as 1919 he participated in the efforts of the Maithili speakers in Calcutta led by Brajmohan Thakur in organizing Maithili Studies in the University of Calcutta, and wrote a learned paper on the Nepalese Maithili dramas in the journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal. He was a scholar of Ancient Indian History and edited along with others the Brahut Inscriptions. He took active part in the politics of Bihar, first as a member of the Hindu Mahasabha, later as a Congress leader. He had been a Member of the Legislative Assembly from 1924 to 1930 and became Member of the Legislative Council (Bihar) in 1937. He was Education Minister of Bihar from 1958 to 1962. Then he became the Vice-Chancellor of the K.S. Sanskrit University in 1962 and remained so till 1965.

Gangananda Singh was a versatile personality. He began writing in Maithili as early as 1917. He led the youth movement in Mithila but his work was diversified as he became the Private Secretary and Literary Adviser of the Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga in about 1924 and remained so till the latter's death in 1960.

Gangananda Singh wrote short stories, novelettes and one-act plays. The stories were first published under the pseudonym, 'Bhola', in 1924—chief of them being 'Manushyaka-mola'. In 1937 he began contributing to the Sahitya patra a wonderful novel about the life of a young girl called Agilahi. It portrays with gentle humour and great skill the growth and development of an adolescent. Unfortunately the novel could not be completed.

In 1965 he published his one-act play Jirana sangharsha in a monthly called Svadesha which was acclaimed as the best in the language in those days. In 1964, Shailendramohan Jha published a collected version of his fiction as Agilahi.

Gangananda Singh summed up his estimate of Maithili writers and their progress in a small but well-written lecture in 1950 on the occasion of the fourteenth session of the All India Oriental Conference at Darbhanga.

Altogether the total output of Maithili creative writing from the pen of Gangananda Singh that has survived is small but whatever he wrote was chiselled, polished and artistically the most finished work of art. The posterity will not be willing to forget his great contribution to the progress of Maithili. And the little but perfect pieces that he wrote on his revolutionary ideas about social reconstruction will, percolating through his works, continue to live and inspire.

KUMAR KISHORE (Assamese; b. 1928), whose real name is Kishori Mohan Sarma, is a popular Assamese novelist. He passed the Matriculation Examination with distinction in Assamese from Gurdon High School, Nalbari, and graduated from B. Barooah College, Gauhati, in 1951. Even when he was a student, he fought for the country's freedom, and was imprisoned in 1942. He began his career as a teacher; but soon went to journalism and then finally to Government service where he still is. Though he started his career as a poet with two volumes of romantic poems, viz., Smritir chakulo (Tears of reminiscence, 1945) and Byarthatar chakulo (Tears of frustration, 1947), he is primarily a novelist with at least eleven novels to his credit.

Kumar Kishore's novels show two distinct traits: a love for the supernatural and a preoccupation with psychological problems. In his early novels, Shatavdir swapna (The dream of the century, 1952) and Sikhar kampani (Flickering of the flame, 1954), he deals with the sex-life of urban society. In his exposure of the sexual vices of the urban people, the author shows his critical attitude towards the urban upper class. His psychological novels deal with the problems of abnormal psychology. Kabar aru kankal (The grave and the skeleton, 1963) is a mixture of romance and reality where the natural and the unnatural rub shoulders together. Era sutir swapna (The dreams of a dried-up stream, 1966) begins like a detective novel; but it soon comes to human or social problems. But neither as a crime novel nor as a social one it shows any serious concern. The setting of Jui, dhomwa aur chhai (Fire, smoke and ashes, 1970) is supernatural; but against this the theme of real life is successfully presented with many a minute detail of the Assamese family life. Prabhu aru prachir (Coral and the wall, 1972) begins in suspense. But here the author fails to maintain any unity in the theme. The use of too many romantic elements makes the story artificial.

In Emuthi tarar jilimili (Glitterings of a handful of stars, 1964), a few psychiatric patients in the mental hospital at Ranchi are portrayed. Through the case histories of six patients, the author tells a story which ultimately comes out to be a story of the problems of the film industry in Assam. If considered from this point of view, the stories of all the six patients would not be essential for the development of the theme. On the other hand, if the story has to be treated as purely psychological, it lacks unity. However, the novel reads well. The skilfully maintained suspense of the story and the emotionally charged language contribute to its readability.

Another novel with a psychological problem is Banya dhouta badwip (The delta washed by floods, 1966). Written in the epistolary form, this novel, too, maintains throughout a suspense. The typical life of the brown sahibs of the tea-gardens is shown here; and against this is shown the struggle of the lower class people. Kinkinir kalanka (Kinkini's disgrace, 1970) is another psychological novel dealing with masochism. But as in others, here, too, the author throws light on social and economic problems. The main interest of the novel, however, rests on the thrill that runs through the story.

At the end, it may be said that Kumar Kishore's popularity as a novelist rests mostly on his stories of romantic nature told skilfully with thrill and suspense in a fluent, emotive language.

Kumar Kishore has also written a book on Assamese film industry.

KUMAR VIMAL (Hindi; b.1931) was born in Kaluchak Vishvapuria in Bhagalpur district (Bihar). He obtained his M.A. and D.Litt. degrees from the University of Patna. Rising from modest beginnings Kumar Vimal, sheerly by dint of hard work, enterprise and perseverance occupied the coveted chair of the Vice-Chancellor of the Patna University and also became the Chairman of the State Public Service Commission.

Amongst the modern critics who made poetry their concern in respect of critical study and appreciation, Kumar Vimal is a significant figure. It was as long back as 1967 that some poetry enthusiasts launched a movement for 'sahaj kavita' i.e., for simplicity, directness and spontaneity of poetry. Kumar Vimal was one of them. It was an effort to bring poetry back into the channel of human emotions and experience—poetry that had gone astray into practising intellectual gymnastics, expressing intricate thought and wielding it as a medium of logical discussion rather than communication of experience of the different facets of human life. His collection of poems titled Ye abhang anubhav amrit (1974) reflects sympathetic understanding of human afflictions and predilections. 'The fresh search for poetry' launched by him and his colleagues in 1967 led him to express himself in a medium that is both intelligible and communicative. His experiences reflect a sensitive man, very much a part and parcel of his milieu, viewing from within the stagnation that has set in the society at large and the disintegration of the values that we have cherished all along. He whole-heartedly espouses the cause of 'sahaj kavita' so that the poet could at least unburden his soul of the mounting pressures of social evils, of human degradation and of the impairment of mutual relationships. Some of his poems have transcended regional and national limits through translations in Gujarati, Telugu, English and Czech.

His contribution to literary criticism has had greater recognition than poetry. He brought an aesthetic outlook to bear on literary creativity and, therefore, his analysis may perhaps be termed as non-utilitarian and non-socialistic. Yet he has an uncanny knack of identifying the ingredients that impart poetry its real value. With aesthetics as his primary concern, it was but natural for him to be drawn towards 'chhayavadi' poetry which he studied with an alert mind and sympathetic concern. His literary critical works reflect a mature poetic understanding. The following works deserve special mention: Nai kavita, Nai alochana aur kala (New poetry, new criticism and art, 1963), Saundaryashastra ke tattva (Grammar of Aesthetics, 1966), Kala-viyechan (On art, 1968), Chhayavad ka saundaryashastriya adhyayan (an aesthetic study of chhayavad, 1970); Kavyanushilan: Adhunika, atyadhunik (A study of poetry: modern, ultra-modern).

KUMARA PILLAI, G. (Malayalam; b. 1927), born at Tiruvalla, son of a school teacher, Kumara Pillai completed his higher education at Nagpur and was a professor of English when he retired in 1982. He is active in the Sarvodaya Movement, especially in creating public opinion for prohibition. His other collections of poems include Saptasvaram, Kavita, Marubhumiyute kinavakal, Ormayute sugandham, etc. In the sixties he turned to 'modernism' and wrote a few poems with a touch of satire, wit and verbal conceit.

Kumara Pillai's literary reputation rests mainly on his dramas. As a dramatist and an outstanding actor, he has won the admiration of all. His main dramatic works are Harischandra, Mohavum muktiyum, Veshangal, Agnipariksha and Matrikamanushyan. As a Gandhian, he has edited selected translations of Gandhiji's writings which run into several volumes. His collection of essays entitled Natakiyam has won several literary awards. He was honoured with a fellowship by the Kerala Sangita Nataka Akademi in 1976.

KUMARADASA (Sanskrit) is known by the names Kumarabhatta, Natha Kumara, Kumaradatta and Bhatta Kumara. Sanskrit kavya tradition credits him with the authorship of a mahakavya, Janakiharana. His work is extensively quoted by later Sanskrit poets, e.g., Rajashekhar and Jalhana and in anthology, Subhashitasamgrahas. Regarding his identity different traditions are prevalent. According to one he was a great admirer, friend and contemporary of Kalidasa. According to the Ceylonese tradition he is identified with the king of Sri Lanka named Kumaradhatusena (517-526). The MSS of the Janakiharana preserved in Govt. Orient MSS library, Madras, preserves 20 Cantos. The last four verses of the MSS mention Kumaradasa as king of Ceylon and son of the king Kumaramani (Maudagalyana) who died in the battle the same day Kumaradasa was born and, therefore, he was brought up by his two learned maternal uncles, Megha and Agrabodhi, with all fraternal affections. The work also bears testimony that his father was also a learned man and that as a child he was troubled by some disease, which, according to Rajashekhar, was congenital blindness. The Mahavamsha, a chronicle of Sri Lanka, records the life events of Kumaradasa thus: "After his (Moggallana's) demise, his son Kumaradhatusena, mighty and godlike, became king, who repaired the temple which had been built by his father; held a convocation of Buddhist scriptures; purified the religion; pleased the priests with the four 'pachchayas'; and having done many meritorious deeds, passed away in the ninth year. Kittisena, his son then became the king." (XLI. 1-3). The identity of the poet with this king almost corroborates with both the Indian and Ceylonese traditions. In Sinhalese historical works, e.g. The Pujavali, The Nikayasamgraha, The Saddharma Ratnakara, The Rajaratnakara and The Rajavali, the king Kumaradhatuseña, the son of Moggalana I, is always referred to as identical with Kumaradasa, a great scholar and contemporary of Kalidasa. An Inscription (Ancient Inscriptions of Ceylon No-97 by Max Muller) bearing the name of the king as 'Maha Kumaradasa Raja' also testifies to the same. Besides, another tradition which also makes him contemporary of Kalidasa records that he was greatly attached to a fair courtesan and in her praise composed one line and promised a reward to anyone who could complete that verse. Kalidasa who was then living in Sri Lanka completed the verse. The courtesan got Kalidas killed and claiming the completion of the verse asked the king for reward. Suspecting foul play, the king made her confess the crime. Aggrieved by the loss of his fellow poet, he also consigned himself to the funeral fire of Kalidasa. The Perakumba Sirita (another Sinhalese work) bears testimony to the traditions regarding Kumaradasa's generosity, his patronage to the religion of the country, his authorship of the Janakiharana and his contemporaneity of Kalidasa. The theme of the poem, the Janakiharana is taken from the Ramavana which is apparent from the title itself. But the style of his poem shows conclusive signs of his indebtedness to Kalidasa's Raghuvamsha. He has enriched Sanskrit poetry with his mellifluous descriptions in Vaidarbhi style full of short musical metres and moderate poetic figures. The work, however, does not display that his imagination was of high order. Nevertheless he proves to be a well bred poet well-versed in grammar, lexicography and he rightly evokes the admiration of the rhetorician like Rajashekhara. His date is fixed in different ways: He was a king of Sri Lanka (517-526 A.D.), he was familiar with the Kashikavritti (650 A.D.), Magha (700 A.D.), knew that he was older than Rajashekhara (7th cent.) etc.

KUMARAGURUPARAR (Tamil; b. 1628, d. 1688) was one of the finest poets of the later day Tamil literature with a flair for happy and elegant phrases. In the history of Tamil he is probably the only poet who carried the culture of the Tamilnadu and its philosophy of Shaivism to the North.

He was born with a defective vocal organ in Sri Vaikuntham, in the Tirunelveli district as the son of Shanmukhasikhamanikkavirayar and Shivakamasundari. When the child was five, the parents took him to the presence of Lord Murugan at Tiruchchendur nearby and by His grace the child began to speak and the first words spoken by him was a poem in praise of Murugan there; 'Tiruchchendur Kandar kalivenba'. In due time he mastered all the books and grew up full of devotion to Shiva. Visiting many Shiva shrines he went to the great temple of Minakshi at Madurai and sang Maduraikkalambakam on Shiva enshrined there are a 'Pillai Tamil' (poem) on Minakshi. Tirumalai Nayak, the ruler, heard of the young boy's fame and listened to his exposition of the poem. Legend goes that Devi Minakshi appeared as the daughter of the temple priest and sitting on the lap of the ruler took a necklace from his neck and placed it on the shoulders of Kumaraguruparar and disappeared. People knew that he was a favoured child of God. Urged by a religious fervour he worshipped at Tiru Arur and then reached Dharmapuram near Mayuram. He received initiation under the head pontiff of the Shaiva monastery there. He then entered the holy orders. He worshipped at Vaidhisvarankoil and then proceeding to Chidambaram at the command of his master, he sang there two poems and then proceeded to Benaras. Dara Shikoh, brother of Aurangzeb was holding a parliament of religions there. Kumaraguruparar seems to have learnt the Hindusthani language by the grace of Sarasvati. He went to the conference and so impressed Dara by his exposition of Shaivism in the Hindusthani language that he granted to him a large plot of land there to build a monastery and propagate Shaivism and also to construct a Sri Kedarar temple on the Tamilnadu temple model. Kumaraguruparar lived there as the revered head of the monastery which he had established.

His poems, eleven in number, short and long, which are available today represent the highest watermark of lyrical as well as devotional poetry not only of his day but of all later periods. Kandar kalivenba is a continuous long poem of 122 couplets in the kalivenba metre which is today recited daily by all devotees of Muruga. It condenses the Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy in couplets i-36 and the whole story of Skanda purana in couplets 75 to 104. His two Pillai-Tamil poems on Minakshi at Madurai and Muruga (Muttukkumarasvami) at Vaidhisvarankoil are some of the sweetest such poems and they record the most felicitous expressions in the language. The two 'kalambakams' on Madurai and Kashi and Tiru Arur Nanmani malai sung by him at Tiru Arur are traditional poems. 'Nitineri vilakkam' is a fine didactic poem of 100 venbas and is said to condense the thoughts of Tirukkural, Chidambara mummanikkovai in praise of Nataraja at the place while the other Chidambara seyyul kovai in 83 verses was intended to serve as illustration for all the different types of metres mentioned in the prosodial grammar. Pandara mummanikkovai (30 verses) is in praise of his master at Dharmapuram. Sakalakalavalli malai invokes the grace of Sarasvati in 10 verses to help him to learn Hindusthani and win over the chief in the Benaras conference. It is today learnt by most children. In KUMARALATA (Sanskrit) is identified, confusedly with Ashvaghosha. A denizen of Takshashila, Kumaralata is mentioned by Hiuen Tsang, the Chinese traveller (7th century A.D.) as the founder of the Sautrantika school of Buddhist philosophy. His doctrinal stand-point lies between the late Hinayana and the early Mahayana. He mentions the name of Kanishka (78-150). He can be said to have flourished during the period between 150 and 200 A.D. He is also a Buddhist literary celebrity like Matricheta, Ashvaghosha and Aryashura.

Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti (Kalpna-manditika or Kalpanalankritika), is a series of Buddhist parables which has been handed down to us in two textual recensions and two textual aids. a) The first textual recension is represented by the fragments of a palm-leaf manuscript discovered at Qyzyl in Chinese Turkestan in course of the Royal Prussian Turfan expeditions. b) The second textual recension is borne out by the three almost complete folios and some fragment of a paper MS. discovered at Tuyog in Eastern Turkestan during the aforesaid expeditions. Now, the first textual aid is Kumarajiva's (344-413 A.D.) rather free and faulty Chinese rendering, the Sutralamkarashastra. The second textual aid is the Tibetan translation, the Dpehi Phren-ba.

However, Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti as preserved in two textual recensions and two textual aids is a collection of 90 Buddhist parables divided into 9 dashatis (decades) which have been re-arranged unsystematically into 15 chapters by Kumarajiva in his Chinese version. The syllabic remains of some sectional colophons and the final colophon to the entire text are still extant. The treatment of the narrative matter is after the manner of the Jatakas and the Avadanas. The stories betray an unmistakable trend of missionary propaganda.

The language of the textual remains of Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti is essentially classical Sanskrit though vernacular influences are quite palpable in certain cases. Couched in an ornate yet simple Sanskrit, his Drishtantapankti is in the form of a 'gadya-kavya' (prose literature) in which prose holds the predominant position and is interspersed with verses composed in varied ornate metres like shardula-vikridita, suvadana, mandakranta, arya, etc. The 'angibhutarasa' (main sentiment) is 'shanta' (quietistic). The 'guna' (literary quality) is 'prasadasamanadhikarana madhurya' (sweetness as saturated with lucidity).

KUMARAN ASAN, N. (Malayalam; b. 1873, d. 1924) pioneered the New Poetry in Malayalam. Born at Kayikkara, a coastal village, 40 km north of Trivandrum, in a cultured Hindu (Ezhava-Avarana) family, Kumaran learned Sanskrit from local scholars. He started writing poetry at a tender age. He taught at a school and also officiated as a temple priest. Meeting Sri Narayana Guru was a turning point. Kumaran, at 17, joined the Guru's hermitage as a novice. Expecting better things of the boy, his mentor sent him for higher studies in Sanskrit to Bangalore and thence to Calcutta. The two years (1898-1900) spent in Calcutta were crucial. The Indian Renaissance, Swami Vivekananda, poet Tagore—all seemed to have extended his horizon. He also mastered English. Back at his Guru's Ashram at Aruvippuram, Kumaran was drawn into active social work. As the founder secretary, he was at the helm of the S.N.D.P. Yogam for 16 years. The spiritual and the secular blended in him and made him an individual of extraordinary perception and acute sensibility. This enabled him to become a mahakavi that he was.

Asan's juvenalia consisted mostly of hymns and devotional pieces. To convey his unique vision, he forged a novel form, the khandakavya, a short narrative in a dramatic mould. Beginning with 'Veena poovu' it heralded the triumph of the lyric. The fallen flower symbolises the transitoriness of life. The poem seeks consolation in Upanishadic philosophy. Nalini (1911) is a perfect khandakavya. Its theme is Asan's unique vision of love. The heroine's love for her lost mate is a spiritual passion, which wins for her easy release from life. Asan introduced shringara of the most ennobling kind. He also delineated women with dignity and honour. Leela (1914) also treats of love, but of a more worldly type. The heroine seems to grow before our eyes and become the very incarnation of love. The poem wafts the reader to dizzy heights of romance, sensuousness and grandeur. Chintavishtayaya Sita (Sita lost in thought, 1919) has a classical perfection of form. It is almost a dramatic monologue, a reverie in which Sita analyses her bitter sweet experiences so far. She is conceived as the mother figure—the universal symbol of self-abnegating love. Hereafter, Asan's thrust is on the social implications of love. Duravastha (Evil plight, 1922) is set in the traumatic milieu of the Mopla Revolt of 1921. Savitri, the uprooted Nampoothiri girl, seeks refuge in a Pulaya youth's hut. She opts to marry him and hopes through their joint efforts to uplift the downtrodden. Chandalabhihskhuki (The outcaste nun, 1922) is a companion piece dealing with the evil plight caused by caste. But here the poet leads us back to the golden age when Lord Buddha lived. An untouchable girl is ordained a nun. The ignorant protest against this. Through his sermon the Lord ostracises caste and ushers in a Golden Age. Asan's last poem, and his most mellifluous at that, is Karuna (Compassion 1923) which chronicles the vicissitudes of Vasavadatta, Mathura's most celebrated courtesan. Even to this sinner, love brings nirvana. The poem is a kaleidoscope of sensuous word pictures ordered in a dramatic sequence.

As a lyricist also Asan is unrivalled. His 'Swatanatria gatha' (Song of freedom) is the manifesto of freedom fighters the world over. His hymns, prayers and exhortations have a humanistic undertone. The lyric, 'Guru', about his mentor is embryonic in its insight. Asan retold the first three Cantos of the Ramayana for children. 'Gramavrikshattile kuyil' (The cuckoo of the village tree) is an allegory vindicating his life and art. 'Prarodanam', the best wrought elegy in the language, mourns the death of A.R. Raja Raja Varma, a scholar-poet and patron of letters. Asan also made a free rendering of five Cantos of Sir Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia under the title Sri Buddha charitam. Among his major prose works are a translation of the Sanskrit play, Pradodhachandrodhayam, and an independent play, Vichitravijayam (A strange victory). He also rendered into Malayalam Swami Vivekananda's Rajayoga. He was also a prolific prose writer, in his capacity as a political activist, legislator, and editor of the journal Vivekodayam. These miscellaneous pieces are collected in three volumes. There is a Government sponsored Memorial at Thonnakkal, 24 km north of Trivandrum, where he lived and wrote during his last years.

KUMARAN, MOORKOTH (Malayalam; b. 1874, d. 1941) was born at Tellichery as the son of Moorkoth Ravunny and Kunhi-chirutheyi. He worked as a teacher in several schools and colleges. He was a member of the Malabar Education Society, Kottayam Taluk Board and Board of University examinations. He also served as the editor of the magazines Gajakesari, Deepam, Vivekodayam, Mitaavadi, Saraswati and Kerala chintamani. A great social reformer, educationist and journalist, he was one of the stalwarts of the evolution of Malayalam prose. He earned a name in the annals of Malayalam literature as an essayist, story writer, critic and biographer.

Representing the class of writers who advocated the avoidance of highly Sanskritised diction and pedantic vocabulary, he was the master of a melodious prose style capable of expressing every shade of feeling and thought. He has written about a hundred short stories. Even though his stories are inclined to romantic escapism, the element of social criticism is often present in them. The theme of 'Jeshtathiammayate abharanangal' (The ornaments of sister-in-law) from Moorkoth Kumarante cher- ukathakal (Short stories of Moorkoth Kumaran, 1967), depicts the weakness of women whose fascination for ornaments leads to family feuds and quarrels. In another story 'Orotta nottam' (Just a glance) he criticises the worthless conventions prevailing in society by depicting the tragic end of a woman whose marriage to an educated man is broken up by the obstinate orthodoxy of his domineering father.

Lokapavadam (Public scandal, 1903), Kanakam moolam (Because of gold, 1905), Shakuntala (Story of Shakuntala, 1910), Vasumati (1912), Ampu Nayar (1916), Sairandhri (1916), Jahannara (Persian tales, 1917), Ente chila anubhavakathakal (Stories of experience, 1929), Kunchan kathakal (Stories from Kunchan Nampiyar, 1931) and Bharata katha samgraham (Stories from Mahabharata, 1932) are the titles of his story books.

Kumaran had a sharp pen as indicated by one of his pen-names, 'Vajrasuchi' (Diamond needle) and he was a notable critic who was courageous enough to say unpalatable things. He revelled in literary polemics. But the lucidity and simplicity of his language as well as the humour and sarcasm flashing from his style would certainly arrest the attention of the reader. In the men of letters series in Malayalam, viz. Kerala bhasha pranayikal (Men who loved the language of Kerala) he wrote two books, Kesari Nayanar (1932) and Chandu Menon (1932), which contain the life and literary contributions of Vengayil Kunchiraman Nayanar and O. Chandu Menon. Apart from these he has written the biography of Sri Narayan Guru, the great Vedantin and social reformer of Kerala, in two volumes under the title Narayana guru swamikalute jivacharithram (1930). His miscellaneous works include Ampalappattu (Songs of the temple, 1941), Ilanjippoomala (garland of Mumusopa, 1962), Asakula (Malayalam translation of Isabella or the Pot of Basil of John Keats).

KUMARASAMBHAVA (Sanskrit) is an ornate narrative poem (a mahakavya) is seventeen Cantos by Kalidasa. Modern scholarship accepts only the first eight Cantos which have been commented upon by Mallinatha, as genuine composition of the great poet and the rest as apocryphal. The title of the poem literally means the birth (sambhava) of Kumara, i.e. Karttikeya, son of Shiva and Parvati. The poem, taken as a whole, narrates the mythical story of Karttikeya's victory and slaying of Tarakasura, a demon who expelled the gods from heaven and imposed a tyrannical rule on the world.

KUMARASAMBHAVA

The Kumarasambhava opens with an excellent description of the landscape of the Himalayas and the life of the dwellers of the mountainous region. The behaviour of the hilly fauna and the attractive features of the high-altitude flora have been artistically presented. The birth and childhood of Parvati alias Uma, the daughter of personified Himalaya and his wife Mena, Shiva's penance in the Himalayan forest and Parvati's waiting on the meditating Lord are the chief episodes of the first Canto. Canto 2 narrates how Tarakasura who had been made invincible by a boon of Brahma had been terrorizing and oppressing the gods. They approach Brahma for redress which the creator God could not provide them with, because 'even a poison tree cannot be cut down if one has reared it'. He advised the gods to seek redress from Shiva; if the latter marry Parvati their offspring would be the deliverer. Then Indra approaches Madana (Kamadeva, i.e. god of love) and seeks his assistance in enticing the heart of Shiva towards Uma. The third Canto shows Madan, along with his wife Rati and Vasanta, Spring personified, trying to fulfil his assignment. A picturesque description of the changes in nature at the advent of Spring in the hilly forest follows. Parvati appears and Shiva strangely feels himself moved. He detects Madana who is just about to discharge his magic arrow at him. A fiery glance from the third eye of the Lord reduces Madana into a heap of ash. Parvati, bitterly ashamed and disappointed, retires. The fourth Canto presents a pathetic picture, in suitable words and metre, of the lamentations of the bereaved Rati who unable to bear the pangs of separation from her husband gets a pyre piled through the help of Vasanta so that she can end her life. A voice from the heaven stays her from this fatal action, assuring her of the reunion with her beloved when Shiva agrees to accept Parvati as his spouse. The next Canto describes the austere penance which Uma starts going through with a view to winning Shiva as her husband, having realized that physical beauty cannot achieve the aim of getting a husband like Shiva. At the end of the Canto, Shiva appears in the guise of a Brahmacharin and tries her patience and sincerity by making uncharitable remarks on the character and habits of Shiva. But Parvati bitterly rebukes the Brahmin and brings out the greatness of Shiva in a brief but forceful speech. Delighted and satisfied Shiva appears in his real form and accepts Parvati. In the sixth Canto seven celestial rishis and Arundhati negotiate the marriage with the parents of Uma. The seventh Canto describes the wedding, celebrated in royal pomp and grandeur. The eighth Canto shows the couple enjoying the happy life of love. The apocryphal Cantos, i.e. 9-17, describe the details of the birth and childhood of their son Karttika alias Kumara, his growing up to be a hero and the commander-in-chief of the gods and finally his fight with and the slaying of Tarakasura.

If it is assumed that only the first eight Cantos ending with the marriage of Shiva and Parvati are genuine then it may be asked why the poet should have left such an excellent piece of poetry just half way, even before the birth of Kumāra, which the title of the poem demands. The supposition of the sudden death of the poet, as suggested by some, cannot be accepted as valid, because his Raghuvamsha is decidedly a later work. It is often thought that Kalidasa, displeased with the severe criticism of his contemporaries for his excessive delineations of the amorous sports of Shiva and Parvati whom he considered to be the parents of the universe (jagatah pitarau—Raghuvamsha, I. 1) abandoned the idea of completing the poem. It is true that Anandavardhana (Dhvanyaloka, III. 6) knew such critics as did not spare Kalidasa for this transgression. Mahimabhatta and Vamana also subscribed to the views of such critics. But it is quite unlikely of a poet of Kalidasa's stature that he would desist from completing one of his great works due to adverse criticism and that too without withdrawing the Canto objected to by the critics. It may therefore, be considered probable that Kalidasa did what he intended, that is, he ended the poem with the marriage of Shiva and Parvati. The natural conclusion of this episode was the birth of Kumara. It may be noted in this connection that the work 'sambhava' in Sanskrit also means 'possible' or 'possibility'. Kalidasa concluded his kavya where the birth of Kumara became absolutely possible after the marriage of Shiva and Parvati. He left the rest of the story to the imagination of his readers. It may further be noted that the Cantos from 9 to 17 do not bear the stamp of Kalidasa's writing—the idiom of this part is weak and the metrical flaws are many.

It is obvious that Kalidasa borrowed the theme from ancient mythological traditions. The Shivapurana (I. 9-19) narrates the story upto the slaying of Tarakasura in great details. Verses may be found in both the Kumarasambhava and the Shivapurana which not only convey the same idea but also are similar in wording and metre. But it is hardly possible that Kalidasa borrowed the theme and the language from the Shivapurana now extant. The present text of the latter work cannot be assigned to a pre-Kalidasan age, even if Kalidasa is placed in the 4th century A.D. It appears that Kalidasa took the story from Valmiki's Ramayana (I. 37) where the birth of Karttikeya has been described. Our poet owes the title of his poem to Valmiki (Kumarasambhaschaiva dhanyah punyastathaiva ca—I. 37. 31). The theory of some of the modern scholars that Kalidasa named his poem after Kumaragupta, son of Chandragupta II, does not, therefore, hold much ground. The poet's indebtedness to the Mahabharata also cannot be ruled out.

The Kumarasambhava is not any one of the major works of Kalidasa, but is one of the best poems in the whole of Sanskrit literature. The genius of Kalidasa has fully unfolded itself in this poem. He not only draws vivid pictures of the beauty of Nature and of human form but brings out the relations between the beauty of nature and the emotions of animate beings. The poet describes the beauty of Parvati, of the forest in bloom and gaiety of spring and of the grandeur of the Himalayas. Kalidasa is generally believed to be a poet of enjoyment (sambhoga) of beauty and of love, but he is a great poet, most probably the only poet in classical India, who harmonizes the love which destroys the fortresses of restraint, with the love which brings tranquillity and peace to the individuals, the family and the society. In this poem Kalidasa fully brings out the idea of love triumphing through austerity (tapas) and fulfilling itself in the birth of a heroic son, the one who can deliver the world from suffering. The poet introduces Madana, the god of love, as a character and shows his power of tormenting the soul of even a yogi of Shiva's stature but gets him burnt to be shorn of his gross nature and resurrects him in a sublime form. Here lies the philosophy of love which Kalidasa intends to reveal through the story of the Kumarasambhava.

S.M.

KUMARASAMBHAVAMU (Telugu), is a poem in 12 ashwasas written by Nannechoda, the first of the Shavia poets (1125). He is a great devotee of Shiva though we can not call him a Virsashaiva. The birth of Sati, the birth of Ganeshwara, the destruction of Daksha's sacrifice, the birth of Parvati, the austere penance of Shiva, the trouble created by Taraka, the demon, the burning of Manmatha, the penance of Parvati, the marriage of Shiva and Parvati, their enjoyment, the birth of Kumara and his victory over Taraka are the main topics dealt with in the poem. This story is found in Brahmandapurana, Shivapurana, Kalidasa's Kumarasambhava and Udbhata's poem of the same name. It has attained great popularity after Kalidasa described it in his poem. Nannechoda seems to have seen all these works in general and Kalidasa's poem in particular. Though there are some verses in his poem the ideas of which closely resemble those in the shlokas of Kalidasa, it is entirely original as the poet says that his poem is "a jewel taken out from the ocean of his genius". The first two ashwasas are not quite essential to the main theme. Nannechoda gives a new exposition for the elephant-faced form of Ganeshwara. He was born to Shiva and Sati when they were sporting in the forms of male and female elephants. The poem should have ended with the birth of Kumara as the name indicates but the battle between the armies of Kumara and Taraka, the death of Taraka and victory of Kumara are also described in the last two ashwasas as Kumara was brought into being mainly for that purpose. The name 'Kumaravijaya' would have been more proper to the poem. The poet is very fond of descriptions and he has introduced all the descriptions in his poem in proper places. The poem contains all the characteristics of the later Prabandha and is rightly called by some critics as the first Prabandha in Telugu. His descriptions are natural and full of exalted ideas, and make the objects of description appear before the mental eyes of the readers. The descriptions of Parvati, the penance of Shiva and Parvati, the troubles created by Taraka, the burning of Manmatha, the marriage of the divine couple, the spring festival and the battle are good examples of his descriptive power and originality. He described the battle in the last two ashwasas so naturally and with such essential details that some critics have opined that it became an ideal even to Tikkana. He could do so as he was a king and might have taken part in many battles. Nannechoda is an expert in the delineation of the various rasas. 'Rativilapa' is full of karuna rasa. There are raudra and bibhatsa in the second arshwasa and in the last two ashwasas where the destruction of the sacrifice of Daksha and the battle are described. Shanta is well depicted while describing the penance of Shiva and Parvati. In the fifth ashwasa, the pangs of separation of Parvati are described with great skill. The shringara in the tenth ashwasa seems to have transgressed the limits of propriety, as the enjoyment of the divine couple is described as that of human beings. The dialogues between Parvati and Shiva in the guise of Brahmachari, Rati and Manmatha, the seven rishis and Himavan are very interesting. The poet displays his knowledge of dance and music in the ninth ashwasa where the music of Tumbura and Narada and the dance of the divine damsels are described. In the description of spring in the fourth ashwasa the poet seems to have followed Kalidasa to some extent. "The male elephant gave the tender sprout of the sallaki tree to his beloved after taking half of it, the male deer swallowed some portion of the darbha grass and gave the remaining to his partner; the swan gave with his mouth the tender lotus stalk to his beloved; the male bee gave with affection the honey of the full-blown lotus to his beloved, the kinnara poured into the ears of his wife the raga rasa (the music and love). In this way the males and females sported as soon as the spring set in, overwhelmed with the power of Cupid". The ideas expressed above coincide with those of Kalidasa in the same context. Nannechoda is highly devoted to his guru who taught him the art of writing and to whom he dedicated his work and in certain places he identified him with God Shiva. Parvati calls the guru, who gave her the Sihvamantra, with the name of Jangama Mallikarjuna. The sabara ladies, while pounding the bamboo rice sang songs not about Shiva but about Mallikarjuna. The devotion of the poet reaches its climax when he says that the ladies saw Jangama Mallikarjuna in Shiva who was coming for the marriage. The poet relates some of the incidents to contemporary life. He describes how the soldiers spoke about their valour in the camp even before the battle began and how they gave vent to their feelings while leaving their wives and children at home. It seems that in those days the salaries of the officers of the king were paid in gold coins and the ordinary soldiers were paid in kind (grain). When the king entrusted any important work to anybody he used to honour him in the court and offer 'Pan' which he accepted with humility. Nannechoda is of the opinion that unless one is proficient in the sixty four arts one cannot be a good poet. He was acquainted not only with dance and music but also with painting, Ashwashastra, Gajashastra and Yogashastra. He is the first poet who mentioned the marga and desi types of poetry, Janu Tenugu and Vastukavita. His poetry is full of beautiful sayings, proverbs and idiomatic phrases. He says that a poet should express his ideas in simple and sweet Janu Tenugu, that poetry should not only give pleasure but also ennoble the heart of the readers, that the style should be pleasant to the ear and that a poem should not be light like a hollow doll but should be substantial like a solid idol. He tried to exhibit these qualities in his poetry and succeeded to a large extent. He used many Tamil and Kannada words in his poem and did not take much care in following the rules of traditional grammar. Several old usages are found in his work and he is fond of chitra kavita, bandha kavita and mudralankara. All these characteristics make some portions of his poems unintelligible to ordinary readers. Though he wrote poetry of a high standard his name was not mentioned by any of the succeeding poets owing partly to his independent usages and partly to his religious fervour. He justifiably bore the title 'Kavirajashikhamani,' He says in the introduction of his poem "what is the use of the poem of the poet and of the arrow of the bowman if it does not enter the heart of the reader or the enemy and make him nod his head." His poem possessed this power of hitting in ample measure.

KUMARAPALA PADIBOHA (Prakrit:), also known as Jinadharma-pratibodha (the awakening of Jaina religion in Kumarapala) or Hemakumaracharita, was written by Somaprabha Suri. The last fifth prastava, containing the Apabhramsha portion has been studied by Ludwig Alsdorf under the title Der Kumarapala-pratibodha; ein Beitrag zur Kenntnis des Apabhramsa und Erzahlliteratur der Jainas. Alt und New-Indische Studien, Hamburg, 1928. A Gujarati translation of the work has been published by the Jain Atmanand Sabha, Bhavnagar, (1983). It is a didactic poem, a collection of 54 tales in verse and prose; meant for the enlightenment of King Kumarapala. A major part of these tales is composed in Prakrit, interspersed with beautiful sayings in Sanskrit and Apabhramsha. The tales are written in simple lucid and unsophisticated style. According to the author, the work was composed in 1184, only 11 years after the death of Kumarapala. It consists of five 'prastavas' by which Hemachandra, who is made the speaker, is supposed to have converted Kumarapala to Jain faith. Most of the tales narrated here occur in earlier Jain works. Prastava I deals with the stories related to violence, gambling, adultery, drinking and theft. The story of Nala is an illustration of the vice of gambling. Here the inhabitants of Kashi are said to be of deceitful nature and those of Konkana prone to fury without any obvious reason. Nala has been called cruel-hearted, pitiless and cowardly for deserting his chaste wife Damayanti, in the forest. It is stated that in order to safeguard the chastity of their sons, the well-to-do people sent them to prostitutes for training. Prastava II deals with the stories related to the worship of God and reverence to teachers. Here the pilgrimage of Kumarapala to Satrunjaya, Girnar and other holy places is mentioned. Prastava III contains the stories related to generosity, virtue, asceticism and meditation. The story of virtuous Silavati has been narrated. She understands the language of birds and animals and performs all kinds of apparently absurd actions. Such behaviour of hers is declared to be the proof of her great intelligence. She offers a garland of flowers to her husband while he was setting out for a long journey, declaring that as long as she remained chaste the flowers of the garland would never wither. This was proved in her favour by subsequent incidents. Several versions of the story are noted in Jain and non-Jain Sanskrit, Pali and Prakrit works, including the folk literature of Braj dialect. Prastava IV deals with the narratives related to twelve vratas preached in Jainism. The last Prastava consists of the account of four passions, anger, pride, deceit and greed and various other teachings of Jainism. It contains two long narratives. (i) The story of conversation between Soul, Mind and Senses, is an elaborately worked out allegory, and (ii) the story of Acharya Sthulabhadra.

Somaprabha Suri was a younger contemporary of Hemachandra and his disciple Kumarapala, the illustrious Chalukya king of Gujarat. He was born in Porwad Vaishya family; Sarvadeva was his father. His grandfather Jinadeva was a popular prime-minister. He was initiated into Jain faith while a boy; he was the pupil of Vijayasimha-Suri. Somaprabha Suri was a poet of eminence, well-versed in poetics. He was skilful in delivering religious sermons successfully. He seems to have been an expert in making his narratives catchy by introducing sayings and proverbs.

His other works are: (i) Sumainaha-chariya (Sumatinath-charita) in Prakrit; manuscript available in Jain Bhandars of Patan, (ii) Sinduraprakara also known as Suktimuktavali (Necklace of good sayings), a didactic poem composed in 1169; edited in the Kavyamala, pt. VII pp, 35-51. It is very popular among Jains. It was written on the pattern of Nitishataka of Bhartrhari. It has been translated into Italian by Pavolini (1898), with Introduction by F.L. Pullee. It is also known as Sindura-Prakarana as its first verse begins with 'Sinduraprakara and also Somashataka as it consists of one hundred verses. Some of its verses are found quoted in the Kumarapala pratibodha (iii) Shatarthikavya (giving one hundred meanings to each verse) was composed between 1177 and 1179. It seems very artificial though it reveals Sanskrit erudition on the part of the author.

KUMARAVALMIKI (Kannada) is the pseudonym of the Kannada epic poet, Narahari (1500). He was influenced on the one hand by Kumaravyasa and, on the other, by the Bhagavata outlook. Following Kumaravyasa, he rendered Valmiki Ramayana in Kannada verse, using the 'shatpadi' (six-line stanza). He was born in Thorave, near Bijapur and was a devotee of Narasimha, the local deity. (and hence, his work is familiarly known as Thorave Ramayana).

Kumaravalmiki's epic comprises 5,100 stanzas divided into six 'kandas', (Cantos). He generally follows Valmiki. The epic is rendered as though Ishwara is narrating the story of Rama to Parvati. He regards Rama as an 'avatar'. But his Ravana has an element of the tragic, and here the poet was probably influenced by Nagachandra. This is the first Ramayana in Kannada closely based on Valmiki's epic. Kumaravalmiki is not a great poet, but has remained immensely popular for three centuries at least; his devotional attitude and his smooth and absorbing narration made the epic very popular, and a 'gamaki' could take Valmiki to the masses by reciting Thorave Ramayana KUMARAVYASA (Kannada; 1430) is a Kannada poet of great renown, known as one of the extra-ordinary poets in the galaxy of the old Kannada literature. Among the epic-poets of the 'Satpadi' age (15th to 17th cen.) he occupies the supreme place, being endowed with an inimitable racy style of the Kannada idiom appealing to scholars as well as laymen. Next to Pampa (941), it is Kumaravyasa who took up the theme of the Mahabharata of Vyasamuni for his epic Karnata bharata kathamanjari popularly known as Kannada bharata or Gadugina bharata (Bharata of Gadag). Unlike Pampa's Samasta bharata which is a concise form of the original Mahabharata, the Bharata katha manjari is a lengthy and detailed version of the same comprising the first ten 'parvas' with 150 'sandhis' and about 8500 verses in 'bhamini satpadi' metre.

Kumaravyasa, like many other Kannada poets, has not mentioned the date of the composition of his epic. And since he makes no mention of his previous Kannada poets nor contemporary kings, his date is not precisely ascertained. There is a paucity of positive evidence either internal or external. From the concluding few prose lines at the end of each parva of his epic, it is clear that he was a staunch devotee of his family god Viranarayana of Gadag (Dist. Dharwad) and that he was a yogindra (an eminent yogi) at the time of the composition of the epic. And in the introductory part of the work, he introduces himself as an incarnation of Vyasa's son Shukacharya, an unsurpassed yogi of the Mahabharata.

It is an accepted fact that the poet belonged to Koliwad, a village in Dharwad district. On the basis of some old official records of Koliwad, R.S. Panchamukhi gives the geneology of Kumaravyasa as follows; The poet's great grand father was one Chinnada kaiya Mathavanarasayya who caused the installation of his family god Viranarayana in Koliwad where he had settled since 1147. He was a chief war-lord and body-guard to Raja Narasingaraya. Madhavanarasayya's son Timmarasayya remained in Koliwad being entrusted to look after the daily worship of the newly installed god, whereas his father lived in the capital Vijayanagar in the service of the kingdom. Timmarasayya had a son called Lakkarasayya who bore five children of whom Viranarayanayya later known as poet Naranappa or Kumaravyasa, was the eldest. As regards geneology culled from other similar records found with certain individuals belonging to Koliwad and Gadag, there are some minor variations too; whatever be the variations, this much appears to be certain that the poet's name was Virayanarayana or Naranappa and that he belonged to the family of the senughogas of Koliwad.

According to the pillar inscription (1563) at the Madhavajananaradana temple of Koliwad, the ancestors of Kumaravyasa were holding both the offices of Gavunda and Sanubhoga, i.e. were in charge of the village administration, collection of revenue and keeping accounts. Practically, they were the masters of the village which was a gift from the Vijayanagara kings, till the date of the inscription, i.e. 1563. Just two years before the fall of the Vijayanagara empire, some of the members of this family had been serving the Vijayanagara kings as commanders in charge of elephant battalions. Aneya Devappayya (Devappayya of elephant) is mentioned in the said inscription as holding such an office. He is said to be a grandson to the poet, Viranarayanayya i.e. Kumaravyasa. From this, some scholars hold that the poet Kumaravyasa too was, possibly, a similar warlord in his younger days.

The name Kumaravyasa appears to be a title of the poet Naranappa. He mentions in a verse that Vedavyasa of the Mahabharata had accepted him as his own son and blessed him with a boon which statement accounts for the title Kumaravyasa. The title is also said to have been conferred on him by Vyasaraaya of the Vijayanagar times according to legend. The poet's assertion that the god Viranarayana himself was the poet of the great epic and that he (Kumaravyasa) was a mere scribe, is a proof of the poet's devotion towards his family god and his self-confidence as well.

There are a number of legends current about the poet, of which one tells how the poet was advised by Ashwatthama, one of the legendary immortals, to take up the task of composing the epic. Accordingly he started doing so daily, after taking bath in a pond in the temple and in drenched clothes, in the presence of the god Viranarayana, reclining in a standing posture against a pillar of the temple at Gadag (Dist. Dharwad) till his inspiration waned and his clothes started drying. The pillar is even to this day, known as Kumaravyasana Kamba (Pillar of Kumaravyasa). The legend is significant, in the sense that the poet's inspiration was not merely human but divine.

A shorter narrative poem called 'Airavata' in Bhamin Satpadi metre, is said to be another work of Kumaravyasa. The theme of the poem is based on an event in the first parva of the Mahabharata dealing with the story of Kunti's worship of the Airavata (the legendary white elephant of the god Indra). The authorship of this work is disputed among scholars since the language, the style and the poetic quality of the poem vary much from those of Kumaravyasa, being of a much lower order.

The date of the poet, is indeed, a major matter of dispute in as much as its range extends from 12th to 16th century as per various conclusions held by scholars. T.S. Subbarayan, on the authority of the poetical works, Gururaja charitra (1650), Bhairaveswara kavya katha sutratnakara (1672) and Chorabasava charitra (1763), holds that the poet belonged to the 12th century. The evidence based on the concocted tales in these works, is too weak to warrant credibility. Govinda Pai on the basis of the forms of Marathi and Arabic words and phrases and on certain internal historical elements, concludes that the poet lived in the former half of the 13th century. R.S. Mugali refuted the linguistic and historical evidence put forward by Govinda Pai as unconvincing. R. Narasimhachar, the author of the Kannada kavi charitre, observes on the authority of the above mentioned Virashaiva works of 17th and 18th centuries, that the poet lived in the time of Vijayanagar King Devaraya (1416-1446) and fixes 1430 as his date which has been accepted by many scholars as a plausible one. The date suggested by R. Narasimhachar may also be considered a tentative one until more convincing evidence is made available.

The religious sect and the school of thought to which Kumaravyasa belonged, is also equally disputed. Whatever the poet's sect or faith, that he was a staunch devotee of the god Viranarayana i.e. Vishnu, is indisputable. And the poet's assertion is that his work is Krishnakatha the story of Krishna, traditionally believed to be an incarnation of Vishnu. Krishna symbolises, in the poet's view, the supreme God-head who is the unseen power behind the drama of this human life so marvellously depicted in his Kannada bharata. Krishna is the transcendental reality from which emanate the Tric—the three aspects viz., Brahma, Vishnu and Maheshwara. Hence, Krishna occupies the central place in this epic story. It is he who plays a vital role in this cosmic drama. Whenever Krishna appears on the scene in the panorama of the Bharata story, the poet's ecstasy knows no bounds and his inspiration, transcends the human levels of consciousness, and creates hitherto unseen pictures and unheard tunes.

Endowed with such catholicity of mind, Kumaravyasa, though apparently partial towards Krishna, shows equal devotion to Shiva, an aspect of Krishna. Hence, Govinda Pai appears to be right when he states that Kumaravyasa believes in Advaita-monism and he is neither Madhwa nor Vaishnava of of Ramanuja tradition as some claim. As he avers, he was probably of the Bhagavata tradition. As N.S. Rajapurohita holds, the poet was neither Viravaishnava nor Virashaiva but an advaiti making no distinction between Hari and Hara. On the basis of the poet's statements in the epic, M.A. Doreswamy Iyenger holds that there are grounds to believe that the poet belonged to all sects and all faiths, and it is possible to contradict the statements found in favour of any one of the sects or faiths. Nevertheless there are no two opinions with regard to the catholicity of the poet's mighty heart and soul never submitting to narrow sectarian view.

It appears to be true that Kumaravyasa lived in the glorious times of Vijayanagar empire. His forefathers were in close touch with the great kings of the imperial dynasty, some of them holding high offices under them.

The poet, thus, had scope enough to understand and to inculcate the spirit of the great Vijayanagar culture. Possibly, he studied all the sciences in depth and was well-versed in the vedas, upanishads and the puranas. He made a thorough study of both Kannada and Sanskrit literatures along with poetics, grammar and prosody. The Vyasa-mahabharata was perhaps, ever on the tip of his tongue. He appears to have gone through the Pampabharata too. With this equipment of scholarship coupled with the gift of a divine inspiration and rich experience of the world around, he could produce such a magnum opus as the Bharata katha manjari which is verily a re-creation of the Mahabharata of Vyasamuni, in Kannada.

KUMMI SONGS (Malayalam). Kummi is a group-dance of the women of Kerala that forms part of the 'kaikottikali'. The dancers move in a circle with fast and violent steps. One of the women leads the singing with a favourite song while the rest take up the refrain. The clapping of the hands is perfectly synchronised with the steps that they make and also with the rhythm of the songs. The songs used for this dance are called kummi songs. These songs have a peculiar rhythm and symphony. The song beginning with "Vira virata kumara vibho charutaraguna sagara bho" that appears in the Uttarasvayamvaram (Wedding of Uttara) attakatha of Irayimman Thampi is the favourite one for women.

In south Kerala Kummi songs are employed extensively for the Villatichampattu (striking with sticks on a long bow and singing). But that is a simple form of kummi as is seen in the following lines from Kirmiravadham.

"Chandrakaladhara palaya mam
Chandomaya pari palaya mam
Indramukhamara-vandita-padara-Vinda Kripalaya palaya mam."

Such lines are seen in the 'vatakkann pattukal' (ballads of North Malabar) also.

KUMMI SONGS (Tamil) have been sung by women in Tamilnadu from a very long time; their origin is obscure. They are sung by groups of girls or women on special occasions, usually religious. These kummi songs have a strongly marked folk flavour and, though they are sung by women of all classes, they are more favoured by the economically backward people, the workers and village peasants. The festivals devoted to the deities of the masses like Mariamman and Bhagavati (goddesses and seldom gods) are the occasions when kummi sessions are held, sometimes for ten days together. They are held in private homes, too, to mark the occasion when a girl of the family attains puberty. During Pongal, village girls go on a picnic to places like mountain slopes to perform kummi and cook the religious offering of Pongal. The subject matter of many of the kummi songs is religion, undoubtedly, but the prevailing spirit of a kummi session is gaiety and not solemnity which marks religious worship. The lyrics purvey a manifold flavour, sometimes narrating an absorbing story, now portraying love or heroism or piety, the more recent ones evoking patriotism, some of them fomenting the polemical spirit or merely poking wholesome fun. The language of the lyrics is very simple, not always grammatical, of the people; nothing is contrived, the whole approach being natural and straight forward. The similes are all based on rural life.

Long kummis of 500 lines and even 1000 lines are known; they depict puranic tales or, in one case, the defiant story of a rebel against the East India Company. In course of time they have come to be regarded as a distinct literary genre.

The basic thing about the performance of a kummi is that a number of women stand in a circle with a lamp in the centre and dance simple steps to the lines of a song, going round the lamp. Sometimes the leader of the group recites a line and the others follow her; sometimes one set of performers recite a passage and another recite a stanza as if in reply to it. The first few lines of kummi songs are usually a joyous invitation to all girls to join in singing and dancing the kummi whose subject-matter is stated or suggested. The performers keep time by clapping their hands in unison; in fact the 'tal' is a very vital part of the music here.

There is no limit to the size of a kummi song. This is perhaps because this song-and-dance can last part of an hour or can carry on for days together; in the southern districts kummi sessions lasting over 10 days are known. To cater to these widely differing needs, folk poets have composed songs of a few lines and of many hundreds of lines, too. In the latter category we can cite 'Harichandran kummi' 'Sirutondanayanar kummi' and 'Panchapandavar Vaikuntar kummi'. There is a kummi on the rebel Kattabomman who rose against the East India Company and also one on the Golden Jubilee of Queen Victoria's reign. These folk poets have freely drawn on the endless resources of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and the puranas and composed kummis on them.

Among these mythological stories of god incarnating Himself in human form, there is a marked preference shown for those on Krishna rather than on Rama.

The performers and the spectators of kummi are unsophisticated village folk to whom stories of valour and romance will naturally appeal. Many kummis centre on Arjuna's exploits like the one where he marries Subhadra with considerable help from Krishna; Arjuna is a very popular hero among Indian villagers.

There are some kummis which treat of profound philosophy like Bhadrakiri's songs. A lady composed a Vedantakkumi 70-80 years ago with a similar purpose and perhaps a similar fate.

Bhadrakiri's kummi deserves special mention, even though it may go above the heads of village audiences. He makes his stanzas—called kannis—literary, through the use of striking metaphors and appropriate diction.

Further the message conveyed through the kannis of this kummi is scarcely appropriate to the atmosphere of gay hedonism in which kummis are sung and danced to. The more modern Vedantakkumi, too, is of a piece with this; its theme of advaita vedanta is unlikely to be understood, even by cultivated urban audiences. Such kummis indicate the development of this form as a distinct, attractive literary genre eagerly adopted by poets who did not have village patrons in mind.

There are two kummis which deserve special mention, one because of the contents and the other, for a variety of reasons, having to do with the personality of the poet concerned and the very apposite subject matter. The first is by yogi Suddhananda Bharati, a scholar-poet of over 90 years whose output over the last 60 or more years has been prolific. He wrote a kummi on the history of the country, in a lucid language.

KUNCHAN NAMPIAR

In this poem, the lyric is quite poetic and the language elevated; it is doubtful how many villagers can follow it by listening once as the lines are recited. The poet emphasises everywhere the essential unity of the country showing how the diversity of languages, religions and life-styles need not make for divisiveness. He tells the story through the episodes of some selected great men like Chanakya, Ashoka and Shivaji. Everything considered, this kummi adds up to be one of the best in this genre.

The second is from the great poet of Indian nationalism, Subramania Bharati. His poem, a kummi, to be sung and danced to by girls is on the subject of women's liberation, on which Bharati was as uncompromising as on that of India's fight for political emancipation. His lyric is as usual fiery and views are expressed without inhibition. He condemns the conservatism which chains a woman to the kitchen, denying her freedom and the chance to fulfil herself, reducing her to the level of chattels.

There is a somewhat obscure kummi called 'Salaik-karai Iyanar makutakkummi' which deserves mention as an extreme case of the tendency towards pedantry. This displays most of the sandhi and verbal tricks very familiar to students of Tamil literature in the later works; it is wholly impossible for the village spectators or even for most of the urban auditors to understand the lines as they are recited.

There are some kummis composed by people of other religions, who were obviously attracted by the appeal of the form to villagers; 'Nabiullah Karanakkumi' and 'Gnana upadesapperinbakkummi' extol respectively the Muslim and the Christian faith.

Not all kummis purvey such serious fare. The true mood of kummi is one of inconsequential gaiety and in tune with this mood, many small pieces appear to have been composed full of a capricious whim. These small pieces obviously are by folk poets in the language understood by the rural people cast in the correct mood of frothy gaiety and in active use in song and dance sequences on festive occasions.

KUNCHAN NAMPIAR (Malayalam) or Kalakatt Kunchan Nampiyar, one of the most popular Malayalam poets, emerged as a famous poet-artist from the rich background of eighteenth century Kerala. He was born in Palghat District of Central Kerala, in the small village of Killikurissimangalam which is famed for its Shiva temple and culture. Kunchan's mother belonged to the Kalakkatt family which is very close to the Shiva temple. The Nampiyars are a sub-caste having some duties in temples, and by profession, they are artists who assist the kuttu and kutiyattam performed by the Chakyar. The question of who his father was remains unsettled to this day. Some scholars say that he was a Nambutiri while others are of the opinion that he was a Nampiar himself. Both opinions are only probabilities. Another opinion that has been recently put forward is that Nampiar's father was a Chakyar.

Another problem regarding the poet is whether Kunchan Nampiar and the Sanskrit poet-dramatist Ramapanivada are the same person or not. Ullur S. Parameswara Iyer and some other scholars have approved the identity of the two poets on the assumption that the real name of Kunchan Nampiar was 'Rama'. But some others like Attur Krishna Pisharody and K. Goda Varma maintained that the actual name of Kunchan Nampiar was Krishna. If this is correct, Ramapanivada cannot be Kunchan. The word 'Panivada' means 'a person who beats the drum with the hand'. Kunchan belonged to the Nampiar community which used to play the drum called 'mizhavu' in 'kuttu' and 'kutiyattam' and hence he is also a Panivada. Scholars like the late Vatakumkur state that Rama Panivada and Kunchan Nampiar were brothers and they belonged to the Kalakkatt family. Some researchers have brought to light some verses to prove the real name either as Krishnan or as Raman. While Ramapanivada has mentioned his name in all his works, Kunchan Nampiar did not care to make any personal reference.

The evidences already obtained, and the discoveries of literary historians and researchers, throw some light on the matter. Kunchan's father either belonged to Kottayam District which is about 150 miles away from Palghat or he lived there doing some professional work. Consequently, Kunchan was also removed to that place in his younger days where his tastes and habits flourished in an entirely different atmosphere. He got the patronage of a local king, Chempakasseri Raja or Devanarayanan of Ampalappuzha. Kunchan stayed at Ambalappuzha under the protection of the King for quite a long time. During that period he could continue his educational career under the able guidance of distinguished teachers like Nandikkat Unni Ravi Kurup and Dronampalli Acharyan whom Nampiar very often mentions in his works with great respect and admiration.

In the year 1746 Martanda Varma of the erstwhile Travancore State defeated King Devanarayana and Chempakasseri was annexed to Travancore. Being a promoter of art and poetry, Martanda Varma invited Kunchan to Trivandrum, his capital. Kunchan moved from Ambalappuzha to Trivandrum before 1750 after a long stay at Ampalappuzha for about 20 years. Trivandrum also provided ample occasion for the poet and artist in him. The king as well as his minister Ayyappan Martanda Pillai encouraged him in a large measure. In 1763 when Ayyappan Martanda Pillai passed away Kunchan also was getting old and he desired to go back to his favourite place Ampalappuzha where he again stayed for about 5-10 years, until his death by poison at 60 or 65, between 1765-1775. So we can assume that the poet lived between 1700 and 1770.

KUNDAKUNDA

During the earlier stay at Ampalappuzha Kunchan Nampiar could witness folk art forms like 'velakali' 'patayani', etc. He also participated in the arts of the chakyar and he closely watched other classical arts like 'kathakali', 'krishnattam', etc. His wide experience and taste helped him to evolve a new form of audio-visual art form called 'tullal' of which the roots were in the earlier artistic life of Kerala. It is said that a chakyar who had insulted him inspired Kunchan Nampiar to invent a rival performance. As a result, Kunchan composed the Kalyana saugandhikam shitankar tullal within a few hours and he designed the art form of tullal for theatrical presentation. Later he composed more than fifty tullal poems. They are of three categories—'ottan', 'shitankan' and 'parayan', and all the stories depicted in the tullal originally belong to the puranas like the Mahabharata, the Bhagavata and the Ramayana. The tullal poems are humorous and musical.

Scholars do not agree on identifying all the works of Kunchan Nampiar. A hundred years ago, the late P. Govinda Pillai, the first historian of Malayalam literature, attributed only 26 tullal songs to Nampiar. Ullur S. Parameswara Iyer in his Kerala sahitya charitram (1955) identifies 42 tullal poems, while P.K. Sivasankara Pillai, the editor of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi edition (1970) of Tullal works accepts only 41, and V.S. Sarma, in his 75 tullal kathakal (1975) identifies 46. The Vidyabhivardhini press which edited 58 tullal poems and the S.R.V. Press which collected 60 tullal poems have done a memorable work in collecting, editing and publishing the tullal poems. The pioneering attempt made by Sahitya Panchananan P.K. Narayana Pillai to bring out the excellence of Kunchan Nampiar and the tullal poems also deserves particular mention.

By identifying Kunchan Nampiar with Rama Panivada, Ullur ascribes the following number of book to the same poet: tullal kathas 42, non-tullal works 35, works in Sanskrit 20. This total output though creditable to any author, seems to deserve further inquiry. The popular non-tullal works are the following: Srikrishna charitam manipravalam, Nalacharitam kilippattu, Panchatantram kilippattu, Kiratam vanchippattu, Shilavati naluvrittam, Kumarapureswaristavam, Rukminiswayamvaram pattuvrittam, Rasakrida naluvrittam, Rugmangada charitam kilippattu and Bhagavadut (Dutavakyam) Patinnalu vrittam. It is also believed that attakathas like Shakuntalam, Palazhimathanam and Shambaravadham were written by Kunchan Nampiar.

The tullal works are puranic in content, lucid in composition and satirical in tone. There are devotional and narrative portions in plenty. The non-tullal works show a different characteristic though written in a very simple style. Sri Krishna charitam manipravalam is an exceptionally brilliant work written in a mahakavya pattern and it is enjoyable to children also. Bhagavadut patinnalu vrittam, which depicts the story of Sri Krishna's message to Duryodhana is a masterly composition. The poem written in Sanskrit metres is one of the finest literary pieces of Malayalam literature.

Among the trio of early Malayalam literature, Cherusseri, Ezhuttacchan and Kunchan Nampiar, the last one is the most versatile as he accepted both the visual aspect and the poetic aspect of the tullal. He has disciples and followers in plenty but nobody could excel him either as a poet or as an artist. The tullal poetry brings out the characteristic features of the poet also. It covers the entire spectrum of humanity, the entire gamut of human emotions and it reflects the life of the 18th century Kerala. He evolved the tullal style of poetry, raised it to a classical stature and through his composition as well as through his art form, he created an indelible impression on Malayalam readers belonging to several generations.

KUNDAKUNDA (Prakrit; 112-08 B.C.) was a great Jain philosopher, logician and saint, who wrote what he experienced by himself in his life. In the realm of Prakrit literature Kundakunda's literary activities were commented on for more than one thousand years. He composed about two thousand verses and some devotional prose passages in the Prakrit language. He belonged to South India, and his native place was Kondakunda, seven kilometers from Guntakal Railway Station in Anantapur district, and, therefore, he was called Kundakunda. The real name of the author was Paumanandi or Padmanandi I, as mentioned by both Devasena and Jayasenacharya. The tradition attributes not less than eighty-four 'pahudas' (prabhritas) to Kundakunda, but it is a floating tradition and no commentator has mentioned a single word about his works. At present, ten pahudas and twenty-two works are available. These works are composed mainly in Prakrit Gahabandha; however, anushtubh and upajati metres have also been used frequently. The works of Kundakunda, mainly the five 'paramagamas' (eminent canonical works), have enjoyed unsurpassed popularity. They have been translated into many Indian languages. Pattavalis and inscriptional documents assign him to the first century B.C. He lived a long life of 95 years, 10 months and 11 days. At the age of eleven, he renounced the world and adopted the saint-diksha.

Panchastikaya of Kundakunda is a fine exposition of Jaina metaphysics. It deals mainly with 'dravyas'. The term 'dravya' denotes any existence which has the important characteristic of persistence through change. Dravyas (organic unities) are six in number: jiva (soul), pudgala (matter), dharma (principle of motion), adharma (principle of rest), akasha (space) and kala (time). These are the constituent elements of the universe and therefore, the six dravyas are the real existence. Jaina system admits only the dynamic reality or dravya as origin, decay and permanency as the triple elements of the Real. The dravya is always associated with certain intrinsic and inalienable qualities called 'gunas'. These six dravyas can move in the same place. They can also occupy the same space because of their mutual accommodating nature. Though they get interpenetrated, still each preserves its own proper nature. Whatever things have the essential nature of manifesting themselves severally through their numerous qualities and modes are the 'astikayas'. Kundakunda states that the soul maintains its intrinsic nature and is real even in its siddha or perfect state.

Kundakunda is one of the early exponents of Jaina mysticism. Kundakunda explains that the self with spiritual knowledge, by contemplating upon the pure self, become himself pure. But the self which contemplates upon the impure nature of the self becomes himself impure. His Samayasara pronounces that the self with spiritual knowledge knows his true nature, and he, lacking in knowledge, blinded by his nescience, is unable to perceive his true nature.

Acharya Kundakunda is a great personality in the field of Jain spiritual teachings. According to him, instead of diverting one's attention to environmental objects, the thought is to be fixed on the self.

KUNDALIYA (Rajasthani) is a combination of two separate metres, the 'duha' (doha) and the 'rola'. Each line of these two metres contains 24 vowel-marks in all. The concluding part of duha, consisting of eleven vowel-marks, is reproduced as the starting part of 11 vowel-marks of the rola, while the terminating portion of 13 vowel-marks of the fourth line of the rola conforms to the starting portion of 13 vowel-marks of the duha. This definition of kundaliya is given by Jagannathprasad 'Bhanukavi' in his Chhanda Prabhakar, and the well-known kundaliyas by the reputed poet Girdhar have been quoted as examples. Kisan Adha, a Rajasthani prosodist, has defined it differently by saying that it is a combination of 'duha' and 'kayaba' metres. Kayaba is practically a rola with the only extra binding that the 11th vowel-mark in each of the four lines should be a short one, other bindings regarding repetitions, etc. remaining the same. The Rajasthani prosodist has further classified the kundaliya metre into 3 kinds: 'shuddha', 'jhadaulata', and 'dohala'. It is the shuddha kundaliya which is often used. Well-known poets like Isaradas and Asiya Duda have written kundaliyas on their patrons and reputed heroes. Jasai Jama na kundaliya or Halan Jhalan ra kundaliya by Isaradas and Rathaur Kalai Rayamalot ra kundaliya are two such works written in the 16th century. Halan Jhalan ra kundaliya (50 in all) by Barahatha Isaradas top them all in their poetic excellence. Kundaliyas by Jaitawat Kesari Simha (140 in all) are aimed at showing mercy towards animals and birds. Other minor works in the metre are: Kundaliyas by Manak (Jain religion), Kundaliyas by Din Kaviraya, Kalyanamal ji ra kundaliya, Arjunsimha ra kundaliya by Barahatha Padamo (18th century), etc. The Dadu Panthi saint poets have also used kundaliyas. Sevasdasji gave us 54 and Haridasji 36. All these belong to the 18th and the 19th centuries. Girdhar is treated as a master craftsman so far as the kundaliyas are concerned, but his language is not Rajasthani. Kundaliya shataka is a recent work written by Kavirava Mohansimha in the 20th century.

KUNDAMALA (Sanskrit) is a drama (nataka) in six Acts dealing with the later portion of the Ramayana story as in Bhavabhuti's Uttararamacharita. Its author, Dinnaga, also referred to in manuscripts as Dhiranaga, Viranaga, Ravinga and Nagayya, seems to be different from the famous Buddhist philosopher and logician of that name. As to the native place of the author, the Tanjore manuscripts say that the poet was a resident of Anuparadha, while the Mysore manuscript refers to the place as Aralarapura. There has been a suggestion that he might be a native of Sri Lanka. From the plot the drama seems to have been written later than the Uttararamacharita and is generally assigned to the 7th century but there are some scholars who believe that Kundamala was written earlier than the Uttaramacharita.

The theme of the Kundamala is taken from the Uttarakanda of Valmiki Ramayana, starting with the desertion of Sita and ending with the reunion of Rama and Sita, along with their sons, Kusha and Lava, during the Ashvamedha sacrifice. To suit the dramatic development of the plot, many deviations have been effected in the Naimisha forest.

In the course of wanderings in the Naimisha forest, Rama and Lakshmana happen to find a garland of jasmine flowers, kundamala, floating in the waters of the Gomati, and Rama recognises it as the work of Sita. They try to trace the place of its origin and come to the hermitage of Valmiki where Sita is collecting flowers. Rama's lamentation for Sita is overheard by the latter. Sita is invisible because of a boon granted by Valmiki, but Rama can see her reflected image in the waters of the lake. Rama falls into a swoon and is fanned by the invisible Sita with her scarf which is visible. The Vidushaka informs him that it was a trick of the divine nymph, Tilottama, assuming the guise of Sita. Kundamala is full of dramatic action and suspense and characters are not mere types, but men and women with individuality. The style is simple and straightforward.

The Kundamala motif reminds one of the 'bakulamalas' in Bhavabhuti's Malatimadhava and the necklace in Shriharsha's Ratnavali. The influences of Bhasa, Kalidasa and Banabhatta are also traceable. Quotations from Kundamala are found in Bhoja's Shringaraprakasha, Saradatanaya's Bhavaprakasha, Sagarandin's Natalakshananakosha, Ramchandra and Gunachandra's Natyadarpana, Vidyakara's Subhasitaratnakosha, Shridharadasa's Saduktikarnamrita and Vishvanatha's Sahityadarpana. Kundamala has been referred to in the Rupadipika of Banurupamishra, a commentary on Dhananjay's Dasharupaka, and the anonymous Kavyakamadhenu.

The best edition of Kundamala is by K.K. Datta (Govt. Sanskrit College, Calcutta, 1956); there is an English translation by A.C. Woolner, under the title, The Jasmine Garland (K.K. Raja and B. Bhattacharya, Punjab University, Lahore, 1935).

KUNDANAGAR, KALLAPPA GIRIYAPPA (Kannada; b. 1895, d. 1965) was a scholar and critic. He belonged to a family of goldsmiths, and his early life was a fight for education. Even as a student he had to support himself, and his education was frequently interrupted. But he got his Master of Arts degree and taught in several colleges. He was known for his scholarship, his modesty and his quiet dignity.

Kundanagar was proficient in Kannada, English, Sanskrit, Pali, Marathi and Ardhamagadhi. He was immersed in the study of epigraphs, palm leaf manuscripts and other ancient records. His book in English, Notes on the Mahalakshmi Temple won wide recognition. Inscriptions in Northern Karnataka and Kolhapur confirmed this reputation. He was a member of the editorial board of English-Kannada Dictionary (Mysore University) and the Kannada-Kannada Dictionary (Kannada Sahitya Parishat), and was elected President of the Kannada Literary Conference (1961). His literary works include Saraswati (novel, 1930), Mahadeviyakka (critical work, 1930) and Hariharadeva (1937). KUNJABDULLA, PUNATTIL (Malayalam; b. 1941) is a medical man by profession but he is an established short-story writer and novelist in Malayalam. He applied modern techniques in his writing and he could earn creditable success in his creative work. Among his books, Smaraka shilakal (Memorial stories) is a popular novel and it won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1980. This novel which runs into 325 pages is the story of an old mosque and the adjacent cremation ground. The story is centred around Khan Bahadur Pookkoya Tungal and the Arakkal family. There are many stories, legends and exciting incidents for the novelist to narrate, and in this description the themes and characters involved get a new birth and life. Smaraka shilakal is original in content and style. Kunjabdulla is one among the moderns who have opened new vistas in story-writing in Malayalam. His novels are Tettukal (Errors), Suryan (The sun), Ali-gadhile tatavukaran (The prisoner of Aligarh), Dukkhi-tarku pumaram (A flower tree for the sorrowful), and Navagrahangalute tatavara (The prison of the nine planets).

KUNJAN PILLAI CHATTAMPI SWAMIKAL (Malayalam; b. 1854, d. 1924), a great spiritual luminary, was born in a poor family as the son of Vasudevan Sharma and Nanga Devi, at a small village named Kollur situated in the suburb of Trivandrum. They called him Kunjan, which means a small boy. Later he got a nickname 'Chattambi' which means a monitor or leader of a group of students. After his becoming a recluse, this name was further expanded as Sri Kunjan Pillai Chattampi Swamikal. But the sacred name he took as a sage was Shanmukhananda Swamikal. He studied Sanskrit and allied subjects, thanks to the kindness of a learned scholar, and music from Pettayil Raman Pillai Asan. Being an intelligent young boy, he pursued his studies and later became an ardent scholar in different disciplines such as literature, philosophy, logic, music, painting, medicine, astrology, yogic culture, etc.

His spiritual guru was Thycattu Ayyavu, who taught him the advanced portions of Hatayoga. His first disciple, the well-known saint and social reformer, Narayana Guru, once paid tribute to him saying that nothing in this world is unknown to him. Both are said to have done penance for a few years in the caves of Maruthwamala—a mountain of medicinal plants near Kanyakumari. Two other disciples of Chattampi Swamikal were Nilakanta Tirthapadar and Tirthapada Paramahamsar who founded a new school of spiritual pursuit with the guidance and advice of their renowned preceptor. There are over 16 books authored by Chattampi Swamikal. Most of them deal with spiritual and ethical problems and subjects. Some of them have served to revolutionize our very outlook on life and society (eg., Vedadhikara nirupanam). His style is also something characteristic of his unique personality. His writing, therefore, had a deep bearing on literature in general.

KUNJAN PILLAI, ELAMKULAM-KUNJAPPA, C.H.

It is said that Swami Vivekananda in his sojourn in Kerala visited Chattampi Swamikal and learnt the proper way of doing khechari mudra, a peculiar yogic feat. Though Chattampi Swamikal led an ascetic life adhering to strict celibacy, he did not take to ochre robes. He was always in the habit of wandering and mingling with people, irrespective of differences of caste and religion, as an ordinary man. At the end of his spiritual pursuits he chose a quiet spot in Panmana, near Quilon, for his departure from this world. After a few years a temple named Bala Bhattaraka Kshetra was built over his Samadhi by Shri Kumbalathu Sanku Pillai. Recently an organisation named Vidyadhiraja Saba has been founded to propagate the ideal of this great son of Kerala.

KUNJAN PILLAI, ELAMKULAM (Malayalam; b. 1904, d. 1973) commonly known as Prof. Elamkulam, was a noted historian, researcher, writer and eminent teacher. After completing his college studies, he joined as a lecturer in the University College at Trivandrum where he taught till his retirement as Professor of Malayalam in 1959. Qualified in Malayalam and Sanskrit, and experienced in archeological studies, Elamkulam was engaged in researches into the cultural history of Kerala. He brought out standard critical editions of ancient Manipravala texts like Lilatilakam, Unnini sandesham, etc. His publications include studies on literature and interpretations of classical works. He brought to light hidden and unknown facts regarding ancient Kerala. His studies throw a lot of light on Kerala culture and Malayalam literature. The annotations he prepared for various old texts, and his literary and historical studies opened a new wave of research in Malayalam. He combined historical, sociological and aesthetic perspectives in his studies, and his prolonged inquiry and study brought him remarkable credit. As a result of his continuous research he could not only make certain observations regarding Manipravala literature, but also find out the sociological and historical facts relating to the feudal system in Kerala. His findings regarding the hundred years' war between the Kerala kings and the Tamil rulers are also very important. Even though his conclusions are not fully endorsed by all scholars, his new approach, his methodical analysis and his interpretations have attracted the attention of students of history, culture and literature.

FURTHER WORKS: Lilatilakam, Unnini sandesham, Koka sandesham, Nalacharitham attakkatha, Chandrotsavam.

KUNJAN PILLAI, SURANAT (Malayalam; b. 1911), perhaps the first triple-postgraduate degree holder of Kerala, has established his reputation among linguists and lexicographers. Pillai held many responsible official and academic positions. As a member of the Indian Historical Records Commission, Indian Language Society and Kerala Sahitya Akademi Executive Committee, as the President of Kerala Sahitya Parishat, as the Editor of the Indian History Journal and as the Hon. Director of the Oriental Manuscripts Library, he has contributed greatly to the fields of language studies, literature and history. Pillai's major contribution is the first two volumes of Malayalam Lexicon published by the University of Kerala, and it was he who organised the lexicon work in Kerala University. His latest work Kairali samaksham consists of a series of articles covering the history of Malayalam literature. He edited an anthology of Malayalam poetry, Kavyaratnakaram, for the Sahitya Akademi. Pillai's essays and books are of high educational value. Some of his writings are prescribed for study at the school and college levels. Apart from his pioneering contribution to lexicography, he has edited and published many ancient texts. He has more than twenty books to his credit. In recognition of his contribution to the field of lexicography, Meerut University conferred an honorary D. Litt degree on him.

KUNJAPPA, C.H. (Malayalam; b. 1907, d. 1982). Born in a poor family of Peralassery in Canannore district as the son of Lakshmi Amma and Krishnan Thangal, Kunhappa had a tough time all through his school and college days and could not have completed his education but for the munificence of many a philanthropic relative and neighbour. His ambition was to become a research chemist or at least a school teacher but he was destined to become neither. Attracted by the Salt Satyagraha launched by Gandhi in 1930, he decided to support it by joining the editorial board of the well-known Malayalam daily Mathribhumi and became, in time, its chief editor. In this capacity he played a decisive role in the nationalist movement until his retirement due to old age. His editorials, loaded with quotations from the Vedas and the Upanishads and sprinkled with the pithy proverbs of North Malabar, had a charm and strength all their own.

His major works are the translations of the autobiography of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru (1940), The Discovery of India by the same author (1948) and Einstein and the Universe (1962). His first work, which he mostly wrote in his teens is a fascinating collection of essays entitled Vichara korakam (published only in 1958). Smaranakal matram (Mere memories, 1982), his autobiography, is regarded as a memorable work in that branch of literature in Malayalam. Nevertheless, he is primarily remembered as a translator of the highest talent.

K.S.N.

KUNJAPPA, MURKOTHU (Malayalam; b. 1905), son of the eminent writer, Murkoth Kumaran, was born in Tellicherry and had his education in some of the local schools, Government Brennem College, Tellicherry, and finally in the Presidency College, Madras, from where he graduated in 1925. He started his official career as an auditor in the Eastern Bengal Railway in 1927 and retired as Director of the Railway Board in 1960. In the following year he was appointed in the post of Senior Personnel Officer in Rourkela Steel Plant. Though he retired from there in 1965, the authorities retained him there as honorary adviser for one more year. In 1966 he joined the Calicut edition of the Malayala manorama as its associate editor and is holding the post to date.

Until the age of 35, Kunjappa wrote practically nothing. When M.R. Nair, popularly known as Sanjayan, took up the editorship of Kerala patrika, Kunjappa began to contribute articles to it almost regularly. Later he started contributing to most of the periodicals of Kerala.

One of the most distinguished writers of the personal and humorous type of essay, Kunjappa ably wielded his pen to deal with serious topics as well with equal acumen and facility. He had a largeness of heart and simplicity of style which secured him a permanent niche in Malayalam prose literature. It is also to be noted that English, too, served as an equally effective medium for the dissemination of his creative and critical ideas as testified by his Three Bags of Gold and Other Indian Folk Tales.

Most of Kunjappa's original Malayalam works, collections either of stories or of essays, belong to the category of children's literature, two of the more notable among them being Oru kuppivala janikkunnu (A glass bangla is born, 1958) and Balakatha tarangini (A collection of stories for children, 1971). Lolakshikal (Women with moving eyes, 1950) is a collection of 15 humorous articles. Perhaps his most outstanding contribution is the biography of his father entitled Murkothu Kumaran (1975).

K.S.N.

KUNJIKKUTTAN TAMPURAN, KOTUNGALLUR (Malayalam; b.1864, d.1913) was a well-known Malayalam poet. Born in the royal family of Kotungallur, Kunjikkuttan Tampuran had all the favourable ingredients of a poetical personality, both inherited and acquired. His father Venmani Achchhan Namputirippattu was responsible for inaugurating a unique school of poetry known as the Venmani School. The Kotungallur palace was not only a centre of learning but a place of congregation also for poets as well as lovers of literature. Tampuran had his early tuition in Sanskrit literature, grammar, logic, astrology and mathematics under palace tutors and also under his uncles.

Though Tampuran had composed a number of verses even during his period of education, it was the publication of Kavibharatam (1893) that brought him into literary limelight. This first publication of Kunjikkuttan Tampuran, incidentally, caused an unpleasant stir among some poets. In Kavibharatam, several Malayalam poets of those days are compared to various characters of the epic Mahabharata. Some comparisons were frowned upon by some poets. A verbal feud followed and the pages of the journals of those days carried satirical and sometimes acrimonious tirades in verse between the supporters and the critics of the composer of the kavya. The work triggered the publication of a counter work, Kaviramayana (1905) by Mulur S. Padmanabha Panikkar. This literary event is known as Kaviramayana yuddham in the history of Malayalam literature.

Whenever Kotungallur palace hosted eminent poets, there were always 'feasts' for lovers of poetry. On such occasions—there were indeed many—the gathering of poets and scholars would eagerly look forward to witnessing 'literary games'. A frequent 'game' in such gatherings would be 'quick versification competition'. The poets would be asked to demonstrate their skill in composing poems within the shortest possible time. A topic would be suggested all on a sudden and the 'verbal acrobats' would be required to compose poems of specified length within the pre-determined time-limit. Kunjikkuttan Tampuran used to participate in the game and invariably he would be the first to complete. This versatility and speed shown by Tampuran earned him the title 'Sarasadrutakavikiritamani' ('saras' entertaining; 'druta' speedy; 'kavi' poet; 'kirtita' crown; 'mani' gem). He also demonstrated this extraordinary capacity in open literary conferences to the astonishment of several spectators of the feat.

Tampuran used to write letters to his friends in verses, some of which have later been published. A phenomenal achievement which brought him spontaneous acclaim from his fellow-poets and other lovers of literature was his rendering of the Sanskrit Mahabharata into Malayalam 'verse by verse and metre to metre'. This work was called Bhashabharatam (1906). He accomplished this stupendous task in 874 days. It is reported that Tampuran would look into the original and immediately could recite the Malayalam shloka for the scribe to write. Perhaps Kunjikkuttan Tampuran's name will be remembered by future generations for his translation of the Mahabharata much more than for any of his other achievements. He is, therefore, rightly called 'Keralavyasa'.

KUNJIKRISHNA KURUP, KUTTAMATTU (Malayalam; b. 1880, d. 1943) was a scholar and creative writer from north Kerala. Even from his school days he used to compose poems. Kaliya mardanam yamaka kavya was written at the age of eighteen. Being a musicologist he wrote seven musical dramas and many musical poems. Balagopalan, Nachiketas, Dhruvamadhavam, Vidya shankhadhwani, Harischandran, Adbhuta parana, etc. are his musical dramas. He also wrote attakatha, tullal, kilippatu, stotra, and some poems on Shri Ramakrishna. There are twenty works to his credit. He had an academic mind, and his writings also reflect the moral and aesthetic nature of that mind. A good example is:

"Oh, scholarly woman, who is your teacher, poverty?
Your lesson, estrangement? Your wealth, devotion to Hari?
Your realisation, the image of Hari?
Your unending wealth-your son? O good lady?"

Kurup's musical poems are still popular. As a man who belonged to a family with a cultural heritage, Kurup kept up his literary traditions and in 1941 he was given the title of 'Mahakavi' by the prince of Chirakkal royal family. The poet edited Kerala chandrika and his contribution to literature, music and to the theatre of Kerala is of lasting value.

Menon took his B.A. degree and joined as Head Master in a Middle School. Gradually he rose to the post of Tahsil Magistrate in the erstwhile Cochin State. Even from his school days he was interested in literary activities and he edited a magazine called Ramanujan. He composed poems, wrote short stories, book reviews, etc. Vinodini, Lakshmi vilasa shatakam, Madirasi katalakkara, Kumbhakona yatra, Ajamila moksham vanchippattu, etc. are some of his works. Menon's poems are short. He was involved in the literary controversies of the time and was considered a good journalist and writer. An example of one of his verses is quoted here;

"Looking at the golden mirror, she combed her hair
Put a 'tilak' on the crescent-moon-like forehead;
Looking at the nipple of the breasts she shook her head.
I was on the path when your looks fell on me
Oh lotus-eyed Panki, the stroke of your gaze is very cruel.

KUNJIKRISHNAN, PALLIPPAD (Malayalam; b. 1905), born at Velur in Kottayam District, was educated at Mavelikkara and Changanachery. After passing the Intermediate examination in 1928, he entered Kerala (the Travancore) government service. For about 18 years he was in the Revenue Department but it was as a supervisory official of the Labour Department that he retired in 1956.

Kunjikrishnan was closely associated with some of the leading figures of the day in the literary, social and political circles of Kerala and enjoyed the patronage of Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, and C. Kesavan, his guru. He participated in the Vaikam Satyagraha along with the well-known social worker T.K. Madhavan (1885-1931), one of his relations.

In his school days Kunjikrishnan was a contributor of poems to periodicals. Later his interest underwent a change and he switched over to prose. His contribution to literature mainly pertains to biographical literature. In spite of personal sufferings and financial losses, he travelled from place to place, collecting details about the lives of distinguished people in every walk of life and bringing them out in a series of books. All these have been brought together in a single volume entitled Mahachcharita sangraha sagaram (1975). It is a biographical dictionary presenting vivid, authentic, short accounts of the lives and achievements not only of celebrated Indians but also of foreigners connected with India. As the author himself has stated in the preface to the book, it is the result of his sustained labours for twenty years and is in the form of a 'Who is Who' with no place for living personalities. As a reference book it has become invaluable, though there are some glaring omissions; for instance Pandalam Kerala Verma, Azhakathu Padmanabha Kurup, etc. are not included in it.

Kunjikrishnan's other notable contributions are the two poetical collections Bhavana kaumudi (1937), Chinta

KUNJIRAMA MENON, C.—KUNJIRAMAN NAYAR, P.

KUNJIRAMA MENON, C. (Malayalam; b.1882, d. 1940), who adopted the pen name M.R.K.C., was a Malayalam short-story writer and novelist. M.R.K.C. belongs to a period when the technique of short-story writing was gaining ground in Malayalam. He was professionally associated with several periodicals like Janmi, Laksmivilasam, Keralapatrika, Mangalodayam, Bharati, Keralam, etc.

M.R.K.C. has written several short-stories on historical and social themes. His deftness in creating plots and structures was more marked in his historical stories than in others. He was one among a few prominent story-writers of the formative period and was responsible for building a solid foundation for this genre of literature, which grew in dimension and depth in later years.

KUNJIRAMAN NAYAR, P. (Malayalam; b. 1906, d. 1978) commonly known to his readers by his first initial 'P', was a well-known Malayalam poet. After undergoing primary education in his native place, P. joined the Sanskrit College at Pattambi, where he studied for about eight years. It was during this period that he began contributing poems to Malayalam journals like Kavana-kaumudi and Kairali. From Pattambi he went to Tanjore for continuing his study of Sanskrit. After returning to his native place he worked in various schools at Kanjangatu, Olavakkotu and Kollenkotu. He was the recipient of several titles and awards like the Madras Government Award, Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award (both for Kaliyachchhan) and the Sahitya Akademi Award for Tamarattoni. (1967).

It would not be an exaggeration to say that P. was totally devoted to poetry. This complete involvement in the world of imagination made him indifferent to terrestrial existence and hence could rightly be called a poetic recluse. Critics have used many epithets to project certain qualities of his poetry, like 'bhaktakavi' (Devout poet), 'Prakritigayakan' (Singer of Nature), 'Keralasamskaratinte kavi' (Poet of Kerala culture), etc. His poetry has several facets, each deceptively elusive. This desultory characteristic of P's creations was confusing to the critics as they were unable to choose an appropriate perspective for evaluating his poems. The themes of his poems are varied, and excessively ornamental and his technique is traditional. Many of his poems remind us of high waterfalls which roll down in astounding splendour reflecting the colours of sunlight and the deep blue of the high skies. Initially his poems centred around 'bhakti' (devotion) and patriotism. The outlook of P, throughout his life was that of a dedicated romantic and his emotions fluctuated between extreme passions.

The most notable characteristic of his poetry is the abundance of imageries which, taken individually, are unique reflections of the height of poetic imagination but at the same time they are loosely knit against the total background of the poem's integrity. A few representative examples of his imagery are given below: (i) "the field with the sacred thread of stream across it", (ii) "fierce wind and rain lashed, the old palm tree started trembling and chanting hymns". (iii) "the small waves embracing the bank"; (iv.) "the grass stubs which have not departed from their mother who has given birth to them"; (v). "the clouds trotting in playful freedom across the sky-pasture" etc. Mother Nature was for him an unending source of inspiration.

P. had an intense feeling of guilt. This guilt-feeling was personal as well as impersonal. He felt that he had not received enough recognition for his poetic labours because of his indifference to or perhaps disobedience of conventional norms. A true reflection of this attitude is seen in a brilliant poem, 'Kaliyachchhan' (The artist-tutor) which is considered to be one of his best products. This poem reverberates with the intense feeling of grief and is free from verbosity which has weakened many of his other poems. The import of the poem can be summarised as follows; "I was a star performer in a Kathakali troupe. But when days passed I suddenly found myself as a non-performer. My elaborate make-ups began disintegrating during performances. My action on the stage became imperfect. Consequently, I was ridiculed by the audience and became the laughing-stock of lovers of art. All this happened because of 'gurushapa' (curse of the teacher). The guru deplored me. His anger fell upon me like a thunder. Depression, sense of shame and guilt transformed me into a non-entity. Eventually I realised that no actor can perform on the stage confidently unless he receives the blessings of the Great Instructor. Therefore, to get out of this shameful existence I should fall down in submission at the feet of the Great Teacher. The suppression of egoism and absolute surrender to him only can bring back to me the glory I yearn for. At the touch of Sun-God the dark night is reborn as light-shedding dawn." It is not difficult to see that the poem is not merely a personal lamentation. It appears to have a social significance and also a spiritual connotation. An artist, however talented he might be, cannot remain in the limelight if he does not respect the people whom he attempts to entertain with his creations. If the people turn against him in disgust he cannot perform satisfactorily. This is the social significance of the poem. The poem can be interpreted on a higher level also. The guru who is referred to in the poem is the Almighty Himself. No individual can afford to disregard him if he aspires for recognition. Without His blessing, 'performance' stumbles and the performer meets with miserable failure.

The poem summarised above reveals the outlook of the poet. It is true that P. was not as popular as some of his contemporaries. If he had been a little more restrained in his creations, a little more careful in planning his compositions, he would have become the greatest Malayalam poet of the twentieth century; such was the depth of his imagination. His poems have been compiled in two collections, Pukkalam (Kottayam, 1975) and Rathotsavam (in two parts, Trivandram, 1978).

KUNJIRAMAN NAYANAR, VENGAYIL (Malayalam; b. 1861, d. 1914), more famous under his pseudonym 'Kesari', was born at Payyannoor in Cannanore district as the son of Pulimpatappu Somayajipad and Vengayil Kunhakkam Amma. He was a pioneer essayist, journalist, story writer and social worker. He was one of the first to explore the essay and short story in Malayalam. He had his education at Taliparamba, Calicut and Madras. After passing F.A. he joined the Agricultural College at Saidapet and took his degree in Agriculture. He was elected as a member of the Malabar District Board in 1882 and as a member of the Madras Legislative Assembly in 1912. He died of heart attack while participating in the Assembly session.

Kunjiraman Nayanar was closely associated with the journals Kerala chandrika, Kerala patrika, Keraala san-chari, Malabar Spectator, Vadyaviadini, Bhashaposhini, Manorama, etc. and frequently contributed articles to them. He used various pen names such as Deshabhimani, Vijrasunchi, Vajrabahu, and Vidushakan. He could write in a simple, popular and informal style and so Kesari has often been compared to Mark Twain.

His writings covered a wide range of subjects, from scholarly studies to humorous essays, from agriculture to medicine and from imaginary stories to factual reports. But an undercurrent of humour runs through all his writings. Their sincerity and individualistic quality reflect the author's personality. Of his innumerable essays and short stories only those published in Vidyavinodini during 1893-1900 were compiled, and published under the title Kesari (1910).

The essays 'Nattezhuthassanmar' (Village teachers), 'Marichchalathe sukham' (The pleasures of death) and 'Sheettukali' (Card play) show his quality as a humorist. Here is a passage from his essay 'Marichchalathe sukham' "When you don't have to breathe any longer, you will not be troubled by the innumerable germs of disease in the air nor by the insufferable smoke of other people's cigars. Nothing to be anxious about even if motor cars and bicycles send up dust while driving along or if you fall or die or your nose is hurt. You don't have to endure any such grief. You don't have to put up any longer with the ringing of the bells or the call of the siren or frog-tongued voice-refiners exerting their throats or reciting songs from plays even on the road."

Though Kesari belongs to the comic tradition he was also a sharp critic of social, political and communal evils. 'Acharopacharangalum sthanamanangalum' (Customs and positions), 'Acharaparishkaram' (Revival of customs), 'Bhramam' (Mania) and 'Kapatavedantikal' (hypocrites) are essays revealing the above characteristics. Most of the essays compiled in Kesari are critical studies on Sanskrit classics, like Kathasaritsagaram, Shakuntalam, Naganandam, Malatinadhavam, Mrichchhakatikam, Raghuvamsham and Naishadham.

It was Kunjiraman Nayanar who wrote the first short story in Malayalam in the modern form. The title of the story is 'Vasana vikriti' (Habitual mischief, 1891). A habitual thief who had committed many thefts was caught by the police. The punishment was twelve blows and imprisonment for six months. The story is narrated by himself after his return from prison. At last he decides to go to Kashi (Benares) and become a hermit. Nayanar's other important stories are 'Dwaraka' 'Menokkiye konnatanu' (Menokki is murdered), 'Oru pottabhagyam' (A beguiled luck) and 'Kathayonnumalla' (Not a mere story). KUNJUKUTTAN, MATAMPU (Malayalam; b. 1946) who has the full name Nambudiri, was born at Kiralur in Trichur District. He is a lonely traveller in the third phase of Malayalam novel which begins by about 1960. He made post-modernism an exciting creative quest. In his Ashwathamavu (1971) he has portrayed an existentialist character by name Kunchunni Nambudiri. Kunchuni, born and brought up in an aristocratic family, and also with high educational qualifications and social status, could make nothing of his life. Therein the author suggests that the chief protagonist of modern sensibility is neither Arjuna nor Krishna, but Ashwattamavu—the immortal and perpetually wandering character with ulcer all over the body and full of hate in mind. Kunchukuttan's another novel Bhrashtu (Excommunication, 1973) tells the story of Paptikkutty, a revengeful Nambudiri woman who was raped by the ugly looking elder brother of her husband on the day of the marriage itself. His Nishadam (Savagery, 1977) is also expressive of this type of modern sensibility.

KUNJHUNNI (Malayalam; b. 1927), is an outstanding poet who excels in composing epigrammatic poems. The son of Neelaknatan Moosad and Narayani Amma, he did his matriculation and teacher's training and worked as a teacher in Ramakrishna Mission School at Kozhikkode from 1953 till retirement. Though labelled as a children's poet, he writes short invectives, proverb-like single line aphorisms and limerical pieces which conceal sinister laughter and explode with a bang when they are aimed at hypocrisy. Not overburdened with scholarship, he writes in a simple, popular and informal style. At the same time he is a sharp critic of social reality.

Kunjunni's own opinion about his poetry is.
"Little am I in stature and very little have I to tell,

Some small words are enough for me Myself, me, mine and like that."

But nobody can turn a deaf ear to his words. The following lines testify to the gems of truth his poems contain and to the pointedness of his criticism:

"There is a land in the world.
Where there are no Indians,
And that land is India."
"Shame! Shame!
Why these dogs quarrel like human beings,
Bhow, bhow, bhow."

His poems have been published in eight collections: Muttassi katha parayunnu (Grandmother tells stories, 1955), Vasumati (story poem, 1957), Varshikolsavam (Anniversary, 1957) Kalikkoppu (Toy, 1959), Pattukal pazhayathum puthiyathum (Songs old and new, 1960), Non-sense kavithakal (Nonsense poems, 1961), Pathinanchum Pathinanchum (Fifteen and fifteen, 1966), and Kunjunniyute kavital (Kunjunni's poems, 1969). He has also written several short stories for children, compiled and published under the titles; Untanum Untiyum (Male dwarf and female dwarf, 1955), Kathakadambam (Bunch of stories, 1955), Nalla kathakal (Good stories, 1955), Katha sookthangal (hymnal stories, 1956), Manushyachitrangal (Human pictures, 1957), and Pantu pantu (Long long ago, 1960).

Kunjunni has got a special skill for combining sound and sense in a particular way which tickles the imagination and kindles the curiosity of the child. Here is his prayer to God:

"If I were to have another life, let me become a tree.
If I were to have a life again,
Let me become a blossomed flower on that tree.
In case a life should haunt me, still

Let me be honey in that flower,
If I am to be born again,
Let me be turned into poetry.
Nothing more have I to request
Let it happen, as you (God) like it."

The jester in Kunjunni compels everyone to think for a while:

"The betrayer is ready,
the crown of thorn
And the cross to nail
Making of Christ is easy now."

One of his collections concludes with the poem:

Is there a book to be written?
Is there a book of finished writing?
Is there is a book that never bores?
Why should I waste my ink?

But any one will admit that he has not wasted his ink.

KUNJURAMAN, C.V. (Malayalam; b. 1871, d. 1949) is a widely respected social leader of Kerala and an eminent Malayalam essayist. Born in an Ezhava family, he had his primary education in the village school at Mayyanatu and later studied up to the eighth standard in the Government English School at Kollam (Quilon). Subsequently he passed the Malayalam Examination and also the Criminal Pleader's Examination of those times. His professional career was varied, first as a school teacher, then as a clerk in a revenue office and finally as a legal practitioner and a journalist. From his early days he showed an aptitude for writing. He contributed essays and short-stories to several leading journals of that period. He was actively associated with the popular Malayalam dailies Keralakaumudi and Malayalarajyam through the columns of which he conducted relentless verbal crusades against social and political injustices that were rampant around him. In those days Ezhava community was a victim of the ill-treatment from upper class people. Shri Narayana Guru, the well-known spiritual leader and social reformer, was exhorting his fellowmen to come out of their cowardly slumber to rise against social injustice. Kunjuraman became a disciple of the Guru and his sincere service to the cause of the Ezhava community became a highly respected social leader.

C.V. Kunjuraman's prose style is uniquely charming as in it a journalistic forcefulness blends harmoniously with literary flavour. He brought out a highly readable translation of Valmiki's Ramayana in simple and chaste language (1903). This was an adaptation of Rameshchandra Datta's English version in verse. Another popular adaptation in Malayalam prose is Datta's Mahabharata.

KUNTAKA

Karttikodayam (1917) is his major poetic composition which was written for children, depicting the birth of a king of Travancore State. Kunjuran also wrote a few novels, a book on Indian history, several short-stories and a biography, besides translating six stories based on Charles Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.

K.M.P.V.

KUNTAKA (Sanskrit) is a major literary critic in the history of Sanskrit poetics. He came immediately after Ananadavardhana and was a senior contemporary of Abinavagupta. It was a time (A.D. 950), when Kashmir witnessed almost a renaissance in the field of literary theory. Chandrika on the Dhvanyaloka, Bhattanayaka's Hridayadarpana and Bhatta Tauta's Kavyakautuka all are seminal works now unfortunately lost evince independent thought and steer clear of orthodoxy and conventional ideas. The same is true in a larger measure of Abinavagupta's masterly works, Lochana and Abhinavabharati on the one hand and Mahimabhatta's Vyaktiviveka which are luckily extant. In this galaxy of brilliant theorists, Kuntaka stands out as a peak and pillar of light who is averse as much to destructive polemics as to blind conformity with any predecessor, however prestigious. He boldly strikes out a new path for himself and his sensitivity to true poetry is so keen and his insight into the poetic process so profound that his language of criticism acquires a charm all its own and becomes most persuasive and convincing. His choice of examples is invariably apt and most representative; and his comments always appealing and revealing a genuine taste for poetry. His Vakrotijivita, which was available only in part so long, has only recently been critically edited and restored and translated into English completely for the first time by the present writer. It is thus now possible to get a vivid picture of Kuntaka as the first literary critic in the modern sense, who has given practical criticism of all major Sanskrit poets and playwrights in conformity with the wide-ranging and all-embracing new poetic theory of 'vakrokti' which he formulated without losing his way in the maze of irrelevant philosophy or grammar or semantics. It is a theory which synthesizes the best in all earlier thinking and goes far beyond them.

The key-words of criticism, viz. 'shabda', 'artha', 'sahitya', 'vastu', 'rasa', 'alamkara', 'marga', 'guna', 'dhvani' and 'vibhava', etc., had become almost blanket terms which any writer could use in any way he chose. They had lost precision and lacked significance. Kuntaka therefore undertook the almost Herculean task of using his words with clear-cut precision and released aesthetics from the strait-jacket of prosaic formulae. Shabda is the one and only apt expression among a hundred which can fully communicate the shade of beauty (vichchhitti, vaichitrya, chatkara, etc.) intended by a poet with 'pratibha' or creative imagination. Its fulfilment is in the felt delight of the man of taste and this delight is not 'rasa'; it is just joy (ahlada) or unique overwhelming bliss (ananda). It is a free and hearty response to beauty. Rasa then is not subjective.

Artha or content is the obverse of shabda; the complete meaning with rich associations of beauty envisioned by a creative genius at the one end and captured without any loss by the man of taste at the other end. This absolute concord (sahitya) between shabda and artha is of the very essence of poetry. They are so entwined that they defy separation. Literary analysis tentatively treats them as if they are independent of each other; but the true nature of poetry demands that their essential oneness is never ignored.

Subjects admitting of poetical treatment are endless. But they can be broadly divided into natural things (vastusvabhava) and mental states (rasa, bhava, etc.). The latter may again be subdivided into those of cultured characters, those of lower animals and children, etc., and those superimposed on insentient objects. In all these types, the one common feature is that they are subjects of the poet's art-activity (kavi-vyapara) and they can all be characterised as the 'embellished' (alamkara). Neither a natural expression of things nor rasas can even be 'alamkara' or embellishments. All the avenues of the art of poetry are nothing but alamkara in this wide sense. But to put the proper stress that it is the spontaneous artistic activity of a genius which may become manifest in manifold ways, Kuntaka was forced to find a new aesthetic term; and he hit upon the happy term 'vakrokti' or 'slanted expression'. If there is no slant or aesthetic turn occasioned by the poet's imaginative power which can immediately touch the heart of a responsive reader, there is no poetry. Hence 'vidagdha-bhangi-bhaniti' is a paraphrase of vakrokti. It is this which marks it off from empirical discourse as well as scientific discourse. If the slant appears laboured or forced, again it ceases to be poetry because sahitya, the minimum concord or balance in the beauty of content and form is destroyed. Alamkara, then, is not something like an appendage super-added from without; it is an intrinsic hallmark of the poetic art.

One can carry on literary analysis dividing the syntactic structure of a poem from the stage of syllable, base or root, affix, termination or case-ending, preposition, conjunction, indefinite pronouns, indeclinables, compound word, adjunct, etc. and pass on through phrase and sentence to episode or chapter up to the work taken as a whole. At every point, beauty should be discernible. Then alone we have 'vakrokti' in perfection.

Poets are not all of the same temperament. Hence there are bound to be diverse styles (margas). A literary theorist can only classify them broadly into sweet or tender (sukumara) and striking or brilliant (vichitra), allowing room for an admixture of the two (madhyama). These styles are recognised by some distinct qualities (gunas); but they must all share some common qualities too, like grace (lavanya), elegance (saubhagya) and appropriateness (auchitya). Naming the styles after regions is erroneous.

The range of kavivya para or vakrokti is so vast that it cannot be cabined and cribbed even in the wide possibilities of dhvani and 'gunibhuta-vyangya'. The unique suggestive power of shabda and artha in poetry is not denied; but it is shown its place along with other avenues of beauty. In the aesthetic thought of Kuntaka no exclusive concept is enough; only the all-inclusive aesthetic term vakrokti can deliver the goods. Hence 'vyanjakatva-vyapara' or 'vyangyārtha' alone cannot be the soul of poetry; only vakrokti can be.

Kuntaka has very high regard for the perspective of Anandavardhana which he assimilates in his wider concept of vakrokti. But he joins issue with his great predecessor when rasa is given a dual role, now as primary and now as secondary, in his self-discrepant concept of 'rasavadalamkara'. He restates this in such a way that the self-contradiction is avoided. He opines that all alamkaras like simile and metaphor should themselves be designated by that term when they foster rasa. The orthodox view of this concept too is severely criticised by Kuntaka as being far too narrow and vague.

Perhaps Kuntaka is the only theorist in Sanskrit poetics to recognise individual figures with a view to their underlying principles. In his re-appraisal, only sixteen stand up to this systematic test. After Bhamaha, Kuntaka is the only theorist who reduces the number of figures to just sixteen and shows his good taste which is exceptional to the general trend revealed in all theorists who revel in adding to their number.

By the time of Kuntaka, the concepts of alamkara, guna, riti or marga or 'sanghatana' had come to stay alongside of the principles of rasa and dhvani. Thus in Kuntaka we see the different categories of poetics worked up into a single, systematic and coherent philosophy of beauty to help understand literature and to foster intelligent appreciation or criticism.

Anandavardhana had spoken of three qualitative levels of poetry, viz., the best (dhvanikavya), the next-best (gunibhutavyangyakavya) and the third-rate (chitrakavya); and these could be fully discerned only by a man of taste as per the application of the principle of dhvani as primarily felt or secondarily noticed, or almost unnoticed. Kuntaka disagrees on this fundamental postulate itself. According to him, there can only be a distinction between what is poetry and what is not; whatever appeals to a man of taste is good poetry; and whatever does not is not poetry. Further distinctions within good poetry are unwarranted.

While Anandavardhana's scheme of 'vyanjakas' is circumscribed by his triple 'vyangyas', viz. vastu, alamkara and 'rasadi', Kuntaka's scheme is not. It is so comprehensively illustrated that it can include all shabdalamkaras under 'varnavinyasavakrata'; all beauty of grammatical affixes, terminations, etc. under 'padapurvardhavakrata'; all arthalamkaras, margas, gunas and rasadi under 'vakya-vakrata'; all beauty of plot and description, original innovations, characterisation and propriety of rasa, 'sandhis' and 'sandhyangas' under 'prakaranavakrata' and the beauty of the whole work and dominant rasa under 'prabandha-vakrata'.

The application of the dhvani theory in practice involves a subtle distinction throughout between 'pradhanya' or predominance and 'gunibhava' or subservience; 'atman' or soul and 'sharira' or body and alamkara or the adorned and alamkara or the adornment. All these distinctions refer to the same ruling principle of beauty in terms of propriety from the point of view of the critic. And all of them follow as a corollary from the postulate that rasa is the whole and sole criterion of good poetry. Kuntaka subjects this stand to a searching examination and rejects it as a hollow postulate. Some poems may be good because their shabdalamkara is appealing; other poems may be equally good because of the poet's art in the use of suffixes, terminations, etc. Still others may be appealing because of the beauty or arthalamkara or marga or guna; it is only when we come to appreciate the plot, characters and significance of a major part of a work or a work as a whole that we light upon considerations of dominant and accessory rasas. Each variety of vakrata is thus inclusive of vastu, alamkara and rasa, guna and riti in a new way, and helps practical literary criticism eminently.

Whether Kuntaka or Anandavardhana is more dependable is a difficult question to answer. No one can dispute that Anandavardhana was a great philosopher and he established his theory of dhvani on sound shastraic lines. But Kuntaka does not even refer to discussions of shastra in his whole book. Yet, what he loses on the logical side is more than gained by him on the side of practical literary appreciation. What precisely is rasa or rasadi which forms the bed-rock of the dhvani theory? Is it something pre-established in other shastras like Tarka and Mimamsa? No, not at all. It is accepted as unique to poetry by one and all.

Kuntaka thinks boldly and takes a step beyond Anandavardhana in affirming the inevitable co-existence of vasturasa and alamkara even without raising the baffling question whether rasa is always suggested or not.

The same logic led Kuntaka to take a bold stand on the nature of 'svabhavokti' also as against the continued tradition of earlier rhetoricians. Svabhavokti or 'jati' had come to be recognised as an alamkara as early as Bana, and except Bhamaha whose opinion is rather dubious, all the other writers say with one voice that it is a figure of speech. Kuntaka asks: What is this svabhavokti which you are all calling an alamkara? How is it different from the poetic subject or theme itself? If it is not different, it should really be regarded as alamkara and should not be called alamkara. Even a subtle observation of things as they are comes in the general nature of the poetic vision and has no justification for being termed an alamkara. In the whole field of Sanskrit poetics, Kuntaka is the only theorist who calls a spade a spade and asks us "How can you stand on your own shoulder?"

More than all, what makes Kuntaka's work most readable and unique even today is his personal style and practical literary analysis revealing a very fresh and smart literary sensibility. It is often complained that in Sanskrit poetics we do not have any racy and readable literary criticism as in the West. While the charge is mostly true of the predecessors of Anandavardhana, it is not true of Anandavardhana and Kuntaka. Between these two again, while Anandavardhana is equally at home in pure and abstract shastra and illuminating practical criticism as well, Kuntaka alone provides us undiluted and unadulterated literary criticism. In the Dhvanyaloka too, the space devoted to pure literary analysis is far too meagre, compared to the space devoted to the establishment of the dhvani-theory because Anandavardhana is more objective than subjective. But Kuntaka's Vakroktijivita may be characterised without exaggeration as one running piece of a purely literary criticism whose merit is subjective appreciation. Here is an example taken at random: The readers referred to are those sensitive to poetic beauty. That which delights them by its own refreshing beauty is the nature of meaning in poetry. To put it in other words: although an object may be qualified by diverse attributes, the poet will select only one of them which is capable of delighting sensitive readers. Its capacity to delight is inferred on the basis of the rare grandeur added to the subject in the poet's treatment or the force added to the literary sentiment developed, e.g.

'Uniquely triumphant is the Great Boar, whose natural impulses had to remain unfulfilled on account of His own greatness, at the time of bringing up the submerged earth out of the ocean. Since mountain-peaks came to be pulverised at the very touch of his tusk, He could not enjoy the game of scratching His itching shoulder. Since the ocean's water-level could not go beyond the cavity of His hoofs, He had to forego the pleasures of a hearty bath. Since the mire was so shallow that only the snout could touch it, He had to deny himself the pleasure of a joyous rolling.'

In this verse the poet has invested the passage with beauty of content by merely inventing such a circumstance wherein natural traits have no room for their exhibition, and by this unique means he endows his subject with extraordinary interest. To take another illustration:

'Following the sound of her lament, the sage, out of his daily routine of gathering sacred grass and faggots, was on her trail; the very sage whose overflowing pity at the sight of a bird shot by a hunter had once taken the form of poetry' (Raghuvamsha, XIV. 70).

Here the context of the story requires only the mention of the proper noun Valmiki in answer to the question: "Who found Sita eventually?" But the poet has avoided the proper noun and provided a picture of the soft and tender heart of the sage by referring to the incident of a mere bird transforming him into a poet. By alluding to this incident, a rich scope is provided by the poet to help visualise the melting heart of the sage at the sight of Queen Sita in such a dire distress. The delight of the sensitive reader is occasioned here by the promotion of the sentiment of pathos by the poet's art.

To cite another example of the same:

'O lady, take me to be a bosom friend of your husband, who is living yet. I am the cloud come to you with his message treasured up in my heart. It is I, as you know, who urge the tarrying travellers on the road, into the arms of their pining beloveds by my majestic and deep rumblings, in order that they might add toilet to their unkempt hair.' (Meghaduta, II, 36)

Here we have, in the first place, a very significant vocative (avidhave) which infuses confidence in the mind of the person addressed. The qualification he is her husband's friend points to his respectability. The intimacy of friendship is reinforced by the epithet 'bosom' and justifies the possibility of being entrusted with a confidential message. Having thus put her at ease, he approaches the main subject of the message meant for her. The epithet 'treasured up in my heart' reveals his great keenness in preserving it. One might wonder why some other person endowed with better senses and talents was not commissioned for the task. So he adds that he alone possesses special qualifications in that regard. He is a 'carrier' of water by nature and carrying something is his speciality. He hastens the hosts of travellers drooping with fatigue on the road, by his own rumbling sounds. The plural throughout brings out how his helping nature is evidenced repeatedly. The sweet and delightful sounds of the cloud suggest the words of the ideal messenger. The specification 'on the road' goes to show how assistance is rendered by him even to unrelated persons as his second nature. So much more would be his sense of urgency in regard to the message entrusted to his care by his dearest friend. Finally, the adjective describing the women emphasises how their spirits are drooping owing to separation from their lovers and how at the same time the lovers are deeply attached to them in love.

The drift of the whole stanza is this: 'It is a self-chosen solemn mission with me to display my hearty friendship by effecting the joyous union of lovers that might have been torn apart by fate in spite of their burning love for each other.' The beauty of thought embodied here by the poet supplies as it were, the very vital essence of his poem named 'Cloud-messenger' (Meghaduta), and is supremely delightful to tasteful readers.

A counter example where beauty is lost only to carelessness in respect of sentiment is furnished in the following:

Even on the outskirts of the city, the delicate girl Sita who had walked hardly three or four steps, started asking Rama more than once: 'How much more distance remains to be covered yet?' Whereupon tears were brought for the first time in Rama's eyes. (Balaramayana).

Here the idea 'more than once' is to be regretted as it does not emphasize the nobility of Sita's personality. Nor does it add to the appeal of the sentiment in question. For, Sita's undertaking the journey is voluntary and worthy of her nobility. Even if we concede that because of extreme physical tenderness, some such thought came to her mind, no sensitive reader can imagine that it would find verbal expression. Again, it is difficult to believe that repeated assertions on the part of Sita were required to draw the first tears from Rama, because even at her first utterance, Rama is much more likely to break into tears.

Thus we see here a very lovely idea spoilt altogether by the poet's concentration straying away for the moment from its object. Therefore, we suggest that the phrase 'more than once' is amended into 'unwittingly'.

Therefore, a definition of poetry which does full justice to the invariable relation of both shabda and artha deserves approval. Literary faults, like 'far-fetched meaning' and 'perverse meaning' are automatically put aside, and the question of mentioning their non-occurrence as a part of definition, therefore, does not arise.

It was Anandavardhana who developed the principle of determining the ruling rasa of even a vast epic like the Ramayana by considering the beginning, middle and end in one critical vision. His finding was that 'karuna' or pathos was the ruling rasa of the Ramayana just as 'shanta' or quietude was that of the vaster Mahabharata.

But it was left to Kuntaka to extend this principle towards full-length studies of classical works like Shakuntala, Uttararamacharita, Kiratarjuniya, Shishupalavadha, etc. In Kuntaka's insightful analysis of Kalidasa's masterpiece, Shakuntala, the climax of the poet's originality and genius is seen, not in the Act IV where a universal homely sentiment of daughter's leave-taking is seen, but in the vivid presentation of Dushyanta's sincere and heart-breaking repentance for his inexcusable inability to recognise his wife Shakuntala in Act VI, in spite of a hundred chances provided to him to recognise her in Act V. Critics customarily take the curse motif mechanically, without seeing into its psychological implications. One thinks that Act V illustrates his sudden amnesia or loss of memory due to Durvasas' curse. But Kuntaka takes it as illustrating the vast springs of his memory, very much present in him at the time, leading him to remember as it were even events of an earlier birth, as spotlighted by Kalidasa in the verse: "ramyani vikshya....bhavasthirani janananantara-sauhridani". This psychological study of character of Kuntaka is both profound and far-reaching.

Similarly, in the Kiratarjuniya we are shown by Kuntaka how the poet has pitched upon Arjuna alone as the hero in the vast galaxy of heroes in the Mahabharata and stops short of the incidents culminating in the battle of Kurukshetra. Every one in the Mahabharata, Krishna and Yudhishthira not excepted, come to be tainted with one or the other failing, once the battle begins. Arjuna too fails many times to live up to the ideals of an epic hero without a trace of adharma or evil. But before the war, when he engages himself in penance and enters into a single combat with Lord Shiva, we have man's strength and peerless character. Such an analysis of Bharavi's motive symbolically is indeed an eye-opener to us even today.

Even in the manipulation of incidents in the story, how Kuntaka lays bare the poetic process involved in works like the Shishupalavadha is again, remarkable. Magha so arranges the story that the sole end of Krishnavatara becomes the destruction of Shishupala who is evil embodied; and he invents a conflict of interest in Krishna's mind not found in any source-book, to make his epic interesting. There is the call of duty to destroy Shishupala on the one hand; and an invitation from his beloved kin Yudhishthira to participate in his Rajasuya sacrifice both at the same time, one conflicting with the other. Then Magha deftly solves the conflict by Krishna's choosing to attend the sacrifice wherein Shishupala also is brought in by chance.

KUNVARASI SANKHALO (Rajasthani) is a long story written in prose and interspersed with over one hundred and fifty popular duha couplets. There has been a well-established tradition of inserting verses in historical and other tales. The hero of this story is Kunvarasi Sankhalo who is a historical figure. The hereditary seat of the Sankhalas was Jangalu, a village near Bikaner, which was first occupied by Anakhasi to be followed by Khinvasi and Kunvarasi respectively. Two sculptured stones with inscriptions of the years 1325 and 1329, erected in memory of Vikramasi and Pratapasi, two sons of Kunvarasi, were located in the village Rasisar. The date of Kunvarasi, therefore, can be placed before 1300. There is a mention of Kunvarasi in the historical works of Nainasi and Bankidas. Nainasi mentions Kunvarasi's marriage with Bharamal, the blind daughter of the Kharala Rajputas, which is the basic theme of this story.

The story is historical, written elaborately with some supernatural elements thrown in though it is predominantly a love-story with shringara (erotic sentiment) as the main rasa, and heroic as the accompanying one. The published text is based on a manuscript written in 1738 belonging to the Balbhandar at Bikaner. The language pertains to the 18th century, or even to a later period. Written by an anonymous writer the story in brief runs like this: Kunvarasi, son of Khinvasi, was a hero with a generous disposition, who always stood by his word. Vainidasa, a Rajput of the Kharala caste, hatched a plot to assassinate Kunvarasi. With this evil intention, he sent a coconut to Kunvarasi, inviting him to marry his blind daughter Bharamal. Having accepted the coconut, Kunvarasi reached Vainidasa's residence with the marriage party. Strangely, Bharamal regained her lost eyesight in course of the marriage ceremony. Kunvarasi managed to leave his father-in-law's house immediately after the marriage and promised to Bharamal that he would come to take her on the occasion of the 'Tij' festival in the month of Shravana. As promised, he reached Vainidasa's residence in the third year and lived with Bharamal in the underground apartments for full six months. Bharamal became pregnant during this period. Thereafter, he returned to Jangalu with Bharamal with plenty of dowry and lived in peace. He defeated the Joiyas in the battle that ensued as a result of their animosity with the Kharalas. The story presents a picture of the medieval feudal society of the Rajputas. Kunvarasi and Bharamal have been portrayed as ideal characters of the time. The aim of the story is to establish idealistic values. The animosity between the Sankhalas and the Kharalas, the deceitful role played by the Kharalas for vengeance, the skirmishes and bloodshed on trifling matters and other such minor causes underline the realities of those times. The book is equally important for literary as well as cultural values.

A village named Kharaliyan still exists near the town of Pilibanga in Sriganganagar district, which seems to have been inhabited by the Kharalas. It is still known for its underground apartments.

KUNVARBAI-NUN MAMERUN (Gujarati) is a narrative poem known as 'akhyana' written in 1683 by Premanand (1636-1734), a renowned medieval poet of Gujarat. The 'mamerun' or 'mosalun' means a maternal dowry offered to the daughter on his first pregnancy. The story is that of Kunvarbai's father, Narasimha, a staunch devotee of Lord Krishna, who is too poor to discharge the social obligations of offering his daughter the appropriate dowry as required by the prevailing custom, when he visits her on the occasion of 'mamerun' i.e. the time of her being pregnant. Narasimha has always reposed strong faith in God and, as the story proceeds, at the time adversity befalls Narasimha, his prayers are heard by God and he comes to the rescue of His 'bhakta'.

The form of this work is known as 'akhyana'. It is a narrative poem of medieval Gujarati literature. The medieval Gujarati poet, Narak, of the 16th century introduced this form. Akhyana generally adopts episodes from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and other puranas. Vishnudas, (1564-1632) a Nagar Brahmin poet of Khamhat city, included episodes of saints in akhyana. Before Premanand, Vishnudas had written an akhyana, Kunvarbai nuni mosalun, and by virtue of this he became the first to depict Gujarati family of his own time in verse. After Vishnudas, Krishnadas (1645), Govind (1624) and Vishanath Jani (1642) also wrote Kunvarbai nun mamerun. They all owe their debt for the subject of this work to Vishnudas.

Premanand raised this form to great heights. He being a master of this form, achieved a literary perfection and beauty. For his predecessors Kunvarbai nun mamerun was a pious and inspiring life of a saint, a devotee, but Premanand, for the first time, viewed it as a source of interesting contemporary Gujarati family life. He showed the tendency and attitude of portraying the typical family characters. While telling the story in detail he introduces anecdotes at various stages of the narrative and makes it interesting. The description of the journey of Narasimha is so ridiculous, and yet so vivid that it amuses even the modern reader. He not only makes his readers laugh, but also captures the various shades of life, and this results in the creation of a variety of 'rasas'. The most interesting and appealing part of the story is the meeting of the motherless Kunvarbai with his 'vairagi' father, a true devotee of Lord Krishna. Though Premanand utilised some portion of the material of his predecessors, sometimes even words and verses, he reproduced them in such an artistic manner that none of his predecessors or successors could reach his heights and perfection. Premanand is unique in depicting various 'rasas'.

Thus, Kunvarbai nun mamerum is the most interesting and popular work of Premanand, an attractive account of medieval Gujarati society and an useful source material for sociological studies. This work has also a resemblance with the story of Kunvarbai written by Narasimha Mehta in medieval Marvadi, Rajasthani and Hindi.

KUNWAR NARAYAN (Hindi: b. 1927), born at Faizabad in U.P., received his M.A. degree from the Lucknow University. He has been the editor of a monthly Yugchetna (1956-1960), and also served on the editorial board of Naya pratik (1975 to 1978). He was the Vice-Chairman of the U.P. State Sangeet Natak Akademi (1976-1979) and at present he is Chairman of the Bharatendu Natya Kendra in Lucknow. His collection of poems entitled Atmajayi (1965) was selected for the Hindustani Academy award in 1971, and his collection of short stories. Academi ke as-pas (1971) received the Premchand Puraskar for 1972-73. He has three collections of poems to his credit apart from the long narrative poem titled Atmajayi. Several English translations of his poems have been included in the Modern Hindi Poetry, an anthology of poems brought out by the Indiana University Press, Bloomington, U.S.A., and Indian Poetry Today (ICCR). Some of his poems have been translated into Japanese by Toshio Tanaka. He was one of the poets included in Tisra Saptak (ed. S.H. Vatsyayan 'Ageya', 1959.)

Kunwar Narayan's poems are remarkable for their quiet, introspective, urbane and philosophical quality. He does not believe in the existence of any defined poetic idiom. His poems seem to create their own flowing patterns which are dictated by their introverted and ruminative themes. His award-winning narrative poem Atmajayi (The self-conqueror) takes for its theme the convolutions in the soul of the young intellectual, Nachiketa, who faces Yama, the lord of death, with his barrage of existential questions. The original story appears in Kathopanishad, and has been reinterpreted by the poet as a man's search for selfhood.

Kunwar Narayan's short stories, too, pass from the realistic into the surrealistic with ease, till it is hard to tell one from the other. Many of them start playfully in a mock-folk setting, and then, take the leap into the unknown and the dreamlike world of fantasies. The language of these stories is stark and simple, and yet it has the colloquial raciness of the traditional story-teller.

FURTHER WORKS: Chakravyuh (1956); Parivesh: hum tum (1971); Apne samne (1979).

KUPPUSWAMY MUDALIAR, ARNI (Tamil) is one of the oldest novelists in Tamil but by no means as outstanding as Vedanayakam Pillai, Natesa Sastry, Rajam Iyer and Madhavaiya had been earlier. But Mudaliar introduced detective novels fashioned very much after western models; he had a sure appraisal of what exactly the public wanted and he gave them that, in ample measure. Unfortunately for him there were few buyers of novels in those days (the early decades of the century); book-buying had not become a habit and a popular novelist like Mudaliar had to serialise all his novels in periodicals. For this purpose he chose the Anandabodhini; and it is a measure of his popularity that it was his novels serialised in its issues that made them sell; for nearly 15 years from 1915 this staid and pedantic magazine enjoyed the esteem of the Tamil public, mainly on the strength of Mudaliar's creations.

There are no clear dates available, touching the life of this novelist; nor is much known about his private life. He belonged to a small town called Arni in North Arcot district but he settled down in Madras where he wrote all his novels. He was a Vedantin who loved to intersperse his narrative with long homilies on chastity; clearly he did not approve of the free and easy social life of young people in the West and of the prevalence of divorce and transgressions from the narrow path of domestic virtue.

Mudaliar was a prolific writer who wrote 43 novels and at least 2 works on Vedanta. Some of his novels were prodigiously long, running to many volumes, especially his translations of the novels of G.H.M. Reynolds and Alexander Dumas. He was extremely hard-working and could sit for hours together writing away furiously. This probably accounts for the mix-up in the names of characters we meet in many of his novels. This also explains his characters with Tamil names going about wearing gloves and other items of western apparel. One is constantly aware of an unnatural, hot-house atmosphere in his novels created by a hasty translator who always wrote to keep target dates.

Among his more important translations is the Ratnapuri rahasyam (the Tamil version of G.H.M. Reynolds'

KUPPUSWAMAYYA, NAGAPUDI-KURATTI SONGS

Mysteries of the Old Court of London). Among his supposedly original creations are some scarcely-concealed adaptations of western thrillers. His favourite detectives were Krishna Singh and his son Ananda Singh. Mudaliar adapted many of the Sherlock Holmes stories successfully into Tamil: he had an obvious penchant for mystery and detective fiction.

Very few knew that Mudaliar wrote full length works on Vedanta; two books of his in this genre are Kaivalya-navanitam and Nanajivavadakkattalai. He is, however, known and remembered only as the author of a large number of popular novels.

Mudaliar lived for 60 years; he probably died a little before 1950; his actual birth date and the date of his death are not known. Despite his lack of high creative ability he must be counted as one of the three authoors (the other two being Veduvur K. Duraiswamy Iyengar and J.R. Rangaraju) who stimulated the Tamils to read books and created a vast reading public for the writers who came after them.

KUPPUSWAMAYYA, NAGAPUDI (Telugu; b. 1865, d. 1951) belongs to Nagapudi in Chittoor District in Andhra Pradesh. His father was Yajna Narayana Sastri. He graduated from Madras Christian College. After taking Law Degree, he practised law upto 1918. But his nature did not suit that profession. Eventually he became a critic in Telugu. He was a good scholar in Telugu and Sanskrit. He acquired scholarship in these languages and had many close Pandit-friends.

His was a traditional life and he was a 'satvika' by nature. With his background knowledge of English, soon he became one of best critics in Telugu. He wrote a number of critical works in Telugu. His first work was Bharata saramu, which is a literary translation in Telugu of Annie Besant's Story of the Great War. His other works are, Bhojarajivamu, Kalahastishwara shatakamu and Shankaracharya charitra. His Sanskrit work Sthava ratnavali is a fine testimony of his scholarship in Sanskrit. For this he was praised and honoured by Sri Jagadguru of Sringeri and Sri Jagadguru of Kumbhonam.

He was a traditionalist in his style and did not accept the vyavaharika style in the books with the notion that it would spoil the Telugu language. He wrote certain commentaries and prefaces to some great Telugu classics. Kuppuswamayya wrote a fine commentary on Parijatapaharana, a Telugu Prabandha by Mukku Timmana. He also edited and wrote prefaces to Mahabhagavata of Pothana, Nirvachanottara Ramayana of Tikkana, Uttara Ramayana of Kankantipapa Raju, Mahabharata of Sripada Krishna Murthy Sastry and other works published by Vavilala Rama Sastry and Sons, Madras. He adopted writing of prefaces to Telugu kavyas from English. It became a model to other scholars in Telugu afterwards.

There are many disciples Kuppuswamayya in Andhra Pradesh. He was felicitated by Pithapuram Rajah for his great scholarship and talent. He was responsible for introducing the examinations for oriental titles in Madras University.

KURATTI SONGS (Tamil). In Sangam love lyrics we come across references to girls from the hills being called upon to diagnose the illness of the heroine through metaphysical means and then to perform worship of the offended god to propitiate him. The tradition continued and grew, yielding a specialist genre of songs called 'kurattippattu' for which a grammar has even provided a definition. When the 'kalambakam' was developed as a distinct genre, tracing the various stages of the development of love between two young people, a stanza was allotted to the Kuratti's prognostication, called 'kuram'. Later, poets began to realise the poetic potential of this; they started composing whole poems, again called kuram, describing the love-lorn maiden whose hand is read by the saucy Kuratti with a great deal of verve, witticism, poetic sense and gritty worldly wisdom. The best known among all these kuram poems is that on goddess Minakshi of Madurai, composed by Kumaraguruparar of Srivaikuntam, in Tinnevely district who flourished in the 17th century.

Kuram is a monologue from a highly endowed Kuratti who is quite confident of her powers. She devotes a number of stanzas to describe the hill from which she comes, later, expansively claiming all the mountains of the country as her own. This passage is rich in poetic conceits and it helps to create an image of the hills and the occupations and life-style of the hill-folk. She then assures Minakshi that whatever she says shall come to pass; no false prediction will ever issue from her lips. Next, she impresses the princess of Madurai by saying that she had successfully predicted that lord Shiva would wed Tatata-kai. For Kurattis like her, she claims, can read the past, the present and the future.

She then describes a number of steps that should be taken, ritualistic arrangements like lighting up a standing oil lamp and spreading paddy before her, to ensure the proper atmosphere without further delay. The mountain girl, then proceeds to read Minakshi's hand. The hand has truly unique markings; for it is the hand of the mother of the Universe, the consort of Lord Shiva, God of Gods. The girl suggests that it is Lord Shiva who is going to wed her. The poem ends with a number of stanzas in praise of Shiva and Minakshi.

The format of the kuram genre is quite simple; it is a monologue, recording the observations of a Kuratti from the time she meets the heroine till her commission is carried out. The opportunity is taken by the better endowed poets like Kumaraguruparar to extract the maximum poetic essence from out of a detailed description of the mountains of the country, the hamlet of the hunter-folk, the flora and the fauna. The poet has also secured the maximum poetic advantage from the fact that his hero and heroine are the primordial parents of the Universe.

Kuram forms one of the 96 known kinds of minor works called prabandhas. This form enjoyed considerable popularity and many poets wrote one or two pieces in it. Kuram gave rise to kuravanji as a natural transition; while kuram is a monologue recording the observations of a Kuratti, kuravanji is cast in the form of a play. The general pattern and the central idea of both are the same; but kuravanji has quite replaced kuram in the last two centuries on account of its variety of appeal and its stageability.

Tirukkuttralak kuravanji was produced as a play during the Navaratri festival in many small towns of south Tamil land. Sarabendra bhoopalak kuravanji written on king Serfoji of Thanjavur used to be produced in the festivals conducted in association with the big temple at Thanjavur. There is a kuravanji on Lord Kumbheshvara of Kumbakonam; we learn that it was produced with considerable éclat at great expense by a rich businessman every year during the masimakham festival.

Clearly this genre attained great popularity among the common folk and even today kuravanjis are being produced as dance dramas on the stage and in the radio and the T.V. The vivacity, wit and generally bright personality of the Kuratti dominating the whole play is the main attraction. Though born in an obscure hamlet in a hill slope, she is a much-travelled person claiming intimate personal knowledge of many lands and peoples. Though of poor hunter stock and unlettered, she is at home in the palaces of kings. The friend of the heroine, too, is a bright character and lends considerable interest to the play. The sub-plot involving the lover of the Kuratti acts as a welcome relief; the racy dialogue certainly is a major attraction.

The best known among all the works of this genre is the Tirukkuttralak kuravanji with the Lord of Kutralam as the hero and Vasantavalli as the heroine; the play was composed by Melakaram Tirukutarasappak Kavirayar who seems to have been a temple official and certainly was a gifted poet. In fact it was this work which inspired many later poets to write in this genre.

One of the well-known works of this genre is the Sarabendra bhupalak kuravanji sung in honour of king Serfoji of Thanjavur, a Mahratta prince of considerable renown. His great munificence, his qualities as a discerning patron of arts, his statesmanship and brilliance as a law giver and administrator, his own personal scholarship, all come in for great acclaim in this poem. The city of Thanjavur appears to great advantage in the lines of this poem.

Two works of this genre have been sung on Tirunal

(Vishnu) on the Azhagar hills in Madurai district. The advantage which these poets have over the author of Sarabendra bhupalak kuravanji is that the hero resides in a hill and that the kuratti feels most at home at elevated places; the poem on the king of Thanjavur has to deal with a riverine city on level plains. The two works similarly on Murugan at Swamimalai, called Swamimalai Murugan kuravanji and Tamizharasikkuravanji suffer from the shortcoming that there is no hill in the Kaveri plains, Swamimalai being only an inconsiderable mound. The authors of these latter works have much lesser excuse as Murugan usually sits on high hills and has been traditionally worshipped as the deity of the hillfolk. These poets must have chosen the Lord of Swamimalai only for parochial reasons.

The Bethlehem kurvanji deserves special mention as the only work of this genre written by a Christian poet, Vedanayaka Sastriar. It presents the Christian dogma and glorifies Christian institutions. Even though this work follows the set pattern in most of the conventions, it presents some innovations too.

103 plays belonging to this genre are known to exist, out of which 21 have been printed. One of them is by a Christian poet and one by a Muslim. The fact that all the major religions chose to propagate their faith through this medium goes to prove conclusively its wide popularity sustained over the years.

KURATTIPPATTU (Malayalam) belongs to genre of the folk songs of Kerala. It is also associated with labour. In this instance the labour is not physical; it involves the exploitation of human psychology. Kuravas are a hill tribe. Some of them, especially the women folk who are known as 'Kurattis' are good at reading the palm and predicting the future. They give their description of past, present and future in the form of songs. However the songs known as 'kurattippattu' generally narrate a story vividly. The song has a lilt of its own, it gains momentum and vigour as the narration advances. In one of the songs a Kuratti is represented as offering to predict the future of Sita. The other challenges her, and there is a bet. It is predicted that Sita would be brought back from Lanka. She would jump into the fire and prove her chastity, and be reinstated in Ayodhya as queen. If this prediction comes true the other Kuratti shall give the narrator a 'chela', or sari. There are many songs like this in Malayalam. The language of the songs is a little archaic yet it has a freshness of its own.

KURAVANJI (Tamil) The term 'kuravanji' is derived from the word 'kuram', one of the 96 poetic forms included in the 'pirapantam' (Sanskrit prabandham) contemporarily referred to as Chitrilakkiyangal. The word kurvanji means a girl of the Kuravar, or forest community who live in the mountainous areas. Kuravanji is a kind of drama in verse and centering around the theme of love. This form of literary composition was popular between the 17th and 19th centuries and was enacted by women players. It has been revived in this century by Tamil dancers and savants like Rukmini Devi Arundale.

KURIGAMI, PRAKASH RAM

The story was woven round a stereotype plot. A young woman playing with her Sakhi or companion would chance to see the local lord or God's image and fall in love with him. Love-sick, she would invite a Kurava woman or Kuratti to foretell her future. The Sakhi would then carry a love-message and the God or the Chieftain would appear in disguise before the girl to woo her. She would not yield, being steadfast in her love. Satisfied with her fidelity the God or the chieftain would reveal himself and marry her. The basic feature of the kuravanji plays, viz., the Kuratti foretelling the outcome of the heroine's love is present in some of the sangam poets and in bhakti literature as well. As kuravanji prominently features persons outside the pale of courtly or urban culture, there is a marked use of colloquial language in these compositions. The best known composition in this genre is the Tirukutrala kuravanji of Tirikuta Rajappa Kavirayar of Kuralam. Although the work is small in size, it is rich in description and meaning and steeped in religious fervour.

The drama opens with the ceremonial procession of Tirikutanattar or Tirukurralanathar, a manifestation of Shiva, to the accompaniment of music, drum-beat and chants. Many a beautiful girl loses her heart to the Lord, of whom Vasantavalli is one. As she hears the Lord's praise from her friends with whom she is watching the procession, she falls in love with him. Her companion's best efforts to bring her out of a trance-like existence prove to be of no avail.

At that moment appears a sooth-saying Kuratti named Singi and Vasantavalli is only too pleased to see her and seeks to know the fate of her love. As she enquires after the Kuratti's home land, latter treats her to a sumptuous description of the Kuralam land and the fame and might of the local God. Vasantavalli commands the Kuratti to reveal the name of her lover in order to test her powers. After characteristic tarrying and double talk the Kuratti spells out the name of Tirikutanathar and assures Vasantavalli that her love will soon lead to union with the Lord. She is given rich gifts by Vasantavalli.

At this point appear Singan, the Kuratti's lover and his friend Nivan, the bird-trapper. Singan locates his sweetheart in a Kuralam street after a prolonged search. He wonders at her strange-looking ornaments and her new cloths which remind him of worms, serpents, etc. and comes to know that they are gifts from a number of people for her sooth-saying abilities. They indulge in a verbal duel with Singan making daring overtures and Singi fending him off with her superior wit. The kuravanji may thus be said to speak of love at two levels, the spiritual and the mundane. The plays end with verses in praise of Tirikutanathar.

There are in existence about fifty kuravanji plays which include those written by Christian and Muslim poets as well. Some of the more important kuravanji plays are Ambalapalli Adimular kuravanji by Marimuttu Pillai, Azhagar kuravanji by Kavi Kunjara Bharati, Karaikuravanji by Suppaiyyar, Madurai Minakshi kuram and Jnana kuravanji both ascribed to Kumara Guruparar, Kodumalur kuravanji by Nallavirappa Pillai, Sarabendira Bhupala kuravanji by Kottaiyur Sivakkozhundu Desikar and Nallainagar kuravanji by Kanda Pillai.

KURIGAMI, PRAKASH RAM (Kashmiri; b. 1819, d. 1877) was born in a Pandit family in South Kashmir. Nothing is known about his early education, but his works reveal that the poet was well-versed in the Persian language and literature. His knowledge of Sanskrit or any other language is not corroborated by his poetical works. There are, of course, Sanskrit words in his compositions, but such words are used in every day speech in every Hindu household even today.

A controversy existed for some time about the time and age of the poet. George Abraham Grierson and Abdul Ahad 'Azad' write that the poet was alive during the reign of Sukh Jivan (1754-1764), but the recent research by B.N. Pandit establishes that the poet flourished in the 19th century. Grierson has mentioned the name of the poet as 'Devakar Prakash Bhat', and Azad as 'Prakash Bhat' only. In the literary circles and among the masses, he is known as 'Prakash Ram Kurigami'.

The language of the poetical works of Prakash Kurigami also supports the view of B.N. Pandit that he was a poet of the 19th century, a contemporary of Mahmud Gami, another well-known poet of Kashmir who flourished during the period.

Besides a good number of hymns, he composed Akanandun, Krishnavtar lila, Ramavtar charit and Lov-Kush charit. His Akanandun was based on a popular folk-tale of Kashmir, but it is not extant now. Krishnavtar lila, too, is declared to have been lost. But after thorough research, it has been concluded that Krishnavtar lila, edited by Grierson and published by the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal, is the composition of Prakash Ram which Grierson has attributed to some unknown poet, Dinanath, on the mere existence of a word 'diyun' at the end of the narrative. 'Diyun' has never been the name of a person in Kashmiri. This word simply means a 'servant', 'slave' or a 'subordinate'. The study of the narrative shows its close affinity with the language, style and diction of Krishnavtar lila and other works of the poet.

Prakash Ram's fame as a well-known poet is based on Ramavtar charit, the first and the most compact epic written in Kashmiri so far. Written in hexameter of Persian, this epic has served as a model for all the epic poets who followed him.

Prakash Ram has not loaded his composition with philosophy and dry logic. His poetry is the spontaneous expression of his feelings. It is soft, sweet, appealing and penetrating.

In the field of descriptive poetry, his pen portrays like the brush of a master artist. His melodies are so sweet that while listening to these, one is transported to some far off dreamland of fragrant flowers and music. His love for his country is evident from all his works.

The study of his works shows that he has been a devotee of 'Devi' and worshipper of 'Vishnu'. In Ramavtar charit, he has shown some inclination towards the Shiva cult also. His version of the Ramayana is quite interesting inasmuch as it departs from the plot of the story prevalent in the plains of Ganga and Jamuna.

KURINJI MALAR (Tamil). One of the best-known novels of N. Parthasarathy, the Kurinji malar (Kurinji flower) was first serialised in the popular Tamil weekly Kalki and published in book form in 1960. It is the first of the author's two novels named after flowers, the other being Anicchamalar. Kurinji is a rare and beautiful flower that blooms at long intervals, sometimes as long as twelve years in the mountainous areas of South India. A portion of the novel is also set in the Kurinji or mountainous areas of Tirupparangunram and Kodaikanal, with the city of Madurai providing the rest of the locale.

The novel revolves around the daughter of a Tamil scholar, Poorani, who is orphaned at a young age to face the trials and tribulations of life. By her strong will power and with the help of a genuine sympathiser named Mangaleswari who offers her the job of a Tamil teacher, Poorani faces life with confidence. She falls in love with Aravindan, an idealistic young man of charm and refinement who is devoted to the cause and upliftment of the weaker sections of society. He too becomes a source of inspiration to Poorani. Poorani's literary and oratorical talents fetch her well-deserved fame and in due course she contests in the elections at the behest of her well-wishers. Aravindan whom Poorani regards as her guide and mentor second only to her dead father cancels his proposed marriage to Poorani as he considers himself unequal to her. He engages himself in the service of disease-stricken village folk, whence he contracts a fatal illness and succumbs to it. Poorani relinquishes her electoral victory and pledges herself to a life of selfless sacrifice.

The Kurinji flower features as a prominent symbol in the novel to underscore the idealised conception of the heroine in stark contrast to the Anicchamalar where the author presents the chief female character an irresolute and weak-minded person whose existence is as fragile as the flower of the same name. The author states in the foreword to Kurinji malar that a person like Poorani is indeed as rare as the Kurinji, blooming at a lofty height and unsullied by the eddies of life. The hero of the novel also describes her as the rare, impeccable and unreachable Kurinji. The Kurinji is shown to be in full bloom as Poorani and Aravindan disclose their deep mutual love. When Poorani revisits the place after many years, the flowers are in one of their rare bloom, which reminds her of an irredeemable void in her life.

The novel, written in a lucid and chaste language, is full of charming descriptions of nature and the author captures local smells, sounds and colours with ease. It is a harmonious blending of the traditional and the modern in Tamil literature for which the author is justly famous.

KURINJIPPATTU (Tamil) is one of the ten longer poems included in the Sangam anthology entitled Pattuppattu. It was composed by Kapilar who is universally regarded as the greatest of the Sangam poets. There is a tradition that he composed it as teaching material while tutoring an Aryan King, Prahasta by name. As if in confirmation of this, the poet has used a metaphor involving two armies ranged in a battlefield which would be appropriate when talking to a king but not apposite in a conversation between a girl and an elderly woman of a village on a hill.

The whole poem of 261 lines is the report of the girl-friend of the heroine to the latter's fostermother; the subject is the love that has secretly developed between the heroine and a youthful hunter, a development wholly unknown to the parents. Kurinji denotes the stage of secret love in Sangam tradition; The particular poem indicates the final phase of that stage where the friend of the girl tells the fostermother the secret story of the love and then the elders arrange for the wedding as desired.

But the poet, grateful for the larger canvas available to him, adroitly brings in all the little details of the episode in the words of the loyal friend. The poem starts with a mild admonition at the ignorance of the foster-mother who, seeing the heroine unwell, arranged for a traditional type of worship directed towards Muruga, the God of the hills. The friend makes it clear that the illness is the result of love and the pangs of separation from the loved one.

She then proceeds to give the older woman an account of how this love was born. She had been deputed along with the heroine to guard the ripening millet in the fields, as was the custom in all the villages in the hills. When they are guarding the crop comes the young man accompanied by fierce hunting dogs: the girls show fear at the sight of the dogs and the hunter most solicitously assures them of protection. An elephant has been running amuck and the girls again express fear and again the beau proceeds to endear himself by driving it away with a well-aimed arrow.

The afternoon flies on rosy wings and at nightfall the young hunter leaves after several oaths that he shall marry her and none else. Thereafter the young lovers meet in the cloistered secrecy of the woods on the hill with the active assistance of the woods on the hill and the active assistance of the devoted friend.

But the constant need to maintain secrecy, the fear of discovery and of possible scandal spreading in the village and the greater anxiety, every night, at the dangers awaiting in the mountain path taken by the young lover—all conspire to make the girl a nervous wreck. The report of the friend concludes with a description of the travails being suffered by the girl; the suggestion is clear that the only solution is to marry her off to the young hunter with whom she is in love.

Even a cursory reading of the poem supports the tradition that it was intended as instructional material; for the poet has covered almost all the different modes and stages of 'kurinji' in this; all the possible flora and fauna of a hill have been referred to meticulously. There are beautiful descriptions, especially of flowers of which 99 are named; there is a terrifying portrait of the fearsome animals and reptiles prowling in the jungle, as only Kapilar can paint. A discerning critic, however, will not rank this as one of the best creations of the king of Sangam poets. He is perhaps at his best in small cameo pieces, of five and six lines as anthologised in the immortal Kurun-tokai where every poem echoes the authentic heartbeat of great poetry.

KURINJITTEN (Tamil), a novel by Rajam Krishnan published in 1963, is an unusual work in many respects. Most novelists are content to portray the familiar sections of society in the major cities of Tamilnadu with a very small number of people doing their work against a village background. This is due to the unwillingness of Tamil (indeed this malaise is seen in the rest of the country, too) writers to study new milieux, unfamiliar ways of living.

Rajam Krishnan seized eagerly on the opportunity that came her way in the shape of a posting for her husband in what are regarded as out-of-the-way places; she took pains to study these societies and wrote novels about them. Her knowledge of these tribal societies is accurate like a sociologist's; but her touch is that of a creative artist; and she has provided in it deeper layers of thoughtful reflection rarely seen in contemporary fiction.

The story encompasses three generations of Badaga families in a village in the Nilagiri mountains. It begins with the fortunes of one Singiah, who builds a prosperous home through hard work inspired by a mystic love of the land; and his brother, an amiable but reckless drunkard portrayed as a contrast to Singiah. Their children Jogi and Rangan grow up together without much education; Krishnan, their contemporary, is more fortunate for he receives high education and finally graduates from a Madras college. They all love the most comely mountain belle, Paru and a physical test which is held among the three suitors pronounces Rangan as the winner; Rangan weds Paru, who openly prefers the sophisticated Krishnan. Jogi marries Paru's sister and settles down to manage his now impoverished farm.

A severe rivalry breaks out between Rangan who turns out to be vicious and unscrupulous and Krishnan, who is high-minded and cultured. The latter prospers but Rangan courts economic disaster through his predilection for gambling and chiefly on account of an ill-considered adventure into politics. Jogi's son grows up to be an engineer and starts working in the hill project.

It is Jogi's son Nanjan who paves the way for the unification of the feuding families; he falls in love with Krishnan's grand-daughter who returns his love; the match is enthusiastically blessed by Krishnan's family and fiercely opposed by Jogi and Paru. Events, however, move very fast; in the strike which Rangan organises for the betterment of the project workers' service conditions, he gets killed in the police shooting. His blood heals the feud of a generation and makes the wedding possible. Paru dies with her hopes centred round Nanjan wholly fulfilled.

Kurinjitten is more of a saga than a mere story; it is painted on a large canvas with a lot of characters; and it spans three generations and nearly five 'Kurinjis' as the Badagas calculate (A kurinji is a period of 12 years; the kurinji tree comes to flower once in 12 years). While these physical dimensions are big enough, what makes the novel big, even colossal, in the artistic sense is the way the history of a whole society has been portrayed through the lives of three families. Symbolically, Rangan is shown as a small boy running away with a stolen jewel to Ootacamund; the journey is fraught with anxieties and real danger; but Nanjan covers roughly the same distance everyday to go to school in the next generation. Food habits change as do the fashions connected with dress and habitation; funeral rites change basically: this is important because the fend originated centring on whether dances and music are appropriate in a funeral ceremony; they are abjured in the funeral of Rangan which brings together the feuding families.

The novelist uses fecund nature on the mountains as an eloquent backdrop for the emotional sequences. She seldom sermonises but through her simplehearted tribal characters, somehow demonstrates the strength of faith and love and moral values and the futility of deceit and chicanery and unscrupulous selfishness.

Rajam Krishnan's Kurinjiitten adds up to a memorable experience, obtainable only occasionally through modern Tamil fiction.

KURTAKOTI, KIRTINATHA DATTATREYA (Kannada; b. 1928) is one of the foremost literary critics in Kannada. He had his early schooling in Gadag. He holds an M.A. degree in English from Karnatak University. He retired as the Professor and Head of the Department of English, Vallabh Vidyanagar University, Anand, Gujarat.

Kurtakoti has the distinction of nurturing intimate relations with two successive literary movements in Kannada. At a tender age he came under the tutelage of D.R. Bendre, one of the greatest of Kannada poets. Among the ancients, Kumara Vyasa is his personal favourite. In fact Kurtakoti's criteria of literary Judgement are formulated on the basis of his reading of these two poets.

Kurtakoti is a literary historian, theoretician and critic. A meaningful synthesis of the western and the Oriental literary theories is his forte. He is well acquainted with English, Sanskrit, Old and Modern Kannada.

He came to the limelight with the publication of Yugadharma hagu sahityadarshana (1962). It is a trend-setting collection of historical essays, which survey the various literary forms in modern Kannada. The work begins with an analytical introduction, which delineates the socio-cultural forces that led to the advent of modern Kannada literature at the turn of this century. The evolution of the literary forms such as the novel, short-story, drama and literary criticism receives a detailed scrutiny in the remaining chapters. His approach to a literary work is a blend of formalist criticism and historical criticism. His contribution to the critical idiom of Kannada is immense. As is natural in a pioneering work of this kind, the book contains a few errors of commission and omission.

Kurtakoti has rendered yeoman service in the role of Bendre's Boswell. He has authored no less than five volumes on the master and his poetry. These include a short biography and a critical analysis of Bendre's poetry. He sets about his work with a conviction that great poetry is capable of generating its own tools of critical analysis.

However, his conclusions seem to be validated, as much by his close and personal associations with the poet Bendre as by his association with Bendre's poetry.

In Navya kavyaprayoga (1965) he gives a lucid introduction to the 'navya' school of poetry. This book contains a critical appraisal of the poets Adiga, Gokak, Narasimhaswamy, Kanavi, Ramachandra Sharma, Gangadhara Chittala and Ramanujan.

Recently he has published three more collections of essays in criticism, entitled Vimarsheya vinaya-kadambari, Vimarsheya vinaya-nataka and Sahitya span-dana. Some of the important novels of Kannada such as Gramayana, Malegalalli madumagalu and Alida mela come in for close scrutiny in the first volume. The second book interprets some important plays in Kannada and Sanskrit. The booklet Yashodhara chariteya kavyatantra deals with the formal aspects of that thirteenth century classic.

Kurtakoti's creative abilities find expression in a number of plays and operas. A mani (That house) and Svapnadarshi mattu itara gitanatakagalu among them.

FURTHER WORKS: Bendra hagu kannada kavyada sva upa (1961); Bhrungada benneri (1975); Da.Ra.Bendre (1982); Bendreyavara kavyadalli shruti mtu kruti (1985), Chandragupta.

KURUNDKAR, NARHAR (Marathi; b. 1932 d. 1982) did his M.A. from Marathwada University and actively participated in the social and political movement in that area. He was engaged in educational work and was highly respected in the literary as well as pedagogical circles for his scholarship and integrity. He was fearless and frank, a free thinker and a humanist. He was awarded Maharashtra State Literary Awards for his three works Rupavedha (1964), Dhar ani kath (1971), Shivaratra (1971). He was a scholar of history, ancient culture, religion, art-history, aesthetics, sociology and linguistics. He knew Sanskrit, Urdu and Hindi. A volume was presented in his honour after his death by Andhra Pradesh Marathi Sahitya Parishad, Hyderabad.

His other important works are: Akalan, Vata marya turya, Glakh chhaya prakash, Jagar (1970), Payavat (1974), Bhajan, yatra, magova (1966).

P.M.

KURUNTOKAI (Tamil) is one of the anthologies of Ettuttokai of Sangam literature containing four hundred and one Akam (love) poems in the Akaval metre ranging from 4-8 lines ascribed to 205 poets. There is a brief invocatory verse by Bharatam patiya Peruntevanar. The compiler of this anthology is Purikko. Kuruntokkai (A collection of poems) is one of the earlier anthologies only next to Ainkurunuru according to S. Vaiyapuripillai. Two hundred and five poets have contributed to this anthology and ten poems are anonymous.

Though there are a few editions prior to that of U.V. Swaminataiyar, it was his edition which appeared in 1937 with a detailed commentary. This edition is most useful to the students of this anthology on account of various details and glossaries supplemented to it. An old commentary, supposed to have been written by Perachiriyar, the commentator for the first 380 poems and by Nacchinarkiniyar for the rest of the poems, is not extant.

Kuruntokai poems are comparatively short but highly poetical. Simile and antithesis function as effective structural devices. The brief descriptions of nature given as proper setting to the love situation treated in the poems are highly suggestive. Apart from these, different types of alamkaras such as avritti, hetu, karanamala, vishama, paryayokta, etc. have also enriched his poetic expressions. Though brief, the poems portray vividly the historical, social and cultural background of the age as well as establish the romantic setting in a convincing manner.

Though no rigorous scheme is followed in ordering the poems of this anthology, all the five major divisions of akam theme and their various minor divisions get fair distribution in the poems of this anthology. The expression of the heroine in the context of separation becomes the theme of many poems of this anthology.

A.K. Ramanujan has given an English translation of 76 select poems of Kuruntokai in his book The Interior Landscape. A complete translation of this book is given by M. Shanmugam Pillai and David E. Ludden.

KURUP, NAGAVALLY R.S. (Malayalam; b. 1917). Born in Alleppey district and educated at the native place, Changanachery and Trivandrum, Nagavally R.S. Kurup is a holder of B.A. and B.T. degrees. For a time he was employed in the Indian Bank and later he worked as a high school assistant for 12 years (1939-51). In 1951 he was appointed as a producer in the Trivandrum station of All India Radio. He has retired from service.

Kurup is a prolific writer with about 30 works to his credit. These include 13 collections of short stories, novels, some plays and essay collections. He was one of the early leaders of the progressive school of literature in Malayalam and is considered to be a good story-writer. As a script-writer and dialogue-writer also he has impressed the present generation of film-viewers.

KURUP, O.N.V. (Malayalam; b. 1931), the son O.N. Krishna Kurup and Lakshmikkutty Amma, took his M.A. degree in Malayalam with distinction in 1955 and has worked as Professor in many colleges in Kerala. O.N.V. (as he is popularly known) earned fame as a revolutionary poet even during his student days in the late forties and was one of the most eminent among them in his twenties. There is a peculiar continuity between romanticism and modernity in his poetry. It is based on a new concept of the symbol and the image. As N.V. Krishna Varrier pointed out "O.N.V. is the song of the revolution. And even when the message was important the music remained more important." One of his poems is entitled Porutunna soundaryam (Fighting beauty). He entered the field of poetry writing thunderous lines like:

"Suppressed are we, suppressed, suppressed,
We shall form our battle-array
Here the calls of the freedom struggle,
Join together to win the fight."

Collections of his poems have been published under the titles: Samarattinte santatikal (Off-spring of the revolution, 1951), Porutunna saundaryam (Fighting beauty, 1951), Jnan ninne snehikkunnu (I love you, 1953), Ente punnara arivalu (My dear, dear sickle, 1954), Mattuvinnu chhantangale (Change the laws, 1955), Dahikkunna panapatram (The thirsty drinking vessel, 1956), Oru devatayum rantu chakravartimarum (One nymph and two emperors, 1958), Marubhoomi (Desert, 1958), Katinjool kanikal (The first fruits, 1960), Neela kannukal (Blue eyes, 1961), Mayilpeeli (Peacock feather, 1964), Oru thulli velicham (One drop of light, 1966), Agni shalabhan-gal (Butterflies of fire, 1971) Aksharam (Alphabet, 1974), Valappottukal (Bangle bits, Children's poems, 1980), Uppu (Salt, 1982), Karl Marxinte kavitalakal (Poems of Karl Marx, 1983) and Bhoomikku oru charamageetam (A dirge to earth, 1984).

In the second stage of his poetic growth O.N.V. strikes a different note. Since then his genius like the phoenix which is a frequent image with him, has risen out of the ashes of its old self and began to give clear liquid melody. His 'Nalumanippukkal' (Four o'clock blooms, 1960) is one of the finest poems in the language on the theme of the relation between poetic creativity and experience. The title is the popular name of a flower that blooms in the evening.

"In the cool dawn when all others bloomed,
These buds had remained closed
And now, vanquishing the heat of the day,
With the intenser ardour within,
They have burst into bloom,
In my heart too, when the moon tide, heart of a grief subsides.
A flower has bloomed,
I do not know its name.

KUSHALALABHA

Poetic intuition thus moves closer to the inward reality and perceives the subtler movements there which the less delicate sensibility of the neo-classical temperament and the hammer and sickle-wielding stance of the radical mind had totally missed. O.N.V. also records the magical, bemused moment when feeling begins to stir but has not yet taken crystalline shape.

"I still shied away from speech;
But the sweet unease in me Became foam-flowers blossoming on the crests of the wavelets of my thoughts."

The subtle study of the self grows into a fine poem.

O.N.V.'s 'Choroonu' (First meal of rice given to children, 1963) records the sacramental experience of parenthood.

The profound sensitiveness in O.N.V.'s poetry is not at all a transition. For him the pink dreams are alive and he is always the spokesman of the downtrodden who have been deprived of the promised land. At no stage has he betrayed the revolutionary ideals, nor overcome by defeatism. But essentially he is a poet and deeply concerned with aesthetics and humanism. Many of his poems like 'Tansen' 'Peacock feather' and 'Phoenix' have captivated the minds of the readers.

O.N.V. received the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1972 for his Agnishalabhangal, Sahitya Akademi Award in 1975 for Aksharam and the Vayalar Award in 1982 for Uppu.

O.N.V.'s contributions as a lyricist are unsurpassed. He has written songs for several dramas and films and his achievement in the field is that he elevated the lyrics to the level of poetry. His lyrics are perfectly synchronised with harmony, symphony, melody and rhythm. His song that begins with "Ponnarival ampiliyil kanneriyunnole", in the drama Ningalenne kammyunistakki is very popular. He has won the state award for the best screen lyricist six times.

O.N.V. is a member of Kerala Sahitya Akademi, Kerala Lalita Kala Akademi and Sahitya Akademi. In 1981 he visited the Soviet Union to participate in the 150th birth centenary of Leo Tolstoy as the representative of the writers of India. In 1982 he received the Soviet-Land Nehru Award for his Uppu.

T.R.R.N

KUSHALALABHA (Rajasthani; b. 1523, d. 1593 approx.) was a poet of Old Rajasthani (Maru-gurjar) language. He was a pupil of Vachaka Abhayadharama of Khartaragachcha, a Jain sect. He lived in Rajasthan and the dates of his birth and death are approximate. Till now his eighteen works have come to light and all of them are in Maru-gujar language. These poems present him as powerful poet and a great scholar. He was a language teacher of prince Hararaja, the son of Raja Maldeva of Jaisalmer. His main works are: Madhavanal Kamakandala chaupai (1561), Dhola Marwaniri chaupai (1562), Tejasar rasa (1567), Agaddatt rasa (1568), Pingal shiromani (1581), Bhimasena chaupai, etc.

Madhavanal chaupai and Dhola Maravani ri chaupai are based on the medieval ballads in Old Western Rajasthani, Madhavanal Kamakandala chaupai is a love story of Madhava and Kamakandala. The Dhola Maru ballad is composed in 'duha' (doha). Kusha Labh collected the old couplets of Dhola Maru, arranged them in order and completed the story by adding chaupais in between composed by himself. This has caused a vast difference in the original and the newly composed chaupai version. He was the first poet who wrote on the ballad of Dhola Maravani during this period. The speciality of this version is that it makes the work dramatic in element. The theme of this work, like other version of Dhola Maru, is derived from the legend originating probably in Prince Dhola of Naravara and his bride princess Maru, Maruni or Maravani to whom he was betrothed during their infancy and who is waiting in her distant desert state, Pugala, for the prince to take her back to his city Naravara. To do this, the hero has to reckon with the stubborn resistance and tearful supplication of his second wife, princess Malavani. After one futile effort in the day, the hero escapes from Naravara at night, on the back of a camel. Crossing a long distance through the desert and hills in a single day, he reaches Pugala and surmounting dangers with supernatural help, no less with the quick witted aid of the heroine as well, returns to Naravara.

The depiction of his adventures is often halted by descriptions of the beauty of Maravana and the lovers' agony of separation. Apart from the old Western ballad version in duha couplets, this legend has also been depicted in different genres in several dialects and languages, an important one being the Dhola Maru ra duha in 'dingala' by Kallola (1473), and the other Dhola Maru ri vata mostly in the prose narrative form.

He had sufficient knowledge of not only Hindi, Sanskrit and Rajasthani (Mewari) but also of Marathi, Gujarati, and Bengali languages. He wrote about sixteen works, and many of them have been published. He could compose poems both in Hindi and Rajasthani in a simple, controlled and easily understandable language. The main themes of his poems are devotion (bhakti) and asceticism (vairagya). Being original, emotional and full of philosophic teachings and preachings, these poems present before us the highest ideal of humanity.

His contribution to the Mewari language (a Rajasthani dialect) is unforgettable. The tradition of saint literature achieved quick progress and attainment in his works. His poems and commentaries on the philosophic literature are still studied, listened to and recited in Mewar with much interest. He has his foremost place among the leading saint-poets after Mira in Rajasthan. He died due to intumescence. His main works are: Samashlokigita (in Mewari dialect with its commentary in Mewari prose), Parmartha-vichara, Yogastura ki tika, Manavamitra Ramacharitavarta, Commentary on sankya-karika, Alakh pachchisi, Mahimna-stotra samashloki (in Mewari), Chaturachintamani (in 4 parts), Chandrashekhara shataka, Anubhava prakash, Tunhina shtaka, Shesha charita, Balakan ri vara, Navo yoga Hridayarahasya, Chatur prakash, Saman-battisi, Hanuman Panchaka, Commentary on sankhya-tattva-samaj.

KUSHTA, MAULA BAKHSH (Punjabi; b.1876, d. 1952), more popularly known in the Punjabi literary world as 'Kushta', was born at Amritsar and died at Lahore.

He started his academic career with the study of the holy book called Al quran, then joined the primary section of the Government High School, Amritsar, but could not continue his studies beyond the 3rd grade of the primary section. His father, Sultan Bakhsh happened to be rather of suspicious nature and of orthodox outlook, and feared that his son might get attracted by Christianity, that is why he preferred a job for the son rather than sending him to a government institution. Consequently, both father and son migrated from Amritsar to Lahore in 1890, where Maula Bakhsh got his training as a scribe and stoneshaper. He was interested more in scribing than stone-shaping, and continued as a scribe till 1898. He returned to Amritsar the same year. Khalifa Qumar, himself a famous instructor in the composition of poems, was Kushta's first teacher, who transformed Maula Bakhsh from 'Munshi' (Kushta was called by this name too, when he was a scribe) to Kushta (his surname as a poet) in his literary or poetic workshop called 'Akhara Agha Ali Khan da'. In 1902 Kushta published an advertisement calling all the Punjabi poets to compete with him in a poetry composition. He gained the day in such a competition in 1903.

Because of his secular outlook, Kushta was loved and respected by all. Religion for him was love for and a devotion to the service of humanity. Cooperation of men of all castes and creeds was not only his conviction, but the first and foremost activity of his life.

He had been an active member of various literary and social organisations. He started under his editorship a monthly Urdu magazine named Fasih-ul-mulk in 1903. Its name was changed to Masiha afterwards, and then came Itihad, a weekly in Urdu, and Amrit, a daily. In 1918, he being its secretary, convened an emergency meeting of the newly founded association of publishers of books at Amritsar. The British Government appointed him assessor-cum-postmaster in 1919. In 1920 he attended to the activities of the 'Muslim Rajput Brotherhood' and founded its Amritsar branch. This association started Muslim-Rajput with Kushta as its founder editor. He, perhaps, had been the first Muslim dignitary who, with the members of his community, took part in desilting the tank of the Golden Temple, Amritsar. At the time of prayers, they took part in the Namaz at the very precincts of the Golden Temple and participated in the 'langar' (community meals) there.

In 1924, Kushta founded the 'Central Punjabi Sabha' with the active cooperation of Hira Singh 'Dard' and Dhani Ram 'Chatrik'. He was its first General Secretary. After Partition, he settled at Lahore, but he did not lose his vigour, and consequently, 'Punjabi Darbar' came into being with Kushta as its founder president. He had been the founder principal of the famous Anglo-Punjabi College, Lahore.

Kushta had an equal proficiency in Urdu and Punjabi. His important works in Punjabi are Diwan-e-Kushta (Patiala, 1981), Heer Ranjha (Lahore, 1949) Punjab de heere (Ludhiana, 2nd Edition, 1950), Punjabi shairan da tazkra (Lahore, 1960).

All his works were written in Punjabi in Persian script. The first and the fourth of these works are his creative writings, whereas the second and the third deal with Punjabi poets. Kushta has surveyed Punjabi poetry (1200-1800) in Punjab de heere, but in Punjabi shairan da tazkra, he has covered the whole range of Punjabi poetry upto his time. In his poetry we come across a happy blend of his moralistic points of view and his sharpness of vision. He advocates a simple but a lofty way of life. His contribution to the Punjabi literary world has a historical value.

KUSUMAMALA (Gujarati) is a collection of poems by Narasinhrao Divetia. It was published in 1887 and it is considered to be a landmark in the history of Gujarati poetry. In the poetry in this collection we find the poet's efforts to write lyrics on the pattern of the English lyrical poetry. In the introduction to the collection, Narasinhrao says: 'I have published the collection of these short lyrics with the highest aim to introduce to the Gujarati readers the method of compositions of the western poetry which is different from that adopted in our country; I do this not by dry critical discussion, but by examples, in order to draw their attention to that poetry and to show what the true poetry is...' It is clear that Narsinhrao wrote these poems with a serious and sincere purpose. He has called the lyrics of this collection 'Sangeet kavyo' (Musical poems), as he lays greater stress on the musical aspect of the lyric. Before the publication of Kusumamala, the poems written in a polished manner were not to be found in Gujarati literature, and it was only the Kusumamala that introduced such poems for the first time. As Narsinhrao was in constant touch with English literature, he wrote poems on the models of the lyrics compiled in the Palgrave's Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics.

The Kusumamala contains sixty-two poems on various subjects, such as love, nature, social conditions, historical places and events, etc. The poems are written in various metres as well as in 'ethnic' or 'folk' tunes and rhythms. Although the poet claimed that he had tried to write short lyrics, yet there are longer poems, too, composed in nearly hundred lines. The shortest poem of the collection is 'Mangalacharan' (The auspicious stanza) which consists of four lines, while the longest one is 'Chanda' (The moon) consisting of 112 lines, divided into 28 stanzas each consisting of four lines. Other such poems are 'Asthir anre sthir prem' (Unsteady and steady love), 'Vidhvano vilap' (The lamentation of the widow) and 'Megh', a translation of Shelley's poem 'The Cloud' (Megh), consisting of 68, 96 and 92 lines respectively.

The collection, when published, aroused a controversy amongst the contemporary critics. Anandshanker Dhruv and Ramanbhai Nilkanth appreciated the collection, while Manilal Nabubhai Dwivedi, Manishanker Bhatt 'Kant', and Balwantrao Thakore had other views.

The collection Kusumamala seems to be monotonous inasmuch as it lacks in variety both of subject and sentiment, and is characterised by stereo-typed treatment and expression. The love lyrics of the collection discuss the idea of love rather than depicting the emotion of love. They hardly express the experience of love. In the poems on nature, however, Narasinhrao is at his best. They represent his genuine emotions aroused by the different aspects, elements and scenes of nature. He has seen nature in its grandeur and grace and narrated it as such. For the first time in Gujarati literature an endeavour was made to treat nature as nature, though the manner in which it was done was Wordsworthian. His reflective vein finds eternal relation between nature and man, which has resulted in giving a reflective quality to his lyrics on nature. Often he views the mystic element in nature, and this element finds expression on the level of mysticism. Even though there is monotony of expression and a lesser poetic genius at work, Kusumamala is historically a milestone in the history of modern Gujarati poetry, in so far as the poet aims at sophisticated language, restrained sentiments and their expression, and above all, a better treatment of the subject than that attempted at by his predecessors.

KUSUMANJALI (Oriya), an anthology of poems by Madhusudan Rao (1853-1912), was published in 1903. The book contained eleven poems, all lyrics, and was dedicated to Radhanath Roy, the famous contemporary poet, and a good friend of Rao. The poems were written between 1891 and 1901 and had earned a great deal of admiration from discriminating readers including the poet Rabindranath Tagore, who had written in Sadhana, in profuse admiration about one particular poem 'Rishiprane debabataran' (The descent of divinity in the soul of a rishi).

Out of the eleven poems two were elegies—one on the death of Queen Victoria and the other on the death of Sir Sudhal Deb, the ruler of the formerly feudatory state of Bamanda of Orissa and great patron of art and literature. Two poems entitled 'Bharatabhabana' (Thoughts about India) and 'Udbodhana' (An exhortation) give vent to the poet's strong patriotic sentiments about Indian and its glorious heritage. One poem entitled 'Nabajugar abhisheka' (The coronation of the new age), though generally about the coming of new times, was covertly related to the ideals and liberality of the contemporary Brahma faith of Bengal in which the poet was a convert himself. The other poems, including 'Rishiprane debabataran', express the poet's feelings of joy and happiness, as well as an elated sense of bliss as related to factors of human life and living.

The first poem 'Nababasanta bhabana' (The thoughts on the new spring) has four sequences. First it welcomes the spring, the king of seasons, that has brought sweetness and youth and has put new life everywhere including nature. In this context the poet's attention is drawn to his own melancholic condition, to a life ridden with disease and passion, almost a dead life. But as he broods, suddenly the wisdom dawns and he starts hearing the melodies of new songs. At the end the poet realizes that he can grow along with the spring, and can break the fetters of temporary life that tortures him and can move into eternal life of joy and happiness, youth and beauty.

Oh, soul, look into your heart
And see the contents of eternal life and eternal beauty
And listen in your heart to the melodies of eternal song.

KUTA-KUTA GITA

The next poem 'E srishti amritamaya he' (Oh, this nectar-filled world) sounds the eternal melodies and points out how all aspects of this world and all factors of human life as well as all the creation of God are full of eternal happiness and immortal beauty which like a pot of nectar one can drink and be immortal and perpetually youthful. The poet spreads this message of eternal happiness in the next poem 'Nabajugar abhisheka' all around and hopes that the light of love emanating from a divine consciousness should now drown the whole world in great, immortal happiness. But the finest concentration of this 'joy' is seen in 'Rishiprane debabattran', considered as one of the two most remarkable poems that the poet ever wrote and also complementary ones, the other being 'Himalaya udaya utsab' (The festival of dawn in the Himalayas), published 21 years after, in 1912, separately. The poem has 176 lines. The poem begins with an account of the dawn, beautiful and sublime, breaking over the distant Himalayan mountain, viewed from the bank of the river Saraswati. The glow of light spreads like expanding illumination till the 'dew decorated' beautiful earth wakes up at the touch of the dawn. Now among others, while standing on the bank of the Saraswati, in the midst of forests and surrounding mountains, a young rishi, a fine personality, welcomes the dawn and his heart tunes with the divine beauty of the quiet, silent sky. The rishi feels transported to a great, divine joy, and as his heart sings, he sings the hymn to that divine source from which all music and beauty emanate, and whose immortal touch frees the human soul from its deadness, and elevates it to limitless joy and happiness.

'Kusumanjali' not only belongs to the great tradition of Oriya poetry but contributes substantially to it, and has been a potential influence on subsequent Oriya poetry till today.

KUTA (Maithili) is a type of literary riddle. It is often a manipulation of arithmetical numbers or that of abstruse meanings of words. The earliest kuta is known to have been written by Vidyapati himself. Generally, however, kuta is found in sophisticated communities as part of folklore for purposes of recreation, or as an instrument to test the mental and linguistic abilities of some one usually the newly wed bridegroom or members of his party on the occasion of a marriage.

KUTA GITA (Marathi). The moment we begin to think of the unique, medieval Marathi songs called 'kuta gitas', we start thinking in terms of the metaphysical conceits of the 17th century English poets. No doubt, in these kuta songs there are concepts of medieval metaphysical thinking as was prevalent in Maharashtra from the 13th century upto the beginning of the 20th century. There were many different schools of thought dominant in the centuries preceding the 13th century. Yet, from the time of the rise of Jnaneshvara and the 'vrakari', cult in Maharashtra, most of the prominent saints, thinkers and 'holy men' followed the 'Kevala advaita' tenets of metaphysical thought as promulgated by Acharya Shankara. Thus, the concepts that we come across in the kuta gitas, are basically those of advaita vedanta, even when the poets followed the path of 'saguna bhakti'. As a matter of fact this duality was inevitable. As these songs were meant to stimulate thinking and to prepare the masses to understand the peculiar mystic concepts, the saintpoets used simpler and more easily conceivable allegories, analogies and metaphors to illustrate them. But the kuta gitas indulged in riddles. Not ending the proposition with reductio absurdum, they started to weave the riddle with absurdum and ended, or, either arrived at the end, with the right 'nyaya-siddha' (proved by the ancient rules of nyaya-logic) solution of the riddle (the kuta prashna) set forth in the song. We come across such songs even in the 'gatha' collection of Jnaneshvara. As is apparent, these songs with riddles are basically different from the otherwise straight forward metaphysical metaphors and analogies. The actual solution is not revealed in so many clear words, but is suggested, and in many of such riddle-songs, the listeners are advised to seek the blessings of the 'guru', who is fully conversant with the mystic meaning of these so-called riddles. To illustrate this we can only refer to the kuta songs of Jnaneshvara, Namadeva, Ekanatha and Muktabai, the knowledgeable little sister of Jnaneshvara.

Jnaneshvara has at least half a dozen songs in which such riddling details are used. The most famous of them all is the following song:

'Katyachya anivari vasale gaon' (On the pin-end of a thorn, three villages are settled). It goes on: "Of the three village, two are barren, and one could not be well-inhabited. Three potters come to stay in the uninhabited three villages, two of the three potters were disabled and the third one did no work on the potters' wheel". Thus, the chain of apparently contradictory situations is carried on. But when we expect quod erat demonstrandum (Q.E.D.), we get only the assurance from these great thinkers that "Yacha to anubhava sadguru vanchuni kalechina" (The truthful solution of this puzzling catechism cannot be had without the blessings of the real Guru).

The obvious context is that of the mystic concept of the creation of the universe. The pin-point of the thorn here means the minutest of the minute—'Anoh aniyani', i.e. the ultimate Reality, and then the two of the three worlds of Hindu genesis, then the triplet of the godheads, and so on and so forth. Nothing comes out of nothing, and so the external creation is evanescent; only Brahma is the Truth and Reality.

Muktabai's kuta song is in the form of an 'abhanga' Mungi uali akashin. In the Muktabai catalogues a series of miracle born out of apparent 'absurdities'. "The ant flies to the sky and swallows the dazzling sun", then Muktabai exclaims "Thora, navalava jahala" (What great miracle is taking place). In the end, the fly begets a big bird like the kite and, seeing all these impossible happenings, Mukta only smiles knowingly.

Namadeva's riddle-song is of the same type. It says 'Mungi vyali, shinge zalio (The ant is in birth pangs, and begets a big horned animal a cow). The mother's breast-milk fills eighteen barrels, and twelve elephants go on drinking it'. The burden of the song is suggestive "Amhi latakun--nabolun (vartamaan khote)"—(We are jokingly uttering false happenings, only to suggest a reality that is true). Of course, the whole riddling yarn that is spun in the lengthy song is all based on absurdities. Such metaphysical riddles are found also in other songs of Namadeva.

Ekanatha's kuta songs are by far the most famous. One of them runs like this "Chinchechya panavari deula rachilen; Aadhin kalasa, maga paya re" (A temple is built on a tiny leaf of the tamarind tree; and, lo! its golden pinnacle was built first and the foundation came afterwards upon it). Then, in the burden of the song the poet says, "Listen to the teaching of the Sadguru, oh Khelia" (a bhakta sojourner, the co-seeker of knowledge). Here, too, impossible things are said to have happened, only to be explained by the true preceptor. Ekanatha's other songs also contain some such mystic topsy-turvisms. One illustration will suffice in which the poet deals with some absurd things. "Duli gaya, hulishinge, wasarun zalen kosen", and then he invokes Rama for the real truth of the matter. This is the topsyturvydom which is very famous in Ekanatha's song: "Thus, the suggestive sign in Natha's realm is upside down".

Ramadasa's 'Dafaganen' is a question put to the complacent Dafagana singers wherein the riddle of the genesis of the universe is referred to.

The Vedantic genesis of the universe and the yogic exercises like awakening the mystic 'Kundalini' and other mystic centres in the human physique, provide ample material for such songs. Thus, many other poets have attempted such riddle-songs. The explanation is always based on the spritual 'anubhava' (mystic experience) which is possible only with proper guidance of the 'knowing' Guru—the 'knowing' in terms of the perceptions of the five organs of the human body. The ultimate 'knowledge' of the All-pervading being is said to be beyond the ken of the human perception! Thus, this 'realization' or 'anubhava' of the ultimate Reality remains essentially a mystic affair. Only the initiated can aspire to attain it. The kuta songs could only spur the mind of the curious ones. The other listeners could only hear or listen to a series of popular details of everyday life, employed by the seer poets to arouse the latent 'atman' to seek union with the 'Parama Atman' the Universal Soul.

KUTBAN (Hindi) is said to have flourished during the last quarter of 15th and the first half of 16th century. In the tradition of medieval romantic (Premakhyanak) Hindi poetry Kutban enjoys remarkable fame. The complete life history of Kutban is yet to be traced and established in the history of Hindi literature.

The only work of Kutban is Mrigavati (1503). On the basis of textual evidence it may be inferred that the poet had completed Mrigavati on the 7th September, 1503, and the work was completed in two months and ten days. Kutban belonged to the Suhrovardi sect of sufism. He refers in Mrigavati to his teacher Sheikh Burhan as a Suhrovardi sectarian. he seems to have been active in the time of Hussain Shah Sharqi, the king of Jaunpur, who appears to have been the patron of the poet.

Mrigavati is a love-story of Raj Kunwar of Chandra-giri and Mrigavati, a beautiful princess of Kanchanpur, whom he married. However, he was already married to Rupmini, the princess of Subodhiya. Raj Kunwar was very fond of hunting. Once while hunting, the wounded tiger fatally attacked Raj Kunwar. Both his wives performed 'sati'. Thus, this love story is a touching tragedy. However, the end of this love story is very much unlike the Indian tradition as it culminates into tragic death.

In this work the poet has depicted the sufi concept of love. The heroine and the hero in this story symbolise the Almighty God and a sufi devotee respectively. The pursuit of Raj Kunwar for Mrigavati represents the spiritual journey of a sufi devotee. The poet has used the traditional poetic motifs for the logical development of the story. He has also depicted the unnatural and supernatural elements of heighten the interest and the curiosity of the readers

Though the depiction of the physical beauty, the agony of separation in love and its expression in the form of 'Barahmasa', and 'Shadritu' are traditional. These form the impressive features of Mrigavati. The description of magnificent buildings, forts, feasts and festivals have added to the charm of this work.

So far as the poetic form is concerned, Mrigavati is a 'saras katha kavya' (metrical romance) in which the poet has very successfully co-ordinated the masnavi style of description and the technique of 'karvakant ghata' of traditional Indian literature. In a 'karvak' (a stanza) the poet has used five 'ardhalis' (two rythmical lines of a Hindi metre 'chaupai' or 'aril') and at its end the poet has placed a Hindi metre couplet ('doha' and 'sortha'), or 'gatha' (a couplet) traditional metre of Prakrit and Apabhramsha.

The use of different figures of speech in this work elevates both the expression and the content.

The poetic diction of Mrigavati is 'Avadhi', popular language of the masses of that time. The poet has used popular words of Sanskrit, Apabhramsha, Arabic, Persian and local dialects. The use of common idioms and proverbs have made the expression more effective and impressive.

KUTIYATTAM

Thus, Mrigavati is a work of historic importance because of its impact on later sufi poetry in Hindi both in content and craftsmanship.

KUTIYATTAM (Malayalam), is the traditional Sanskrit theatre of Kerala. Kutiyattam is the only extant form of classical Sanskrit theatre in India. Kuttu and kutiyattam are performed by a distinct community called chakyars, and the performance was done in 'kuttampalam', the theatre-house attached to temples.

The terms 'kuttu' and 'chakyar' are referred to in Silappadikaram, an ancient Tamil text. Kuttu and kutiyattam seem to have existed in a rudimentary form for a long time, but they got wider appreciation and more scope during the reign of Kulasekhara Varman (A.D. 978-1036), a ruler of Kerala who possessed unusual artistic talents. He wrote two plays Subhadra Dhananjaya and Tapatisamvarana which were adapted for the theatre of kutiyattam. The great king might have made some modifications in kutiyattam to make it more refined and popular. His court poet Tolan (Atula) was a good scholar, humourist and poet. With his help Kulasekhara Varma re-formed the Sanskrit drama, in the light of the then existing form. The king wrote 'Vyangavyakhya' for his two plays, they present the artistic and aesthetic element of kutiyattam. The innovation made during that period are—(i) In addition to the existing oral performance of the Vidushaka, Sanskrit verses and dialogues and their interpretations in Malayalam and 'pratishlokas' (verses to equate the Sanskrit verses of the text) were incorporated. (ii) More detailed Angika-sattwika abhinaya style were adopted. (iii) A convention called 'nirvahana'—elaboration of previous stories—also was added. To help the actors, 'attaprakara' (Methodology of presentation of kutiyattam) and 'kramadipika' (suggestions to the actors with regard to the action) for various plays were also prepared.

The main temples have kuttampalams inside the campus, constructed according to the prescriptions in the Natya shastra. Important kuttampalams are in the temples at Trichur, Perumanam, Irinjalakkuda, Kitangur, Hari-pad and Guruvayur. There are many others also and all of them might have been built between the 12th and 18th centuries A.D. The kuttampalams are constructed with the enormous artistic skill and mathematical perfection and according to traditional concepts. One kuttampalam was constructed recently in the premises of the Kerala Kalamandalam.

The main families of the Chakyar community which perform kuttu and kutiyattam are Kuttancheri, Amman-nur, Valiya Parisha, Evur, Mekkat, Mani and Koypa.

Basic texts usually accepted for presenting kutiyattam are the following:- Bhasa's Pratima, Abhishaka, Pratijna, Swapnavasavadatta, Dutaghatotkakacha, Dutavakya, Pancharatra, Karnabhara, Avimaraka, Balacharita, Char-udatta, Urubhanga, Madhyamavyayoga, Shaktibhadra's Ascharya chudamani, Kulasekhara Varma's Subhadra Dhananjaya and Tapatisamvarana, Harsha's Nagananda, Mahendravikrama Pallava's Mattavilasa, Bodhayana's Bhagavadajjukiya and Nikantha's Kalyanasaugandhika. Plays like Shakuntala also were chosen rarely. Angika, vachika, aharya and sattvika abhinaya styles are adopted in kutiyattam. Elaborate angikabhinaya is the peculiar characteristic of this art and hence presenting even one whole act of the play in a night's time is practically impossible. Sophisticated and stylised action is essential to this form. Vachika becomes elaborate when the Vidushaka has a part to play as in Shakuntala or Subhadradhananjaya. He takes all sorts of mythological, social, historical and contemporary themes and presents them as coherently and interestingly as possible for the audience. The Vidushaka's utterances are humorous, and they reflect the degenerated brahmin society of medieval Kerala. The term 'kutiyattam' does not merely mean the combined action of various actors, it denotes also the action of a character who presents various roles with minor indications of change from one to another. For example the actor who plays the role of Rama in 'Ascharyachudamani' may have to adopt the guise of Sita (without any change in costume) or Lakshmana. This is a convention peculiar to kutiyattam. For example the actor who plays the role of Rama in Ascharyachudamani may have to present the role of Rama in action or of Sita or Lakshmana also and so on.

The verses are sung in a peculiar style and the tone in called 'raga' or 'swara', akin to the style of Vedic chanting. The ragas employed in Kutiyattam are twenty in number: Muddan, Srikanthi, Tond, Arttan, Indalam, Muralindalam, Veladhuli, Danam, Tarkan, Viratarkan, Korakurinj, Pourali, Puranir, Dukhagandharam, Chetipanchamam, Bhinnapanchamam, Srikamaram, Kaisiki, Ghattantari and Antari. These ragas are employed so as to express different emotions. The common orchestra includes 'mizhavu' and 'kuzhi talam'. Mizhavu is played by a Nambiar for certain auspicious occasions, instruments like 'kurumkuzhal', 'idakka' and 'shankhu' are also played. The main talas employed are Eka, Dhruva, Tripata, Champa, Atanta, Chempata, Lakshmi etc.

The aharyabhinaya (costume and make-up as well as stage-setting) of kutiyattam is decorative though simple. The costume includes kirita, kataka, kankana, nupura, etc. The hero's attire is generally named as 'pachcha' or 'minukku', for Ravana and such other characters 'katti', and for Dhirodhata Nayakas and for women characters 'pazhukka'. For flower-decorations Ixora (Ixora Coaccini) is used. The male as well as female characters usually wear reddish full shirts and specialized ornaments. Black colour (kari) is applied for the character of Shurpanakha. A vessel full of paddy, palm leaves, coconuts, banana bunches, etc. are used for decorating the stage. A lamp will be lit in front of the stage and a coloured screen (tirassila) is used at the beginning of the performance and in between the scenes. There are many theatric conventions in presenting kutiyattam like 'nirvahana', 'Purushartham Parayal' etc. The sattvikabhinaya is subtle and there is great scope for it in every role. The mudrabhinaya is also important as far as angikbhinaya is concerned.

Kutiyattam is a complete and elaborate presentation of Sanskrit drama. With its long tradition and heritage kuttu and kutiyattam exist in a closed circle even now. But undoubtedly it can be said that this classical art form deserves the deeper attention of students and scholars. It excels kathakali in many respects and the 'natyadharini' (stylized acting) of kutiyattam is unique. It is the only extant form of Sanskrit drama in India, conforming to the technique and genre established by Bharata Muni through his Natya shastra.

KUTIYOZHICKAL (Malayalam) is a long poem written by Velloppilli Sridhara Menon which appeared serially in the Mathrubhumi Weekly during 1949-50 and published in book form in 1952. This is considered to be the poet's masterpiece. The poem is in the form of a monologue which presents the conflicting emotions of the writer who cherishes the age-old values steeped in his tradition and also his sympathies with the working class from whom, temperamentally he keeps a safe distance. The word 'kuti' means both 'drunkenness' and a 'hut'. The combined word means eviction or stopping the habit of drinking and/or both.

The poet does not get any peace of mind in his house. His poetic concentration is shattered by the abuses heard from the neighbouring hut where a drunken labourer and his tenant live. He warns that either he has to stop drinking or he will be evicted. The tenant sorrowfully looks at him. The poet of turns to himself and asks: "Who is drunk? He or you? Get rid of your drunkenness lest he should evict you from the false paradise of your intoxicated imagination."

The poet who is infatuated by the beauty of a poor village belle yearns for her. He wants to prove by marrying her that he is capable of genuine love for the poor. Sensing the poet's fascination for the girl, the tenant loudly chides her as one "selling honour to fill the belly".

Hurt by this double-edged dirty remark, the poet examines the real intention behind his love. He is convinced that courage and idealism exist only in imagination and that in his heart of heart his love for the village dame is only a craving for free pleasure with scant regard for the victim.

Now the tenant's hut catches fire in an accident when a lad lights a bidi. The tenant is in a rage. With knife in hand, he accuses the landlord of having intentionally burnt his hut. The poet displaying moral courage, asks him to thrust the knife into his innocent chest if he so believes. This has its intended effect; with head lowered, the tenant walks away. But the poet asks himself, "Can you honestly absolve yourself of this crime? Your flaming anger was the real cause of the fire. The poor boy lighting a bidi only fulfilled your desire" The landlord, instead of building another hut for him, gives him a meagre compensation to build one elsewhere and evicts him. He drinks away the money.

What the poet proves through these thoughts is that genuine love of the middle-class intellectual for the working class has proved a mirage in the face of baseless reality. Even a conscious sympathizer rebels at their life style and value system.

The poem later takes an unexpected turn. On a stormy night the poet stands near the newly-built hut of his old tenant. A sudden storm and terrible torrents lash the scene. Women with illegitimate foetuses in hand, men in chains, the tortured, the starving and the murdered all rise from the bosom of the earth. They identify the poet as the fiend and run after him. He tries to run away, but his legs do not obey him. The family deities do not answer his prayers; perhaps they too have fled. The poet opens his chest and takes out his heart to show that he sincerely loves them. The girl he loved spits into it and the labourer squeezes it into a bowl of toddy and gulps it down declaring:

"Ha, I diluted my toddy,
With concentrated he today "

The storm passes away. A brave new world is built by the revolutionaries. The poet welcomes this world. He congratulates the bravery with which the Gordian knot which the middle class had tried to untie was cut by the working class in a single stroke. But he doubts if this short cut is enduring. He had hoped for a better solution; but now it seems futile. He warns: "Violence begets violence. Let the sword now sleep in its sheath, let the path of love open the doors of heaven before you".

This long poem written in a musical folk metre of ten syllables in a line is full of rare imagery and mellifluous diction.

KUTTANIMATA (Sanskrit) is a work on bawd women by

KUTTANIMATA

Damodaragupta. It should however be noted that the work does not deal with prostitutes as such but sounds a note of warning against their wiles.

Damodaragupta is quoted extensively in anthologies like the Subhashitavali, Suktimuktavali, alankara treatises like the Kavyaprakasha, Alamkarasarvasva, the grammatical work Durghatavritti, in the Panchatantra, Kshirasvamin's commentary on the Namalinganushasana, etc. Padmashri of Padmashrijnana, the Buddhist author, in his Nagarasarvasva, a work on erotics, mentions the Kuttanimata. This testifies to the high reputation and authoritative character of the work. It seems that the work lost popularity and ceased to be studied from the thirteenth century onward. The reason for this conjecture is that Manikyachandra and other commentators of the Kavyaprakasha appear to have been unable to identify the poet in respect of the verses quoted from the Kuttanimata. Some commentators have wrongly attributed the verses to other poets.

It was in the year 1883 that Peterson came across a fragmentary manuscript, called Shambhalimata (Advice of a procuress). Two more worn out manuscripts were discovered by Durgaprasad in 1886. The work was first published in the Kavyamala Series. In it not less than 132 verses were missing.

H.P. Sastri found a complete manuscript in Nepal in Bengali characters; the date of copying corresponded to 1172. It is, perhaps, the earliest manuscript in Bengali script.

In 1903 Meyer published a translation of the work along with that of Kshemendra's Samayamatrika under the title Mores et Amores Indorum.

In 1914, the French scholar, Louis de Langle, translated into French both those works and they together were published in or about 1920 under the titles Les Lecons de l'Entre-melleuse and Le Brreviaire de la courtisane. Some scholars in collaboration, published an English translation under the title Lessons of a Bawd (Kuttanimata). Other editions of the work are by T.M. Tripathi (1924), Bibliotheca Indica edition (1944), T.N. Ray (1960). The Rasadipika is a well-known commentary on the work.

A courtesan, named Malati, lives at Varanasi. Finding herself unable to attract people, she seeks the advice of Vikarala who is old but experienced. Vikarala advises her to tempt Chintamani, son of a prominent official, and gives a detailed description of the art of attracting people and earning money. To make her instruction impressive she recounts the story of the courtesan, Haralata, and Sudarshana. She also narrates the story of the dancing girl, Manjari, and king Samarabhata of Varanasi. Manjari is said to have staged the drama, Ratnavali, by Harsha, ensnared him by her wiles, and fleeced him, leaving him a destitute.

The Kuttanimata was, perhaps, composed by the poet in his mature age; the work reveals his knowledge of literature, grammar, philosophy, politics, erotics, smriti, ayurveda, purana, archery, horselore, painting, music, dramaturgy, logic, etc.

The work is erotic-comic; the satirical element is commendable. In the story of Haralata and Sudarshana there is a mixture of the erotic and the pathetic. The art of feigned love has been depicted in an attractive manner. Through an unsavoury theme the author draws some social pictures which are true to life. The work is didactic inasmuch as it warns the reader against the wiles and machinations of disreputable women. The satirical element occurs in the delineation of the coquetry and blandishments of such women. The style is lucid and elegant. Long compounds are rare. There are a few comparatively less known words, but it is not difficult to understand them. The author, however, shows off his rhetorical skill and knowledge of the science of erotics. The work deserves to be ranked among the best poems as it is highly suggestive.

The poet delineates various characters with vividness, so much so that some of them seem to have been his contemporaries. The descriptive power of the poet is obvious.

The dominant sentiment is 'shringara'. Various facets of this have been delineated with masterly skill; the other sentiments are 'karuna', 'hasya', 'bhayanaka' and 'shanta'.

Hemachandra, in his Kavyanushasanaviveka, characterises the work as 'nidarshanakavya' as it describes the activities of rakes, rogues and rascals, etc. Some would like to designate it as 'laghukavya' (as it briefly narrates those things which are described in mahakavya), 'khandakavya' (as it contains the same matter up to the end), 'kelikavya' (as it describes sports). It is rightly suggested that, as it is a poetical presentation of Vatsyayana's chapter on prostitutes, it can be called a 'shastrakavya' or 'kavyashastra'.

The work is written throughout in arya metre. The work reveals the influence of sexology in relation to courtesans, elaborately dealt with in Vatsyayana's Kamasutra (Vaishikadhikarana). There is open description of carnal pleasures and the amatory intrigues resorted to by courtesans.

A comparative study of the Vaishikadhikarana of the Kamasutra and the present work reveals similarity as well as difference between the two. For example, Damodara speaks only of the harlot of the 'ekaparigraha' type (attached to one person) and leaves out 'anekaparigraha' and 'aparigraha', the latter is, however, referred to in connection with the conversation between a harlot and a king in course of the description of prostitutes' quarters in the stories of Haralata and Manjari.

The work has some sociological importance. It appears to reflect on the moral degeneration of contemporary Kashmir which is attested by Kalhana. Besides, in the story of Manjari at the end, we find considerable information about the histrionic art, hunting and other aspects of society.

KUTTIKRISHNA MARAR, (Malayalam; b. 1900, d. 1973), eminent literary critic, took his Sahitya Shiromani title in Sanskrit in 1923 from the Sanskrit College at Pattampi. Early in his career, Marar came under the influence of the famous Malayalam poet, Vallattol Narayana Menon and another poet and theosophist, Nalappattu Narayana Menon, the latter almost changing the young scholar's outlook on life and letters. During this period he wrote his first work, Sahityabhushanam, which, though printed (1928), could not be released. The book was published only in 1965. This maiden literary attempt although not of a high standard, did reveal some of the traits of his style and his unique approach to the established beliefs, which in subsequent works brought him fame and acclaim. In Sahityabhushanam, Marar raises doubts about the position of Anandavaradhana in Sanskrit poetics. He also questions the assumptions of Bhashabhushanam (1902), a very popular elementary text book on rhetorics in Malayalam, written by the well-known literary theorist, A.N. Raja Rajavarma. Thus his first appearance on the literary scene as a challenger of traditional notions, gave him a unique place amongst the literary practitioners of the day.

From 1938 to 1961, he worked as a proof-reader for Mathrubhumi in Calicut. It was during this period that most of his notable works on criticism were produced.

As a critic he approached life and letters in his own way. He could not reconcile himself to the fast changing values. Instead, to his last breath, he clung to certain perennial principles which alienated him from the 'Progressive Literary Movement' that was sweeping through Kerala in the forties and the fifties of the 20th century. If there was any critic whom the leftist writers feared and secretly admired, it was Kuttikrishna Marar. The torrential and often pretentious leftist pronouncements infuriated him, and out came tirades against them from his powerful pen. Marar had a lengthy word-duel on Kalidasa's Abhijnanashakuntala with Joseph Mundasseri, a reputed critic, who was the spokesman of the Progressive Literature in Malayalam. He was daringly outright in exposing the weakness of the character of Rama of Valmiki (Rajankanam, 1940) which zealous devotees are bound to overlook. His excursions into the Mahabharata resulted in an illuminating study of the epic, Bharataparyatanam (1950). His prose renderings of Kalidasa's Kumarasambhava, Raghuvamsha, Meघaduta and Abhijnanashakuntala went a long way in popularising Kalidasa's works in Kerala.

Since Marar had a fastidious and rigid standard of ethics and aesthetics, many of the stalwarts in Malayalam literature through the age like Tunchattu Ezhuttacchan, Kunchan Nampiar, G. Sankara Kurup and Changampuzha Krishna Pillai fell short of his ideal. But when a writer rose up to his expected standard he never hesitated to extol his works in unequivocal terms.

His prose style is almost inimitable. Even those who disagree with him cannot but be fascinated by his style of writing, marked by brevity, logic and precision. His Malayalashaili (The idiom of Malayalam, 1942) deals with the basic principles of Malayalam prose writing and is considered an effective practical guide to the same. In Vrittashilpam (1952), a work of great originality on Malayalam metres, Marar refuted the earlier theory of syllabic patterning as the basis of metrical differences in native poetry and argued that 'tala' (rhythm) alone differentiated it from non-metrical compositions.

In the last years of his life, Marar turned to Vedanta. His main preoccupation during these years was to give fresh interpretations to the Upanishads and the Gita.

KUTTIKRISHNAN, P.C. (Malayalam; b. 1915, d. 1979), who adopted the pen-name, 'Urub', was a short-story writer and novelist. After secondary school education he worked as teacher, chemist, clerk and also as editorial assistant for the Malayalam literary magazine, Mangalodayam. From 1950 to 1974, a period of prolific literary activity, he had been a staff artist and later a Producer for All India Radio, Calicut. He was the Vice-President of Kerala Sahitya Akademi during 1974-77 and was nominated as President in 1978, which position he held till his sudden death. His novel, Ummachchu (1955), received the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1958 and another novel of his, Sundarikalum sundaranmarum (1960) fetched the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1960.

He began his literary career as a short-story writer. Soon he turned to writing novels. Ummachchu, which was serialized in Matrubhumi weekly in the early fifties brought him to the forefront of fiction-writing in Malayalam. This was soon followed by another novel, Sundarikalum sundaranmarum (which was also serialised in the same periodical. The response from the readers to these two novels was unprecedented.

Ummachchu, one of the best novels by Urub, though basically a tale of the eternal triangle of love, was so realistic that the characters became household names to the reading public. The story opens with Ummachchu, a Muslim girl, befriending two boys of the same community, Biran and Mayan, the former affluent and the latter poor. The characters of the boys are diametrically opposite, Biran being soft-spoken and mild and Mayan aggressive and self-assertive. Days pass by to see Ummachchu marrying Biran and Mayan disappearing from the scene. A boy is born to the couple. Mayan, meanwhile, returns a rich man to the village. The burning infatuation privately nursed by him all these years, turns him into a murderer. Ummachchu's son was a silent witness to the ghastly killing of his father. The boy grows up hating his mother and Mayan, who has become his step-father. Against this background Urub takes the story into a series of episodes wherein each participant is caught in the knotted coils of conflicting emotions. Ummachchu emerges as a woman of classical proportions, stalking across the vale of darkness swept by storm arising from within and finally surrendering herself to fall along the lonely precipice of death.

Sundarikalum sundaranmarum (The pretty women and handsome men) is a more ambitious work. It has some traits of a period novel, as the story is set against the background of the pre-Independence years. The period, however, forms only a back-drop for the individuals parading in the story. Urub presents a wide variety of characters in this novel each endowed with a distinctive individuality. The theme is a long sequence of conflicting emotions and outlooks and defies summarisation in a few sentences.

Urub has created several memorable characters in his novels and short-stories. One among them, the Maulavi (The Muslim preacher), appears as an affable, mischievous wise man bubbling with rustic humour. In stories like Ponnu tukkunna tulassu and Moulaviyum changatimarum, this Maulavi is the central character who could easily be compared to the archetypal wise man of folklore.

Urub was at his best when he dealt with Muslim themes. A good portion of his literary output revolves around the Muslim community of South Malabar. He could reproduce the Muslim dialect of Malayalam so well in his creations that many readers in the beginning took him to be a Muslim. His pen name 'Urub', an Arabic word meaning 'sunset', added strength to the above misunderstanding.

Urub kept away from political affiliations. He had a philosophical awareness of the tragedy of human life and the revolutionary's keen susceptibility to the myriad subtle ways by which the strong exploit the weak. These two traits blended in him into a mellowness and equanimity of vision which expresses itself as compassion. In spite of human beings' wickedness, frivolity and helplessness, Urub presented them as lovable characters in his stories. He always directed his attention to the brighter side of human life. Never for a moment does he climb the pulpit to sermonise nor does he retire to the solitary grey eminence of philosophy.

Though Urub was essentially a realist, a streak of romanticism runs through all his stories. His love of humanity could have landed him in exaggerated sentimentalism but he always examined life around him with a sense of subtle rustic humour as that of his own creation, the Maulavi, referred to above. Only in one small novel (Ammini) did he attempt to deal with a psychological theme. Though he has come out successful in this attempt, it could very well be said that psychological themes are not his forte.

In the history of the twentieth century fiction, Urub, no doubt, would occupy a place amongst the top three or four. His works include sixteen collections of short-stories, eight novels, two books for children, three collections of one-act plays and a collection of essays.

KUTTIKUNJU TANKACHI (Malayalam; b. 1820, d. 1908). Born in Vilavankoda taluk as the daughter of the illustrious poet and composer Irayimman Tampi, Kuttikunju Tankachi or Lakshmi Pillai as she was originally known, was taken, while only three months old, to Trivandrum where she lived the rest of her long, quiet life. From her father she learnt Tamil and Malayalam and later had advanced lessons in Sanskrit, having been initiated into it by Kochunni Varier, the guru of the then Maharaja of Travancore. She began to evince interest in music and to compose poems at the age of 14. The result was that she authored three 'attakkathas', three 'kilippattus', three 'tiruvatira' songs and a number of kirtanas in praise of the Hindu deities. Most of her works bear testimony to her extraordinary poetic talent and musical acumen, and her 'kuratti' songs have had the distinction of being the best in the genre. All the three Maharajas, Uthram Tirunal, Ayilyam Tirunal and Vishakhham Tirunal, whose reigns her life spanned, were quick to discern and generous enough to reward her special gifts and achievements. No wonder she is still regarded as one of the greatest poetesses in Malayalam.

KUTTU (Malayalam) is a recital-cum-exposition conducted in the temples of Kerala by persons belonging to a community known as Chakyar. Kuttu is also known as 'chakyarkuttu' or 'prabandhakkutu'. In the former, the performer is indicated whereas in the latter the text

KUTTU-TAMIL

(prabandha) is mentioned. 'Chakyar' is derived from 'shakya' according to one view. Another view has it connected with the Sanskrit 'shlaghyagir' (one with excellent speech). The origin of the second term is in the tradition that some brahmin families were assigned the task of expounding texts and telling stories. These were then called 'shlaghyagirs' which later became chakyars. The origin of the term from 'shakya' is more probable for several reasons. We have literary evidence which indicates the performanc of kuttu in the early Kerala kingdom prior to its temple-orientation under brahmin auspices.

Kuttu, in its identifiable history was performed in temples in halls known as 'kuttambalam' specially built for the purpose. Several temples in Kerala have still these kuttambalams which, as the rules demand, are within the precincts of temples.

In the kuttu performance the Chakyar is aided by a member of the Nambiyar community and his wife known as Nannyar will act with the Chakyar.

The instruments used in kuttu are a drum 'mizhavu' the conch ('shankhu'), a small drum ('itaykka') and a pipe.

In the early periods of its history, kuttu perhaps consisted only in the story-telling. Later, texts known as prabandhas were used. The costumed Chakyars would recite the verses and expound the meaning. In expounding these texts the Chakyar had the license to bring in any contemporary event or person for comment as part of the exposition. No one, however, had the right to protest. Kuttu thus performed a salutary function of social criticism.

The texts used by the Chakyars in kuttu were prose-cum-verse compositions both in Sanskrit and Malayalam. Melpattur Narayana Bhattatiri (16th century), author of the famous devotional poem. Narayaniyam, also wrote a number of Sanskrit prabandhas for use in kuttu. There were other authors, too, who supplied texts in Malayalam.

King Kulashekara (10th century), himself a playwright in Sanskrit, introduced several reforms in kuttu and kutiyattam. He was assisted in this task by a brahmin counsellor named Tolan noted for his poetic talents, wit and humour. The permission to use Malayalam also in the performance of kutiyattam and the stressing of humour in kuttu were among these reforms. With these reforms the performance became spiritually closer to the people.

These temple arts are now on the decline since the social and economic conditions which nourished them have been on the decline. Modern education and availability of other more popular avenues of entertainment have elbowed them out from the patronage of the people. However, in recent times there have been some notable performers, like Kuttancheri Eravi Chakyar and Mani Madhava Chakyar. There have also been a few art groups working towards a revival.

KUTTU (Tamil) is prevalent more as an art form than a literary genre. The word was associated with certain dramatic dances of the folk variety from which drama developed later. The open air theatre was called kuttupottal, the enclosed theatre, kuttuk kalari, the songs in the drama, kuttuppattu and so on.

The first reference to kuttu is found in Tolkappiyam. Tunankaikkuttu, munter kuravai and pinter kuravai are mentioned in it. These were victory dances connected with war. But in the Sangam literature, tunankai and kuravai were danced by even young girls.

Silappadikaram and Manimekalai gave certain other names like sakkaikkuttu, vinodakkuttu, chandikkuttu, vallikkuttu, vitutakkuttu and vachaikkuttu. The eleven different dances of the former epic, viz., alliyam, kotukot-kataiyam, poti and pavai are all considered to be kuttu kataiyam, poti and pavai are all considered to be kuttu depicting mythological incidents.

The commentary on Silappadikaram by Atiyarkku Nallar is a treasure house on kuttu. Kuttu is severally divided into various groups here as vachaikkuttu, pukalk-kuttu; vettiya, potuvai; varikkuttu, varichchandikkuttu; chandikkuttu, vinodakkuttu, ariyakkuttu, tamilkkuttu; iyalpukkuttu, tecikakkuttu. A list of hundred different kuttus is also provided by him.

Availability of certain treatises and knowledge of many extinct treatises on kuttu, had enabled this commentator to give such magnificent materials. Paratam, Akattiyam, Muruval, Sayantam, Cheyirriyam, Kunanul, Parata chena patiyam, Mativanan natakattamil nut were such works. The commentaries of Yapparunkalam and Tolkappiyam have also given certain other treatises as Shantam and Vilakkattar kuttu. U.V. Swaminathaiyar refers to one, Shuddhanantapparakasham, to explain certain akakkuttu.

Vanchippattu, Motirappattu and Katakantu mentioned in the Tolkappiyam commentary might be the earliest kuttu literature, but they are lost to us.

The remainder of this rich tradition is seen in the folk-kuttu of the Tamils. Most of these are kaniyan kuttu, played during day time also. Mythology, and sometimes folk life form the content of most of the kuttus, and mostly, only men play even women's parts. Later this changed and woman also played the roles in them.

Terukkuttu gets its name from its being acted on the street without stage or curtain. Kaniyan kuttu is acted by a particular caste and hence the name. It resolves round village folk-deities. These are acted in village temple festivals of Nellai and Kanyakumari districts of Tamil Nadu.

Pavaikkuttu (puppetry) has the two types: pommalat-

KUTUMBA RAO, KODAVATIGANTI-KUVALAYAMALA

tam and nizhalattam. In the former, dolls are used at the end of ropes, while in the latter leather dolls are used with a white screen in front and lamp at the back to effect shadow play. Mostly the Ramayana story is acted. From India, this leather puppet shadow play has gone to Java, Sumatra, Borneo, Bali, Siam and Cambodia.

Kambar kuttu of Kerala is a variety of puppetry held in December-January at the temples of Bhagavati of Central Kerala. This kuttu describes the Ramayana according to the '12026' viruttam of Kamban and hence the name. A mixture of Malayalam and Tamil is seen in the recital.

Kalaikkuttu (acrobatics on the bamboo pole) has no story content, but is a very ancient art.

There is no published material or relevant printed matter on these kuttu varieties.

KUTUMBA RAO, KODAVATIGANTI (Telugu; b. 1907, d. 1980) was a noted Telugu novelist, short-story writer and essayist. Educated at Tenali and Varanasi, he left college without taking the M.Sc. Degree. His early stories had traces of Chalam's influence to the extent of pleading for the reform of the institution of marriage and a fresh attitude to woman. Developing a scientific bent of mind and discovering his own analytical approach to men and matters, Kutumba Rao blossomed into a realist and a rationalist even during the period when romanticism held sway in Telugu literature. His novels, Chaduvu, Arunodayam and Gaddu-rojulu (1952), describe graphically the political and social history of two decades, 1915-35. In the sympathetic portrayal of woman, as she is exploited in marriage and outside marriage, in analysing the play of social forces on family, and man-woman relationship in the period between the two World Wars and in the post-Independence era, Kutumba Rao has few equals. The women characters in Ni-kem-kavali, Kulam-leni manis, Enda-mavulu and Maruperlu (1939) being the children of devadasis suffer in the aftermath of social reform abolishing the devadasi institution; the youthful widows in Varasatvam (1961) and Tara (1962) are exploited as a part of the bourgeois milieu; and the five married women in Panchakalyani (1961) reveal five different stories of misery in marriage. Kutumba Rao as a champion of the cause of women inspired the women novelists of 1970-80; but his humanist insight and social analysis have remained unsurpassed. In 1970

Kutumba Rao joined the Revolutionary Writers' Association, and though his creative writing almost ended, he continued to write short essays on literature, on social-awareness and on Marxism, collected in a volume entitled Kalalushastriya vijnanam (1980). His two sequential novels, Bedirina manusulu (1959) and Braduku bhayam (1964), intended in a lighter vein, portray the anti-hero Sitappa, a memorable character, unique and fascinating as a psychological study in self-deprecating defensiveness. Chaduvu is universally acknowledged as Kutumba Rao's best novel. His novel Tara received the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi Award in 1967.

KUVALAYAMALA (Prakrit) is an important champu kaya of the complex 'Mahakatha' type written mainly in Prakrit by Uddyotanasuri, also called 'Dakshinyadhinna', in 779 A.D. at Jhalor (Jabalpur) in Marwar during the time of King Vatsaraja of the Pratiharas. Uddyotanasuri was a Kshatriya, son of Vateshvara and Samprati, and pupil of Haribhadra and Nemichandra. The work contains a wealth of cultural data giving a picture of Indian life in the eighth century A.D., valuable specimens of a number of Prakrit and Apabhramsha dialects and even Paishaci, and several interesting stories following the tales of five souls through several births put in the mouths of several characters in the story. It is a huge work in Prakrit prose interspersed with about 4180 verses, most of them in gatha metre. It is not divided into 'uchchhvasas' or 'lambhas'. It can be called a champu in view of the free admixture of prose and verse and the poetic qualities. Uddyotana calls his work a 'Dharmakatha' of the 'samkirna' type. The term samkirna (complex) is apt because of the complex threads of the story which cover many lives of five souls, the author's richness of information and proficiency in different lores, the varied situations and descriptions, manifold episodes and religio-didactic exhortations, parables, sub-tales and conversations, different poetic flavours and the religious elements seen everywhere in the work.

The work opens with salutations to the great Tirthamkaras; criticism of bad people and praise of the good fellow. The story shows how Kuvalayachandra was born and was carried away by a god, his former associate; how he met the lion, the monk and the god in a lonely forest; how he heard about the past lives of all the five from Kevalin, how they acquired 'samyaktva', practised austerities and were consequently born in heaven; how after enjoying heavenly pleasures, they were born in the Bharatavarsha; how it happened that they did not know one another; how they were enlightened by the omniscient teacher and lastly how they adopted renunciation, practised penances and attained liberation, being free from karmas. The text presents the biography, through a number of births, of five souls who first degraded themselves on account of intense anger (krodha), vanity (mana), deceit (maya), greed (lobha) and infatuation (moha) respectively, but with proper guidance and mutual cooperation and help on the path of religion and practice of penance, attained liberation at the end: (1) Chandasena-Svayambhudeva, (2) Manabhata-Manirathakumara, (3) Mayaditya Mahartha, (4) Lobhadeva-Vajradatta and (5) Mohadatta-Kamagajendra. The author has used every opportunity to introduce details to make the stories worthy of the name of Dharmakatha. In some places he criticises the views of other cults; various tenets and practices of different religious schools are reviewed as inferior to the Jain. There are references to mathas or schools of higher studies where students were trained not only in philosophy and religion but also in fine arts and in the use of weapons. There is a difference of opinion regarding the identity of Vijayapuri in South India, where the hero reached after coming down from the flying horse and later married the heroine. It is often difficult to distinguish facts from fancies in such stories.

An abridged Sanskrit version of the text, called Kuvalayamalakathasamshepa, was made in 1431 by Ratnaprabhasuri, pupil of Paramananda.

KUZHIVELI, MATHYU M. (Malayalam; b. 1905, d. 1974) was a promoter of children's literature in Malayalam, and an author of several books on Education, Popular Science, General knowledge and books for children. After graduation he started his career as a school teacher. Later, he joined Government Service and was connected with the Department of Publications, University of Kerala, for about two decades. He has written sixty-five books and has published nearly three hundred titles through his own publishing house, Balam Publications at Trivandrum. His major achievement was, however, the publication of the first Malayalam Encyclopaedia called Vijnanam in eight volumes (1956-1974) and running to more than ten thousand pages with around two thousand illustrations in them.

LABANGALATA (Manipuri), first published 1939, is a historical novel by Kh. Chaoba Singh. Several editions of the book appeared subsequently. It is based on the anecdotes and episodes centering around Maharaja Khagemba who reigned in Manipur during 1597-1652. The king had a step-brother named Shanongba who was not in good terms with him. Khwairakpa, the younger brother of the king, had a daughter named Kunjalata. She was in love with Labanga, a man in the service of Shanongba. Kunjalata's father strongly disapproved of the match. To avenge this injustice, Shanongba rose against the king and with his men fled away to Cachar. Kunjalata and Labanga also accompanied him. Shanongba then invaded Manipur. But the rebellion was easily put down and in the battle both Shanongba and Labanga were killed. The novel ends in a tragic note with Kunjalata's father begging of her forgiveness and entreating her to return to her home in Manipur.

In style, conception and execution, Labangalata shows definite influences of Bankimchandra's novel, Durgesh-nandini. The novelist takes great liberty in forcing together unconnected historical incidents in order to build up a convincing plot. The imagination has a free play resulting in anachronism. The language has elements of Bengali and Sanskrit.

LABANYABATI (Oriya) is a long narrative poem by Upendra Bhanja (1670-1740). It consists of forty-eight cantos. They are set to different musical modes, viz., basanta, ramkeri, chokhi, kausika, kalyanahari, gujjari, kamodi, sankaravarana, etc. with specific instructions in each case as to how to sing them. As such the work is also famous as a fine melodious composition. The story of Labanyabati is fictional; it deals with love and the desire for union through marriage. The hero, Chandrabhanu, is the son of king Sasisekhar of Kanchi in Karnataka, and the heroine, Labanyabati (who is really a creation of goddess Parvati), is the daughter of king Ratneshwar of Singhal. The poet tells us how they had known each other in their previous births and how they had sacrificed their lives in order to be united later. Now when they grow up, the fame of their youth and beauty spreads everywhere. Labanyabati's almost divine beauty becomes a legend and by common consent she is crowned Empress of the world of beauty. When she comes of age, her father sends messengers far and wide to find a suitable match for her. Through some deft negotiators, such as a mendicant, a magician, a dancer and a parrot, the news of Labanyabati reaches Chandrabhanu. And through them Labanyabati comes to know of Chandrabhanu. After a prolonged process of negotiation, the marriage between the two is fixed and at last consummated in great pomp. The poet describes in detail their conjugal love and happiness. After a brief separation for a year when they suffer great agony of heart, they are united again. Chandrabhanu becomes the king and they live happily hereafter.

As a poem of love with its depiction of love-union, love-act, anxiety and estrangement as well as of the details of physical beauty set to a total musical structure, Labanyabati has few parallels in the whole range of Oriya literature. The poet's main emphasis is on Labanyabati, the woman non-pareil. He describes her beauty and graces in great detail as well as her physical activities and emotional strains related to growth. But the poem is not a simple narrative. Composed in the tradition of the Sanskrit kavyas, it employs a large number of poetic devices. The poet himself is conscious of it when he says at the end that his book is like a 'rich trader's fair' full of innumerable allurements. There is a liberal use of the rhetorical devices such as similes and metaphors. Sometimes a single couplet can suggest multiple meanings related to different gods.

Besides being extremely sensitive to nature (as when he describes the changes in the cycle of season), Upendra Bhanja is also aware of contemporary social habits, manners and customs which he describes. There are in this book continuous references to saws and aphoristic sayings. But there is an overall easy manner in which he can use language appropriate to the occasion and can as easily break up narration with dramatic dialogues. All these go to make Labanyabati not only probably the best work of Upendra Bhanja, but one of the very best in Oriya literature. While setting a new tradition of poetry in Oriya, Upendra Bhanja influenced subsequent Oriya poets for more than a century.

LAD, P.M. (Marathi; b. 1905, d. 1957). Purushattam Mangesh Lad (I.C.S.) was a Marathi poet and critic, Sanskrit scholar and an able administrator. He retired as the 'Secretary of the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting'. He was born at Savantwade, district Ratnagiri. He was educated at Bombay and Cambridge Universities.

Madhuparka (1943) has a learned introduction entitled 'Muktak ani bhavagit' (short poem and lyric). According to Lad, Prachiti (Experience), Prakshobh (Intense emotional explosion), Prasad (Spontaneity), Pratibha (Genius, originality) and Prayatna (Workmanship) are the five components of a popular sentimental lyric. He has traced its origin to Vedic times. His love poetry is thus tinged with a classical coating at places; the rest of his versification is contrived. For example:

Adi Purush to hota raji
Adi streechya vilobhane, ji

Sphure prenana hote taji
Teech aj ge: Purush toch mee

(The first man Adam consented to the first woman Eve's temptation. The inspiration is as yet freshly remembered. Am I not the same man even today. O beloved).

His other works were Krittika (essays) and the biography of Saint Tukaram.

LAD'O (Sindhi) is a form of Sindhi folk-song sung in chorus by women on happy occasions like marriages, sacred-thread ceremonies, etc. In it are reflected the desires, passions, raptures and heart-pangs of women. The word 'lad'o' (pl. lad'a) is derived from the word 'lad', meaning fondling, encompassing sentiments and feelings of love, blandishments and delicacy. Lad'o is also called 'g'achu', 'g'ichu', meaning a verse meant for singing. The words 'g'avan' in Siraiki dialect and 'g'ayo' in the dialect of lower Sindh have the same meaning. In urban areas, it has another name of 'sihro'.

The time when lad'o entered the area of folk-music and came to be sung is not known. However, in it are manifest the signs of man's earliest attempts at verse-making.

Ancient man was a man of many traditional beliefs and early lad'a would have, indeed, been those containing elements of rites and ceremonies performed on various occasions necessitated by such myths and beliefs.

On a rough count, lad'a are of two kinds, viz., those which are sung on various occasions from birth to death, and those which are sung in praise of a god, a goddess, a deity or a saint. During rejoicings, both kinds of lad'a are sung. A desire to be blessed with a son, a vow for having a child, in praise for newly born son, a child's 'munanu' (tonsure), the sacred thread ceremony, a betrothal or a marriage were the occasions when lad'a were sung.

Each occasion has a number of lad'a for different stages and purposes. For example, on a marriage occasion there is a lad'o in praise of a bridegroom, his conduct, virtues and blemishes; another for a bride's pre-marriage seclusion; one for henna-colouring ceremony; one for robes, dresses, ornaments, other marriage articles and their makers; there is a lad'o welcoming guests and close relatives; a lad'o on the marriage procession; a lad'o each for ceremonies such as 'ved'i' (acutal marriage performing rituals), bride taking leave of her parents, her entry in the bridegroom's home, so on and so forth. In brief, there are manifold lad'a for every small as well as big ceremony connected with a marriage.

The marriage-lad'a are of two kinds: those sung at bride's place and the ones sung at the bridegroom's place. However, lad'a or g'icha at bride's place are fewer. In certain sections of the community, there exist lad'a especially composed which are called 'kamana', meaning enchantment and sorcery. By singing such lad'a, bride's people desire to endear, enchant and enslave the groom to the bride, by spell, incantation and bewitchment.

Some lad'a extol or glorify both the bride and her groom. Their beauty is described by the mention of the curly hair, moon-like face, pearl-like teeth, pomegranate lips, rosy cheeks, 'kamal' (lotus) hands, 'kun yun' (lotus stem) arms and 'padam' (white lily) feet. While attributing virtues, a bridegroom is called a courageous darling, a brave man, swan-lad'o (here lad'o means bridegroom), peacock lad'o and so on and so forth. For a bride, adjectives like swinging lad'i (bride), cuckoo lad'i, virtuous lad'i, religious daughter, red bride, nymph bride are used. Bridegrooms and brides are also respectively named after folk-lore heroes and heroines. Examples are abundant, like Punhal lad'o, tactful Rano, Mian Mendhro, brave Dodo, J'arar (mighty) J'am, etc. Similarly, brides are called, Mumala, Sasui, Sorath, Sohini, Lila, Laila, Hira, Shirin. There is also no dearth of witty lad'a full of drollery, banter and jocularly. There are lad'a with sallies variously aimed at grooms, brides, mothers-in-law, fathers-in-law, brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law. However, main victim of such mirthful ridicule always is 'ahinaru' (groom's best man, generally his sister's husband). Oftenly such provocative pleasanties reach the stage of the use of abusive terms. In the past, such abusive lad'a were more common, and considering the occasion, no one would get annoyed or take exception to them.

In general lad'a there are some-times subtle references to sex instincts of husband and wife. In the house, there is spiteful mother-in-law, vulturish father-in-law, husband's jealous brother, and his equally envious wife; lastly, there is his childless sister. Summer is on with all its unbearable heat and insufferable sultriness. Everyone is sleeping in the open courtyard. 'Sodhalu' (bridegroom) is tormented by his sensual urges. 'Mumala' (bride) is shy with modesty. In this situation, how does the couple manoeuvre to reach the terrace or the garden! Such descriptions are plenty.

Not only on marriage occasions, but also while celebrating the festivals like Holi, Dashahera and Diwali, women combine dancing and acting with the singing of lad'a. Women, who take part in the festivity, wear costumes suitable for the part to be played. Then some women sing and others dance and play-act to the tune of the subject-matter. Such lad'a are termed as plays or games.

The verse composition of a lad'o is of a simple nature. The beginning comprises one-and-half or two lines of 'thalu' (refrain) followed by 'antras'. Each stanza is again almost of the same length as that of the refrain. (This kind of structure in the lad'o, it seems, must have been responsible for the formation of a new genre in Sindhi poetry called 'Vai'). The main theme of a lad'o is contained in thalu, the stanzas being just fillings. Often only a name of an ornament, a clothing or a relative is changed and the rest of the line or lines of the thalu are repeated. From the point of view of music as well, in several lad'a the tune of an 'asthai' is the same as that of antra.

Simplicity of such a structure of a lad'o and repetitiveness are both a virtue and a flaw. Its virtue lies in that the repetitive tune and lines are easily grasped by the ordinary women. The apparent flaw is that such frequent repetition makes a lad'o almost devoid of meaningful content or emotive feelings. In some lad'a, even rhyme and metre are not adhered to.

Only a few and simple musical instruments are used as accompaniments. Usually 'thaluhu' (a large flat high-rimmed metal salver) in its inverted position is played on with both the hands, and the rings worn in all the fingers strike against the metal surface producing musical notes. A lad'o never uses 16-matra beat, i.e. 'teentala' or a 12-matra beat, 'ek-tala', or even a 10 matra 'jhap tala', but is satisfied with a 4-matra 'keharuva', or a 6-matra 'dadra' both as 'tala' and as a form. Simple dance rhythms of 4 or 6 beats, variously called 'zanani-vaj'at (womanly play), 'talu-talu' (4 beats) and 'jhamat-talu' (6 beats) are also used.

The language in lad'a is of a special kind. The words generally used by women-folk, plain but charmingly sweet, make the verses of lad'o; it contains small but beautiful lines, heart-stirring and lively sentences, exciting idioms. A treasury of current words from past ages to present times enrich lad'a vocabulary.

As lines change, subject, structure and language also change. Previously, subjects described were mumal's Muslim headgear, cotton brassiere sewn with myriad tiny mirrors, silken petticoat, chikne-ji-choli (Blouse inset with embroidery), 'boski hochhanu' (China-silk sash), 'pishori pag'ri' (Peshawar style turban). Now terms like Singapore sari and a Bombay bell-bottom trouser have also registered their entry. A motor car, a bus, a lorry, a train, a jet-plane have replaced a horse, a camel, a bullock cart and a 'kajao' (Camel carriage).

In lad'a, names of places and regions such as Malir, Multan, Kashmir, Jaisalmer, Thar and Lar, trading centres, roads, riders, markets for various agricultural products and handicrafts are mentioned. Also mentioned are past events, heroes and heroines. Thus, we get glimpses of both geography and history.

A lad'o is saturated with fragrance of Sindh's land and its people, excellence of its language, reasonableness of its customs, usages, manners, beliefs and goodness of society and politics and it has become part and parcel of Sindhi culture.

women-folk. The class of songs, known as lagani, is of two types. In the first category, we have lyrics consisting of four to five stanzas of great beauty having the rhyming refrain as 're ki'. The second category is a folk-type of greater length. It generally narrates stories in verse which are sung by village women while grinding grains in the early morning. The laganis, in fact, relate to the tales of women's sacrifice and love, such as the story of Uttama and Jayasimha where the lady is said to have saved her honour by killing herself. We have again the story of Mainavati who followed her husband when the latter became an ascetic, and the story of Narasimha who is said to have married a poor village girl of no consequence. There are many such versified stories depicting the sorrows and sacrifices of girls which form the themes of lagani of the second category. It is the former category of lagani which has been used as medium of fine poetry by Nidhi and Gananatha Jha, who were expert writers in the field. They reflect some of the deepest values of life. The silent music of the throbbing heart can be heard through these songs of various categories. They are mainly the work of such persons whose identity in most cases is not known. The dialectical variations in these songs are quite marked, and the anonymous composers have made subtle and suitable use of the language in their own way

LAGHARI, HAMAL FAQIR (Sindhi; b. 1815, d. 1879), thought by some literary critics to be the best known poet in Sindhi next only to Shah Abdul Latif, wrote both in the Siraiki dialect of Sindhi and Sindhi itself. He is considered to be the parodist par excellence, who could write parodies and other forms of poetry on the spur of the moment. The youngest of the five sons of Rahimkhan Laghari, he hailed from a middle class family settled in a village in the then state of Khairpur Mirs. He migrated from the state and settled in a village called Mahmoodkhan Laghari. There, he founded his own Sindhi primary school, where he engaged himself as a teacher. Later, when he retired, his patron, the Nawab, Mir Ali Murad, sanctioned for him a pension of two rupees a day, which he used to collect every six months.

Sociable by nature, he liked to be in cheerful gatherings in which his melodious voice, ready wit and spontaneous verses immediately made him the cynosure of all eyes.

Although he had started writing poetry from his childhood, the period of his writing is reckoned from 1845 to 1875. He has written a large number of parodies which are considered superior compositions. The other kind of poetry that he wrote is free from complex language, obscure similes and esoteric subtleties of thought. His poetry is replete with common ideas, familiar similes and simple imagery, couched in beautiful words, accompanied by sweet musical tones, rhythms and appropriate rhymes. He never claimed to be a saint or a mystic, nor will it be proper to call him an erudite philosopher or a great scholar. He was basically a devoted poet who could enthral his listeners and captivate the hearts of the readers of his poems. His poems reveal the simple truths, every day facts and the truths of life interwoven in an artistic way.

Hamal has written verse in various forms like 'ghazal', 'bayt', 'kafi', etc. His narrative poem of Hira Ranjho became very popular in Bahawalpur State and Upper Sindh. The narrative is for the most part in the form of a dialogue between Hira and her mother. He introduces a new pathos in the story of Sasui and Marui in which he introduces dialogues.

Hamal's poetry was equally popular with the exalted literary circles and the illiterate folks living in the villages.

LAHA, SHAILENDRAKRISHNA (Bengali; b. 1892, d. 1960) was a lyric poet of the Tagorite tradition, and journalist.

He studied Law and joined the Bar. But when Mahatma Gandhi launched his Non-cooperation Movement, he gave up legal practice and joined it. Afterwards, he took to literary pursuit. He wrote poems and essays on various subjects and they were published in Manasi-omarmabani, Bharatbarsha, Prabasi, Shanibar chithi besides Sabujpatra. Laha translated Kalidasa's Meghaduta into Bengali.

He was associated with the famous 'Rabibasar', a literary club of which Tagore was the chief patron. He would regularly recite poems and read articles of his own in its sittings. People fondly called him the 'Court Poet of the Rabibasar'. Subsequently he became its Secretary. He was also associated with 'Bangiya Sahitya Parishad'. He was its Assistant Secretary for about four years from 1935 and later edited the Parishad Journal during 1952-1953. He founded and edited a weekly magazine called Chhota galpa in which at least one short story used to be published every week. He also edited another literary magazine named Tantu and tantra, but it did not last long. During 1935-1936, he joined the editorial staff of the Prabasi. Afterwards, he became the Acting Editor of the Modern Review. Laha remained associated with the Prabasi Group of Publications till death. Shailendrakrishna did not publish any book of poems, but many of his poems were published in the reputed journals of his time. His poems were marked by a sonorous diction, flawless versification and more or less a romantic flavour.

LAHARI SAHITYA (Nepali). Roughly from the middle of the nineteenth century the Mongoloid Nepalis of Nepal and India, who generally belong to the working class, were able to produce literary or semi-literary compositions in Nepali. It is their works that constitute the bulk of the lahari sahitya.

'Lahari' is wave or a succession of waves of feelings or emotions, understood figuratively. A 'lahari' could well be of religious or moral instructions too. Indeed the first laharis were such: Samudra lahari (1844) by Basant Sharma and Uday lahari (1877) by Gyadnil Das. Subsequently laharis came to be increasingly associated with a class of compositions which were predominantly amatory.

The British Indian army and the tea plantations in the Darjeeling-Doars region of Bengal provided the two main means of employment to the Mongoloid Nepalis who in India liked to call themselves Gorkha. And their being in the army and the consequent estrangement from their beloved ones, impelled them to compose songs that made manifest their feelings of lovelornness. Truly, therefore, many of the composers of the laharis were Gorkha soldiers. But then there was also another completely different set of circumstances as obtained in the tea plantations which too prompted the writing of the laharis, and it is these laharis that form a more interesting subject for study. Placed in alien surroundings, the Gorkhas became aware of a new sense of freedom as also of a new form of bondage. They felt that they had been liberated only to be exploited by the capitalist economy. The age-old social customs were coming apart liberating men from many old constrictions. But at the same time new constraints were being thrown in putting men in more difficult straitjackets. Love had become free: unlike in the past, marriage could take place on the basis of mutual liking. But the new economic disparities had further reinforced the caste systems and further estranged one class from another so that love faced new forms of distress.

As love in the laharis was for marriage and companionship in life, it always had a social aspect about it unlike the erotic (shringarik) poetry of the Nepali Brahmin poets of Banaras. As the laharis, composed invariably in the folk metre 'jhyawre', were meant to be popularly sung and, therefore, had to be confined to expressing general experiences, any propensity to indulge in eroticism was at once checked. Nor was there any room for practising the precept 'shringarat bhavet hasya' (humour from eroticism) in laharis as humour in them was put to a different use.

The laharis are in the form of couplets, the two lines of it having no one or conjoint theme. The first line is usually descriptive of a natural scene or of an aspect of social life, or even of a commonplace thing. Its compositional function is to set up terminal word or words to rhyme with word or words similarly placed in the second line. The content of the second line makes up the theme of the couplet. The rhyme-scheme is, to some extent, varied and intricate. The first line is often a cheerful and witty description purporting to allay all fears and alarm and to set the minds of the listeners at rest. The listeners, however, simply cannot guess as to what would be the strain of the second line. They remain in a state of expectancy. It is at the deliverance of the rhyming word of the completing second line that the pith of the subject matter is disclosed. A happy humoristic surprise follows almost independently and soon mingles with the pathos of the theme. Humour is entwined with pathos. In translation this humour is apt to be lost.

The origin of the composition of laharis is surely to be traced to the tradition of folk songs in Nepali to which the contributions of the Mongoloid Nepali tribes have been truly immense. Laharis, simply put as jhyawre folk songs written at will and printed, came much later. In the year 1900 was published Meetha meetha Nepali geetharu, a volume containing laharis by Hajirman Rai who was an employee in an office then housed in the Old Kachari building in Darjeeling. Sundar Singh Mansi, whose compositions were collected in Anand lahari Vol V, was a munsif in a tea garden in Darjeeling. Anand lahari Vol II contains laharis by Bal Bahadur Saru Magar composed in 1916 while he worked in the Monteviot Tea Estate in Darjeeling. Prasad Singh Nechali Rai brought out his Priti lahari in 1919 containing two hundred and seventy-two laharis which he had penned while he had been at the Chaklala army cantonment. Amongst the other composers of laharis were Narbir Tamang, Dharma Singh Chamling Rai, Dil Bahadur Rai and Taraman Gurung who were all workers in different tea gardens in Darjeeling.

Composition in the lahari mode, at best only acknowledged as semi-literary by the more fastidious of Nepali critics, appeared to have come to an abrupt end by 1925. In truth it continued with undiminished vigour; only there was a dearth of publishers. The latest and most brilliant flowering of the lahari tradition could be witnessed in the seemingly inexhaustible and aesthetically exquisite laharis of Manmaya Newarni, popularly known as the Black Beauty of Darjeeling.

The significance of the lahari sahitya lies in its being the beginning of the Mongoloid, the proletarian and the Indian Nepali nationalist writings in Nepali literature.

LAHIRI, DURGADAS (Bengali; b. 1858, d. 1932) was a noted writer. His literary career began when he was a student in the Metropolitan College in Calcutta. His poetry and prose writings used to appear in the leading journals almost regularly. He came in contact with Vidyasagar and it was Vidyasagar who inspired him to engage himself in literary work. He brought out Anusandhan, a literary monthly, in 1887. He edited the magazine for long eighteen years and made the publication fortnightly from monthly and then daily from fortnightly. Later on he made it bilingual adding an English version. In 1909 he edited the Bangabasi, one of the very prestigious journals of his day. He wrote many books most of which dealt with history but his greatest contribution was Bangalir gan (1905), an anthology of all possible types of Bengali songs. The book includes some of the songs of Raja Krishnachandra Ray of Krishnanagar, Raja Vijaychandra Mahatab of Burdwan and Raja Mahendralal Khan of Nadajol. He enriched the collection with a number of songs translated from Urdu, Persian, Postu, Assamese and Oriya. This valuable work contains about 5200 songs of 108 poets and composers. Durgadas also wrote biographical notes on all these poets. He had an ambitious plan to write the history of the world but he could finish only the part dealing with the Indian history in seven volumes. Another of his invaluable works was an annotated translation of the Vedas in Bengali. He also translated Tennyson's Enoch Arden (1864).

FURTHER WORKS: Dwadashnari, Nirvan jiban, Bharate durgat-sob, Churi o juachuri, Jat o khun, Vaishnablabari, Ramayana, and Mahabarata, Swadhinatar itihās, Rani Bhavani and Sikhaguddher itihās. He also edited a book entitled a Brajarayer granthavali (Vol. 1, 1906).

LAHIRI, TULSI (Bengali; b. 1898, d. 1959) was a versatile actor of both stage and screen and a producer and playwright. He was born at Naldanga in the district of Rangpur now in Bangladesh. He graduated from Rangpur and got his B.L. degree from Ripon College in Calcutta. He took part in acting on the amateur stage while in Rangpur and joined the Art Theatre when he came to Calcutta. He had by that time already become famous as a composer. But when he joined the amateur theatre he turned all his attention to the theatre. He brought the famished and down-trodden masses in his plays, realistically presented them in their own language which is often a dialect of Rangpur. He was one of the founders of the Bohurupce, a leading theatre group of Bengal.

Tulsi Lahiri's Duhkhir iman (1947) was produced at Srirangam by Sisirkumar Bhaduri. The stark reality of the famine-stricken people suffering under the ruthless oppression of a capitalist system has been laid bare in this play. There are melodramatic elements in Pathik (1951) but the dramatist has shown the inevitability of class conflict in the present society. In Chhenra tar (1953), love and the pangs of separation in a peasant family in the grip of a devastating famine have been poignantly drawn. Lakshmipriyar sansar (1959) is a doleful play showing the wretched condition of a miserable family, the helpless victim of poverty and deprivation. A collection of Tulsi Lahiri's one-Act plays was published in 1962. There are some plays in it which bear testimony to the author's skill in handling this form of play.

LAILA MAJNU (Kashmiri) was composed by Mahmud Gami (1765-1855) of Dur, Mahmudabad in Anantnag district. It was first published by Abdul Hai of Nava Kadali at Amritsar in the early years of the third decade of the present century. Ghulam Muhammad Nur Muhammad Book Sellers, S.R. Gung, Srinagar, published it in 1937 and, it ran into many editions thereafter. In 1977 it appeared in Kulliyati-i-Mahmud Gami edited by Naji Munawar for the State Cultural Academy on the basis of a number of manuscripts, a list of which has been given in the said Kulliyat.

The exact date of its composition is, however, not known, but it surely belongs to the first half of the nineteenth century.

Laila Majnu is a famous folk-love story of Arabia rendered into Persian verses by Nizami of Iran. Mahmud, well-versed in Persian poetry, leaned heavily on this work and followed its story-line while composing his work. However, it is not a verse to verse translation, but it is a composition which shows Mahmud's powerful imagination. While narrating the story, he has inserted songs at a number of places, which give it local colour and habitation, and preserve it for posterity.

This immortal theme of tragic love has attracted many poets through the ages and Mahmud first gave it a powerful poetic form and expression.

Mahmud has composed this story in a 'masnavi' form and added songs at suitable places to deepen the intensity in the narration. These songs also serve as interludes. There are many fresh turns of expressions, similes and metaphors.

Mahmud is the first poet who introduced masnavi form into Kashmiri poetry during the first half of the nineteenth century. It has, therefore, great importance in the development of this genre, for it serves as a model to the successors of the poet.

LAIRENMAYUM IBOONGOHAL SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1895, d. 1966) was a playwright and an educationist. He graduated from Calcutta University and was the first Manipuri to have passed the B.L. examination. He served the Government of Manipur in different capacities. He was a member of the Darbar of the Maharaja of Manipur, Judge of the Chief Court and the first District and Sessions Judge of Manipur. In 1922 he wrote Nara Singha which is the first historical play in Manipuri. His next play, Babhrubahan, was written in 1925. Introduction to Manipur and Meaning of Mayang are two of his books in English. He was also the Co-editor of the Cheitharol kumbaba, a royal chronicle of Manipur published by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad. A member of the now defunct Nikhil Manipuri Hindu Mahasabha, he ran for election to the Lok Sabha from Inner Manipuri Parliamentary Constituency after his retirement. Founder of the L.M.S. Law College, Imphal, he was the President of the Manipur Sahitya Parishad and worked for the promotion and propagation of the Manipuri language, literature and culture. LAISHRAM SAMARENDRA SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1925), is a distinguished Manipuri poet and painter. He graduated from Calcutta University in 1948 and took to teaching. Eventually he became a Deputy Inspector of Schools. He is now working as Joint Director in the Directorate of Arts, Culture and Social Welfare, Government of Manipur. Even as a student he wrote two poems 'Leilangba' and 'Sita' which made him famous. They were remarkable for novelty of imagery and use of an evocative language. Thereafter several poems appeared in different journals. His first book of poems, Wa amanta haige telanga (One word with you Kite) was published in 1962. It contains poems which are both romantic and realistic and they are also mildly satirical. The second volume Mamang leikai thambal shatle (Lotus in the eastern frontier) was published in 1974. These poems are more mature and demonstrate a firmer grasp and restraint. From very young days Laishram Samarendra Singh loved music and painting and these arts influenced his poetry also. His poems are musical and lyrical. They are packed with visual imagery and rich in suggestiveness. The poet is associated with several literary and cultural organisations of Manipur like the Cultural Forum, Manipur and the Naharol Sahitya Premme Samiti and worked for them in different capacities. He was also the editor of Ritu, a quarterly journal of the Cultural Forum, Manipur Government. He was awarded the Jamini Sundar Gold Medal of the Manipur Sahitya Parishad in 1976 for his Mamang leikai thambal shatle and the same book brought for him the Sahitya Akademi award in 1976.

LAKANNA DANDESHA (Kannada; b. 1400, d. 1430) was the Prime Minister of the Vijayanagar kingdom during the illustrious rule of King Proudhadevaraya. He was a poet and writer. He is famous in the political, religious and literary fields of Karnataka. He was bestowed with the rare qualities of bravery and poetic skill. He had a wonderful capacity for effective administration, toleration for other religions and interest in the development of literature and culture. The epigraphical evidences indicate that Lakkanna Dandesha was also known by the titles of Lakkannodeya, Dannayaka, Lakkamantridhara, Heggade Deva, Amatya Shiromani, Dakshina Samudradhipati, etc.

Shiva tatwa chintamani is a religious epic written by Lakkanna Dandesha. The title itself indicates that this is a treatise on the essence of Virashaiva philosophy. It is one of the famous poems of ancient Karnataka which have incorporated the 'dharmanu' (religion) and the 'kavyadharmanu' (poetry). Shiva-tatwa chintamani is an epic written in the form of vardhaka shatpadi (stanzas of six lines). 'Chintamani' is a rare and valuable pearl. The Indians believe that the repeated and constant worship of this pearl leads to the fulfilment of desires. Similarly, this work is also a Chintamani to those who want to know God Shiva. Just as the Bhagavad Gita of Vyasa is the essence of the Upanishads, Shiva tatwa chintamani is also the essence of the Shivagamas, puranas, etc. He has profusely quoted from ancient works.

The subject matter of this work can be analysed as follows in accordance with the mode of its preparation and scope: (1) The story of Shiva Tatwa and Shivalila, (2) The life-sketches of ancient and modern Sharanas, (3) The philosophy of 'Shat-Sthala'.

The first 25 chapters deal with the Panchavingshatililas of Shiva from the first part. The second part consists of the matter from the 26th chapter to the 38th chapter, the description of the palace of Shiva, Darshana of Narada, the dialogues of Shiva and Nandikeshvara, the birth of Basaveshvara and stories of modern Shaivite saints. The third part consists of the gist of the chapters dealing with the importance of Shat-sthala philosophy, the decision on the Shatothala Brahma, and Kriya-Vishranti (Stillness of action), etc.

Shiva tatwa chintamani has religious and historical importance because it is an introduction to the way of thinking of the Vachanakaras. It is a model for an attractive blend of philosophy and poetry. This can very well be described as the encyclopaedia of the stories of Shaivite saints.

LAKHIMA RANI-LAKSHAMANA GANI

LAKHIMA RANI (Maithili) is a khanda-kavya, written by Kedarnath Labh, published in 1960.

This khanda-kavya is divided into five cantos and is written in free verse style from the beginning to the end. From the very name of this book it is clear that the poet has taken utmost care to paint the life of Lakhima who is the chief queen of King Shiva Singh. Lakhima is like ocean of learning, a great lover of art. Her aesthetic sense is unique. She possesses keen sense of appreciation for any beautiful piece of poetry. She hears the love songs of Vidyapati with rapt attention and gets heavenly pleasure. In this book the poet has tried his best to throw light on the intelligence of Queen Lakhima and at the same time on her penetrating insight into fine arts. She has been painted as an ideal wife. She has strong desire to sacrifice herself for the sake of a deep love for her husband.

As the poet has great love for the Maithili language and Mithila culture he has always tried to keep these two things in his mind.

Its plot is well-knit and finely displayed. While elucidating its plot, the poet has very appropriately defined art, imagination, poetry and life, youth, etc. through the medium of dialogue. Its conversational style has added grandeur to its dramatic effect on the audience. By giving a clear picture of beauty the poet says:

The book is full of local colour. Besides Lakhima, the characters of king Shiva Singh and poet Vidyapati have been given due importance. Like peace-loving people of Mithila, King Shiva Singh has denounced war.

In the second Canto, while denouncing war the poet has clearly depicted the peculiarity of Mithila.

The language of the book is full of elegance and natural flow. In the use of language the poet is very liberal, and at the same time very mature. His poetic maturity can be seen in the entire book. Labhjee has added much to the Maithili language and literature.

LAKSHMAN SINGH, RAJA (Hindi; b. 1826, d. 1896) was one of the principal pioneers of Hindi prose. He is accredited with introducing an acceptable medium of communication for educational as well as literary purposes. He was the first Hindi writer to visualise the potentiality of the common speech. Raja, by putting forth the ideal of simple, chaste and easily intelligible Hindi, enthused a very wide readership for Hindi. He struck a middle path between the high-flown Persianised Urdu style of Raja Shivprasad and the Sanskrit-laden style of the Pandits.

He was born at a place in Agra known as Wazirpur and died also in Agra. From his very childhood, he had begun the study of Sanskrit, Hindi and Persian. At the age of twelve, he joined the Agra College to study English. Later on, on his own he studied the Prakrit, Gujarati and Bengali languages. In 1850, he was offered the post of a translator in the office of the Lieutenant Governor of the Northwestern Provinces. By dint of his intelligence and efficiency, he became a favourite of his superiors. In 1855, he was appointed Tehsildar of Etawa and in 1856, he was appointed Deputy Collector of Banda. He was honoured with the title of 'Raja' at the First Delhi Durbar (1870). While serving the Government, his zeal for literary activities remained undiminished. In 1855, he published a literary journal, the Praja hitaishi, from Agra. It is certain that in its publication, his own point of view concerning the popularisation of language played a dominant role. He was in favour of a blend of borrowed words from Sanskrit and words used by the common people. In 1863, he translated Kalidasa's famous work with the title Shakuntala natak. This work was published in 1875 from England by Frederic Pincot, a lover of Hindi. It was recognised as a text book for the Indian Civil Service Examination. In 1878, he translated the Raghuvamsha into prose and, in 1881-1883, he prepared a translation in verse of the Meghaduta. He set an example of good and fluent language through these creative translations. Other books by him are Dandasamhita (translation of the Indian Penal Code), Buland-sheher ka itihas, Naye karon ke vishay mein, Dhoron ki bimariyon ka elaj (translation of an English work on the subject).

He was a Fellow of the Calcutta University and a member of the Royal Asiatic Society.

R.N.S.

LAKSHMANA GANI (Prakrit; 12th century) was a well-known poet of Prakrit. He was a disciple of Hemachandra Suri. He composed only one charitakavya Supasana-hachariya (Suparsvanatha charita) in the year 1142. It narrates the whole history of the seventh Tirthankara Suparashvanatha. The work consists eight gathas (Prakrit verses). It is divided into three 'prestavas' (cantos). The poem deals with the previous birth of Suparashvanatha Tirthankara in detail. In the second canto we find the conjunction of birth, age and the renunciation of world. The last canto describes the great penances and the ways of attaining the 'Kevalajna' (ultimate knowledge). There is also a description of Samavasrana (a great religious meeting) and sermons. This is the peculiar quality of Jain story that it is not connected with one life or accident but is related with the events of previous birth like a chain. In this poem the story of Champakmala is narrated to show the importance of right faith or belief in 'Parmatama' (pure soul). The other eight stories deal with the eight 'angas' (parts) of the right faith. Besides these, in order to point out the 'aticharas' (faults) the poet gives a different story accordingly, and like that the five stories are also described for understanding the five 'anuvratas'. The poem is full of various events. Though the scenes of city, town, mountain, temple, garden, morning, sunset, seasons, etc., are painted yet due to scarcity of descriptions and abundant events, the plot is loose and the poet could not frame the work like an epic. The poet is not a master of imagination. In an epic poem where characters are vividly imagined, success depends on the poet's imagination and the representation of characters. It usually depicts the horizons of human life. In such a poem, the interest is rather national than individual. In these respects we find that the elements of an epic are not found in the above-said Suparshvanatha-charita-kavya. The poet has followed the principles of poetics; therefore, various metres, figures of speech etc. have been used freely having embellished his poetry with sayings and proverbs. The poet defines a friend in the following words:

A friend is one who awakes you from slumber, attachment to this wordly home; and someone who lets you sleep in attachment and passion (moha) is not a friend

One finds more than fifty verses in Apabhramsha in this poem. The language of the poem is completely influenced by the Apabhramsha language. We find lively description using upama, utpreksha, rupaka and other devices. The cultural elements are also there in abundance.

D.S.

LAKSHMANA RAO, B.R. (Kannada; b. 1946) is a Kannada poet who published his first collection of poems in 1971. He is a graduate from Bangalore University.

The poems in Gopi mattu gondalina (1971), Lakshmana Rao's first collection, were a refreshing change from the type of poetry that was written at that time. He was a poet, 'a slave to the senses, brain and heart—and in that order', writing about love and sex in a simple, personal and uninhibited manner.

He has produced two more collections, Tuwatara (1977) and Lilliputtia hambala (1981) since 1971. He has also written songs for cassettes and is very popular at poets' gatherings. If one has to cavil at all, it has to be in terms of his current output not being very different from the poems in his first collection.

Rc.S.

LAKSHMANA RAO, KOMARRAJU VENKATA (Telugu; b. 1876, d. 1923) lost his father in his childhood and was brought up by his maternal uncle Bhandaru Madhava Rao. He has his education in the colleges of Poona and Nagpur in the medium of Marathi. He took his M.A. degree in English but he was proficient not only in English but also in Telugu, Sanskrit, Marathi, Bengali, Tamil and Kannada. He was very much interested in his study of History. He rendered exemplary and memorable service to the language and literature of Marathi. He contributed many articles and poems to Marathi newspapers and magazines. He revised Bharatakavya written by Moropant, an ancient Marathi poet and published a corrected version of it.

Great pandits like Balagangadhar Tilak felt that Nasik (where the temple of Tryambakeshvara is situated) in Maharashtra was referred to as Parnashala in Valmiki's Ramayana. On the basis of his thorough research, Lakshmana Rao proved and illustrated that Parnashala near Bhadrachalam in Andhra Pradesh was the Parnashala referred to by Valmiki in his Ramayana.

Though Lakshmana Rao lived in Maharashtra, he had great regard for his mother tongue. He wrote a number of articles for Telugu magazines. His articles were published largely in Janana published by Rayasam Venkata Sivudu. During this period he wrote a historical work Shivaji charitra. He served Raja Nayani Venkata Ranga Rao Bahaddur of Munagala in Krishna district as Divan who lent him a helping hand in his efforts to spread Telugu literature.

Lakshmana Rao was responsible for the establishment of Srikrishnadevaraya Andhra Bhasha Nilayam in 1901 in Hyderabad for which he held discussions with Ranga Rao Bahaddur and Ravichettu Ranga Rao and made tireless efforts. It was the first public library in the whole of Andhra Pradesh to be established with modern methods. Ever since it has been a great centre of learning. Another notable act of Lakshmana Rao was the establishment of Vignana Chandrika Granthamala in 1905 in Hyderabad. Several works written on history, biography, physics, chemistry, economics, zoology, geology, etc., by eminent scholars like Chilukuri Veerabhadra Rao, Vemuri Viswanatha Sarma, Mantripragada Sambasiva Rao, Achanta Lakshmiapati, Cattamanchi Ramalinga Reddy etc. were brought out by this publishing house. Hindu mahayugam and Mahammadeeya mahayugam were two great historical works of Lakshmana Rao published by this institution.

It was a great literary adventure on Lakshmana Rao's part to undertake the publication of Andhra vignana sarvaswamu (Andhra encyclopaedia). This is a real testimony to the wide-ranging variety of his knowledge and literary interests. The three volumes running into two thousand pages, with their contents arranged in the alphabetical order, were published under his editorship. One thousand articles on a variety of subjects were included in them; and Lakshmana Rao himself contributed no less than thirty-five of them, dealing with several areas of knowledge. In addition, other essays he contributed to the magazines occasionally were collected and published under the title Lakshmanaraya vyasavali (A collection of Lakshmana Rao's essays) in the form of a book. The total number of his works would run into ten volumes if they were to be published.

LAKSHMI-LAKSHMIKANTAM, PINGALI

Lakshmana Rao is also an expert in the study of inscriptions. His researches in historical inscriptions make another volume. He set up the Historical Research Society in Hyderabad, with the objects of promoting historical research, publication of scientific literature, books of literary criticism and books which had never seen the light of the day before.

Lakshmana Rao believed in religious tolerance. He was opposed to partisan outlook. This great, talented scholar devoted his life to research and scholarship.

LAKSHMI (Tamil, b. 1921, d. 1987). Tripura Sundari who assumed the pen name, Lakshmi, at the beginning of her writing career took to writing while at school, went through the mortification of receiving rejection slips but met with success when most needed, when, as a medical student, she had to find an independent source of income; she has been writing ever since. From short stories, she quickly graduated on to the writing of novels. Her first novel predictably centres round the fortunes of a surgeon and is entitled Bhavani. The career as a doctor was satisfying (and undoubtedly furnished her a number of plots for her stories); but it is as a writer of fiction that she is known.

Lakshmi received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1984 for her novel, Oru kaviriyai pola. She has written nearly 200 novels and 1000 short stories besides a few books on medicine, mostly for the laymen. Two of her novels have been filmed. She has received a number of awards other than that from the Akademi.

One can identify four main factors that have moulded her creative personality. The financial privations she went through as a member of a large family whose head was not a big earner were the first influence on her. Later, the raw physical suffering and the mental torments of the patients she came across as a medical college student and as a practising doctor appear to have had a lasting influence on the tenor of her fiction. She was influenced by the novels of Saratchandra Chatterjee. Kalki, the Tamil writer, could be called her guru; he shaped her ideas through his writings and later, when she wrote her stories he gave her counsel from which she profited hugely.

The fourth factor was her stay for 22 years in South Africa where she married a South African Indian; her personal experience of apartheid coloured her view of life and influenced her writings greatly. Oru kaviriyai pola is based on the experiences of a South African born Indian girl who visits India and is treated to a series of unpleasant encounters which shatter her dreams centering the mother country.

Lakshmi's novels are characterised by a deep sympathy for the suffering woman. They invariably have a message. Though they unfold a series of tragic events, they all end happily. In the matter of style, they are not distinguishable from a hundred other works. Though they portray sufferings, they cannot be deemed profound, as they do not affect the reader powerfully. Lakshmi's chief merit is her capacity to entertain. She has a good story to tell and she tells it well.

LAKSHMIKANTAM, BALIJEPALLI (Telugu; b. 1881, d. 1953) studied Sanskrit and Telugu under the guidance of his father and maternal uncle. After his matriculation he became a Head Clerk at the Sub-Registrar's Office, Kurnool. Later he taught at Guntur Municipal High School. He founded the 'Chandrika Granthamala' at Guntur with the royal patronage of Ankinidu, Prasadu Bahaddar, the raja of Challapilli, in 1922.

He participated in the Salt Satyagraha and was in jail in 1929-30, during which period he wrote Satyaharischandra. This play is one of the outstanding works of his age and his role as 'Nakshatraka' in his play brought him fame. Satrajitiya natakam and Buddhimati vilasamu are his other plays. He also translated Bhavabhuti's Uttararamacharita as Uttararaghava. His other works are Svarajya samasya (verse); Brahmaratham, Manjusha (novels); Sivanandalahari (tr. of Adi Shankara's work) and an incomplete translation of 'Sundarakanda' of the Ramayana.

He visited Rangoon (1930) on an academic assignment and in 1942, for his contribution to cinema, he was given the title 'Pambhava Sarasvatimurti'.

LAKSHMIKANTAM, PINGALI (Telugu; b. 1894, d. 1972) was a scholar, poet and eminent professor of Telugu. Educated at Machilipatnam, he was influenced by Challapilla Venkata Sastry (1870-1950) who worked as a Telugu teacher on the staff of the Hindu High School where Pingali happened to study. He took M.A. in Telugu from Madras University and served for nearly three decades as Professor of Telugu in the Andhra University, Waltair, and Sri Venkateswara University, Tirupati. He inculcated in his students a historical perspective, critical insight and the methodology of comparative assessment of literary works. He attempted an admirable synthesis of oriental and occidental methods of critical enquiry, pursuing a disinterested quest for truth and beauty.

In collaboration with Katuri Venkateswararao (1895-1962) he started his literary career as a poet. They published a slender volume of poems entitled Tolakari (First shower) which offered a refreshing novelty of content and suggestive expression.

He and Katuri Venkateswararao published in 1932 Soundara nandam and dedicated it to their poetic preceptor. When the literary scene was dominated by short love lyrics, they made a significant departure and published this narrative poem which runs to nearly ninety pages. It combines classical finish and lyrical fervour. It was inspired by the Gandhian ideal of universal love and equality. The poem added a new dimension to the theme of love which ran as an undercurrent through the romantic poems of their contemporaries. This major poem stands out as a significant landmark in the development of modern poetry.

After retirement from academic service, Lakshmi-kantam joined the staff of Akashvani as a producer of the spoken work. He left the stamp of his personality on the planning as well as execution of literary programmes like discussions, discourses and symposia. He directed and produced classical Sanskrit plays, ably editing and adapting them to the medium of the radio. His personality was domineering, his tone was stentorian, yet his heart was full of the milk of human kindness.

He translated Soundarya lahari of Acharya Shankara into fine Telugu verse. His Sahitya shilpa samiksha is an authentic work on literary criticism and principles of composition. His lecture-notes on the history of Telugu literature continue to serve as an inspiring model for critics and students alike by their perceptive quality, flair, balance and taste. Some of his critical pronouncements have become proverbial.

C.N.S.

LAKSHMIKANTAMMA, UTUKURI (Telugu; b. 1917) is a prolific and versatile writer and eloquent public speaker. She inherited a love of literature from her father Nalam Krishna Rao who was a pioneer in the field of children's literature. From her childhood she took keen interest in fine arts like music and painting. She gained proficiency in Sanskrit and passed the Ubhaya Bhasha Praveena examination with distinction. She was influenced early in life by the teachings of Ramakrishna Paramahansa, Ramana Maharshi and Aurobindo. She got married in her thirteenth year to Hayagriva Gupta, an advocate belonging to a cultured family in Bapatla, Guntur district. In a congenial atmosphere her artistic temperament, literary talent and liberal outlook received full encouragement. She has to her credit a dozen publications to date. Though primarily a writer of prose she tried her hand at poetry and fiction also. As a champion of the rights of women she works on several fronts making her presence felt wherever she goes. She served as a member of the Executive Council of Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi and worked for the institution of special awards for women writers and for holding conferences of women writers at several places. She visited some western countries where she upheld the glory of Indian womanhood. She also published a book on the women writers of India after having gained wide recognition for her book on The Poetesses of Andhra which was awarded a prize by the Telugu Bhasha Samiti, Madras, in 1953. In her we find the rare blending of critical acumen and creative ardour. Never resting on her oars she believes in the ideal of constant endeavour, still pursuing and still achieving, always cherishing and working for the promotion and preservation of the abiding values of life. She is equally powerful on the platform and the printed page. Besides Telugu and Sanskrit she has mastery over Hindi and believes that Indian literature is one thought written in many languages.

LAKSHMINARASIMHA RAO, PANUGANTI (Telugu; b. 1865, d. 1940) was a dramatist and an eminent essayist. Inspired by his reading of Shakespeare, Swift, Defoe, Goldsmith, Addison and Steele, Molière and Sheridan, Panuganti opened up new vistas of humour in his plays and essays not found in earlier Telugu works. Vipranarayana achieved an overwhelming popularity. In Radha Krishna love and devotion are ecstatically blended. Kanthabharanam is the most humorous and popular of his plays.

Panuganti's Sakshi essays, 140 in all, satirical in the style of the Spectator of Addison, exposed the evils of society. His aim was to criticise and reform. Incisive wit, scintillating humour and caustic satire were his weapons. His torrential flow of words to suit the occasions invigorated the themes. The Sakshi Club (established in 1931) dealt with every subject ranging from 'snuff' and 'cock-fights' to the Vedanta philosophy. They exercised a profound influence on the readers.

LAKSHMINARASIMHAMU, CHILAKAMARTHI (Telugu; b. 1867, d. 1946) was born at Khandavalli, a village in the East Godavari district, in the house of his maternal uncle Puranapanda Mallayya Sastry. His mother was Venkata Ratnamma and his father, Venkanna. He received his early education in Veeravasaram. In 1886 he passed the Matriculation Examination. On account of defective vision, he could not proceed to the college. By degrees it became worse and he was forced to give up the idea of higher education and take to teaching. He possessed a wonderful memory. He was able to remember any poem of any length, which was read out to him once. It was a great asset which made up for the loss of his vision. He made people read out the classics to him both in Telugu and Sanskrit and thanks to the power of memory he soon became a highly learned scholar, LAKSHMINARAYANA BHATTA. N.S.

His earliest play was Kichaka vadha. It was a prose drama. It was written at the instance of I. Hanumantharao, an ardent lover of drama. Later, he produced a number of other plays in succession—Draupadi parinayam, Sri Rama jananam, Gayopakhyanam Parijatapaharanam Nalacharitam, Gayopakhyanam, Parijatapaharanam, Nalacharitam, Sitakalyanam etc. Originally they were all written in prose but subsequently some verses were incorporated in the plays. Besides these original plays, he also translated a few from Sanskrit—namely, Parvati parinayam and thirteen plays of Bhasa.

A competition was organised by K. Veeresalingam to encourage the authors to produce original novels. Narasimham was awarded a prize in the competition for his novel, Ramachandra vijayam. Encouraged by his success now he turned his hand to writing fiction. He began to turn out a series of novels one after another. They are Hemalata, Ahalya Bai, Karpuramanjari, Saundarya tilaka, Sudha sharaschandramu, Krishnaveni, Mani manjari and Ganapati. Some of them are mythological, some social. Sir Walter Scott was his model and he was called the Andhra Scott. He looked upon Veeresalingam as his mentor. His Ramachandravijayam has similarities with Veeresalingam's Rajasekhara charitra. But Ramachandra vijayam is more entertaining, and excels in its appeal to our emotions.

Lakshminarasimham also tried his hand at journalism. He organised and edited three magazines, namely, Manorama, Deshamata and Saraswati. He was a fearless critic of the many atrocities of the British rulers in India.

In 1911, there arose a controversy about the relevance of the 'grandhika style' (i.e., the classical style). Lakshminarasimham lent his support to the 'grandhika' style of writing. He produced several works in that style of prose such as Rajasthana kathavali, Mahapurushula jeevita charitra (Lives of the great men), Dharma vijayamu, etc. Besides these, he also wrote several comedies and farces. He started the Hindu Lower Secondary School, which was taken over by Veeresalingam. He also set up another school named after Raja Rammohan Ray for free education of the lower classes. He started yet another school in Bhimavaram. Thus he played a notable part as an educationist.

In 1922, he started to translate the Rigveda into Telugu, but owing to financial stringency he gave up the work after translating one mandalam. In 1928 his Shashitipurti function was celebrated in Rajahmundry on a grand scale, and on that occasion all his works were collected and published in ten volumes.

He was interested in social reform as well as in political struggle. He participated in every meeting organised by social reformers or freedom fighters, either as a speaker, or as the president. He was a fluent public speaker. He was particularly adept at composing the Sisa verses, which were comparable to those of the great poet Srinatha. His individuality is brought out in the Lulaya shatakam (i.e., a collection of a hundred poems).

In 1943, Andhra University awarded him the title of Kalaprapurna. Like his mentor Veeresalingam, he was a great advocate of the education of women.

The autobiography of this great scholar and writer, patriot and reformer, was published by the Association of the Andhra Progressive Writers in 1944 as a mark of their respect for him.

LAKSHMINARAYANA BHATTA, N.S. (Kannada, b. 1936) is a Kannada poet and critic. After his early education in Shimoga, Karnataka, he took M.A. in Kannada and also Ph.D. from Mysore University. Now he is a Professor of Kannada and the Director, Institute of Kannada Studies, Bangalore University. Apart from Kannada, he knows English and Hindi.

Lakshminarayana Bhatta has written both poems and criticism and has done significant work as a translator, and as editor of manuscripts. But he is best known as a poet. Beginning poetic composition in the heyday of 'navya' poetry, he has grown from collection to collection. His interests have widened. His poetry has sought to explore the external and the inner worlds of man from an individual point of view. The mystery of life particularly engages his mind as a poet. With a remarkable mastery of both rhythm and language his poems achieve a well-knit pattern. He assumes the ironical stance which was dominant in navya poetry, particularly in poems of social satire but his characteristic style is one of intimacy and involvement. 'Suddavva' represents the first type and 'Savari' is representative of the second. He has also composed more complex poems characterized by contemplation and meditation. Side by side with his more serious compositions, he has also composed songs. This is significant because the Navya Age was opposed to the composition of songs. Lakshminarayana Bhatta recognizes song as a legitimate form of poetry and argues that only a good poet can compose good songs.

Lakshminarayana Bhatta's important critical collections are Horludariyalli kavya (1974) and Vivechane (1978). He brings to his critical work a comprehensive awareness of the tradition of Kannada literature. He adopts western methods of criticism with a firm grasp of the literary practices and innovations both in earlier and in later Kannada literature. So he continues the critical tradition of Kuvempu (K.V. Puttappa), T.N. Sreekanthiah and G.S. Shivarudrappa. His essay on Muddana is of particular significance from this point of view. He has also written valuable studies on the poetry of K.S. Narasimhaswamy and Gopalakrishna Adiga.

Lakshminarayana Bhatta has rendered into Kannada Sudraka's Mrichchhakatika and Shakespeare's sonnets, as well as a few poems of T.S. Eliot. He has also edited the compositions of Sishunal Sheriff and Kavyashodhana, a collection of critical studies of the poems of Adiga. He has also written some books for children.

FURTHER WORKS: Vritta (1968), Suli (1972), Ninnege nanna mathu (1974), Chitrakutu (1981), Dipika (1986), Sunita (Translations of 24 sonnets of Shakespeare, 1983); Ispit rajya (translation of Tagore's Tasher desh, 1980), Bharatiya grantha sampadara parichaya (translation of S.M. Kattr's Introduction to Indian Textual Criticism), Kannada matu (1983), Readings in Kannada (English, 1974)

LAKSHMINARAYANA, UNNAVA (Telugu; b. 1877, d. 1958). was a social reformer, freedom fighter and literary innovator. He was educated at Guntur and later enrolled himself as an advocate. He also worked for a while as a teacher and even received training as a teacher at Rajahmundry during which time he came into contact with Kandukuri Veeresalingm. From 1913 to 1916 he was in Ireland studying law at King's Inn, Dublin. He practised as an advocate at Madras and Guntur. He plunged into freedom struggle and was arrested several times; first time during 1921-1922 when he took the opportunity to write his classic, Malapalli; again, in 1931 during Salt Satyagraha and in 1942. To translate his convictions on remarriage of widows, removal of untouchability, Unnava founded Sarada Niketan at Guntur in 1922. The first part of Malapalli was published in 1922 and the second part in 1923. The publication attracted praise from literary savants as the first social novel in Telugu employing the colloquial style. But it also attracted the ire of the government of the day. The Law Member of the Madras Government, C.P. Ramaswamy Iyer, took exception to the support extended by the novel to the workers' movements and the work was banned as being seditious in 1923. After a heated discussion in the Assembly in which patriots like Ayyadevara Kaleswara Rao participated, it was agreed that the ban would be lifted if certain objectionable portions were deleted. The ban was lifted in 1928. A revised edition was published in 1935, but it was again banned in 1936. The ban was finally lifted by the first Congress ministry under Rajagopalachary in 1937. Apart from the novel, Unnava published a drama, Nayakuralu, in 1926, depicting the chicanery of Nagamma and the stolid morality of Brahmanayudu, two characters in the history of Palnadu. The writer also published several articles of social and literary interest, like 'Pre-narajyamu', 'Vishala Andhrodyamamu' and 'Saudarana-damu'. He wrote plays like Sodoyamma Sodi (1936) and Tikkana (1946). Although not pronouncedly, there is in Unnava a poetic streak and he published a few songs like 'Avula Kaarulu', 'Roti pata', 'Meka Pata'. He also attempted a History of Akbar in twelve chapters. After a life of service and fulfilment upto a point, in his later years

Unnava tended to be a little contemplative and non-attached even to his institution, Sarada Niketan. Perhaps, he was sour with a few commercial overtones in politics in the post-Independence India. But he did not give vent to his bitterness. Like Ramadasu, the saintly character of Malapali, he withdrew into a world of meditation. At the ripe age of 81, he died at Guntur.

Unnava's classic, Malapalli, originally published in 1922-23, was reprinted by the Sahitya Akademi in 1976. Nayakuralu was published by Triveni Publishers. In connection with the Centenary of Unnava, Society for Social Change, Kavali, published Some Works of Unnava in 1980.

G.Sr.

LAKSHMISHA (Kannada; b. 1520) is generally believed to have been a native of Devanur in Kadur taluk, Chickamagalur district, in Karnataka. He composed his Jaimini-bharata in vardhaka shatpadi, a six-lined deshi (native) metre which is the best specimen of that style. He was an ardent devotee of Lakshmi Ramana Swami, the presiding deity of Devanur to whom he dedicated his work. Lakshmisha hailed from a family of Bhagavata tradition. His father's name was Annamanka and he calls himself Annamarika suta in his introductory chapters of Jaimini-bharata. He acquired the epithet, Karnatakakavi Chutavanachaitra.

He chose Jaimini-bharata in Sanskrit for his Kannada rendering, which relates the story of horse sacrifice performed by Yudhishtira with the aid of Lord Krishna. Though its theme is based on the original Sanskrit work, Lakshmisha had shown his personal skill in the matter of description and delineation of characters. His work is an abridged version of the Sanskrit Jaimini-bharata where he has made some welcome omission from the original. He has displayed a great mastery in the weaving of a wreath of images and produced a symphony of sounds which makes one enjoy the rhythmic charm of music in his poetry. In his use of metre and language, he has combined the classical and popular trends with a happy blend of erudition and ease.

His is the superb art of story telling in verse. The chapters dealing with Sita vanavasa and the story of Chandrahasta are noted for his narrative presentation. He has highlighted the treatment of Krishna bhakti found in the original and made it the central point of his work. As a result, all the main characters in his stories of horse sacrifice, Yavanasva Sudhanva, Babhruvahana, Chandrahasta and others are portrayed as ardent lovers of Lord Sri Krishna.

His work is enjoyed both by the learned and unlearned and is universally studied. The work enjoys immense popularity even to this day. Modern critics complimented him with the epithets Upamatola and Nadatola (Reveller in similes and melody).

LAL DED (LALLESHVARI) (Kashmiri) is also known as Lalla Yogishvari, Lalla Yogini, Lalla Arifa and Lalla Matschi. It is said that she was also known by the name of Padmavati during her married life. Born sometime between 1300 and 1320, during the last phase of Hindu rule in Kashmir, in a Sarasvati brahman family in the hamlet of Sihampora, a village 5 miles from Srinagar on Jammu-Srinagar national highway, she was named Lalleshvari. It is said that she was married at the tender age of twelve in a brahman family of the then Padmanpora, now known as Pampore. She suffered the pangs of starvation, neglect, ill-treatment and rebukes of her mother-in-law for quite sometime. But she remained firm in her quest for the eternal. In fact this quest was ingrained in her nature from the very childhood. In her spiritual journey she was initiated by the family priest, Sidda Moul, but she very soon overtook him.

Her matured spiritual attainments helped her to break the shackles at last. She renounced her husband's home and took to wanderings and 'tapas' (penances).

Absorbed in eternal bliss of her attainments, she lived the life of a wandering ascetic till she breathed her last. She proceeded on her heavenly journey from Vijeeroor, a place of historical fame. Like the year of her birth, the year of her death is also not recorded anywhere. The Rishinama of Baba Nasib-ud-Din Ghazi, the oldest document of its kind, and written ninety years after the death of Nund Rishi, records that when Nund Rishi was born, he refused to take his mother's breast-milk. Those present were very much perturbed. In the meantime, Lal Ded appeared there. She took the infant in her lap and said to him: 'Yaina mandachhokh na vuni chhokh tsana mandchhan.' (When you are not ashamed of your birth, why are you ashamed of sucking the breast of your mother?)

Leaving aside the legendary aspect of this episode, it may be assumed that at the time of Nund Rishi's birth, Lal Ded was very much alive. After this episode, there is nothing recorded in the Rishinama, which could make us believe that she lived for a longer time. In this way we can conclude that she departed for her heavenly abode sometime between 1377 (the year of Nund Rishi's birth) and 1380.

Her contemporary historian, Jone Raja, is silent about her. It is Nund Rishi, her junior-most contemporary, the great patron saint of Kashmir, who longs to attain the spiritual greatness of Lal Ded, and establishes the historicity of mother Lalla in the following words, "That Lalla Padmanpora, who sipped the nectar at ease, beheld Shiva all around her. Oh! God, bestow upon me the attainments you bestowed upon her."

Lal Ded was a Shaiva 'yogini' of high order. She was against all rituals, including idol worship, because Shaivism emancipates the man from all sorts of restrictions and leads him to self-illumination. Shaivism or 'Trika' knows no caste, creed or colour. A seeker of truth, irrespective of all restrictions, is sure to know his self. The greatest contribution of Lal Ded lies in the fact that she made Shaivism understandable to common man. She talked to them in their own language and made this faith of intellectuals the faith of everybody. She derived her terms, word-choard and expression from the Shaiva shastras and made it a legacy of common people.

Some later Persian historians and biographers have recorded at length her meeting with Shah Hamada. To set the records right, their writings have no material basis, as this episode is nowhere mentioned by her near contemporaries or anywhere in the contemporary records of the 14th century. Similarly, she has not been in anyway influenced by the Islamic mysticism. However, she treated the Hindus and the Muslims alike as is clear in her following 'vakh'.

Shiv chhi thali ahali rozan
Mo zan huind tah Musalman
Truook aay chukh tah pan parzanav

LAL DED

Soye chi sahibas zanee zan (God is everywhere, do not discriminate between the Hindu and the Muslim. If you are wise, try to know yourself and this is the only way to know God).

It is 'Trika' which pours through her vakhs. Trika is the philosophy of unity of being which comes close to the Islamic concept of 'Tauhid' (believing in the unity of God). Her opposition to rituals and idol worship does not mean that she had given up her own path. She was inclined to serve her own faith, because Kashmir Shaivism stands for all that she preached and practised. If, in any way, she was influenced by Islamic tenets, the question arises as to why Lal Ded was full of passion for all living creatures and opposed to all sorts of violence. And then, there is no evidence of Islamic mysticism in her vakhs, for the simple reason that at that time Islamic mysticism had yet to establish itself in Kashmir.

The poetry of Lal Ded is classed as 'vakh' in Kashmiri. Vakh is basically a Sanskrit word meaning speech, but in Kashmiri it is a form of poetry confined to Shaiva poets alone.

Vakh is normally a four line stanza, but sometimes it goes beyond this limit. Its rhyme scheme, too, is not always uniform. The vakhs of Lal Ded are the sacred lore of Kashmir. Every Kashmiri dances to the tune of vakhs, but only a few can fully understand them. The vakhs of Lal Ded constitute the most valued treasure of Kashmiri language. Her vakhs glow with her spiritual grandeur and attainments. She is great because she has successfully made her vakhs the vehicle of her experiences. Every word is pregnant with meaning and every vakh opens new vistas of speculation and thinking for the reader. Even today some people recite these vakhs for spiritual enlightenment. She is great not because she had reached the abode of 'Parmashiva' but because her poetry is great. It is ever refreshing and makes the reader think again and again. Lal Ded has influenced many generations of Kashmiri poets, particularly the sufi poets. Almost all of them have acknowledged her greatness in writing. Her multi-dimensional poetry always produces a cooling and soothing effect on the reader or the listener. It is because of this that every Kashmiri folk-singer starts with the recitation of her vakhs. These vakhs have attained the status of sayings, allegories and parables in Kashmiri. Bhaskar Razdan, a Shaiva savant of the 18th century, was the first to compile the first Anthology of vakhs of Lal Ded. The anthology contains 60 vakhs along with their Sanskrit rendering and explanation by the compiler. He wrote the manuscript in Sharda script and it was later published by the State Research Department in 1919. Two copies of this manuscript are preserved in the Stein collection of Oxford University.

Rishinama of Baba Kamal-ul-Din and Baba Khalil have a separate chapter about Lal Ded. Some of her vakhs are scattered in the body of both these Rishinamas. There are 30 vakhs of Lal Ded recorded in Baba Khalil's Rishinama and 25 in Baba Kamal's manuscript. Lalla is the first among the host of Kashmiri poets who attracted the attention of the European Orientalists. Her vakhs were for the first time collected and translated into English by George Abraham Grierson. The book with the text in Roman and a detailed introduction by L.D. Barnett was published in 1920 from London under the caption Lalla vakyani.

Richard Temple rendered her vakhs again in English and published his book The Word of Lalla in 1924.

A critical edition of her vakhs along with the versified Urdu translation, edited by Jayalal Kaul and N.L. Talib, was published by Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy in 1961. This edition has run into two editions so far and its third edition is under process.

A Hindi version of her vakhs was prepared and published by S.N. Bhatta Haleem in the Lal Ded Number of Koshur Samachar (1971). This very rendering was later published by the State Cultural Academy in book form. In the very Special Number of Koshur Samachar, English translation of the vakhs of Lal Ded was published. The English rendering is by J.N. Bhan. The Sahitya Akademi has published a monograph on her entitled Lal Ded written by Jayalal Kaul, in 1973. This monograph contains, besides her life and role in shaping the language and culture of Kashmir, English rendering of 138 vakhs. The Hindi translation of this monograph by S.K. Raina appeared in 1980 and its Urdu version by Motilal 'Saqi' is expected to be published by the Sahitya Akademi shortly.

Year 1980-81 was celebrated in Jammu and Kashmir State as 'Lal Ded Year'. During this year, special seminars, debates and mushairas were organised on the life and works of Mother Lalla. In addition to these activities, her vakhs were translated in Dogri and Punjabi, and published in book form by the State Cultural Academy. Special commemorative volumes of Shiraza (Kashmiri, Urdu, and Pahari) were published. A competition of paintings based on her vakhs was arranged by the Cultural Academy and cash awards were given. The Sahitya Akademi organised a National Seminar in her honour. The seminar which continued for three days in the Government Education College, Srinagar, was attended by scholars from all over the country.

The Kannada version of the vakhs of Lal Ded appeared in early seventies. Lal Ded is the only poetess of Kashmir who has attracted scholars and researchers again and again. Books continue to be written about her. B.N. Parimo is the last man so far who published a comprehensive book, Ascent of Self (1982), on her life and contribution.

Lalleshwari is the only luminary of Kashmiri literature about whom more than thirty books have been published so far.

LAL, LAKSHMI NARAYAN (Hindi; b. 1927, d. 1987) one of the most versatile writers of post-Independence era in Hindi, was born in an ordinary Kayastha family in village Jalalpur of district Basti in Uttar Pradesh. Commencing his educational career in his village, he later shifted to Allahabad to study for his B.A. and M.A. degrees from that University in 1948 and 1950 respectively. Two years later, he obtained his Ph.D. degree on Hindi kahani kin shilpavidhi from the same university. He taught for a number of years in Chandausi and Allahabad and, in the meanwhile, established a 'Natya Kendra' at Allahabad. In 1965, Lal shifted to the S.G.T.B. Khalsa College, Delhi University, and taught there for about seven years. He then had a short stint with the National Book Trust, New Delhi, as Editor in 1972.

Lal is an important and versatile writer of the post-Independence era. Apart from being a fictionist, essayist, literary critic and thinker, Lal was a pioneer in the resurgence of the Hindi play and stage. To the modern Hindi novel, he endeavoured to impart a new lyrical temper, dignity, idealism and a sense of values.

Through his plays, widely staged and acclaimed, Lal brings the reader face to face with the destiny of the conceited individualistic life of the modern man. The Yaksha-prashna, Vyaktigat, Abdullah diwana, Curfew, etc. are remarkable plays from this point of view. In Kalanki, we find a resentment, albeit quiet, against exploitation. The content of Ek Satya Harishchandra is almost the same—status quo as a device to exploit the common man.

Amongst the modern playwrights in Hindi, Lal made a mark as one of the most alert writers devoted to experimentation. He has experimented both with the content and craft in his novels. From the viewpoint of the use of myths in plays, his experiments have attracted the attention of both scholars of drama and stage artists. Plays that deserve mention here are Sharanagat, Surya-mukh, Navsinghkanth, Ek Satya Harishchandra, Yaksha-prashna, Uttar-yudha and Kalanki.

Amongst his novels, the most talked of are Man Vrindavan and Prem apavitra nadi. The former is a love story which has been transformed into a philosophy of love by the author. The author has succeeded in providing a new sensitive base to a traditional subject which is supposed to have no scope for a novel interpretation. The latter novel has the philosophy of love as its background. Love is a divine experience of the human mind. Social traditions and religious beliefs envelope it by considerations of holy and unholy, thus defiling its purity and spontaneity.

His major published works are as follows: Plays: Mada cactus, Darpan, Ratrani, Sunder rasa, Sukha sarovar, Rakta-kamal, Kalanki, Mr. Abhimanyu, Surya-mukh, Curfew, Abdullah diwana, Vyaktigat, Yaksha prashna, Ek Satya Harish-chandra, Sabrang, Mohabhang, Panch-purush, Narsinghkatha, Gangabhiti, Ram ki larai; One Act Play Collections: Dusra darwaza, Natak bahurangi, Natak bahurupi, Khel nahin natak; Novels: Kale phul ka paudha, Baya ka ghaunsla aur sanp, Rupajiva, Bari champa chhoti champa, Man-Vrindavan, Prem pavitra nadi, Divana, Hara samandra Gopichandra, Shrinagar, Vasant ki pratiksha; Short Story Collections: Sune angan ras barsai, Ek aur kahani, Ek bund jal, Daku aye the; Biography: Jai Prakash; Research: Hindi kahani ki shilpavidhi, Parasi Hindi rangmanch aur natak, Rangmanch aur natak ki bhumika; Politics: Nirmul vriksha ka phal—Bharatiya rajniti ka charitra.

LAL, PURUSHOTTAM (English, b. 1929) is an Indo-English poet, critic, editor and publisher. Migrating to Calcutta with his parents at the age of one, Lal was educated in the same city, where he is now an Honorary Professor of English. He founded, in 1958, the Writers' Workshop, a publishing house which has, during the last twenty years, unceasingly encouraged the growth and development of Indo-English literature in both its creative and critical aspects. The bi-monthly journal, The Miscellany (1961) edited by Lal is an organ of the Writers' Workshop.

Among Lal's principal volumes of verse are The Parrot's Death and Other Poems (1960), "Change"! They Said (1966), Draupadi and Jayadratha and Other poems (1967), Yakshi from Didarganj and Other Poems (1969) and The Man of Dharma and the Rasa of Silence (1974). His Collected Poems appeared in 1977. He has also published a number of 'transcreations' including those of the Bhagvad Gita (1965), the Dhammapada (1967) and Ghalib's Love Poems (1971). His 'transcreation' in prose and verse, of the Mahabharata, of which sixty volumes have already appeared, is an ambitious project begun in 1968. Modern Indo-Anglian Poetry (1959), an anthology edited by him with K.R. Rao, spearheaded the revolt against romanticism. His Concept of an Indian Literature: Six Essays (1968), stresses the importance of myth in creative literature. Lal's early verse, 'full of apples, birds, white roses and bees,' has often the delicacy, grace and charm of the Chinese (Sung) landscape painting. From this scene of 'dew filigreeing the grass', he soon entered a world of increasing awareness of social realities and life's sorrows. However, these later perceptions are not yet firmly crystallized. His 'transcreations' are eminently readable and are apt at places to bend the spirit of the ancient original to the needs of modern literary taste.

Lal was awarded the Jawaharlal Nehru Fellowship in 1969-70 and a Padma Shri in 1970.

LAL SINGH 'KAMLA AKALI' (Punjabi; b. 1889, d. 1979) was born at Bhanohar, Dist. Ludhiana. A journalist, essayist and travelogue writer of prominence, he belonged to a marshal family. His father, Bhagwan Singh, a Veterinary Surgeon, served in the army, was in Burma for a pretty long time and earned the title of Sardar Bahadur for his meritorious services. Kamla Akali went to England in 1927 after doing his B.Sc. and LL.B from the Punjab University and did his M.Sc. in 1929 from the Imperial College of Science and Technology, London. He was associated with the Akali movement and wrote a pamphlet 'Kamla Akali' after which the pen-name stuck to him. From 1943 to 46, he served as Managing Editor of the daily Ajit (Urdu). He was member of the Punjab Legislative Assembly from 1937 to 1945. He was honoured as a writer by the Punjab Government in 1964.

With his first writing, Mera vilaiti safarnama (1929), a travelogue, he established himself as a writer in the lighter vein. Even when dealing with a serious subject like death, he does not lose his Punjabi characteristic humour and satire which are very purposeful and lively in expression. His important writings are: Collections of literary essays: Jiwan niti (The guiding philosophy of life, 1948); Man di mauj (ecstasy of the mind, 1955); Vigianik lekh (Scientific essays); Kamalan di kot (Summits of perfection, 1970); Philosophic writing: Maut Sani da Ghund (1935). Travelogues: Mera Vilaiti safarnama (1929); Sailani deshbhagat (The travelling patriot, 1954).

LALA LAKHMAN (Kashmiri, b. 1892, d. 1962). Lachman Razdan, popularly known as Lala Lakhman, was born at village Hanand Chawalgam of Kulgam district. He was a devotee of Ganesha and wrote 'Lilas' and 'Bhajans'. Lachman Razdan was named Lala after his friend of Kamraz (the North Valley), whose name was Lala Lakhman. He was traditionally educated, and studied Gulistan and Bostan of Saadi. Lala never cared to record his verses. His humorous verses were so popular that his contemporary friends and relatives which included men and women, preserved these in their memories and in this way they saved Lal from dying unsung and unheard. Lala Lakhman lived a very hard life. In his early life, he kept watch over the fields of the village, and later, joined Posts and Telegraph Department as 'Postman' till his retirement. He did not succeed in writing serious verses and turned to humorous poetic compositions. He often composed poetry extempore and his verses often suffer from prosodic flaws. At times, he transgresses the limits of social decorum. His poetry mostly falls in the category of sarcasm and lampoon. It does not have the precision demanded by the effective satire. His humorous poems 'Tota Gudrin chai' (Tea at Totaram's house at Gudar), 'Sarwa mazkury kandury wan' and other humorous poems on and or about a marriage party, bakery and the like, became very popular. He has immensely and effectively used ritualistic terms in vogue in Kashmiri Pandit families. He has a typical and individual style of his own. He effectively begins his poem about his unpleasant profession of watching the fields thus: It was the twelfth of the dark fortnight. The moon was in Taurus and a Saturday to boot, when Lala and Lakhman set out on that ill-fated day to handle a job which they had not learnt to handle before.

LALANSHAH FAKIR (Bengali) was born of Hindu parents probably in 1775 in Bhanrra village in the district of Kushthia (now in Bangladesh). He married early. While on a pilgrimage he fell ill and was deserted by his fellow-pilgrims. He was tenderly nursed back to health by a Muslim family. When the Hindus refused to take him back into their fold he took to the Fakir cult, married a woman of the Muslim Momin community, built an ashrama in Senuria village and from then on lived a sequestered life. He was described as a man with a long beard and long hair. He was blind of one eye but his eyes were large and the one with which he could see was deep and penetrating. It is not known for certain how long he lived but from an announcement printed in 1891 in the fortnightly Hitakari it appears that he died in that year at the age of 116.

Lalanshah was a fakir singer. Nowhere in the whole gamut of Bengali literature are the feelings and wisdom of different sects and communities better integrated than in the works of the baul and the fakir poets. They combined in their works the spirit of the Buddhist Sahajiya cult, the non-conformism of the Vaishnava movement and the radicalism of the Sufis. Lalanshah inherited all this from his predecessors. Thus he could sing both as a Muslim and as a Hindu with equal ease and sincerity. He could sing of the Navi and also of the Hindu gods:

The flower floats in the formless
Vishnu, Hara and Purandara
This their flower burgeons into the Mother-flower.

Lalanshah places man above everything else:

Shall I again be born as a man?
Even the gods for ever strive to be born as men.

He sees the history of man as a continuous search for the essence of humanity:

That Man is there in men
(That Man) whom through ages
The sages have been seeking.

Only love can be the true guide in this quest:

O the Man of the Light for ever is in the Light
But none can see him save the Lover.

Lalanshah uses ordinary words but invests them with a rich suggestiveness as in:

Who is he that lives inside my house?
I have not seen him yet though all this life

I have striven to see him.
Or in:

I have not seen him,
My neighbour, who lives next door
In the City of Mirrors.

Much of Lalashah's works are lost. Some of them were retrieved. They were later published in a volume by Calcutta University.

LALAS PIRDAN (Rajasthani; b. 1663, d. 1736) was an eminent devotee poet of Rajasthani. He was born at Judiya village of Marwad in Lalas sub-caste of Charan, a caste which is known for its poetry dedicated to the praise of patron Rajas. He accepted Barhat Isardas as his 'Bhava guru', who, too, was a saint and a devotee poet. The works of Pirdan Lalas differ from traditional Charan poetry. His seven poetic works and thirty Dingal songs were composed in the year 1734-35. All his poems were composed in the devotion of the gods or the goddesses like Rama, Krishna, Hinglaj Devi, etc. Some times he shows his devotion to 'Nirgun' also. In Narain neh, he recognises Narain as almighty and all pervading. In Parmesh-var Purna, he bows before many devotees of different sects. Some of them are unknown. Hinglaj rasau is praise poetry of the great goddess Hinglaj, who is known for her bravery. In Alakh aradh, the poet recognises Nirgun Brahma as supreme, who incarnates in the forms of Rama, Krishna, etc. He is Allah of Islam. Ajampa jap describes the way of devotion and says that inhalation and exhalation should accompany the name of God. Jnan charit speaks of the spiritual knowledge which reveals the ultimate truth. In Patig pahar, the poet praises the name of God which is the sole means to attain salvation. His thirty songs are also based on similar themes.

Pirdan's poetry is more a revelation to him than a poetic attainment. Therefore, in the application of rules to the forms of poetry and the metrical composition, he is weak. His metres are doha, chaupai, kavita, paddhari, etc. He is a poet of devotion, valour and spiritualism and believes in harmonious blending of different religions and sects.

LALAS SITARAM (Rajasthani; b. 1908), an eminent lexicographer of the Rajasthani language, lost his father, Hathiram, when he was only two and a half years old. He was brought up by his maternal grand father, Sadulaji, who was a learned scholar and an eminent poet. Sitaram got his primary education at Saravadi village and was, later on, admitted in the Rajamahar Middle School and Darabar High School, Jodhapur for further education. After completing his education upto high school, he started his career as a teacher.

LALAS UMARADAN-LALBAI

He learnt Sanskrit from Bhagavatilal, to whom he duly pays his gratitude. He studied Rajasthani literature under the guidance of Panaram Motisar, a Kabir-panthi sadhu and an esteemed scholar of Rajasthani language and literature. Along with this he developed his interest in the deep study of lexicography and turned out to be an eminent lexicographer of the Rajasthani language. After researching for about 30 years in this branch of knowledge, he brought out in series the dictionary of Rajasthani language under the title Rajasthani shabada kosha, which contains about one hundred seventyfive thousand words in 3350 printed pages. It has been published by the Rajasthani Sodha Sansthan, Chopasani, Jodhapur with the financial aid of the Government of India and the Government of Rajasthan. Its abridged edition is also under publication by the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute, Jodhapur. Sitaram Lalas was honoured for this work with the doctoral degree by the University of Jodhapur.

He has also written a book on the grammar of the Rajasthani language (Rajasthani vyakarana) and has produced critical editions of a number of unknown works of Dingala and Pingala and, thus, has brought to light a precious hidden treasure of Rajasthani language and literature. His edited works are Vadada singara, Premasimha rupaka, Raghuvarajasa prakasha and Suraja prakasa, published by the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute, Jodhapur.

LALAS, UMARADAN (Rajasthani; b.1851, d.1903) was born at Dhadharavada village in Phalaudi district of Jodhapur state. He was the youngest son of Bakshiram Lalas. His two other brothers were Navaladan and Sobhjudan. His parents died when he was a child and there was no one to look after him. He, therefore, turned into a naughty boy. He did not get proper treatment from his brothers, and became a disciple of a Ramasanehi saint Manjiram. He remained in this sect upto the age of nineteen, and returned home thereafter. In 1879, he joined a school and studied English upto the 4th standard. He acquired proficiency in Dingala and Pingala, and the English languages on his own efforts.

In due course, with his qualities and ability he gained the favour of Maharaja Jasavant Simha II of Jodhpur, who sent him to Udaipur on a mission to invite Swami Dayananda Sarasvati, the founder of Arya Samaj, in 1883.

Since then, he held the Arya Samaj ideology in great reverence.

He was a man of easy-going nature, and looked like a peasant in his simple attire. He always used to be in a humorous mood. If anyone asked him about his whereabouts, his reply would be that he had no place to live in and, therefore, he kept roaming from place to place.

He entertained revolutionary and progressive views, which could be found abundantly in his writings. He was a man of firm determination, and served the society as a poet upto his death.

His poems are full of insinuations. He seems to be an expert in striking furiously against the social evils with his uncompromising language and sharp mode of expression. He has also attacked the evils prevalent among the ruling princes and in their states. The general trend of his poetry is inclined towards the exposition of the prevailing social evils.

His descriptions are charming and impressive, loaded with popular similes and sayings. He wrote his verse in easy Rajasthani.

His popular poems are 'Chappana-ro-chanda' (A poem on the famine of, 1899), 'Kaladar karamat' (A magic of coin), 'Abara-ko-hala' (A description of today), 'Dafola dundi' (A proclamation of fools), 'Vyabhichar-kiburai' (The evils of corruption), 'Daru-ra-dosha' (The evil of liquor), 'Dharma kasauti' (A touch-stone of religion), 'Olamo' (A censure), 'Amala-ra-ogana' (The evil of opium) and many others. Two of his works Jasvanta-jasa-jalada and Dafolashataka were published during his life time.

He has not only lamented the down fall of Rajaputa clan in his poems, but has also abused the fashion of modern days and the brutality and apathy of the British regime towards their subjects.

He composed his beautiful and inspiring poems in the metres like 'chappaya', 'sikharani', 'madhubhara', 'naracha', 'trotaka', 'doha', 'motidama', 'lakhani', 'gagghara nisani', 'shloka', 'kavitta' and 'kundaliya'. He used to compose poems in Pingala also.

He was interested in searching out the old manuscripts of history and poetry. He was the first scholar who searched out the manuscript of Viruda chahattari by Dursa Adha.

The death of his elder son, Agarandan in 1900 at the age of eighteen, brought him profound grief beyond his bearing and he died within a period of three years after the incident.

A collection of his poems was published in 1906 under the title Umar kavya. The 2nd and the 3rd editions were published in 1912 and 1930.

LALBAI (Bengali) is a historical romance by Ramapada Choudhury. During the reign of Aurangzeb, the Malla

LALCHAND AMARD'INOMAL JAGTIANI—LALDASJI

dynasty ruled the state of Bishnupur in Bengal. Raghunath Singh was its crown prince. Krishnaram was the Raja of Burdwan and Shobha Singh was the Zamindar of Midnapur. Shobha Singh rose against the Mughals and attacked Burdwan because Krishnaram supported the Mughals. Krishnaram's daughter, Satyabati, who secretly loved Sobha Singh, slew him. Raghunath married Chandraprabha, the daughter of the slain chieftain. Raghunath had a passion for music and was indifferent to the affairs of the state. But he soon fell victim to another passion, which brought about his ruin. Lalbai, originally a slave, had found her way to be one of the most coveted of the courtesans. When Aurangzeb promulgated a ban on music she came to Bishnupur where she met Raghunath. They fell in love. So great was Raghu's infatuation that he decided to make Lalbai's son heir to his throne. People were outraged by the prospect of a concubine's son ruling over them. They rose in revolt. Chandraprabha the queen herself took the life of her husband to save the country from ignominy. An angry mob put to death Lalbai and her son.

The novel is well-knit and the narrative engaging. The characters are painted in strong, simple strokes. The romantic anecdote is woven into the description of the historical turmoil. Lalbai has run through fifteen editions so far and is considered to be in line with the glorious tradition of Bankimchandra Chatterjee's famous historical romances.

LALCHAND AMARD'INOMAL JAGTIANI (Sindhi; b.1885, d.1954), after Matriculation and S.T.C., served as a teacher in N.H.Academy, Hyderabad and Singh Muslim Madrasa, Karachi. While preparing for higher studies through his own efforts, he was rusticated along with Acharya J.B.Kripalani for taking part in the nationalistic activities. Subsequently, he tried to qualify for legal practice, but failed and temporarily worked as an income-tax expert instead. He graduated in 1916 and established Tilak Qoumi Vidyalaya followed by a college for girls and S.N.D.T. School in Karachi. After Partition, this school was transferred to Bombay where the education of girl students was entrusted to him.

During Non-cooperation Movement, he was jailed for an year. Being a non-sectarian by temperament, he consorted well with his Muslim friends and wrote a book on the prophet Muhammad entitled Muhammad Rasul Allah (Hyderabad, Sindh, 1911). Similarly under the influence of romantic vedantism, he dilated on the life of Rama Tirth in 1914. Lalchand was one of the initiators in the art of novel writing in Sindhi, and he depicted the highly wrought feelings of a lover, when women were still in 'parda' (veil). In 1906, he turned his attention to the widely prevalent evil of dowry which tended to bankrupt some middle class families. His abiding interest in politics led him to found Bandematram Mandi for staging his own one-act plays like Amaldar kina azaru (1921) for popularising 'swadeshi' and denouncing the 'bosses-tormentors of the people'. However his last political play Vachan (pledge), dealing with respective view points of Annie Bessant and Gandhiji, was written in 1946, slightly before the actual creation of Pakistan. In 1923, the 'Rabindra Tagore Club' was inaugurated by the poet himself. Two years later, the Club staged Lalchand's play Umar-Marui (Hyderabad, Sindh, 1925), which in popularity succeeded all the other performances of those days in Sindh. However, another of his folk-plays flopped due to some of its drawbacks.

He was closely connected with the work of Sindhi Sahit Society, which aimed at creating interest in the study of great writers, both eastern and western. He also initiated the critical study of Shah Abdul Latif, Sachal and Gul. A collection of his original essay Phulani muthi (A handful of pop born, Hyderabad, Sindh, 1927) bears the unmistakable stamp of his idiomatic style. His notable skill in literary craftsmanship is also evident in his rendering of Golden Hearts and Sacrifice to Truth. In emulation of Tagore's Gardener, he wrote Sada gulab (Ever rose). His Musafiria jo mazo (Joy of travel, 1925) and translation of a book on long life clearly indicated this trait.

His other works include: Senu kina venu (1911), Ram badshah (on Swamy Ram Tirth, 1912), Shahano Shah (1914), Sunharo Sachal (1916), Suhini Mehar (1939), Chothi jo chand (Novel, Forth night of moon, Hyderabad, Sindh, 1947).

LALDASJI (Rajasthani; b.1540, d.1648) was born at Dholidup village near Alwar (Rajasthan state) in a poor Muslim family of Mev community. His father's name was Chandamal and his mother's name was Samda. After residing for some time at Dholidup, Bandholi, Todi and Rasgan, he settled at Nagla where he lived for forty years till his death. The final burial rites were performed at Sherpur (Baghera district). These places are in the Alwar-Bharatupur region and occupy a place of special importance in his sect. He was a householder, and earned his livelihood by manual labour. By virtue of his devotion, the pursuit of the divine goal and the deeds of public welfare, he soon became famous. Many Hindus and Muslims became his disciples. Among his disciples, and the disciples of his disciples were Haridas, Dungarsi Sadha, Pranisadha, Bhikhana Sadha.

He left behind a new sect known as 'Lalpanth' named after him, the tradition of which survives even to this day. Laldasji's works are available largely through the oral tradition. At present, over 700 'sakhis' (dohas), approximately 600 'padas' and a work entitled Chetavani are credited to him, but the entire bulk does not belong to him. As the poet has survived as a literary artist largely through the oral tradition, his language has undergone a slight modification. Actually his language was Mevati, which was spoken in the Mevat region in his times. Laldasji, his disciples and the disciples of his disciples took to the Vaishnavite Hindu way of life. He held that a saint or an ascetic should avoid eating in excess. Recitation of the divine word 'Rama' and singing aloud the praises of God constitute the path for the pursuit of a divine goal. He believes in a formless, shapeless manifestation of Rama. In his 'padas' we also get a glimpse of the worship of the formless aspect of God in the manner of the love of a lady for her beloved. He taught how to control the mind and the senses. It is noteworthy that he laid stress on devotion to Rama and condemned 'yoga'. Condemnation of yoga is an innovative step in the tradition of saints.

Details regarding the life of Laldasji are available in Dungarsi's work Shri Laldasji ki vani which has been published.

LALIT (Janmashankar Mahashankar Buch; Gujarati; b.1877, d.1947) was a Gujarati poet born in a Vadnagra Nagar family. He was well versed in Sanskrit, English, Vraj and Gujarati literatures and served as a teacher in High School at Gondal for 6 years. He edited the Kalwawas Times (Rajkot) for two years and served as a public consultant at the library of the Baroda State for eight years. Inspired by the national movement, Lalit joined the National University, Bombay in 1921 as the teacher of the Gujarati language and literature, from 1938 till death, he spent his years of retirement with the Thakora Saheb of Lathi. He started writing poetry since 1893 and his poems were published occasionally in periodicals like Chandra, Sudarshan, etc. His collections of poems are: Lalitnan kavyo (1912), Vadodarane vadalo (1914), Lalitnam bijan kavyo (1932) and Lalitno lalkar (1952). Lalit's poetry is marked by description of nature, patriotism, glory of freedom, praise for Gujarat and praises for many other places. Some of his poems are also topical and of general nature; some again are children's songs. Lalit's forte is his devotion to God as depicted in his songs. Apart from and songs, he also tried his hand at metrical poems both long and short. The use of the 'Harini' metre is more prominent in his poems but he has done better in his poems composed in the 'Vasantatilaka' and 'Mandakranta' metres. His poems have many limitations. However, simple and melodious composition of songs, pleasant metrical compositions, expressions of tender family sentiments and graceful diction are the main attractions of his poetic art.

LALITA (Marathi) is an old form of Marathi drama. In the Maharashtra shabda kosha (Dictionary) there are two meanings given to this term: 1. In Navaratra festival, on the last day when the deities are on their thrones, Vasudeva, Dandigana and other devotees take different roles of cult-followers and beg the 'prasada' (blessings) of the deities. 2. In any festival assuming different forms and presenting plays.

Ananda Coomaraswamy thinks 'lalita' is derived from the Sanskrit 'lila'. Marathi saints have composed 'abhangas' on Krishnalila. There is great similarity in Raslila of Braja, Krishnalila folk plays of Bengal and Bhagavat of Karnataka. No much information is available of the earliest lalitas. But there was Vedantic didacticism mellowed with religious entertainment in such plays. There used to be twenty-five to thirty characters, like the guards (Chhadidar, Bhaladar, Chopdar), Vasudeva, Dandigana, Gondhali, Vaghya-Murali, the deaf, dumb and blind and so on. Lalita concluded with the killing of Ravana by Rama. They used to show different playlets of ten incarnations of Vishnu (Dashavatara). When Vishnudas Bhave started Marathi drama in the beginning of the nineteenth century, it was based on these folk plays.

The Lalita stage was generally one to one and a half feet high, made of wooden planks placed on benches of 12 by 18 feet. There was no curtain. At one side of the stage the musical accompanists sat, the boys who repeated the chorus or supported the actors sat behind. Actors used to enter and exit from the other side of the stage. The 'sutradhar', 'nati' and 'nat' did not have any striking dress. But the clown had baggy trousers and a long frock-like tunic, a tall cap and a mirror in his hand. He used to have a big mark on his forehead.

The children sang the chorus in the beginning. Then the sutradhar and his supporters entered the stage. They would sing in praise of Ganapati. The clown cut a joke or two. Sutradhar would sing and then the nati (actress) would enter. Sutradhar would ask for her help to stage a lalita, and then both would sing a duet. The first scene would be, thus, over. Then the chief dramatis personae would enter the stage. The guard has a all-red dress. The patil (headman) his yellow dress and a belt. Both would speak in Hindi. Some lalita texts are in Hindi. Even in the songs used; some Hindi words are discreetly interspersed. According to V.K. Joshi; this was due to the fact that these shows were done in Uttar Pradesh and other northern Indian places and, therefore, Hindi was freely used. Others think it as an influence of the Muslim rule, as there are many Urdu and Persian words in Marathi too.

Then the village priest would enter. He would talk ill of his wife and entertain the audience by funny songs. The king's priest would enter and both would have a verbal duel. The patil would speak in Marathi and the jangam (mendicant) would speak in Kannada and the communication gap would be a good subject for comedy. Then would follow the Kashi-Kapadi, Vaghya-Murali and other characters who would have a dialogue with patil, full of wit and humour. The lalitas are staged from midnight till the morning. Eknath's 'Bharuda' (absurd poems) were presented dramatically in such folk plays.

LALITA (Telugu). Romantic period in Telugu started with Royaprolu Subbarao, the author of the poem 'Lalita'. He is the propounder of 'amalina shringara' (Platonic love) in Telugu literature. This concept of love goes beyond that of the physical union of man and woman. What starts at the physical level between man and wife, gradually reaches the mind, growing beyond mere sex, and reaches a stage where the man and woman are more like friends, their sympathetic understanding of each other growing deeper, finer and more enduring. Where mere physical bodies meet, it is sex: where two selves, two hearts and two souls link, it is platonic love.

Royaprolu believed in this theory and composed many 'kavyas' to exemplify it. Some of his works were original and others translations. He composed 'Lalita' on the lines of Goldsmith's 'Hermit'. This was his first attempt at depicting platonic love. What attracted the poet to this story is the pure ideal of love. What he had to do was merely Indianising the names and situations. Thus was 'Lalita' a lovely romantic piece from Royapolu's pen.

Lalita was a princess. Her mother having died early, her father Jayapala brought her up tenderly. As she came of age, she loved a youth called Satyavardhana. Many princess sought her hand in marriage. And she could not open her heart either to her father or to her friends out of sheer modesty.

Satyavardhana though poor, had a high pedigree. Flawless in all else, his only flaw was that he loved Lalita with all his soul. But he was aware of the difference in their status, despaired of marrying her and went into the forest to live like a recluse. Coming to know of it Lalita left her father, her princely luxuries and her play-mates behind and went in search of her love, disguised as a young man. Darkness, loneliness, despair and love made her cry bitterly. Satyavardhana, whose hermitage was nearby, rushed to the spot and offered the youth his love and protection.

Satyavardhana was enamoured of the tender beauty of the stranger and Lalita was struck by the handsomeness of this young monk. The monk asked why the youth was lonely, helpless and weebegone. He philosophised over transience of all happiness and sorrow, wealth and poverty. he concluded by saying friendship alone was enduring. Slightly consoled, Lalita revealed her identity when Satyavardhana embraced her with irrepressible emotion. Lalita withdrew from the embrace and blamed the monk for taking advantage of her sex when he narrated to her his own story and their joy knew no bounds.

The poet depicted Lalita as the incarnation of womanly qualities, especially steadfastness. It was as though she had undergone penance as Parvati and forced heaven to grant her, her desire. The hero was a steadfast-lover who too was finally rewarded with his union with the beloved. The poet starts the narration with the lonely travellers's cry in wilderness; and the story comes to an end with the sweet re-union of the pair of lovers.

J.V.S.

LALITA DUKKHADARSHAK (Gujarati) is the first tragic play in Gujarati written by Ranchhodhbhai Udairam (1837-1923), who is regarded as the father of the Gujarati drama and theatre. Pointing out the social evils, this reformist writer narrates the atrocities perpetrated on women.

Lalita is a cultured and chaste woman. She has been married to Nandkumar who belongs to a rich family. Nandkumar is a stupid and licentious man. In the very beginning of their married life, Lalita is subjected to physical and mental tortures. The wayward Nandkumar, after inflicting physical tortures on her takes away all her jewellery and drives her out of the house. Lalita suffers all kinds of hardships, and finally falls into the hands of the ruler of Parvatpur. In order to free herself from his clutches she jumps into a river, but she is saved by a boatman, and through him again, she falls into the hands of a prostitute called Chandravali. From there she is kidnapped by an imposter, who is devoured by a tiger in the jungle. Lalita, too weary to move, somehow walks through the woods and ultimately reaches her town Champanagari. In the meantime, Lalita's in-laws sent the news to Champanagari about her death caused by a snakebite. The people at Champanagari, therefore, considering her a ghost, beat her mercilessly. These physical assaults prove fatal for her, and in her last moments, she narrates the sufferings of her miserable life and impresses upon them that the child-marriages should be stopped and the consent of both the boy and the girl should be obtained before fixing a marriage.

The story and plot of the play are highly dramatic, and because of the fast moving events, the play attracted the attention of the people of those times. But because of the far-fetched conclusions into tortures and hardships, and their magnified proportions, the play, instead of ending in natural tragedy, has become melodramatic. The portrayal of the characters of the play like Lalita, Nandan, Priyamvada, Chhaldas, etc, is noteworthy. This was just the beginning of the plays in Gujarati and, therefore, this play contained the elements of both the English and the Sanskrit drama. Just as in the Sanskrit play, there are passages of verse to suit certain sentiments, this play also has songs interspersed in it to suit the different situations and mental states of the characters. This feature, too, is something that obstructs the enjoyment of the play from the point of view of the modern theatre. But in the historical context, Lalita dukkhadarshak is a play that can be considered a milestone in an age where the literature was one of the means for social reform. When this play was first staged in Bombay before an invited audience of 1200 people, it was very well received. Inspired by the play, an old lady, who had fixed up the betrothal of her daughter without her consent, cancelled the ceremony.

LALITAMBIKA ANTHARJANAM (Malayalam; b. 1909), who is foremost among the women short story writers in Malayalam, was born at Kottavattam in Quilon district (Antharjanam means a Nampoothiri woman). She has made remarkable contributions as a poetess and a novelist also. She had her education and literary training at home. She started writing poetry from very early life and later switched over to fiction. Her first poem 'Lalitanjali' appeared in 1923 in the women's monthly Sarada. Collections of her poems have been published under the titles Lalitanjali (19 poems, 1937), Bhavadipiti (11 poems, 1944), Oru pottichchiri (8 poems 1958), Nisshabda sangeetam (11 poems, 1959) and Ayirattiri (63 poems, 1969). The thoughts developed in her poems vary from beautiful lullabies to highly philosophical ideologies. They reveal the mind of the woman in several manifestations such as bride, mother, housewife and heroine.

From childhood Antharjanam could understand the age-old social evils in the Nampoothiri community, particularly about the pathetic condition of their women. Hence she felt greater affinities not only for Nampoothiri women, but for all those who were repressed, exploited and enslaved, and she also challenged the ideologies that underrated human dignity and justice. Having been conscious of the inequalities rampant in the society she raised her powerful voice through her writing against all evils and pleaded for social change. Her first story 'Yatravasanam' (The end of the journey) was published in 1930. Thenceforward she wrote many short stories on various themes as exemplified by 'Pancharayumma' (A sweet kiss), Mootupatattil (Under the veil), 'Satyattinte swaram' (The voice of truth), 'Kuttasammatam' (The widow's confession), Pratikaradevata (Nemesis), etc. Pratikaradevata makes a strong indictment on the custom of 'Smarthavicharam', the cruel system of prosecuting a Nampoothiri woman suspected of adultery; and the story came as a bombshell in orthodox circles. During the annual conference of the Nampoothiri Yogakshema Sabha held at Haripad in 1935 Antharjanam was given an award in honour of her contributions for upholding the rights of Nampoothiri women.

Ambikanjali (1937), Mootupatattil (1946), Takarnna talamura (Fallen generation, 1949), Kalattinte etukal (Leaves of time, 1949), Kilivattililote (Through the window, 1950), Kotumkattil ninnu (from the storm, 1951), Gramabalika (The Village girl, 1951), Adyatte Kathakal (The earlier stories, 1954), Kanneerinte punchiri (Smile of the tears, 1955), Irupatu Varshangalkku shesham (Twenty years after, 1956), Agnipushpangal (Flowers of flame, 1960), Theranjetutta kathakal (Selected stories, 1966) and Satyattinte swaram (The voice of truth, 1960) are collections of her short stories. Sincerity, simplicity and moral excellence are the characteristics of her writing, and she has got a special gift of presenting the complex moments of human life.

Agnisakshi (Fire as witness, 1977), the only novel of Antharjanam, is unique in theme and style. It is visualised on a wide canvas, the course of the story taking on new dimensions, from the social circumstances of Kerala to the national liberation movement. A Nampoothiri woman named Thethikutty, the main character in the novel, raises herself as Devaki Manampilly and then as Devi Cahan in the course of her struggles to free herself, the society and the nation from slavery. Agnisakshi won the Sahitya Akademi Award, Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award, Vayalar Award and Otakkuzhal Award in 1977.

A pioneer in social reforms, Antharjanam has been associated with many's organisations. She has served as a member of the director board of Sahitya Pravarthaka Co-operative Society and the State Textbook Committee and also as the Vice President of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi.

LALITAVISTARA (Sanskrit) is a Sanskrit Buddhist text of great importance. Apart from being a biography of Buddha, originally of the Sarvastivada School of the Hinayana sect, it throws a considerable light also on the social and cultural history of India during the early centuries of the Christian era.

The name 'Lalitavistara' means the detailed narrative of the sports or 'lila' of Gautama the Buddha, indicating his divinity. It describes the events of Gautama Buddha's life from his descent from the Tushita heaven in the form of a white elephant into his mother's womb up to his attainment of knowledge and preaching of the first sermon.

The Lalitavistara is not a unified text nor it is a composition of one author. And it is not known when it was redacted in the final form as we know it now. It is a compilation of old and later traditions placed side by side. In other words, it was originally a Sarvastivada text, which was later on expanded and embellished with Mahayana ideas laying emphasis on Buddha's superhuman character and miraculous deeds. According to P.L. Vaidya, the present Sanskrit text goes back to the 3rd century A.D. By the late fifth century when the poet Wang Jung (468-93) wrote his cycle of twelve songs "Songs of Religious Joy", there were at least five versions of the Lalitavistara in China. The Lalitavistara forms a part of the Nanadharma of Nepalese Mahayana Buddhism and also of the Tibetan canon and it was translated into that language in the 9th century A.D. It may be mentioned here that the Tibetan translation of the Lalitavistara is considered to be very authentic and close to the Sanskrit text.

The Lalitavistara has been translated also into many European languages and it is interesting to note that Edward Arnold's 'Light of Asia' is based mainly upon the Lalitavistara. It may, however, be noted that a version slightly differing from the Lalitavistara was also in vogue, which was followed by the artists of Barabudur from about 850 to 900 A.D. It can also be assumed that the artists of Gandhara who embellished the Buddhist monuments with the scenes from Buddha's life were acquainted with the text of the Lalitavistara.

The Lalitavistara in its expanded form came to be known as a Vaipulya sutra. The other Mahayana texts known as Vaipulya sutras are: The Ashtasahasrika Prajnaparamita the Saddharma pundarika, the Lankavatara, the Suvarnaprabhasa, the Gandavyuha, the Tathagataguhyaka or Tathagata-guna-jnana, the Samadhiraja and the Dasabhumishvara. Though the Lalitavistara in its present form is considered to be a Mahayana text, there is no trace in it of the Trikaya theory, i.e. the three bodies of the Buddha. This would show that the Lalitavistara belonged to the transition between the Hinayana and the Mahayana. It has been established that many of the verses and prose passages in the Lalitavistara have come from the Sarvastivada canon, while its Mahayana leanings and elements are apparent from such terms as Dharmatathata, Bhutakoti, etc. as well as Buddha's statement that he has attained the void of the world (Jagachhunya).

In the Lalitavistara, the miraculous acts of the Buddha as noted above have been emphasised. Just before his last birth, he (Buddha) lived in the Tushita heaven. He was greeted with the sounds of eighty-four thousand drums and requested to come down to the earth for the release of the people from the bondage of birth and death. The Bodhisattva chose to be born in the Shakya family of Kapilavastu with Shuddhodana as his father and queen Maya as his mother. He did not stay in the filth of his mother's womb as other children do. Gods provided a jewelled box for him to stay in his mother's womb. From his body emanated light shining far and wide. 'The yet unborn Bodhisattva in his mother's womb delight the celestials by pious sermons and the god Brahma obeyed his every suggestion.' The Buddha's birth also was attended by various miracles and portents. He was born in Lumbini as a 'great being' and just after his birth he took seven steps (comparable to Vishnu's three steps as Trivikrama) announcing his greatness that this was his last birth after which he would not be subjected to the chain of birth and death.

The above description was followed by a dialogue between the Buddha and Ananda in which every one is urged to believe in the miraculous birth of the Buddha. Here the importance of religious faith is emphasised, echoing almost similar sentiments in the Bhagavadgita. The Buddha says: "To all who believe in me I do good. Like friends are they to me and many a friend the Tathagata has. And to these friends, the Tathagata only speaks the truth and not falsehood...To believe Ananda should be thy endeavour. This I commend to you." Thus, the Lalitavistara lays stress on the devotional aspects of Mahayana Buddhism.

Again, the Lalitavistara tells us that when the newly born Bodhisattva was taken by his foster mother to a temple, all the gods rose from their seats and prostrated before him. He showed extraordinary merit also as a learner. Heavenly damsels scattered flowers on the path the child Bodhisattva followed in coming to his school. The school master, unable to bear his radiance, fell down and fainted on the ground. A god roused him. Bodhisattva needed no instructions as he was omniscient. But he came to school as a matter of worldly routine. It is said in the Lalitavistara that the Buddha came to this world as Lokanuvartana (i.e. to follow the ways of the world). The teacher was amazed to find that Bodhisattva knew all the sixty-four alphabets including the Chinese and Huna symbols. The remaining narratives of the Lalitavistara, chapters 14-26, though containing many exaggerations show close similarity with the other sources. The last chapter, in the Mahayana fashion glorifies the text and refers to the merits or advantages one derives from its propagation.

The Lalitavistara is written in both prose and verses. Many of the metrical ballads are beautiful and old. They and some of the prose passages are ascribable to the first centuries after the Buddha.

In the last chapter of the text he is described as a Dharma-kayajna (i.e. one whose body is composed of dhrama), a remarkably Mahayana idea.

The Lalitavistara, apart from its importance for the religious history of Buddhism, throws some welcome light on the social conditions of India during the early centuries of the Christian era. It has already been stated that it contains the names of various alphabets. Further, it mentions various arts numbering eighty-six whereas the lists in other texts speak traditionally of sixty-four arts. It also refers to various subjects of science and humanities in which a person should acquire proficiency. These subjects are ganana (arithmetic), samkhyā (use of numbers), the Veda. Itihāsa, Purāna, Nighantu (lexicon), Nirukta (etymology), Nigama (revealed scriptures), Shiksha (phonetics), Chhandas (metrics), Jyotisha (astronomy), Vyākaraṇa (grammar), Yajñakalpa (rules for conducting sacrifices), Yoga, and Vesika (philosophical systems), Barhaspatya (philosophy of Brihaspati), Hetuvidyā (Nyāya philosophy), Arthavidyā (Economics), Kavya-grantharacitam (the art of writing), Akhyayana (the art of telling stories), Hasya (the art of humorist), etc.

A number of Buddhist legends appear in the Apocryphal Gospels. In the Gospel of Thomas, longer version, it is mentioned: 'Trees bend down before the young Christ and dragons (nagas) adore him; when he goes to school to learn the alphabet he convicts his teacher of ignorance, and the good man faints.' Again, the Arabic and Syriac Gospels of the infancy glorify the Child Christ... "when he enters a temple in Egypt, the images prostrated themselves before him". These and several other exploits recorded in the case of the young Christ seem to be based on some childhood exploits of the Buddha as mentioned in the Lalitavistara as above.

LALLULAL (Hindi; b. 1763, d. 1825), one of the pioneers of Hindi prose, is renowned for his work titled Premśagar. He was appointed by John Gilchrist, a teacher of Hindi at the Fort William College, Calcutta for writing books in Hindi. Lallulal was born in Agra in a Gujarati Brahman family. Agra is an integral part of the Braj region where 'Khariboli' tinged with Brajbhasha is generally the spoken language of the people. When Lallulal was commissioned to write the Premśagar, he composed the story of the tenth Canto of the Bhagavata in 'Khariboli' with a strong tinge of Braj. He was cautious enough to avoid words of Perso-Arabic origin in his work. Some verbal forms of Braj got mixed up and assimilated with his 'Khariboli' in the natural course. He was meticulous about adequate refinement and embellishment of his language style and, therefore, he composed his work in a language that has a rhythmic pattern and is full of alliteration.

Lallulal was well-versed in Urdu, Khariboli, Hindi and Brajbhasha. Since he did not have complete command over Sanskrit, he committed errors of translation at some places. At The Fort William College he had been ordained to compose in Urdu and Khariboli such stories and tales as were prevalent at the time in the Braj region. Accordingly, he composed the Sinhasan battisi, Vaital pachisi, Shakuntala nata, 'Madhona' in Urdu and the Premśagar in Hindi.

He composed the tales of Hitopadesh in Braj bhasha prose under the title Rajniti. He also published compilations of Brajbhasha verses under the titles Madhav-vilas and Sabhr-vilas. Lallulal also wrote a commentary on the celebrated Bihari satsai and designated it as Lal-chandrika.

In short, amongst the pioneers of Hindi Khariboli prose, Lallulal acquired renown because of his linguistic versatility and his composition Premśagar. He established a printing press named Sanskriti Press and was engaged in the publications of Hindi books. He popularized the Ramayana, the Bhagavata and the Mahabharata by publishing stories from these works.

LALWANI, LILARAM VATANMAL, 'KHAKI' (Sindhi; b. 1867, d. 1941) was a critic, playwright and a poet. After his graduation in Arts and Law, he was appointed a sub-judge in Sindh and worked in the judicial department up to his retirement. In 1913, he embraced Khalsa (Sikh) sect and called himself Lilaramsingh. Besides English and Sindhi, he acquired proficiency in Arabic, Persian, Sanskrit, Urdu, Hindi and Punjabi. His important work is The Life, Religion and Poetry of Shah Latif which was written in English and published from Karachi in 1890. It was reprinted from Lahore (Pakistan) in 1978 with a critical introduction by Mehbub Ali Channa. While writing this book, Lilaram often discussed various problems with Mirza Qalich Beg and Dayaram Gidumal Shahani, the great scholars of Sindh. However, as he mentions, his main source of information on the life of the poet and explanations of a good many obscure verses in the poetry of Shah Abdul Latif, was Akhund Ahmadi, the old man of Bhit, whose great grandfather was the teacher of the poet. This book of Lilaram is one of the fundamental works for the students of Shah Abdul Latif.

Lilaram was one of the earliest playwrights in Sindhi who, along with Mirza Qalich Beg, contributed significantly to the growth of Sindhi drama and stage. He wrote a good number of plays in Sindhi, most of them were staged by Dayaram Jethmal Sindh College Amateur Dramatic Society established in 1894 by the principal of the college. Some of the plays written by Lilaram are Harishchandra (staged in 1898), Draupadi ya Pandava charitra (1905), Mohan Tarika (1896) and Sujan Radha (1897), both these plays deal with social problems of that period), Shah Adil Khan and Lobhi Lakhina (both are one-act plays) written in 1930).

After embracing Sikhism in 1913, Lilaramsingh wrote a commentary in Sindhi on Guru Granth, a holy scripture of Sikhs. This monumental work shows Lilaramsingh's deep study of different religions. It was published by Sikh Sabha of Hyderabad (Sindh) during the second decade of the present century.

In the field of poetry, Lilaram wrote a good number of ghazals which were compiled by him in a book Diwan-e-Khaki published in 1914, III Edt. These ghazals lack poetic imagination and are more a clever versècomposition than poetry. Lilaram is, however, remembered in the history of Sindhi literature for his critical study of Shah Abdul Latif and his contribution in the field of Sindhi drama and stage.

LAM AHMAD AKBARABADI (Urdu; b. 1885). Latifuddin Ahmad, popularly known as Lam Ahmad, was born at Agra. also known as Akbarabad, produced many eminent poets and litterateurs, like Mir Taqi Mir, Nazir Akbarabadi, Mirza Ghalib, Simab Akbarabadi, Maikash Akbarabadi, etc. Lam Ahmad also joins this galaxy of Agra writers.

Lam Ahmad was brought up and educated in a religious atmosphere. But before he could complete his education, his father expired in 1898. This forced him to abandon his formal education, and he started looking after the family business alongwith his younger brother Shahabuddin Ahmad. Later, he entered national politics and joined Home Rule Party which was founded by Annie Besant, and soon became the general secretary of its local unit. He formally joined the All India Congress Party and was elected councillor of the Agra Municipal Board. During his political life, he came in close contact with national leaders like Annie Besant, Desh, Bandhu, Motilal Nehru and Sarojini Naidu.

Lam Ahmad was a prolific writer of Urdu. He started his literary career with the translation of Thomas Moore's Lalla Rookh. It was first serialised in the monthly journal, Nigar, which he, alongwith Niaz Fatehpuri, Zia Abbas Hashimi, Malik Habib Ahmad and Shah Dilgeer, had founded in 1922. Moore (1772-1822) was a major poet of the Romantic Age and Lalla Rookh (1816) is supposed to be his masterpiece which influenced the contemporary writers.

Lam Ahmad was a pioneer of Romantic movement in Urdu. Romanticism in literature is said to be a deviation from the old and classical style of writing to a more relaxed, lighter and more personal style of writing. Under this influence, 'the old narrow intellectual attitude gave place to a wider outlook and emotion and a sense of mystery in life, and in which the critical was replaced by the creative spirit and wit by humour and pathos.' The Romantic movement which originated in England in the last quarter of the 18th century, cast its shadow on Urdu literature towards the end of the 19th century, and both poets and prose writers came under its direct influence.

Lam Ahmad took to fiction-writing, and although he had a poetic inclination, he never took to poetry. Nevertheless his flowery, chaste and beautiful prose charmed readers like poetry. Most of his works are translations from English and other foreign languages, but rather than translations, they are adaptations.

His published works include Lalla Rookh (1935); Naghamat, Insha-e-Latif (1935); Naqd-e-adab (Translation of Abercrombie's 'Principles of Literary Criticism', 1963); Zindagi ke khel, Mohabbat ya afsana, Subh-o-sham. Mulahizat-e-na'isi (1959); Rusi fikr aur mufakkir, Rang-o-bu and Adabi tasawwurat (1964).

LAMA, SANU (Nepali; b.1938), whose real name is Garur Singh Lama, was born in Gangtok. By profession an engineer, he represented Sikkim in a number of social, literary and other conferences in a number of countries abroad. For the Nepalese, however, his fame chiefly rests on his katha sampad, a collection of twelve short stories, published in 1974. These stories deal with the natural, social and political scenes of Sikkim. The description of the village Timitarku in the 'Pahari phul karakai majha', and of the simplicity of the village folk and their life and the conflict between the rich and the poor in 'Swashi manchey' has an irresistible appeal. In the delightfully woven story of the 'Earring' he has a geniality as he delves into the depths of his beloved's heart and tenderly lays bare her feelings. There is a perspicacity as he brings out the inner conflicts and the struggles of the middle class people in 'Khanitar ma ek din' and in 'Sampati'. Lama mostly chooses the rural scene as the background of his stories and loves to explore the common bonds which unite the different ethnic groups and castes in Sikkim. He has a broad, humanistic vision which makes his works immensely refreshing.

LAMABAM KAMAL SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1899, d.1934) popularly known as Doctor Kamal was the first novelist and short story writer in the modern Manipuri literature,

LAMABAM VIRAMANI SINGH—LANGARAKO SATHI

A physician by profession, he knew English, Bengali and Assamese well. In his boyhood he read and studied the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Manipuri myths and legends. He started writing poems from his school days. His works, both poetry and prose, reveal his awareness of social evils and his strong feeling of resentment against social injustice. Indeed he had his private resentment against the society he lived in. He had married a woman to whom he was distantly related—an act for which he was treated as an outcaste. In those days of the monarchy he fought single-handed against an oppressive society. This feeling of resentment is evident in his poems collected in Lei pareng (The garland; 1929). His Madhabi (1930), which is the first original novel in modern Manipuri deals with universal love in a traditional style. By nature L. Kamal Singh is an idealist and a romantic. Because of the poetic language and expression Madhabi is regarded as a kind of prose-poem. In his 'Brajendragiluhongba', which is, in fact, the first Manipuri short story, his revolt against social oppression is evident again but at the end he reconciles with tradition. Even when he is critical his geniality never leaves him.

Young novelists of modern Manipuri are widely influenced by Kamal's writings. He died in 1934. In 1948 Manipuri Sahitya Parishad posthumously conferred on him the title of 'Kabiratna'.

LAMABAM VIRAMANI SINGH (Manipuri; b.1952), a science graduate of Gauhati university, started his professional career as a teacher and eventually became a lecturer in the basic training College at Imphal. He is now working as the District Science Supervisor, Thoubal District.

He is a writer by choice and inclination and he has so far published two collections of his short stories which have marked him out as a force to reckon with. He portrays characters with insight and projects them vividly. He uses a language and diction which are at once simple and forceful. Chekla paikhrabada, a collection of his short stories, was chosen for the Sahitya Akademi award of 1984.

Viramani Singh is a founder member of the Cultural Forum of Manipuri and National Sahitya Premi Samiti, Imphal. He is also the founder President of the Science Teachers' Forum, Manipur.

LAMAM (Manipuri) is a novel by Guno Singh Hijam. It is about the love of a Meitei youth and a tribal girl against the historical backdrop of the oppressive slavery system which was a part of the feudal social order. The time is early nineteenth century when king Marjit Singh (1813-1819) reigned as king and when Manipur was depredated by the Burmese. Extreme penury drives Tamubi, the young mother of a boy and her husband Chaoba to barter away their lives as slaves for a paltry sum of money to a nobleman of the court of the Meitei king. Though she has already begotten a son, Tamubi is still beautiful. Her master soon conceives a passion for her and being a man without a heart, drives away her husband from the country. Tamubi, however, secures the help of Tomba, a trusted friend and manages to escape with her infant son. The three make for the faraway Khoubum Hills to the west of Imphal. There she hopes to meet the chief of the Luwanglon Nagas and his wife who have been friends to her parents. Toiling up the steep hill-path, after great hardship they come to the house of the Chief, but to their utter shock they learn that the Chief is dead. They meet his wife. They come to know that the entry of any Meitei from the plains into the tribal settlement has been forbidden as the two communities are no longer on good terms. The old woman, however, is moved to see the plight of the mother and the young child and hits on a ruse. Tomba, the Meitei youth, beats a hasty retreat before anybody can detect him. Tamubi remains with her child and assumes the name of Pamheibi. Her son is named Pari. Thus they come to pass off as belonging to another tribe of a remote village. The greater part of story that follows does not deal with any incident of historical importance. It dawdles on, leisurely describing the growth of the boy in an alien but otherwise beautiful land, his falling in love with Changning, the only daughter of the reigning Chief and brother of the old chief's widow. The narrative slowly drags on to a climax when Pari's rivalry with Luthou, the betrothed of Changning since childhood, comes to a head. It results in the discovery of the real identities of Tamubi and Pari. The mother and the son are compelled to leave their shelter. As the valley falls into the hands of the dreaded Burmese, they make for the region of Cachar and on the way the griefstricken Tamubi dies. But before she dies she enjoins Pari to marry Changning and to liberate his country. Pari treads his way back to Luwanglong accompanied by a few patriotic Manipuris. After settling his hash with Luthou, his old adversary, he at last secures the hand of his love.

The novel is the first work of the author. It is a rambling chronicle of love which could have been more interesting if the plot were more closely knit. But the lack of skill in handling the plot and characterization is compensated for by the fluidity of the author's prose and his charming description of natural beauty.

LANGARAKO SATHI (Nepali) is the most starkly realistic of the four novels by Laina Singh Bangdel who is regarded as the precursor of realism in Nepali fiction writing. Writing in 1951, the year the novel was published in Prabhat, a Nepali literary magazine that he edited and brought out from Calcutta, he insisted that modern fictions should be realistic and deal with the realities of contemporary society and by choice, of the life in its lower rung. But even among the realists he stands apart by virtue of the fine humanistic sentiments and values which permeate through his novels particularly Langara ko sathi.

Langara ko sathi is about a cripple and his pathetic death. This cripple carries himself using his two arms as crutches along the road of a small town,—which can be easily identified as Darjeeling,—begging alms. He lives on charity. His sole companion is Kalay, a black dog. The cripple has been virtually cast off by society; the mutual help and protection which men in society get are denied to him. He has virtually been thrown back to the state of nature exposed to its elemental furies. He is at the mercy of the thunder, the lightning, the rain and the cold as the primitive man was. But he has other enemies and these he fears most. They are the supposed protectors, the policemen, who will not allow him to trudge along or across the public roads. And worse still, he fears the innocent school children who rejoice to caper at and pounce on him calling him a 'crawling bear'.

Treated as such the cripple himself has not degenerated to a sub-human being. There is something in him which always pulls him up, indeed propels him to line up to higher values. A sense of human dignity pervades his being, however outwardly despicable he may seem. He is proud to buy food that he likes to eat and to share it with his companion, the dog.

One day the dog disappears. He crawls out of his hovel looking out for it. Towards nightfall, driven by strong wind and rain, he takes shelter in the verandah of an apartment house. The owner comes out, sees him and pushes him down the stairs. At dawn he breathes his last but only after finding his dog beside him and seeing the morning sun bathe with light the high pinnacle of a nearby temple. The cripple feels that his life and death have not been meaningless and in vain.

On occasions the novelist strays out of the confine of literary realism. His concern for the lowly and his feeling of animosity towards those who are comfortably provided with show themselves at places in rather simplistic black and white episodic narrations. Laina Singh Bengdel is now an internationally renowned abstract painter.

LANGOI SAGOL THABA (Manipuri) is a manuscript in old Manipuri written in the indigenous script. It deals with the story relating to the sacrificial horse of King Yudhis-thira after the end of the Great War of Kurukshetra. Interestingly, the work contains in detail an account of its composition: it was the work of Longjam Parshuram, who on the 13th day of Hiyangei (Agrahayan), Saka 1724, Monday after having offered his prayer to the goddess of learning and having received the blessings of the noble Meitei queen undertook to compose it. The poet's source was a vernacular rendering by Ghanshyam Thokchom of a Bengali epic by Gangadas Sen. Parshuram was much advanced in age when he undertook the work. He was, therefore, assisted by three amanuenses named Chirom Abhimanyu, Wairokpm Gangacharan and Oinam Nabashyam—all his disciples and then by another three named Maibam Abhiram, Hidamcha Madan and Khang-lembam Haricharan from the royal institution of singers who helped him in putting the narrative into its melic form.

It is a nice representative work of the Middle Period of the history of Manipuri literature when the language was undergoing a change from the sheer archaic into the comparatively simple with borrowings from Sanskrit and Bengali mainly for the sake of embellishment and musical effect.

In conformity to the traditional mode of composition, the text begins with an invocation. Curiously, it is not an invocation of the Almighty or the patron King usually invoked but of a number of deities of the Hindu pantheon rounded off by an obeisance to his own revered mentor. The poet in Bengali, Gangadas Sen, departs much from the sage Vyasa and his narrative has been padded with a proper plot and strong characters. The Sanskrit version of Arjuna not accepting Babhrubahana as his son, Ulupi's urging of the son to take up arms, the facile revival of Arjuna with the life-giving gem of Ulupi conjured up out of the void and Arjuna's refusal to enter the Capital of Babhrubahana—all these have been conveniently dispensed with. Here the exuberant Babhrubahana is outright rejected as the son of a whore having nothing to do with the Pandava blood. A deadly fight ensues and Arjuna is not only slain but his head is torn asunder by the arrows of his son. Then Ulupi, the naga princess and step-mother of Babhrubahana, sends Pundaraksha, her accompanying guardian, to fetch the precious gem from the nether world, of snakes. Ananta, the king of the nether world, is too willing to give away the gem but his subjects stubbornly object. Whereupon Babhrubahana attacks the kingdom of the snakes and after severely worsting them, siezes the gem. But meanwhile, the humbled prime minister of Ananta has stolen the severed head of Arjuna. But the situation is saved when Krishna accompanied by Bhima, Kunti, Devaki and Yashoda arrive in Manipur on Garuda's back. At this stage, Manipur is painted as a place of everlasting beauty and pleasure. Arjuna is raised from the dead and soon the father and the son are reconciled. Then Babhrubahana, the king of Manipur, invites Sri Krishna, Bhim and his own father, Arjuna, to his Capital which these august guests promptly accept.

LANGUAGE – APABHRAMSHA

The work was transliterated into Bengali script and then edited by N. Khelchandra Singh. It was published by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad in 1968.

LANGUAGE (Apabhramsha). The Apabhramsha language, from the view point of the evolution of Indo-Aryan languages, belongs to its Middle Indo-Aryan stage. Though traditional grammars have treated it as one of the several varieties of Prakrit, Apabhramsha really represents its, later phase. In several respects it can be looked upon as a stage between Middle and New Indo-Aryan as some of the characterizing tendencies of New Indo-Aryan languages had their starting in Apabhramsha.

But the term 'Apabhramsha' has been used in several different senses in earlier tradition as well as in modern scholarly writings. Primarily apabhramsha meant 'falling away from an established standard' then 'a substandard' or 'corrupt' speech usage'. Patanjali (2nd century B.C.) has observed that people use several corrupt forms (apabhramsha) in the place of a standard or correct word form. From this time down to the modern period Apabhramsha or 'Apabhrashta' has been used, as also 'Prakrit' for the popular or 'uncultured' dialects or linguistic usages of various regions, as against Sanskrit, (Sanskrita) language of the cultured. In many a traditional reference, apabhramsha means regional dialects.

In many works of literature and poetics, however, Apabhramsha has been counted as one of the four (or sometimes, six) traditionally recognised languages of literature, the other three being Sanskrit, Prakrit and Paishaci. In the context of dramatic dialects, Shauraseni and Magadhi, besides a few others also occur, and in such cases the term Prakrita stands for the Maharashtri only.

Because features of popular dialects underlay Apabhramsha as a literary language, it was bound to have some formal variation. Dandin (7th century) tells us that when the dialects of the tribes like the Abhiras received literary treatment they were known as Apabhramsha. In his manual of Prakrit prosody, Vṛttajatisamuhchaya (possibly before the 8th cent), Virahanha (IV 32, 35, 36). Abhinavagupta has referred to the language of Anandavardhana's Apabhramsha illustrative verse as saindhava. (Dhavanyalokalochara under IV 7). Rudrata explicitly says that Apabhramsha has many varieties corresponding to various regions. Possibly he confuses in this Apabhramsha as a literary language with Apabhramsha as a designation of spoken dialects (deshabhasas). Explaining Rudrata's statement, Namisadhu informs us that Rudrata counters an earlier view which held that there were only three varieties of Apabhramsha, viz. Upanagara, Abhira and Gramya. According to another tradition, the three varieties were called Nagara, Vrachada and Upanagara. Besides describing these three varieties, Markandeya (16th century) has enumerated in Prakritsarvasva (XVIII.12), twenty other varieties of Apabhramsha which include Karnati and Dravidi—obviously the dialects from the Dravidian speaking regions. Clearly these Apabhramsha of Markandeya were regional spoken dialects (deshabhasas). Uddyotanaśuri has kept in his Kavalamala (779 A.D.) Apabhramsha and Deshabhasas quite distinct. The latter, eighteen in number, he has illustrated with characteristic words or phrases. The number of Deshabhasas reaches forty-two in the Bhasalaksana chapter of Gitalamkara, a later musicological treatise.

Hemachandra, who has treated Apabhramsha as a unitary language, has mentioned under Chhandonusasana (VIII. 8) Gramya Apabhransa as the language of an epic called Bhimakavya. His information seems to have been derived from Bhoja Shringaraprakasha. But in another context Bhoja has actually illustrated with verse citations three chief varieties of Apabhramsha, each of which has several subvarieties Shringaraprakasha, pp. 102-103). According to him, Avantya and Latiya represented the superior variety of Apabhramsha, Ahhira and Gaurjara the middling variety, the Kashmira and Paurastya the inferior variety. Unfortunately the text of the illustrative verses is highly corrupt, and it is not possible to get any idea of the differentiating features of these Apabhramshas on its basis. But judging from the reconstructed text of two of the citations and from a few identifiable words of the other citations, it appears that these Apabhramshas excepting perhaps a stray feature or two, do not differ significantly from the standard literary Apabhramsha. The same is true about the Apabhramsha verses we find as Samgrahashlokas in the Tantrasara and the Paratrimśikavṛiti of Abhinavagupta and of the Dohas of the Vajrayana Siddhas, Kanha and Saraha. Hemachandra seems to be justified in regarding the difference within Apabhramsha as minor, and treating it as one uniform literary language for practical purposes.

In modern times, there have been several attempts to determine and define the dialectal variations in Apabhramsha on the basis of available Apabhramsha literature. Some linguistic features have been pointed out as appearing exclusively or more frequently in the Digambara Jain works, while others in the works of the Shvetāmbaras alternatively, the distinctions are sought to be made on a regional basis: Western, Central, Northern, Southern and Eastern varieties (an earlier version of this being Apabhramsha corresponding to various Purakrits, viz. Shaurasena Apabhramsha, Kāgadha Apabhramsha, etc.); or again chronological differences have been marked, some peculiar to the Early or Classical Apabhramsha, and others to the Late Apabhramsha. It is however, clear that variations within Apabhramsha were such as are natural in any standardised literary language, current over extensive regions for several centuries and considerably open to borrowing from 'above' and 'below'. In fact, processes of standardisation succeeded in maintaining a working uniformity for Apabhramsha for a fairly long period in the face of multiplying differences.

As a literary language recognised along with Sanskrit and Prakrit and having some exclusive metrical structure and literary types, Apabhramsha was in use from Valabhi in the West to Nalanda in the East and from Kashmira in the North to Manyakheta in the South. But numerous early and late references and accounts are evidence for its close affinity with the western region. Historically numerous characteristic features of Apabhramsha are seen to have been conserved to a relatively greater degree in the New Indo-Aryan languages and dialects like Gujarati, Rajasthani (Marwari, Jaipuri, etc.) and Hindi dialects (Braj, Khadiboli, etc.). Post-Apabhramsha literatures also of the western and central regions, show an unbroken continuity with Apabhramsha literature in diction, prosody and literary genres.

Considered practically, literary Apabhramsha was but a variant of literary Prakrit, and like the latter it was highly standardized and stylised. Besides it should be also remembered in this context that Apabhramsha was exclusively the language of verse. No prose work in Apabhramsha is known so far. Like Sanskrit and Prakrit, Apabhramsha was to be learnt by special instruction. Traditional grammars, devised as aids to poets and their audience (readers, spectators), described Prakrits contrastively. Differences of Maharashtra etc. from Sanskrit were listed, and this was followed in turn by a list of differences of Apabhramsha from Maharashtra.

The earliest available extensive treatment of Apabhramsha on these lines is the Apabhramsha section (i.e. Sūtras 329-446) of the fourth quarter of the eighth chapter) of Hemachandra's Siddhahemasabdanulshasana 11th century). As some five or six centuries of vigorous literary production in Apabhramsha preceded Hemachandra, it is natural to assume that the latter's treatment of Apabhramsha was based on earlier precedents. Possibly Syayambhus Apabhramsha grammar (9th century) was one of his indirect sources.

In Apabhramsha, the Prakrit morphological structures were further simplified and to compensate for this, certain new constructions developed in syntax. The analytical tendencies especially in the expression of case relations were gaining ground.

Broadly, the chief differential features of Apabhramsha are as follows: (1) Shortening of the final vowels; (2) Change of final short o to u and of short e to i at a later stage; (3) Change of intervocalic voiceless consonants to voiced ones, and the preservation of the voiced ones, (a Maharashtra trait); (4) Optional change of intervocalic m to v; (5) Change of intervocalic -s- to -h-, mostly in terminational elements; (6) Optional preservation of clusters with a posterior r; (7) A later emergent tendency to simplify clusters in a final (or penultimate) syllable. Morphology: (1) Case ending: Nouns ending in -a -u

(Nom./Acc. Sing. Masc.); u, -au (Nom./ Acc. Sing. Neu.); Zero, but later optionally a (Nom./Acc. Pl. Masc.), -ai (Nom./Acc. Pl. Neu) -em (Inst. Sing. Masc./Neu.), -ho, but later -hu, ha (Dat./Abl./Gen. Sing. Masc./Neu.), -he but later -hi (Dat./Abl./Gen. Sing. Fem.); -hu, but later -ha (Dat./Abl./Gen. Plu). -e (but later -i), -hi (Loc. Sing. Masc./Neu.) Zero.a (optionally for Masc. nouns ending in -a) (Voa. Sing), -ho (Voc. Pl.) Nouns ending in i u: -he (Gen. Sing.); ;hi (gen. Pl.)

Instrumental and locative have fallen together at a later stage. (2) Verbal ending: Present: -u (I sing), -hu (IPl.) -hi (II sing.), -ho but later -hu -ha (II Pl.), -hi (III Pl.). Future: The present endings were applied to a base with the tens marker -is -is -or -ih. Imperative: -e (later -i), -u, Zero (II sing), -ho, but later -hu, -ha (II Pl.)

Potential participle ending even gerund ending: -eppi -eppimnh -evi, evinu, but later, -ivi, -avi, -i, -iu. Infinitive ending: -evam, -hu, but later -nau-nahi. Some new morphemes (like the causative marker -ad -at have emerged. There was an increasing use of postpositions to distinguish within the case relations. The use of verbal compounds, which later on became a characteristic feature of New Indo-Aryan languages had already emerged in Apabhramsha. The same can be said about some new types of frequentative, reduplicative, onomatopoeic and rhyming formations. Several new constructions in the syntax of case and tense had emerged which later on became wide spread in several New Indo-Aryan languages. Certain new derivative suffixes too, and especially several new diminutive/pleonastic suffixes (-da, -ulla, etc.) had appeared. Numerous words and roots of obscure or unknown origin had become incorporated in the lexicon of Apabhramsha.

After about 100 A.D. classical Apabhramsha, with varying degree of dialectal admixture continued to be used in literature up to about 1600 A.D. But side by side with it works began to be composed in increasingly more colloquialised Apabhramsha which eventually faded into various regional languages with decreasing remnants of Apabhramsha. From the 12th century onwards, literary works were attested from old Gujarati and some other New Indo-Aryan languages.

LANGUAGE (Assamese) The word 'Assam' from which the term Assamese is derived, is not very old, for the term 'Asam' which is often applied to the people, does not go beyond the sixteenth century. Of course, that does not indicate the date of the origin of the Assamese speech which is perhaps much older.

When Hiuen T'sang visited India in 643 A.D. he knew the Assamese region and called it Kamarupa. He observed that their speech differed a little from that of Central India. On the basis of this statement it is pointed out that the speech of the people of Kamarupa, now known as Assamese, developed as a separate speech as early as the seventh century.

The origin of Assamese is traced to Magadhi Prakrit. G.A. Grierson in his Lingusitic Survey of India says: 'Magadhi was the principal dialect which corresponded to the old Eastern Prakrit, East of Magadhi lay the Gauda or Prachya Apabhramsha, the Headquarter of which was Gour in the present district of Malda. It spread to South and South East and there became the parent of Modern Bengali. Magadhi Apabhramsha, in fact, may be considered as spreading out eastwards and southwards in three directions. To the north east it developed into Northern Bengali and Assamese, to the south into Oriya and between the two into Bengali. Each of these three descendants is equally directly connected with the common immediate parent. According to Sunitikumar Chatterjee the classification may be presented as follows:

Magadhi

Eastern (Assamese Bengali Oriya)	Central (Maithili Magadhi)	Western (Bhojpuri) Nagpuri etc)
---	----------------------------------	--

Umesh Mishra suggests a different classification. He puts them into four groups;

Magadhi

North eastern (Assamese)	South eastern (Oriya)	Central (Bengali, Western Maithili, Magadhi, Bhojpuri)
-----------------------------	--------------------------	---

Though no precise date of the division of Magadhi Prakrit and Apabhramsha into groups can be indicated, it began to branch out quite early. The grammarians of Prakrit mentions Gaudi, Dhakki and Utkali or Odri as some of the varieties of Magadhi. Jayamangala (12th century) in his commentary on the Kamasutra, identifies Gauda with Kamarupa.

Though Assamese is a direct descendant of Magadhi and, therefore, an offshoot of the Indo-Aryan language, and follows the rules of Sanskrit grammar and retains some of the characteristics of Prakrit, it has also a great number of words, phrases and idioms borrowed from Bodo and other non-Aryan languages. However, the influence of the Sanskrit language and literature is so tremendous that till the American Baptist missionaries produced the first grammar of the Assamese language, and a lexicon, there was no grammar or lexicon of Assamese. Sanskrit grammar and lexicography were till then considered enough to govern the language and word formation, and regulate their meanings.

Of the neighbouring languages, old Assamese has more affinity with Maithili and Oriya than Bengali. For instance, Assamese has a complete set of negative conjugation with the negative particle 'na' placed before the verb root. Oriya has a negative conjugation with the verb substantive only. Bengali has no negative conjugation at all. The type of vowel harmony in Assamese where an anterior 'a' (aa) is found in a succeeding syllable is absent in Bengali. This feature is common to Assamese, Oriya and in a modified form to Bhojpuri. Assamese has a peculiar pronunciation similar to 'x' representing the three 's' palatal, cerebral and dental. It also has 'va' in addition to 'ba', as in Sanskrit.

So far as the script is concerned, 'Kutililipi', a distant descendant of Brahmi, was used till the publication of the Bible, the first book in the Assamese language, by the missionaries from Serampore of (West) Bengal in 1813. Though thereafter the script became almost the same with Bengali, Assamese retains the original 'ra', which is used in Maithili script. Thus there is a difference in two letters in the present Assamese and Bengali scripts.

From the very beginning the Assamese developed as a distinct language with its own individual traits. Kamarupa was ruled by different dynasties independently beginning with the Varman dynasty in the fourth century A.D and the western boundary was extended up to the river Karatoya in North Bengal. In the medieval period though the ancient kingdom of Kamarupa was fragmented, different ruling dynasties held their sway and maintained independence till its annexation to the British India in 1826.

Although the origin of Assamese speech is traced to the seventh century and oral literature dates back to the tenth-eleventh century, the earliest specimen of Assamese literature is an adaptation from Vamana-purana placed in the late thirteenth century. Thus, beginning from the late thirteenth century the Assamese language has an unbroken record of producing a multitude of literature. During this period of eight hundred years the Assamese language has undergone changes qualitatively and quantitatively. Various factors such as socio-religious condition, economic and political situation, have brought about these changes leading to the enrichment of the language and literature. Banikanta Kakati divides the history of the Assamese language into three broad periods: (a) Early Assamese, from the fourteenth to the end of the sixteenth century, which is again subdivided as (i) Pre-Vaishnavite and (ii) the Vaishnavite sub-periods, (b) Middle Assamese from the seventeenth to the beginning of the nineteenth century and (c) Modern Assamese from the beginning of the nineteenth century till the present day.

From the literature produced during these periods, it may appear that the rules of conjugation of roots were followed strictly and the tense with the number and person was clear. And more and more words from Sanskrit were used along with other borrowed words.

The case of the Assamese language was taken up by the missionaries, who came to Assam to preach Christianity. They were anxious to reach the common people through the spoken language of the region. They gave it a literary shape. However, this language in its expression, style of composition, phraseology and spelling of words assumed a completely new form.

In 1839 Robinson brought out a grammar on Assamese from Serampore. Nathan Brown, another missionary, published yet another Assamese grammar in 1848. Miles Bronson, belonging to the Mission, which established a printing press in Sibsagar, brought out the first Assamese-English Dictionary in 1867. In recent times, like many other modern Indian languages, Assamese has also come under the influence of the English language and literature. This led to a considerable degree of enrichment, and now Assamese serves as a capable vehicle for expressing any shade of thought, old and new, past and present.

Assamese is the medium of education from the primary to the university level (along with English and others) and is the official language of the State. It is spoken by a large number of people of the State. Assamese is one of the fifteen languages of the country recognised by the Constitution of India.

B.S.

LANGUAGE (Bengali). Bengali belongs to the Indic sub-branch of the Indo-Iranian or Aryan branch of the Indo-European family of languages. Bengali is one of the Eastern speeches that are grouped as a separate cluster of New Indic or Modern Indo-Aryan languages. Old Indic or Sanskrit appears to have been brought over to Bengal by the Aryan immigrants from the North-Western region sometime about 1000 B.C. They were the older pre-Vedic generation of immigrants in India who were pushed to the eastern region by the hostile and new Vedic immigrants. The story of the conflict of the older non-Vedic immigrants with the new Vedic is recorded in very garbled versions of the various stories incorporated in the Vedic prose works, which describe it as the conflict between the asuras and the devas. The asuras seem to have been the forefathers of those Aryans who came to settle in Bengal and the surrounding regions, implanting their language, a dialect of old Indic somewhat different from the language of the Rigveda. There are some indications as to the nature of the dialect of the immigrants in the East in the stories narrated in the Brahmanas, and the indications are in agreement with the characteristics of the language attested later in this region. The language of the eastern immigrants was a spoken language, and as a spoken language it had its normal growth and it turned into Middle Indic during the Maurya period (c. 300 B.C.). The existence of this Middle Indic dialect of Bengal (that is of the eastern region) is attested in a small inscribed piece of artifact, the so-called Mahasthan Stone Plaque. The inscription is short and mutilated. Nevertheless its affinity with the eastern dialect of Asoka era is clear. Here (r) becomes (l) and (ah) becomes (e).

Absence of any historical document belonging to the period between c. 300 B.C. and c. 400 A.D. makes it impossible to determine the stages of development of Middle Indic in Bengal and its neighbouring provinces. As historical documents since 400 A.D. up to the end of the twelfth century are all in Sanskrit it must be presumed that there was a continuous flow of immigration of learned Brahmins from the North-West which resulted in the suppression of the spoken tongue, the local Middle Indic. Influence of Sanskrit was so over-whelming that Prakrit (i.e., Middle Indic) seems to have been not at all cultivated by poets and authors.

Curiously enough, Rajashekhara, an eleventh century poet from Central India observed that the goddess of learning had forbidden the Easterners (Gaudiyas) to use the Prakrit language. It can only mean that the Prakrit speech and compositions of the Easterners were much below the standard of the North-Western writers. But it seems that Rajashekhara was wrong. For in the East the Middle Indic speech was much more advanced towards the third stage than elsewhere, and that is why we find the appearance of New Indic in the East as early as c. 800 A.D.

No specimen of the Bengali language before the late fifteenth century was known before 1916 when Haraprasad Shastri published three old manuscripts he had discovered in Nepal. They were published by the Bangiya Sahitya Parisad, under the title Hajar bachharer purana Bangla bhashay Bauddha gan o doha (i.e. Buddhist songs and couplets in the Bengali language a thousand years old). Shastri's claim was not sustained in spite of all the texts published here by him but the language of the Buddhist Charya songs was accepted by competent scholars and later by linguists as written in old Bengali. The songs were written by several Siddhas or Yogi saints, and their date is presumed to lie between 1000 A.D. and 1200 A.D. This period is accepted by scholars as the old state (or period) of the Bengali language.

It must have taken some time to attain the literary form seen in Charyas. So it may be safely presumed that Bengali had started to emerge from the Late Middle Indic some time about 800 A.D. Specimens of the immediate ancestor of Bengali, Avahattha, the form of the Middle Indic dialect which was almost the lingua franca in Eastern India and even outside, are easily available. As a matter of fact one of the three texts published by Shastri, the Dohakosha of Saroja-vajra is written in Avahattha. The language of the Dohakosha is very close to the language of the Charya songs; the first may be taken as an archaic form of the latter. To give an example, Saroja-vajra writes in his Dohakosha:

sarahe nittam kaddiu rava sahaja-svarupa na bhavabhava

‘Saraho (i.e. saroja) continuously raises a the cry: Normalcy is the nature; there is neither existence nor non-existence’. The couplet could be translated thus into the language of the charya songs:

sarahe niti niti karhila ra sahaja-svarupa noa bhabha

As a matter of fact the language of the charya songs is not strictly speaking Old Bengali: it is really Proto Bengali. It has some characteristics which are absent in Bengali but present in some of its sister dialects: Maithili, Oriya or Assamese. But Bengali characteristics are so overwhelming and dominant that it cannot be denied that it was the direct ancestor of Bengali.

There are other points which indicate that there was a gap in the chain of development between the language of the charya songs and the Middle Bengali available from the late fifteenth century. The missing chain could be really accepted as old Bengali proper. The missing points are the following:

1. Uniform reduction of double or germinated consonants; e.g., we have both [jita] and [jitta]. 2. Retention of Avahattha words, especially verbs. 3. Avahattha structure of the metrical system.

The characteristics of the Proto Bengali language as presented by the charya songs may be briefly mentioned.

1. The tendency of contraction of contiguous vowels and the tendency of the vowels to be of a uniform metrical length. 2. The gender distinction in the declension of noun is almost lost. 3. There is no plural form as such in the declension of noun, and also in the declension of verb except in the first person. 4. Only the present indicative and the imperative forms are inherited from Old Indic. The preterite is newly formed from verbal derivatives. So also the future. 5. Inflected forms in the noun are confined to the nominative and the instrumented-locative only. New inflections have appeared and new postposition have taken place of oblique case-endings. The genitive [ra] has cast off its adjectival nature. 6. A large number of idioms have appeared which have helped to overcome the slender grammatical fetters.

Until the arrival of the Turks the vernacular was neglected by not only the scholars but also by the common people in their ordinary business. Sanskrit was the State Language as is indicated by the inscriptions of land grants. It appears that official business was carried on in a broken style of Sanskrit mixed with Avahattha and Vernacular. Of this language we have no contemporary record. But we can make almost a sure guess from the language of Sekashubhodaya (c. 1600).

Muslim invasion and occupation of the country in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries made it necessary for the people of Bengal to use their vernacular for the daily business transactions and public affair as the language of higher administration was now Persian. Brahmins and other business-minded men of the upper classes did not hesitate to learn Persian. This bilingualism in the higher classes of active and public men served to stimulate the vernacular which, as a result, passed from its inadequate proto or old stage to a fully viable middle stage. Consequently the Bengali language was in full use towards the end of the fourteenth or the beginning of the fifteenth century. The influence of Persian, however, never ceased till its replacement by English in the fourth decade of the nineteenth century.

The salient characteristics of the Bengali language at its middle stage (c. 1500-c. 1750) are as follows:

1. Contiguous vowels were either contracted or separated by the semi-vowel [w] represented very often by [y]. 2. The nasal before a consonant was weakened, and in the central dialect it was dropped after nasalizing the preceding vowel. 3. Syllables had the tendency to become monometric. 4. The final [a] after a single consonant had a tendency to elide. The elision was complete by the beginning of the seventeenth century. 5. The ‘payar’ metre was fully developed. 6. The plural forms for pronouns and nouns were evolved from or with the help of Persian. 7. The preterite and future tense forms became fixed. 8. Conjunctives and participles as well as compound tenses were evolved from the verbal nouns ending in [a] or [i]. 9. The vocabulary of Old Indic was always and largely drawn upon. 10. Persian (and Arabic and Turkish) element in the vocabulary were ever on the increase. 11. It developed a mixed language for literary song and verse.

Middle Bengali produced a large and significant literature. Chaitanya’s movement gave the language and the literature such a mighty push that by the middle of the sixteenth century it evolved into a highly developed New Indic language. The ‘payar’ metre became a very mobile instrument. This mobility of the ‘payar’, however, prevented the development of prose. As a matter of fact versification in ‘payar’ was so easy and facile that even after the vogue of prose writing in the beginning of the nineteenth century some type of text books continued to be written in verse till the end of the third decade of the century.

The mixed language for song and verse was really a continuation of Avahattha poetry over-lapped with local vernaculars like Maithili and Bengali. The language has been given the name Brajabuli (the tongue of Vraja).

LANGUAGE-BENGALI

Some of the best treasures of Vaishnava songs from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century were mostly written in Brajabuli. Even Rabindranath Tagore in his young days wrote songs in this language.

Since the late sixteenth century when Bengal was conquered by the Mughals and became a part of the empire, the influence of Persian in the native language became greater. During the previous Pathan rule administrative work at the lower level was done entirely in the native language. (In the independent states on some border areas all transactions high and low were done in Sanskrit and Bengali). The Mughal administration introduced Persian at all stages, and as a result the language of the work-a-day began to differ from the domestic and literary language of the people. But there was a heavy pressure of Persian on the vocabulary and from this pressure a separate vocabulary began to grow at first slowly but from the late seventeenth century rather fast. Businessmen had daily and close contact with the Persian speaking people and Persian had already become the lingua franca in Northern India. The influence of Persian in the cultural field was also reflected on the literary style so that the best poet of the eighteenth century, Bharatchandra Ray, had to confess that he was compelled to mix Persian in his style as otherwise it would lose elegance and verve.
